[I] Upon the Prince's landing he appeared in arms for him.] He had concerted meaſures with the Earl of Danby, the Lord Delamere, Sir Scroop How, and ſome few others of the greateſt quality and intereſt in thoſe parts. They had at firſt an eye upon the Prince's landing in the North, and when diſappointed of thoſe hopes, they ſtill continued their preparations, and waited for him as their Deliverer. In the mean time the Earl treated with many of his friends and neighbours; but he found them reflecting upon the Duke of Monmouth's unhappy attempt. He had the hearts and wiſhes of many, who dared not to ſtir their hands. Some expectations were not anſwered, and even ſome promiſes were evaded. When the Prince was driven back by a ſtorm, and the King was doing ſome fair things to pleaſe the people, his Lordſhip was then in danger of being delivered up, or at leaſt of being left alone. He did however keep himſelf and ſervants, and ſome few of his friends, in a readineſs and ſilent preparation. They talk'd over the ſcene, which they had laid, in feigned words and phraſes; and when any ſuſpected company ſeemed to underſtand them, they fell into other inventions of ſecrecy and reſerve. As ſoon as he heard of the Prince's landing in the Weſt, he began to move, and reſolved to run the utmoſt hazards for the public ſafety. He marched firſt with a ſmall retinue to the County-town of Derby, and invited many of the Gentry, and entertained thoſe, who adventured to come to his open table, with freedom and diſcourſe. He called out the Mayor and Commonalty, and read to them the Prince's Declaration, and made a ſeaſonable Comment upon it, and delivered to them a paper of the Declaration made by himſelf, and the Nobility and Gentry with him, dated November 21, 1688, "that they would to their utmoſt defend the Proteſtant Religion, the Laws of the Kingdom, and the "Rights and Liberties of the Subject." While his Lordſhip was in this town, a Meſſenger came from London with a Letter in the heel of his boot, ſo much ſoaked in water and dirt, that it could hardly be made legible. The contents were to ſignify the return of King James to Saliſbury, and the advance of the Prince's Army toward London. This occaſioned great joy, but in the midſt of it another Courier arrived with an account directly contrary, and left the wiſeſt of them in ſuſpence, and the reſt in conſternation. The Popiſh Party made their advantage of it, and began to form a plot for ſecurlng the Earl and his company, if they had not left the place with greater expedition. From hence his Lordſhip marched to Nottingham, where the people were well affected; and the Nobility and Gentry ſoon made a number and figure very conſiderable. The Earl at the head of them thought fit to unite them in a declaration of their ſenſe and reſolution; which was accordingly made, and unanimouſly ſubſcribed Novem. 22d upon this profeſſed principle; We own it rebellion to reſiſt a King, that governs by Law; but he was always accounted a tyrant, that made his will the law; and to reſiſt ſuch an one we juſtly eſteem no rebellion, but a neceſſary and juſt defence. This Declaration was thought to be ſo juſt and honourable, that many others came daily into it, and were formed into regular troops, and made the appearance of a confederate Army. While her Royal Highneſs, Devonſhire, which with his Garter, and white Staff, and Juſticeſhip in Eyre, was as much honour as an Engliſh ſubject could enjoy. After Queen Mary's death, when the Adminiſtration of the Government in the King's abſence was to be intruſted in the hands of his honourable ſubjects, the Duke was one of the Lords Juſtices of England for ſeven ſucceſſive years, a continual honour that happened to no other Peer except him, and Dr. Teniſon Archbiſhop of Canterbury. In the caſe of Sir John Fenwick, though he had a conviction of his guilt, yet he was ſo averſe to any extraordinary judicial proceedings, that he oppoſed the Bill, as he did likewiſe another Bill for the reſumption of Eſtates in Ireland. Upon Queen Anne's acceſſion he was continued in his high office and other ſtations, and ſerved her Majeſty with a grateful reverence to the memory of King William [K]. At the Coronation of the Queen he was again Lord High Steward for the day. In Parliament he was active for ſecuring the Proteſtant Religion, and declaring war againſt France and Spain, and for ſupporting her Majeſty in her Alliances, to carry on the common cauſe of Europe; and within this firſt year of her reign, he was one of the Commiſſioners on the part of England to treat of an Union with Scotland. He was now in the attempt, and within few years in the accompliſhment of that great work. He oppoſed the Bill for preventing Occaſional Conformity in 1702. He was a manager for the Lords in a free conference with the Commons in March 170$\frac{4}{5}$, in the great cauſe of Aſhby and White, wherein the rights and privileges of the two Houſes, and the liberty and the protection of the people, and the regularity of Writs of Error, &c. were argued and defended with great judgment and learning. In April following he waited on the Queen to Cambridge, and was there created Doctor in Law [L] with the Dukes of Grafton and Bolton, his own ſon the Marquis of Hartington, and many others of the Nobility and Gentry. He died after a ſevere indiſpoſition [M] in Devonſhire Houſe in Piccadilly Auguſt the 18th 1707, in the 67th year of his age. His Funeral Sermon was preached by Dr. White Kennet, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough, in the Church of All-Hallows in Derby, September the 5th 1707; a paſſage in which Sermon relating to repentance gave great offence to ſome perſons [N].

We

Highneſs, the Princeſs Anne, was under a neceſſity of providing for the ſecurity of her own Perſon, ſhe went from London with the Biſhop of that See, the Earl of Dorſet, and a ſmall train of Ladies, on Sunday night, Novem. 25th. When ſhe was firſt miſſing, the people were ſo enraged, that they threatned to tear in pieces ſome of the Papiſts in Whitehall, upon a ſuſpicion, that they had committed violence againſt her; but they were ſoon ſatisfied by a very decent Letter, which her Royal Highneſs left for the Queen, and by the news, that ſhe was going to Nottingham. In her journey a rumour was induſtriouſly ſpread, that a party of the enemies would intercept her; upon which the Earl of Devonſhire marched out with a good body of Horſe, and at ſome miles diſtance from the town met her Royal Highneſs with great reſpect and joy, and conducted her to the caſtle, (from whence the Earl of Nottingham had withdrawn,) and kept tables at his own expence, and provided all the other accommodations of a Court and a ſtanding Council. When his ſtock failed, he accepted of ſome contributions, and at laſt borrowed the public money in ſuch a manner, as to ſatisfy the collectors, and pleaſe the Country. When a copy of the Aſſociation came, he readily went into it, and was followed by thoſe, who were moſt hearty in the cauſe. When ſome were ſo cautious as to decline it, he waved their refuſal with great temper; but when they afterwards upon a nearer proſpect of ſucceſs offer'd to ſubſcribe, he then check'd them for their former warineſs, and ſaid that there was now no need of their doing it. The Princeſs being extremely ſatisfied with her reception, propoſed to go towards Oxford, to be nearer his Royal Highneſs Prince George, who had joined himſelf to the Prince of Orange, with the Lord Churchill, the Dukes of Ormond and Grafton, &c. Upon this motion the Earl of Devonſhire and his noble Train were a guard to her Royal Highneſs, and by eaſy and moſt convenient ſtages conducted her ſafe to Oxford, where ſhe was ſoon after met by her Conſort the Prince. The Earl next day haſted with a private friend or two to London; and hearing that the Prince of Orange was come as far as Sion-Houſe, he reſolved to meet him the next morning, and came thither to the Prince as he was taking coach, and was received by him with all the marks of affection and eſteem (11).

(11) Kennet's Memoirs, pag. 146-155.

[K] Served her Majeſty with a grateful reverence to the memory of King William.] When a report was induſtriouſly ſpread, that a project had been formed in prejudice to her Majeſty's Succeſſion to the Crown, and that a paper tending that way was to be found among the papers of King William; at the deſire of the Houſe of Lords, the Duke was one of the Prime Miniſters appointed by the Queen to inſpect the ſaid papers, and ſoon after they ſeverally declared in the Houſe, "That "they did not ſee or find any paper or papers tending "to the prejudice of her Majeſty, or her ſucceſſion to "the Crown, or which might give any ground or co-"lour for ſuch report." Upon which it was reſolved by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, that the ſaid report was groundleſs, falſe, villainous, and ſcandalous, to the diſhonour of the King's Memory, and tending to the diſſervice of her preſent Majeſty (12).

(12) Idem, pag. 174, 175, 176.

[L] Waited on the Queen to Cambridge, and was there created Doctor in Law.] He had before received a title at Oxford, which he eſteemed an honour; for he had a great reſpect for the Univerſities, and diſliked no part of the education in them, only that he thought the young men were many of them warmed with Politics, before they underſtood the conſtitution of their country (13). He was however tender of the leaſt reflection upon them, and recalled himſelf in theſe lines with good nature and temper:

(13) Kennet, pag. 181, 182.

Say Muſe (ſince no ſurprize or foreign ſtroke
Can hurt her guarded by her walls of Oak,
Since wholeſome laws her liberty tranſfer
To future ages) what can Albion fear?
Can ſhe the dear-bought treaſure throw away?
Have Univerſities ſo great a ſway?
The Muſe is ſilent, cautious to reflect
On Manſions, where the Muſes keep their ſeat.
Barren of thought and niggardly of rhime,
My creeping numbers ſhe forbids to climb.
Vent'ring too far my weary genius fails,
And o'er my drooping ſenſes ſleep prevails.

[M] He died after a ſevere indiſpoſition] "Some "perſons, ſays Dr. Kennet (14), had the vain wick-"edneſs to boaſt, that he died, in their language, like "a man, and in their nicer phraſe, like a Gentleman; "but whatever they mean, he died with repeated "profeſſions of faith, and open declarations of repen-"tance, and evident tokens of charity, and all the "preparatory offices of Religion, i. e. he died like a "Chriſtian." See the Doctor's Funeral Sermon upon him, p. 54, 55, 56.

(14) Memoirs, pag. 185, 186.

[N] A paſſage in which Sermon relating to repentance gave great offence to ſome perſons.] The paſſage is,

We ſhall give the Duke's character in the Note [O].

is that, where ſpeaking of a late repentance, he ſays (15), that this rarely happens but in men of diſtinguiſhed ſenſe and judgment. Ordinary abilities may be altogether ſunk by a long vitious courſe of life. The duller flame is eaſily extinguiſhed. The meaner ſinful wretches are commonly given up to a reprobate mind, and die as ſtupidly as they lived; while the nobler and brighter parts have an advantage of underſtanding the worth of their ſouls before they reſign it. If they are allowed the benefit of ſickneſs, they commonly awake out of their dream of ſin, and reflect and look upward. They acknowledge an infinite Being; they feel their own immortal part; they recollect and reliſh the Holy Scriptures; they call for the Elders of the Church; they think what to anſwer at a judgment-ſeat. " Not that " God, continues the Doctor, is a reſpecter of perſons, " but the difference is in men, and the more intelli- " gent nature is the more ſuſceptive of Divine Grace. " It was an effect of Solomon's wiſdom to ſee at laſt " his Vanity, and to leave his penitence upon record. " We have had in our own age and nation men of " illuſtrious honour and of the moſt celebrated parts, " who had been carried away by the courſe of this " world into extravagant vices and follies, and yet " upon the proſpect of death, theſe men of under- " ſtanding have felt the excellent ſpirit to move with- " in them; they have retracted their looſe opinions; " they have repented of their grievous ſins; they have " made their peace with God, and have died, nay " have ſometimes recovered and lived, like true un- " feigned Chriſtian Converts. So great are the powers " of Religion to work moſt upon the largeſt capacities." The Author of the life of Biſhop Kennet, printed at London 1730 in 8vo. vindicates this Sermon from the imputations caſt upon it; and tells us (16), that it had been inſinuated by ſome, that the Preacher had built a bridge to heaven for men of wit and parts, but that the duller ſort of mankind muſt not hope to paſs that way; when yet he had ſaid nothing at all to that effect, but in this ſound truth, that the more underſtanding a man has, the ſooner he may come to a ſenſe of God and Religion. He ſays nothing, but what common experience and obſervation juſtifies, that the ignorant and unnurtured multitude are not in the nature of the thing ſo likely to be wrought upon by the powers of Religion, as wiſe and underſtanding men, thoſe of a higher and better education.

(15) Pag. 54, & ſeq.

Earl of Marlborough, Lord Rochester, &c.

Sir Duncomb Colcheſter, &c.

(16) Pag. 40, 41.

[O] We ſhall give the Duke's character in the note.] He deſpiſed the Philoſophy, as much as he abhorred the Politics of Mr. Hobbes (17). He had a reverence for the Scriptures, and read them with a diligent eye, and defended whatever he thought the fundamental doctrines in them. " He looked deep into the Soci- " nian controverſy, and declared his judgment freely " againſt thoſe pretenders to reaſon; and was as " much offended at any advocates, who (he thought) " helped to betray the orthodox cauſe (18)." He treated the Biſhops with great eſteem and reſpect, and all the Clergy with a decent regard to their function; and never made his company uneaſy to them or to any others by a profane jeſt, or by any ſhocking expreſſion. His greateſt rebuke to a Clergyman, who meddled in ſome affairs, which his Lordſhip thought not pertinent to him, was only this, Sir, remember you are to preach on Sunday next (19). He read the Roman Authors with great attention. Tacitus was his favourite, whom he read over with many juſt reflections, maſtering the ſenſe, and imbibing the ſpirit of the Writer, and digeſting his notions of liberty and power (20). It was his greateſt ambition to love and ſerve good Princes. This put him upon ordering his monument to ſhine with this inſcription. WILLELMUS DUX DEVON. Bonorum Principum fidelis ſubditus; inimicus & inviſus tyrannis: i. e. " William " Duke of Devonſhire; a faithful ſubject to good " Princes; an enemy to tyrants, and hated by them." He valued no other political character. His bearing a near relation to moſt of the noble families in England gave him, as he thought, a larger ſhare in the common care and concern for the privileges of the Peers, and rights of the people. He ſeemed to be made for a Patriot (21). He hated the very name of a tyrant; his pen was never ſharp but on that ſubject (22). In a Poem of his, intitled An Alluſion to the Biſhop of Cambray's ſupplement to Homer, he has theſe lines:

(17) Kennet's Funeral Sermon, pag. 43.

(18) Idem, Memoirs, pag. 169.

(19) Idem, ibid. pag. 170.

(20) Idem, Funeral Sermon, pag. 42.

(21) Idem, ibid. pag. 51, 52.

(22) Idem, Memoirs, pag. 167.

O deſpicable ſtate of all, that groan
Under a blind dependency on one!
How far inferior to the herds, that range
With native freedom o'er the woods and plains?
With them no ſallacies of ſchool prevail;
Nor of a Right Divine the nauſeous tale
Can give to one among themſelves the power,
Without controul his fellows to devour.
To reaſoning human kind alone belong
The arts to hurt themſelves by reaſoning wrong.

His mein and aſpect were engaging and commanding; his addreſs and converſation civil and courteous in the higheſt manner. He judged right in the ſupreme Court, and upon any important affair his ſpeeches were ſmooth and weighty. As a Stateſman his whole deportment came up to his noble birth and his eminent ſtations; nor did he want any of what the world calls accompliſhments. He had a fine hand in Muſic, and an elegant taſte in painting and all politer arts, with a ſpirit, which was continually improving his judgment in them. In Architecture he had a genius, and a ſkill and experience beyond any one perſon in the age; and his ſeat at Chatſworth for beauty and magnificence is not perhaps exceeded by any Palace in Europe. He had a great ſkill in languages, and was a true judge in Hiſtory, and a critic in Poetry (23), in which kind we have two Pieces of his compoſition: I. An Ode on the death of Queen Mary, which Mr. Dryden is ſaid to have preferred to all that was written on that occaſion (24). II. An Alluſion to the Biſhop of Cambray's Supplement to Homer. He was a Poet not by genius only, but by learning and judgment. The Lord Roſcommon made him a conſtant reviſer of his immortal lines. He was a maſter of Horace, and would talk of the other Antients with great reliſh and knowledge. He had nothing profane or indecent in any line; and knew the difference between the wit and the Gentleman, and nicely obſerved it (25).

T.

(23) Idem, Funeral Sermon, pag. 52, 53.

(24) Idem, Memoirs, pag. 172.

(25) Idem, ibid. pag. 172, 173.

☞CAVENDISH (WILLIAM), ſecond Duke of Devonſhire, ſon of the preceding, after the peace of Riſwick, made a tour to France, and in the 7th of King William III, was elected one of the Knights for the County of Derby, as alſo in two other Parliaments in that reign, and was choſen one of the Knights for Yorkſhire, in the two firſt Parliaments called by Queen Anne. He married Rachel, eldeſt of the two daughters of William Lord Ruſſel, and ſiſter of Wriotheſley Duke of Bedford; and by her, who died December the 28th 1725, had four ſons and ſix daughters [A]. While he was Marquis of Hartington, Queen Anne conſtituted him Captain of the Yeomen of the Guard; and

[A] Had four ſons and ſix daughters.] His ſons were, I. Lord WILLIAM, the preſent Duke of Devonſhire, born in 1698, who married, on the 27th of March 1718, Catherine, ſole daughter and heir of John Hoſkins of the county of Middleſex, Eſq; and by her had iſſue now living three ſons and three daughters, viz. William, ſtiled Marquis of Hartington; George, to whom his Majeſty was Godfather; Frederick, to whom his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales was Godfather; the Lady Caroline, to whom her preſent Majeſty was Godmother; and the Ladies Elizabeth and Rachel. II. Lord JAMES, who in April 1730 was made Captain of a Company in the third Regiment of Guards. III. Lord CHARLES, who is a Fellow of the and ſucceeding his father in his honours, her Majeſty likewiſe conferred on him his places of dignity and truſt, with this compliment, "that ſhe had loſt a loyal ſubject and a good "friend in his father, but did not doubt to find them both again in the ſon." September the 8th 1707 he was declared and ſworn Lord Steward of the Houſhold and one of the Privy Council; and on the 29th of October conſtituted Warden and Chief Juſtice in Eyre of all her Majeſty's Foreſts, Parks, Chaces, and Warrens, North of Trent, as alſo Lord Lieutenant and Cuſtos Rotulorum for the County of Derby. On the change of the Miniſtry in 1710 he reſigned his places; but having been elected a Knight of the Order of the Garter, he was inſtalled December the 22d the ſame year. On the demiſe of Queen Anne, Auguſt the 1ſt 1714, he was appointed by King George I one of the Lords Juſtices of Great Britain, till he arrived from Hanover; and September the 24th following declared Lord Steward of the Houſhold; and October the 1ſt ſworn of the Privy Council, and on the 9th appointed Lord Lieutenant and Cuſtos Rotulorum of the County of Derby. In 1716 reſigning his office of Lord Steward of the Houſhold, he was the next day declared Lord Preſident of the Council; from which honourable poſt he retired April the 16th 1717, when ſeveral of the Nobility and Perſons of Honour reſigned their places. June the 11th 1720 he was a ſecond time appointed one of the Lords Juſtices of Great Britain, whilſt his Majeſty went to Hanover, as he was a third time June the 3d 1723; and on the 27th of March 1725 was declared Preſident of the Council. June the 3d 1725 he was a fourth time appointed one of the Lords Juſtices during his Majeſty's abſence; and on the 31ſt of May 1727, a fifth time, when on the 11th his Majeſty died at Oſnabrug. September the 10th 1727 he was by his Majeſty King George II again made Lord Lieutenant and Cuſtos Rotulorum for the County of Derby; and on the 20th of the ſame month declared Preſident of the Council; and November the 13th following appointed one of the Governors of the Charter-Houſe. He died June the 4th 1729, and was ſucceeded in his honours by the preſent Duke of Devonſhire. His Grace's Arms are Sable, three Harts Heads caboſh'd, Argent, attir'd, Or; and his Creſt, on a Wreath a Snake noue, proper. The Motto, Cavendo tutus (a).

(a) See Collins's Peerage of England, vol. 1. pag. 125, 126, 127, 128.

the Royal Society, and was on the 15th of April 1725, elected Member of Parliament for the Borough of Heyteſbury in the county of Wilts, as in 1727 he was for the city of Weſtminſter; and in 1728 was appointed one of the Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber to his Royal Highneſs Frederick Prince of Wales. In the preſent Parliament is Knight of the Shire for the County of Derby. On Jan. the 9th 172⅞ his Lordſhip married the Lady Anne de Grey, third daughter to Henry Duke of Kent, who died in September 1733. IV. Lord JOHN, who died May the 10th 1720. His Grace's daughters were, I. Lady MARY who died June the 15th 1719; II. Lady RACHEL; III. Lady ELIZABETH, married, on the 2d of July 1723, to Sir Thomas Lowther, of Hocker in the county of Lancaſter, Bart. IV. Lady Catherine, married, on the 14th of May 1723, to William Morgan of Tredegar in the county of Monmouth Eſq; who on the 27th of May 1725 was made Knight of the Bath. V. Lady ANNE. VI. Lady DIANA, who died February the 12th 172⅝.

T.

(d) Riolan, Recherches des Echoles de Medicine, pag. 184.
(e) And not in the year 1499, as Konig ſays, Bibliotb. pag. 178.
(f) See Geſner, Bibliotb. fol. 286.

CAULIAC (GUI DE) a Phyſician of the Univerſity of Montpelier (a), and Author of a Treatiſe of Chirurgery, which is very much eſteemed [A], flouriſhed in the fourteenth Century. He ſtudied at Paris under Henry de Hermondavilla, firſt Phyſician to Philip the Fair (b). He was Phyſician to Pope Urban V (c), and to Pope Clement VI (d). He was at Montpellier, and pretty much advanced in years when he wrote his Treatiſe of Chirurgery in the year 1363. He mentions it with a great deal of modeſty, and as a work, in which he had only collected what he had read in the beſt Authors (f).

(a) 'Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franç. pag. 519.
(b) Riolan, Recherches des Echoles de Medecine, pag. 196, 213.
(c) See Lindenius Renovatus, pag. 368.

[A] He is the author of a Treatiſe of Chirurgery, which is very much eſteemed.] It would be an endleſs taſk, to rehearſe the names of all thoſe who have either tranſlated it, or procured new editions of it with notes, or with ſupplements (1). Let us only name a few. . . John "Tayant, a very learned Phyſician, has enlarged and "improved the Chirurgery of Gui de Cauliac, which is "borrowed from the Arabians, and from the Chirurgery "of the Greeks. He has ſet it off in his fine Latin, "which is as correct as that of Cicero, tho' the ſub-"ject they have treated, be very different (2)." They printed at Lyons in 1579, the Chirurgery of Gui de Cauliac, newly reſtored to its dignity, by Lawrence Soubert, who beſides his new tranſlation (in French) has added ſeveral curious obſervations in the margin (3).

(1) See Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 519.
(2) Riolan, Recherch. des Echoles de Medecine, pag. 2, 3.
(3) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 785.

(b) Eleven years at Amiens, and nine at other places, Des Caurres, Oeuvres Morales, liv. 6. chap. 43. fol. m. 355 verſo.

CAURRES (JOHN DES) a native of Morœul (a) in Picardy, was Principal of the College of Amiens, and Canon of St. Nicholas in the ſame City. He had been a teacher of youth twenty years (b) when he publiſhed in 1575, a work, of which I ſhall ſpeak below [A]. He publiſhed ſome other books, the titles of which are given by la Croix du Maine, and Du Verdier Vau-Privas. He was ſtill living in the year 1584, and continued to be uſeful to the public, as well by his learned works, as by his inſtructing the youth, which was

(a) And not Moroent, as Du Verdier Vau-Privas ſays, Bibl. Franç. pag. 666.

[A] He publiſhed a work, of which I ſhall ſpeak below.] It is intitled, Oeuvres morales, & diverſifiées en Hiſtoires pleines de beaux Exemples, enrichies d'enſeignemens vertueux, & embellies de pluſieurs Sentences, & Diſcours. Le tout tiré des plus ſignalez & remarquables Auteurs Grecs, Latins, & François, qui ont écrit de tous temps pour l'enſeignement des toutes perſonnes, qui aſpirent a vertu & Philoſophie Chreſtienne. i. e. "Moral "Works, interſperſed with Hiſtories abounding with "noble inſtances of virtue, and adorned with beautiful "and inſtructive ſentences. The whole collected from "the moſt eminent and celebrated Authors, both "Greek, Latin and French; who wrote at any time "for the improvement of thoſe, that deſire to attain "at the knowledge of virtue and Chriſtian Philoſo-"phy." He cauſed this work to be printed at Paris by William Chaudiere, in the year 1575, 8vo. It contains 357 leaves. I have not ſeen the edition of the year 1583, which is half as large again (1). It was an eaſy taſk for the Author to make additions to ſuch a work; for he did not conſult the originals, but only tranſcribed modern Compilers, as Du Verdier Vau-Priva was committed to his care in the College of Amiens (c). He would meddle with Poetry, and made ſome very indifferent verſes in French. Thoſe he wrote upon the death of Admiral Coligni, and upon the execution of the Count de Montgomery, were full of the moſt bitter invectives; he was not even aſhamed of writing an Ode in praiſe of the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's-day. All theſe pieces are printed in the 4th book of his Moral Works. He had a very great opinion of his own merit, and thought that his eminent qualifications had expoſed him to the perſecutions of the envious [B]. He has acquainted me with a particular which was entirely unknown to me; namely, that there was a time when it was the faſhion for women to wear a looking glaſs upon their belly [C]. I do not know whether he was ever quoted amongſt the Roman Catholic Authors, who relate the ſtory of Pope Joan; but he deſerved it; for he relates that ſtory, without doubting of it in the leaſt (d).

(1) La Croix du Maine, Bibliotb. Françoiſe, pag. 214.

(c) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 214.

(d) Des Caurres, Oeuvres Morales, liv. 5. chap. 16. fol. m. 225, verſo.

Privas very well obſerves. He has borrowed and collected his Moral Works, word for word, from ſeveral French Authors and Tranſlators, as the Anthology of Peter Breſlay of Anjou, the Commentary of John Coras upon the ſentence of Martin Guerre, James Grevin's Tranſlation of the Books concerning the Impoſtures of Devils, and from ſeveral other Books (2).

(2) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 666.

It muſt be obſerved, that this Compiler ſtrangely falſifies and miſrepreſents things, or borrows them from very bad Authors; here follows an inſtance of this. He ſays, that Caligula's cruel temper was owing to his nurſe; and proves it after this manner: "Dion, a "Greek Hiſtorian, relates, that this cruel man was "in his infancy nurſed by a country-woman of Italy, "named Priſcilla, who has as much hair on her breaſt, "as men have beard on their chin; which is not na-"tural to women; and who could run the ring, "manage a horſe, ſhoot an arrow with ſo much dex-"terity, that few young Gentlemen at Rome could "be compared to her. It happened once, as ſhe was "going to give Caligula the breaſt, that one of her "ſervant-maids did ſomething amiſs; at which Priſ-"cilla fell into ſuch a paſſion, that ſhe killed her on "the ſpot; and beſmeared her breaſt with the maid's "blood, ſo that Caligula ſucked it in ſeveral times "and in a great quantity. She followed in this the "cuſtom of country-women, who paint their breaſt "with goat's blood, which they ſay make the chil-"dren grow ſtrong and luſty (3)." It is not true, that Dion relates this; when I read it in Des Caurres's Book I ſuſpected, that he ſtole it from Antonio de Guevara; and having conſulted his Horloge des Princes, I found that my conjecture was true. This Spaniſh Impoſtor (4) relates this pretended ſtory of Caligula's nurſe, as though he had read it in Dion, in the ſecond Book of the Cæſars. Des Caurres has tranſcribed many other things from Antonio de Guevara, without quoting him, and without denying himſelf the liberty of diſguiſing them a little.

(3) Des Caurres, Oeuvres Morales, liv. 2. chap. 25. folio 73.

(4) Antoine de Guevara, Horloge des Princes, liv. 2. chap. 21. pag. m. 703.

[B] He thought that his eminent qualities had expoſed him to the perſecutions of the envious.] He dedicates his Moral Works to Monſeigneur Antoine, Sieur de Crequi, and does not forget the common topic, that he did it, in hopes that ſo illuſtrious a name being prefixed to his work, he might thereby be able to reſiſt and repulſe the attacks of the Zoilus's, the perpetual diſturbers of the happineſs of men (5). (For I can aſſure you, my Lord, continues he, that if we believe, as far as Further excluſively: in the printed copy folio a iiii verſo of the Dedication prefixed to the Moral Works of John des Caurres. Paris, printed for Will. Chaudiere, 1575, 8vo. This Edition muſt be had, becauſe the Dedication is not printed in that of 1583 *.) Compare this with the remark [C] of ANTESIGNANUS.

(5) Epitre Dedic. des Oeuvres de Des Caurres, folio a iiii verſo.

* Theſe words, which we have put in a parentheſis, are not in the edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary publiſhed in 1720. I ſuppoſe they were taken from ſome papers found in his ſtudy after his death. They ſeem to be only a memorandum; and perhaps Mr. Bayle intended to tranſcribe ſomething more from Des Caurres's Dedication. ADDIT. REM.]

[C] He has acquainted me ... that it was the faſhion for women to wear a looking-glaſs upon their belly.] I believe, that this faſhion did not laſt long; but it may be of ſome uſe to obſerve, that it was once in vogue. John des Caurres cenſures it very bitterly. I ſhall tranſcribe a long paſſage, in which he condemns ſome other faſhions. "And here, (Ladies) I muſt aſk you, "whether you can poſſibly be acceptable to God, and "be ſaved, when you practiſe what he forbids? By "no means; and, whether you will or not, you muſt "either untwiſt, unbat, and unnet your hair, that "is, not wear it dreſſed in the manner of bat's wings, "and like nets, to catch the men diabolically, in or-"der to ſatisfy your diſorderly luſt, or you muſt be loſt "or damned for ever. For this is certainly a thing "prohibited both in the Old and New Teſtament. "If the King had forbidden, you would be forced to "obey; but as for God's Commandments, you will "not mind them, and will die, (as it is ſaid) in your "diſobedience and obſtinacy, thro' that worldly va-"nity and pride, which deceives you, and which "even makes you look ſo ugly and ſo abominable, "that if you knew, how much that hair-dreſs miſ-"becomes you, you would rather burn it than wear "it. Would to God, it was lawful to call all thoſe, "who appear in ſuch a dreſs, whores and proſtitutes "in order to reclaim them. O Lord! in what un-"happy times do we live! to ſee ſuch a deprava-"tion of manners, that even at church the women "wear looking-glaſſes, the inticements to lewdneſs, "hanging upon their belly. Conſult all the Hiſtories, "divine, human, and profane, and you will not find, "that even common proſtitutes ever wore them in "public, till this day, that the Devil is got looſe a-"mongſt us in France. This is ſtill more abominable "before God and men, than all the other abomina-"tions. And altho' none but Courtezans and maſked "Ladies wear them now, yet in time every Citizen's "wife, and every chamber-maid will follow the "faſhion, as they already begin to do (6)."

(6) Des Caurres, Oeuvres Morales, liv. 6. chap. 11, folio 305.

CAUSSIN (NICHOLAS) a French Jeſuit, and Confeſſor to Lewis XIII ſurnamed the Juſt, was born at Troyes in Champagne (a), in the year 1580. At the age of twenty ſix he entered into the Order of the Jeſuits, and gained a great reputation by teaching Rhetoric in ſeveral of their Colleges. He began afterwards to preach (b), and as the reputation he gained that way, was kept up and encreaſed by the books he publiſhed, it was thought he deſerved to be made ghoſtly Father to the King. He did not diſcharge the duties of his function to the ſatisfaction of the Prime-Miniſter [A], and it is the

(a) His father practiſed Phyſic there. Eloge du Pere Cauſſin, prefixed to the Cour Sainte.

(b) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 351.

[A] It was thought he deſerved to be made Ghoſtly Father to the King. He did not diſcharge the duties of his function to the ſatisfaction of the Prime Miniſter.] F. Cauſſin's diſgrace at Court was one of thoſe events, about which men think much, and talk but little, and of which the cauſe is never preſently underſtood. However the Public has had ſome knowledge of it. It is pretended, that a little before this Jeſuit died, he gave to one of his friends the originals of ſome of his Letters, written in his own hand, to the General of his Order, to Father Seguiran, and to the Prince of Condé. It appears by ſome extracts of theſe Letters, which have been publiſhed (1), that Father Cauſſin fell under this diſgrace, becauſe he would not reveal ſome things, which common opinion, that it was because he behaved himself as an honest man ought to do. Some Authors assert, that he suffered himself to be deceived by the artifices of a Jesuit of the Duke of Savoy's Court [B]. There is some probability that he caballed, to get Cardinal Moreri has not been less mysterious than the two Jesuits who published the Bibliotheque of the Writers of their Order; he mentions neither this employment of F. Cauffin, nor his banishment from Court.

(1) See the Entretiens d'Eudoxe & d'Euchariſte ſur l'Hiſtoire de l'Arianiſme & ſur l'Hiſtoire des Iconoclaſtes du Pere Maimbourg, reprinted in Holland in the year 1683. That book was burnt at Paris by the common Hangman, in 1674.

which he knew by the King's confession, not even take advice of his superiors, how he was to behave himself in the direction of the King's conscience, when he could not do it, without breaking thro' the laws of confession. There are some hints in the same extracts, which shew, that he did not approve Lewis XIII's conduct towards the Queen his Mother. Now, this was the most proper means to exasperate the Cardinal. Mr. de la Barde has observed, that his Eminence caused F. Cauffin to be removed, because he raised scruples in the King's mind about the hardships, which Mary de Medicis suffered. Hic postea Ludovici XIII Regis Confessarius fuit, qui quoniam ei scrupulum injecerat, de Mariâ Reginâ Matre haud satis pie habitâ, atque Aulâ & Regni finibus abscedere coactâ, Aulâ & ipse Richelii operâ, cui cum Maria litis intercessere, successere prudens jussus fuerat (2). The Author of Father Cauffin's Elogium very justly observes, that we ought to have a very great esteem for a man, who chose rather to draw upon himself the indignation of such a Cardinal, by following the dictates of his conscience, than to do the least thing against it in order to please that Minister. "It must be confessed, in honour to this generous "Father, that his conduct at Court was such as deserves to be had in admiration; he forced the whole "Court to own with astonishment, that he had an "uncommon generosity and strength of mind, since "being to cope with a man, who was powerful enough "either to load him with favours, or to crush him in "a moment, yet he never courted his favour, either "for himself or his friends, and did so little dread a "disgrace, that he rather chose to suffer in his own "person, than to do the least thing inconsistent with "the duty of a faithful Confessor. This indeed is a "very great encomium; [St. Augustin bestowed it on "his dear Alypius"; but it suits perfectly well with "the generous R. Cauffin's character; and is more glorious to him, than a thousand other things, that might "be said of him." The Author of this Elogium did not know, that F. Cauffin's Letters concerning his disgrace are in the hands of the Jansenists (4); who thinks they are lost; for he says, "I know that this affair was a "very great secret, and that when it happened, it "was ascribed by the public to very different reasons: but time has at last reconciled the various opinions of men, and the truth of the matter being "known, this heroic and glorious action has appeared in its full light. He had given an account of it "himself in an excellent Letter, which has been unluckily lost, and deserved yet to be published for the "satisfaction of the curious, if it could be found."

It is asserted, that this Jesuit did not believe, that an attrition caused only by the fear of hell was sufficient to justify a man, who take the Sacrament (5); it is even said, that his opinion upon this subject occasioned his disgrace. Monsieur Arnauld will be my voucher. "We have heard from very creditable persons of the late King's Court, that your F. Cauffin, "when he was that Prince's Confessor, thought it his "duty to declare to his Majesty, that this (attrition) "was not sufficient, and that a man could not be justified without the love of God. Cardinal de "Richelieu, who suspected him, took hold of this opportunity, to have him removed, and banished to "Quimper by persuading the King, that the Jesuit's "doctrine was erroneous. It was for this reason also, "that he afterwards employed all his credit to procure "a condemnation of what F. Sequenot had written upon this subject in his observations upon the Book "concerning the holy Virginity; for he told the King, "that F. Sequenot's opinion was the same with Father "Cauffin's, with which the latter had acquainted his "Majesty (6)."

We cannot sufficiently wonder at the silence of Father Alegambe and of his Continuator. The former, who published his Book after F. Cauffin's disgrace, does not even say, that he had been the King's Confessor: and the latter, who published his book after this Jesuit's death, says indeed, that he was Confessor to Lewis XIII, but without a word of his disgrace.

[B] Some Authors assert, that he suffered himself to be deceived by the artifices of a Jesuit, of the Duke of Savoy's Court.] Let us give an Abstract of what Monsieur Aubery published upon this subject (7). Father Monod, the Duchess of Savoy's Confessor, who had a design to embroil the affairs of France, laboured with an uncommon zeal, to have the Queen Mother recalled. For which reason, in his journey to the Court of France, he took care to engage in an intimate friendship with Father Cauffin, who was also a Jesuit, and Confessor to the King, and to have several conferences with him, in which he had no great trouble to win him, and to gain as much power over him, as he desired, being a much greater Statesman and more cunning Courtier than F. Cauffin was, and having as much wit and malice, if we may believe the Cardinal-Duke in some of his Letters, as the other had of simplicity and ignorance: so that having already gained this point, he did not doubt, but he would succeed in his design, and was confident that so devout a Prince, as Lewis XIII was, would follow the directions and counsels of his Confessor in a matter of conscience. And indeed the King appeared very uneasy and anxious, since Father Cauffin had raised new scruples in his mind concerning the banishment of the Queen Mother, and had persuaded him to call her back, against the inclination and advice of his Prime-Minister. The Duke of Savoy acquainted the Cardinal with the correspondence and intrigues of the two Fathers (8). Others say, that they were found out thro' the imprudence of F. Cauffin, who being pressed by the Duke of Angoulême to grant him a Patent for an Abbey of Nuns, gave him to understand, that he must have patience till the Cardinal was removed, which would certainly be within a few days, and that he would then be quickly dispatched. The Duke gave (8) the Cardinal notice of this Father's intrigues; the Prime-Minister was very well pleased with the news, because it explained to him the cause of that great uneasiness under which the King had laboured of late. He endeavoured immediately to find out a remedy against this evil. This remedy was a Note which he wrote to the King, and which very much puzzled the Confessor, who was not proof against so heavy an attack, nor in a condition to resist in this open war. So that finding himself much the weaker, he was forced to submit, and to accept the terms which a powerful adversary would impose upon him, who caused him to be removed in a manner somewhat dishonourable to him, and to be banished to Quimpercorentin in Lower Britany (9). Monsieur Aubery places this under the year 1639; but he furnishes us himself with an argument to prove that he mistook the year. The Cardinal, says he (10), having thus humbled one of the Ghostly Fathers, he could not so easily subdue the other, or at least not so soon, tho' at last he had him punished in a more full and exemplary manner. Some pages lower (10) he tells us, that on the 4th of Jan. 1639 the Duchess of Savoy gave the Cardinal notice, that Father Monod had been arrested. Most of the Historians, I mean those, who set down the year in the margin, are guilty of such blunders, more than it were to be wished. See the remark (G) towards the end.

It follows from this account, tho' one should give it the most favourable turn for the Cardinal, that Father Cauffin's design was only to recall Mary de Medicis. This design might certainly have been lawful; for it is hardly probable that a King can use his mother ill with a safe conscience. But yet it is certain, that considering in what condition France was in at that time, the King could not well keep Mary de Medicis at Court, without exposing the whole Kingdom to a great many disturbances, so much was that Princess then beset with busy persons, who had no other intentions but to imbroil the State. After all, it was very difficult to labour for the restoration of Queen Mary, without a design to ruin the Cardinal. An Author, whom I have quoted above, tells us, that Father Cauffin

(7) In the Life of Cardinal de Richelieu, liv. 6. chap. 16. pag. 474. of the 2d vol. Dutch edition.

(8) The Cardinal himself writes this, as Mr. Aubery asserts. Ibid. pag. 48.

(9) Ibid. pag. 50.

(10) Ibid. chap. 17. pag. 50.

(11) Pag. 63.

(2) Labatiscus, de Rebus Gallicis, lib. 9. sub finem.

(3) Eloge du Père Cauffin, prefixed to the Cour Sainte.

(4) This appears by the Entretiens d'Eudoxe & d'Euchariste, quoted above.

(5) Arnauld, in the last page of the Advertisement prefixed to the IV Denonciation de l'Hérésie du Péché Philosophique.

(6) Ibid.

Mirantibus omnibus insistatum Animam, quæ hominem tantum innumerabilibus præstandi, ostendique artibus celebratum, vel amicum non aspiraret vel non formidaret inimicum. S. Aug. Conf. lib. 6. cap. 10.

Cardinal de Richelieu removed [C]. However that be, he was deprived of his employment, and baniſhed to a City of Britany. He got leave to return to Paris after the Cardinal's death, and died there in the Convent of the Jeſuits July the 2d 1651 [D]. None of his works did him more honour than that which he intitled, La Cour Sainte [E]. He publiſhed ſeveral other books both in Latin and in French [F]. They relate very extraordinary circumſtances of his ſympathy with the Sun (c). The Sieur Bullart has committed ſome blunders with regard to Chronology [G].

(c) See the Remark [G] quotation (28).

I have

ſin laboured effectually to procure a reconciliation between Lewis XIII and the Queen his Conſort, and by that means to put a ſtop to that Princeſs's barrenneſs. This, I think, is moſt probably the ſenſe, which we can put upon that Author's words. Lewis the XIIIth, ſays he (12), gave Father Cauſſin a very free acceſs to him, and being extremely pleaſed with his converſations, granted him a conſiderable ſhare in his favour, and even admitted him with great familiarity. The confidence he repoſed in him was grounded on the knowledge he had of that worthy Father's eminent qualities, by which he had ſo eaſily and ſo ſoon gained his Majeſty's heart. It was not doubted in the leaſt, but the generous and ſtrong inclination he had for his King's ſervice and glory, inſpired him with a very great zeal for the public good, and made him endeavour to eſtabliſh a good underſtanding between all the perſons of the Royal Family, which was the chief deſign of all his actions. And we have been informed by faithful and unqueſtionable witneſſes, that it is to his wiſe Counſels France is partly beholden for the valuable preſent ſhe received from heaven, and ſtill enjoys in the ſacred perſon of her auguſt Prince, the worthy ſon of his father, whoſe great virtues he has inherited.

(12) Eloge du Pere Cauſſin.

[C] There is ſome probability, that he caballed to get Cardinal de Richelieu removed.] If we may believe the Abbé Siri in his Memoirs (13), this Jeſuit, in his private converſations with the King, inſiſted upon the Cardinal's removal for the four following reaſons. 1. Becauſe the Queen-mother was baniſhed. 2. Becauſe his eminence left Lewis XIII only the empty name of King. 3. Becauſe this Miniſter oppreſſed the nation. 4. Becauſe he powerfully aſſiſted the Proteſtants to the great prejudice of the Catholic Church. F. Cauſſin even engaged to maintain theſe four articles againſt the Cardinal in the King's preſence, and he offered the Cardinal's place to the Duke of Angoulême. The Duke having acquainted the Prime Miniſter with this plot, was the occaſion of F. Cauſſin's diſgrace, according to the Abbé Siri.

(13) Tom. 8. pag. 573, &c. They who cannot conſult theſe Memoirs, may read the new Life of Cardinal de Richelieu [By Mr. Le Clerc] publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1694, tom. 2. pag. 312, &c.

[D] He died . . . July the 2d 1651.] Moreri, who was miſtaken with regard to the time when F. Cauſſin entered amongſt the Jeſuits (14), has been ſtill more miſtaken with regard to the year of his death, he places it in 1655. Meſſieurs Bullart and Witte have rightly placed the time of our Jeſuit's death, but then they are in the wrong with regard to the length of his life; the one ſays, that F. Cauſſin died July the 2d 1651 in the 69th year of his age (15); the other pretends, that he died July the 2d, 1651 in his 81ſt year, and in the 57th ſince his entering amongſt the Jeſuits (16). This does not agree, either with F. Alegambe, or with F. Southwell; according to the former Cauſſin entered amongſt the Jeſuits in the year 1606, and was then twenty ſix years old; whence it follows that he died in the 71ſt year of his age, and the 45th ſince he was a Jeſuit. But F. Southwell ſays, that Cauſſin became a Jeſuit at the age of twenty ſix, in the year of 1596; whence it would follow, that he died aged eighty one, and had not been a Jeſuit above 55 years. I think we ought to follow F. Alegambe's account.

(14) He ſays, that Cauſſin turned Monk, in 1605; it was in 1606, according to Alegambe, and in 1596, according to Southwell.

(15) Bullart, Acad. des Scienc. tom. 2. pag. 225.

(16) Witte, Diar. Biograph.

[E] None of his works did him more honour, than that which he entitled, la Cour Sainte.] It has been printed a great many times (17), and tranſlated into Latin, Italian, Spaniſh, Portugueſe, German, and Engliſh (18). The firſt edition of the firſt volume was publiſhed in the year 1625, 8vo. The other volumes followed ſoon after. I ſhall below (19) cenſure Mr. Bullart, who ſays that Cauſſin retired from the Court in order to compoſe his Cour Sainte; he ſhould have ſaid, that he reviſed and enlarged it during his diſgrace.

(17) My edition is of Bruſſels 1664, in 2 vol. 4to. There is another of Paris, 1680, in 2 vol. fol.

(18) Sotuel, Bibliotb. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 627.

(19) Remark [G] quotation (30).

[F] He publiſhed ſeveral other Books both in Latin and in French.] The firſt eſſays of his pen were the ſacred ſymbols, ſome pieces of Poetry inſerted in the Pompe Royale, and the Compariſon between ſacred and profane Eloquence (20). He wrote theſe three Books being ſtill pretty young, as the Author of his Elogium ſays. And yet it is obſerved in the Bibliotheque of the Jeſuit Writers, that the Electorum Symbolorum & Parabolicarum Hiſtoricarum Syntagma, ſeu de Symbolica Ægyptiorum Sapientia & Polybiſtoris Symboliti Libri XII. ("A Commentary upon Symbols and parabolical Hiſtories of the Egyptians; or twelve ſymbolical Books concerning the ſymbolical wiſdom and learning of the Egyptians,") was printed at Paris in 1618; and that the Eloquentiæ ſacræ & humanæ Parallela was printed at la Fléche * in 1690. The Author was then very near forty years old according to Father Alegambe's account, or very near fifty according to Father Southwell's, when he publiſhed theſe two Books. Can it be ſaid of a man of that age, that he is ſtill pretty young? Amongſt his other Works I ſhall take notice chiefly of his apology for the ſociety of the Jeſuits, printed in 1644; his anſwers to the objections concerning Moral Theology; the triumph of Piety, which he publiſhed on occaſion of the taking of Rochelle in 1629; the anſwer which he publiſhed three years after to Mr. Drelincourt's Book (21) againſt that triumph of Piety; the Angelus Pacis, (Angel of Peace) printed in 1650; the Regnum Dei, ſeu Diſſertationes in Libros Regnum cum aliis tractatibus. (The Kingdom of God, or Diſſertations upon the Books of Kings, with ſome other Tracts) printed alſo in the year 1650 (22).

(20) Eloge du Père Cauſſin. See the laſt Remark.

* A ſmall City in the Province of Anjou, in which there is a famous College of the Jeſuits founded by King Henry IV.

(21) This book of Mr. Drelincourt is the 2d Part of the Triomphe de l'Egliſe ſous la Croix. The Author tells us in his Preface, that Cauſſin had made uſe, in his book, of all poſſible artifices, in order to prove, that the taking of Rochelle was an argument that this City was heretical. Mr. Drelincourt confutes this fancy unanſwerably in his Preface.

[G] The Sieur Bullart has committed ſome blunders with regard to Chronology.] I have already obſerved (23) his miſtake concerning Father Cauſſin's age. Let us examine now his other blunders. "It was not "long ſince he (Father Cauſſin) had conſecrated him-"ſelf to God, under the habit and according to "the Statutes of St. Ignatius, when he preſented "the public with the firſt fruits of his labours. It "was a curious Book concerning the Sacred Symbols; "in which the Author diving into the Hieroglyphicks "of the Egyptians, explains the enigmas which an "ancient Writer hid under thoſe myſtical figures (24)."

We have obſerved already, that this Book was printed in 1618, that is, according to Father Alegambe twelve years, according to Southwell twenty two years, after Cauſſin entered amongſt the Jeſuits. As I cannot compare the different editions of the Book De Symbolica Ægyptiorum Sapientia, I deſire thoſe, who have an opportunity to do it, that they would examine, whether the approbation of the Provincial of the Jeſuits be rightly dated in the Edition of Cologne. In my Edition, which is of Cologne, 1631, 8vo, the approbation is dated from la Fleche November the 19th, 1627. I do not doubt but the Printers put 1627 inſtead of 1617: ſo that I will not inſiſt upon this date, to prove that the Book concerning the Hieroglyphicks of the Egyptians was not the Jeſuit Cauſſin's firſt Eſſay. The Preface of that Work might furniſh me with an argument to prove this; for the Author ſays, that whilſt he compoſed his Rhetoriek, he thought of this work. Cum Libros de triplici eloquentia & apparatum quendam ex florentiſſimæ exemplorum copia ad oratoriam facultatem inſtruerem, adjeci quoque animum ad ſymbolicam veterum ſapientiam, i. e. "Whilſt I compoſed my Books concerning the three "kinds of eloquence, and collected ſome inſtances of fine "oratorial touches from the rich ſtores which are left us, "I alſo applied my ſelf to the ſymbolical wiſdom of the "Ancients." Obſerve, that he had publiſhed a collection of Greek Poems (25) in the year 1612; and a Latin tranſlation of a work of Richeome (26) in the year 1613; ſo that ſtrictly ſpeaking, one could not ſay, that his expoſition of the Hieroglyphicks was the firſt Eſſay of his pen. Theſe excellent Works (theſe are Mr. Bullart's words (27), and he ſpeaks, 1. of the ſacred ſymbols. 2. Of the Royal Pomp; 3. The Compariſon of the Sacred and Profane Eloquence) having rendered his name famous at Court amongſt the learned, his ſuperiors deſired

(22) Taken from Southwell, Bibliotb. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 627.

(23) Above, Remark [D], quotation (15), &c.

(24) Académie des Arts & des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 224.

(25) Theſaurus Græcæ Perſeos ex omnibus Græcis Poetis collectus, Alegambe, Bibliotb. Soc. Jeſu, pag. 351.

(26) Vertit è Gallico Latinè juſta Funebri Henrico Magno Galliarum Regi a Ludovico Richeomo ſcripta. Idem, ibid.

(27) Académie des Artes & des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 224.

I have juſt been reading a Letter (d), in which it is aſſerted, that the Queen-mother obliged him to leave Paris, and baniſhed him into Britany, to pleaſe Cardinal Mazarin, whom he had diſobliged; and that his diſgrace was occaſioned by his book de Regno & Domo Dei (concerning the Kingdom and Houſe of God) publiſhed in 1650, in which he had made a very good obſervation upon the qualities with which Princes ought to be adorned.

(d) Of Gui Patin, printed with thoſe of ſome other eminent men at Amſterdam, ex Muſæo Joannis Brandt, anno 1702, 8vo. See pag. 200.

that the Prince ſhould alſo know him perſonally. Father Gonteri, one of the moſt celebrated Preachers of the Society, conducted him to the Louvre, and preſented him to Henry IV, who received him very kindly, and obſerving the brightneſs which ſhone in his face, he ſaid, that F. Cauſſin would become one of the moſt eminent men of his Society. This is confounding the times in a very groſs manner: for theſe three Works of Father Cauſſin were not publiſhed till after the death of Henry IV. The Symbols, according to Mr. Bullart, were printed in the year 1618. The account which we read in Father Cauſſin's Elogy, is not more exact with regard to Chronology. Here follow the words of the Author of that Elogium (28). "Father Cauſſin "had a very extraordinary ſympathy with the hea- "vens, eſpecially with the ſun, which he called his "ſtar, and which had very remarkable effects both "upon his body and ſoul, according as it was more "or leſs diſtant, or as it ſhined bright or was covered "with clouds. The effects of the ſun upon him "were not tranſient, but appeared conſtantly by the "ſparkling of his eyes, and the lively colour of "his face, which had ſomething celeſtial, that made "a very ſtrong impreſſion upon the mind of Henry "the Great. This Prince, who could diſtinguiſh the "character of men with ſo much ſagacity, obſerved "one day very attentively our Cauſſin, who being "ſtill very young, had accompanied F. Gonteri, one "of the moſt famous Preachers of his time, to Court. "The King had never ſeen him before, nor heard of "him; but as ſoon as he perceived him, he went to "him, and obliging the crowd to make room for "him, took him by the hand, and treated him with "ſo much kindneſs, that young Cauſſin was aſhamed, "and the by-ſtanders aſtoniſhed; but the King ſaid, "that he had diſtinguiſhed this youth amongſt the "crowd, and expected that he would ſerve him and "his family faithfully, and ſpeaking to F. Gonteri, "he told him with a loud voice, as a very remarka- "ble omen, Father, you have here an attendant, who "if I am not miſtaken, will become in time one of "the greateſt ornaments of your Society." Compare this with Mr. Bullart's account: what a great difference will you not find between the original and the tranſcript? For we may be ſure, that Mr. Bullart took his account from the Elogium of F. Cauſſin, and gave it a turn after his own fancy. He has not ſucceeded better in the following paſſage. Father Cauſſin "ac- "cepted indeed this difficult poſt (29), and diſcharged "his duty in it for ſome time with a great deal of "prudence and piety; but ſeeing the Royal Family "at variance, he reſigned his employment with very "little concern, and returned into his Convent, where "being free from the vexations of a profane Court, "he employed all his thoughts in the compoſition "of that great and admirable work, which he in- "titled, La Cour Sainte." Now, this Work was already tranſlated into Latin, before Father Cauſſin left the Court (30); and it was by no means of his own accord that he left it; he was obliged to ſubmit to the arbitrary will and to the perſecutions of the Prime Miniſter; nor did he retire into his Convent, but was baniſhed into Lower-Britanny.

(28) Pag. 1, 2.

(29) That of Confeſſor to Lewis XIII.

(30) You will ſee in Alegambe, pag. 157, that Henry Lamormaini tranſlated moſt of the books of the Cour Sainte in 1636, and 1637, and F. Cauſſin was baniſhed in December 1637, if I am not miſtaken.

I am perſuaded that moſt of the Elogiums of illuſtrious men abound with ſuch Chronological blunders, and that the Authors of thoſe Elogiums are oftener guilty of the ſophiſm, called a non cauſa pro cauſa, than the ſchoolmen. That is they miſtake the cauſes of the facts they relate. To avoid this, it would be proper to write the lives of eminent men in the form of Annals. But the Annaliſts themſelves are not free from Anachroniſms. For they often relate an affair only under the year in which they were finiſhed; in this caſe, they reſume the affair higher, relate the origin and progreſs of it, and relate in a breath all that paſſed in five or ſix years time, without mentioning any date; ſo that they lead their Readers out of the road of an exact Chronology.

☞CAXTON (WILLIAM), eminent for the works which he publiſhed, and for introducing the Art of Printing into England, was born in the Weeld of Kent, as he tells us himſelf (a), bred very reputably in the way of trade, and ſerved an apprenticeſhip to Mr. Robert Large, a Mercer, who after having been Sheriff and Lord Mayor of London, died in 1441, and left by will xxiiii Marks to his apprentice William Caxton, a conſiderable legacy in thoſe days, and an early teſtimonial of his good character and integrity (b). From the time of his maſter's death, he ſpent the following thirty years beyond Sea in the buſineſs of Merchandize; where in the year 1464 we find him employed by King Edward IV in a public and honourable negociation, jointly with one Richard Whitehill Eſq; to tranſact and conclude a treaty of commerce between the King and his brother-in-law the Duke of Burgundy, to whom Flanders belonged. The commiſſion ſtiles them Ambaſſiatores, Procuratores, Nuncios, & Deputatos ſpeciales, and gives to both or either of them full powers to treat &c. (c). He was undoubtedly the firſt who introduced the Art of Printing into England [A], and publiſhed ſeveral works, either of

(a) See his Preface to the Recuyll of the Hiſtoryes of Troye. Dr. Fuller in his Worthies is miſtaken in ſaying that he was born at Caxton in Hertfordſhire.

(b) Dr. Conyers Middleton's Diſſertation concerning the Origin of Printing in England; ſhewing that it was firſt introduced and practiſed by our Countryman William Caxton at Weſtminſter, and not, as is commonly believed, by a foreign Printer at Oxford. pag. 19. edit. Cambridge 1735, in 4to.

(c) Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xi. pag. 536. and Mattaire's Annal. Typograph. Append. ad tom. 1. pag. 33.

[A] He was undoubtedly the firſt, who introduced the Art of Printing into England.] This point has been very accurately diſcuſſed by the learned and ingenious Conyers Middleton, D. D. principal Librarian of the Univerſity of Cambridge, in his Diſſertation concerning the origin of Printing in England; ſhewing that it was firſt introduced and practiſed by our countryman William Caxton, at Weſtminſter; and not, as is commonly believed, by a foreign Printer at Oxford (1). He obſerves (2), that it was a conſtant tradition delivered down by Hiſtorians, that Caxton by his travels abroad and reſidence of many years in Holland, Flanders, and Germany, in the affairs of trade, had an opportunity of informing himſelf of the whole method and proceſs of the Art of Printing, and by the encouragement of the Great, and particularly of the Abbot of Weſtminſter, firſt ſet up a preſs in that Abbey, and began to print Books ſoon after the year 1471. This tradition was univerſally received, till a book, which had ſcarce been obſerved before the reſtoration, was then taken notice of by the curious, with a date of its impreſſion from Oxford, anno 1468, and was conſidered immediately as a clear proof and monument of the exerciſe of Printing in that Univerſity ſeveral years before Caxton began to deal in it. The Book, which is in the public Library at Cambridge, is a ſmall volume of forty one leaves in quarto with this title: Expoſicio Sancti Jeronimi in Simbolum Apoſtolorum ad Papam Laurentium; and at the end, *Explicit expoſicio, &c. Impreſſa Oxonie, & finita an. Dom. M.CCCC.LXVIII, xvii die Decembris. The appearance of this book robbed Caxton of a glory which he had long poſſeſſed, of being author of printing in this Kingdom, and Oxford ever ſince carried the honour of the firſt Preſs. The only difficulty was to account for the ſilence of Hiſtory in an event ſo memorable, and the want of any memorial in the Univerſity

(1) Printed at Cambridge 1735, in 4to.

(2) Pag. 1, 2.

* See Mattaire's Annal. Typog. vol. 1. pag. 63. edit. Hagæ-Comit. 1719, in 4to.

of his own compoſition, or tranſlated by him [B]. Dr. Middleton obſerves (d), that whoever turns over his printed works, muſt contract a reſpect for him, and be convinced that he preſerved the ſame character through life of an honeſt, modeſt man, greatly induſtrious to do good to his country to the beſt of his abilities, by ſpreading among the people

(d) Ubi ſupra, pag. 20.

Univerſity itſelf, concerning the eſtabliſhment of a new art amongſt them, of ſuch uſe and benefit to learning. But this was likewiſe cleared up by the diſcovery of a record, mentioned in the Article of ATKYNS (Richard) (3), in which it is ſaid that "Thomas Bourchier, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, moved "Henry II to uſe all poſſible means to bring the Art "of Printing over to England, and that the King "approving the propoſal, diſpatched Mr. Robert Turniſour, an officer of the Robes, into Flanders, furniſhed with money for the purpoſe; who took to "his aſſiſtance William Caxton, a man of abilities and "knowledge of the country; and theſe two found "means to bribe and intice over into England one "Frederic Corſellis, an under-workman in the Printing-houſe at Harlem, where John Guttemberg had "lately invented the Art, and was then perſonally at "work; which Corſellis was immediately ſent down "to Oxford under a guard, to prevent his eſcape, and "to oblige him to the performance of his contracts," where he produced the piece abovementioned, but without any name of the Printer. Dr. Middleton examines this pretended record, and makes ſeveral obſervations upon it, and at laſt (4) pronounces it to be a forgery, and tells us, that Mr. Atkyns, who ſeems by his manner of writing to have been a bold and vain man, might poſſibly be the inventor; for he had an intereſt in impoſing it upon the world, in order to confirm the argument of his book, that Printing was of the Prerogative-Royal, in oppoſition to the Company of Stationers; with whom he was engaged in an expenſive ſuit of law, in defence of the King's Patents, under which he claimed ſome excluſive powers of Printing. With regard to the Book abovementioned, which ſtands as a monument of the exerciſe of Printing in Oxford, ſix years older than any Book of Caxton with date, the Doctor obſerves (5), that there are ſuch contrary facts to ballance it, and ſuch circumſtances to turn the ſcale, that he takes the date in queſtion to have been falſified originally by the Printer, either by deſign or miſtake, and an X to have been dropt or omitted in the age of its impreſſion; of which examples are very common in the Hiſtory of Printing. Beſides, not to inſiſt on what is leſs material, the neatneſs of the letter, and regularity of the page, &c. above thoſe of Caxton, it has one mark, which ſeems to carry the matter beyond probable, and to make it even certain, viz. the uſe of Signatures, or letters of the alphabet placed at the bottom of the page, to ſhew the ſequel of the ſheets and leaves of each Book, an improvement contrived for the direction of the Book-binders; which yet was not practiſed or invented at the time when this Book was ſuppoſed to be printed (6). What further confirms this opinion is, that from the time of the pretended date of this Book, anno 1468, we have no other fruit or production from the Preſs at Oxford for eleven years next following; and it cannot be imagined that a Preſs, eſtabliſhed with ſo much pains and expence, could be ſuffered to lie ſo long idle and uſeleſs; whereas if the Doctor's conjecture be admitted, all the difficulties, which ſeem inſuperable and inconſiſtent with the ſuppoſed Æra of Printing there, will vaniſh at once (7). Dr. Middleton afterwards proceeds (8) to ſtate the poſitive evidence, which remains of Caxton's being the firſt Printer of this Kingdom, and obſerves, that all our Writers before the Reſtoration, who mention the introduction of the Art amongſt us, give him the credit of it without any contradiction or variation. Stowe in his Survey of London, ſpeaking of the XXXVII year of Henry VI, or ann. 1459. ſays, The noble Science of Printing was about this time found at Magunce by John Guttemberg a Knight; and William Caxton of London Mercer brought it into England about the year 1471, and firſt practiſed the ſame in the Abbey of Weſtminſter. Truſſel in his Hiſtory of Henry VI, and Sir Richard Baker in his Chronicle, give the ſame account; and Mr. James Howell in his Londinopolis (*) deſcribes the place, where Iſlip the Abbot of Weſtminſter ſet up the firſt Preſs for Caxton's uſe in the Almonry or Ambry. But above all the famous John Leland, Library-Keeper to Henry VIII, who by way of honour had the title of the Antiquary, and lived near to Caxton's own time, in his Commentarii de Scriptoribus Britannicis (9) expreſly ſtiles him Angliæ Prototypographus, i. e. "the firſt Printer of "England;" and as he had ſpent ſome time in Oxford, after having firſt ſtudied and taken a degree at Cambridge, he could hardly be ignorant of the origin and hiſtory of Printing in that Univerſity. Mr. Henry Wharton in his Appendix to Dr. Cave's Hiſtoria Literaria (10), affirms Caxton to have been the firſt, who imported the Art of Printing into this Kingdom; primuſque omnium artem typographicam Angliæ intulit; upon whoſe authority it is probable, that Monſr du Pin (11) ſtiles him the firſt Printer in England. To the atteſtation of our Hiſtorians, who are clear in favour of Caxton, and quite ſilent concerning an earlier Preſs at Oxford, the Works of Caxton himſelf add great confirmation. The rudeneſs of the letter, irregularity of the page, want of ſignatures, initial letters &c. in his firſt impreſſions, give a prejudice at ſight of their being the firſt productions of the Art amongſt us. But beſides theſe circumſtances, Dr. Middleton (12) has taken notice of a paſſage at the end of the third Book of his Recuyell or gadryng together of the Hiſtories of Troye, printed without a date in fol. which amounts in a manner to a direct teſtimony of it. Thus end I this book, &c. and for as moche as in wrytyng of the ſame my penne is worn, myn hands wery, and myn eyen dimmed with over moche lokyng on the white paper— and that age creepeth on me dayly—and alſo becauſe I have promyſed to dyvers Gentilmen and to my frendes to addreſſe to hem as haſtely as I myght this ſayd Book, therefore I have practyſed, and lerned at my grete charge and diſpenſe to ordeyne this ſayd Book in prynt after the maner and forme as ye may here ſee, and is not wreten with penne and ynke as other bokes ben to thende that every man may have them attenes, for all the bookes of this ſtorye named, the Recule of the Hiſtoryes of Troyes, thus emprynted as ye here ſee, were begonne in oon day, and alſo finiſhed in oon day &c. Now this is the very ſtyle and language of the firſt Printers, as every body knows, who has been at all converſant with old Books. Fauſt and Sheffer, the inventors, ſet the example in their firſt Works from Mentz, by advertiſing the public at the end of each, that "they were not drawn "or written by a pen (as all Books had been before) "but made by a new Art and Invention of Printing, "or ſtamping them by characters or types of metal, "ſet in forms." In imitation of whom the ſucceeding Printers in moſt cities of Europe, where the Art was new, generally gave the like advertiſement, as we may ſee from Venice, Rome, Naples, Verona, Baſil, Auſburg, Louvain, &c. juſt as our Caxton in the inſtance above (13).

(3) Note [B] vol. 2. pag. 410.

(4) Pag. 6.

(5) Pag. 7.

(6) Ibid. pag. 9.

(7) Ibid. pag. 10.

(8) Pag. 14.

(*) Pag. 353.

(9) Tom. 2. cap. 586. pag. 480. edit. Oxon. 1709. He calls him Caxodunus.

(10) Pag. 39. ed. Colon. Allobrog. 1720 in fol.

(11) Hiſt. Eccleſ. Cent. 14. pag. 71. edit. Engl.

(12) Pag. 15, 16.

(13) Idem, ibid. pag. 16.

[B] Publiſhed ſeveral works, either of his own compoſition, or tranſlated by him.] We ſhall give a Catalogue of them from Bale, Pits, Mattaire's Annales Typographici, Palmer's General Hiſtory of Printing, and Dr. Middleton's Diſſertation. I. Fructus Temporum, or Frute of Tymes, printed in 1483. There was likewiſe another edition printed at Weſtminſter by Winken de Worde in 1497 (14), and another at London 1515 in fol. (15). II. The Life and Hiſtory of King Arthur, in 21 Books, written and printed by Caxton at Weſtminſter in 1480 in fol. III. Thymage or Mirrour of the World, tranſlated from the Frenſhe, and fyniſhed the VIII of Marche, the XXI yere of Kynge Edward IV. Printed at Weſtminſter 1480 in fol. Caxton tells us, that "it treteth of the World and the "wonderful Dyviſion thereof; in whiche a man reſonable may ſee by the figures therein the ſituacion "and movyng of the Firmament, and how the uny"verſal Erthe hangeth in the myddle of the ſame— "tranſlated out of Latyn into Frenche 1245, and now "rudely out of Frenſhe into Engliſhe by me ſymple "perſone William Caxton &c." IV. A Deſcripcion of Britayne and Irlond, taken oute of the Policronicon. Fyniſhed XVIII of Auguſt. Printed at Weſtminſter 1480 in fol. V. Polycronicon; compiled in Latin by Ranulph Higden,

(14) Idem, ibid. pag. 13.

(15) Nicholſon's Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, Part I. p. 5. edit. London in 8vo.

people ſuch books as he thought uſeful to Religion and good manners, which were chiefly tranſlated from the French. The novelty and uſefulneſs of his art recommended him to the ſpecial notice and favour of the Great, under whoſe protection and at whoſe expence the greateſt part of his works were publiſhed. Some of them are addreſſed to King Edward IV, his brother the Duke of Clarence, and their ſiſter the Ducheſs of Burgundy, in whoſe ſervice and pay he lived many years before he began to print (d), as he often acknowledges with great gratitude. He printed likewiſe for the uſe, and by the expreſs order of Henry VII, and his ſon Prince Arthur, and many of the principal Nobility and Gentry of that age; all which confirms the notion of his being the firſt Printer; for he would hardly have been ſo much careſſed and employed, had there been an earlier and abler Artiſt all the while at Oxford, who yet had no employment at all for the ſpace of eleven years. It has been generally aſſerted and believed, that all his books were printed in the Abbey of Weſtminſter; yet we have no aſſurance of it from himſelf, nor any mention of the place before the year 1477; ſo that he had been printing ſeveral years, without telling us where (e). Mr. Echard in his Hiſtory of England, at the end of Edward the IV's reign, among the Learned of that age, mentions William Caxton as a Writer of Engliſh Hiſtory, but ſeems to doubt whether he was the ſame with the Printer of that name. Had he looked into Caxton's books, the doubt would have been cleared. There is no exact account of Caxton's age; but he was certainly very old, and probably above fourſcore at the time of his death. In the year 1471 he complained at the end of his Recuelyl (f) of the infirmities of age creeping upon him, and feebling his body; yet he lived twenty three years after, and purſued his buſineſs with extraordinary diligence in the Abbey of Weſtminſter till the year 1494, in which he died (g). Voſſius (h) remarks, that Simler, and Poſſevinus who generally follows the former, repreſent him as flouriſhing in the year 1538, which is a very flagrant miſtake. It is a little ſurpriſing that neither Bale, nor Pits, nor Voſſius, ſhould take the leaſt notice in their articles of him of his having been the firſt Printer in England. He collected Chaucer's Works, and publiſhed an edition of them. Bale ſtiles him a man not abſolutely ſtupid or indolent (i). But Pits (k) gives him a more advantageous character, and tells us, that he was a man of piety, learning, and induſtry, and though ſollicitous for his own reputation, yet much more zealous for the honour of his country. John Major, the Scots Hiſtorian, in his fourth book, acknowledges, that he had tranſlated ſeveral Hiſtories of our Author out of Engliſh into Latin, and taken the greateſt part of his own work from thence (l).

(d) Idem, ibid. See Caxton's Preface to his Recuelyl of the Hiſtoryes of Troye, and Balæus, Scriptor. Illuſt. Major. Brytann. Catalog. Cent. 8. cap. 43. pag. 618. edit. Baſil. 1557, in fol. and Pitſeus de illuſtrib. Angliæ Scriptor. num. 882. pag. 670.

(e) Dr. Middleton, ubi ſupra, pag. 20.

(f) See note [A].

(g) Dr. Middleton, ubi ſupra, pag. 21.

(h) De Hiſtor. Latinis, lib. 3. cap. 9. pag. 636, 637. edit. Francofurti ad Mænum 1677, in 4to.

(i) Vir non omnino ſtupidus, aut ignavid torpens, &c.

(k) Ubi ſupra.

(l) See Pits, ubi ſupra, and Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 636.

CAYET

Higden, Monk of Cheſtre. Tranſlated into Engliſhe by John Treviſa, vycarye of Barkeley, at the requeſt of Thomas Lord Barkeley. Continued from 1357 to 1460 by me ſymple perſon William Caxton. Ended 2d of Juyll xxii of Edward IV, a thouſand four honderd and foureſcore and tweyne. Printed at Weſtminſter in fol. 1482. VI. Life of King Edward the Confeſſor. VII. The Game of the Cheſſe, tranſlated out of Frenche into Engliſhe. Weſtminſter 1474 in fol. VIII. The Cronicles of England; fyniſhed the X of Juyn, and enprynted in the Abbey of Weſtmeſtre. Fol. 1480. IX. Godefrey of Boloyne, or the laſt Siege and Conqueſt of Jheruſalem; tranſlated out of Frenſhe in thAbbaye of Weſtmeſtre. Fol. 1481. X. The Legende of Sayntes, called the Golden Legende; tranſlated out of Frenſhe, and fynyſhed the XX day of November the fyrſt yere of Kyng Richard the thyrd, at Weſtmeſtre. Fol. 1483. XI. The Boke called Caton [or Cato's Precepts in Latin, with a Verſion and Comment in Engliſh,] tranſlated out of Frenſhe in thAbbaye of Weſtmynſtre, XXIII of Decembre. the firſt of Rychard III. dedicated to the Cyte of London. Fol. 1483. XII. The book of thEnſeignmentes and techynge that the Knyght of the Toure made to his daughters. Tranſlated out of the Frenche, Enprynted the laſt day of Janyver, the firſt of Richard III. Fol. 1483. XIII. The Ryal Book, or Book for a Kyng; in whiche ben compryſed the X Commandements, the XII Artycles of the Fayth, the VII dedely Synnes, the VII Petycions of the Pater noſter, the Yeftes of the Holy Ghooſt, the VII Vertues, &c. reduced out of Frenſhe into Engliſhe at the requeſt of a ſingular Frende, a Mercer of London. Fyniſhed XIII Septem. the ſecond of Rich III. Fol. 1484. XIV. The Hiſtory of the noble and valiant Knyght Parys and the fair Vyenne the daughter of the Doulphin of Viennois. Tranſlated out of French into Engliſh by William Caxton of Weſtminſter, finiſhed the laſt of Auguſt 1485, and imprinted the XIX of Decem. the ſame year. XV. The Book of Good maners; delyvered to me by a ſpecyal frende of myn a Mercer of London named William Praat; tranſlated out of Frenſhe. Fynyſhed the VIII of Juyn M. IIIICLXXXVI, firſt yere of Kyng Henry the VII. enprynted XI of Maye after. Fol. 1487. XVI. The Doctrinal of Sapyence, right utile and prouffytable to alle Chryſten Men; tranſlated out of Frenche at Weſtmeſter, and fynyſhed VII of May. 1489. XVII. The Book of the Fayt of Armes and Chyvalrie, whiche Chryſtyne of Pyſe drewe out of Vegecius de re militari, which being in Frenche was delyvered to me by the mooſt Chriſten Kyng my Soverayn Lord Hen. VII. to be tranſlated into Engliſhe, XXIII of Jan. the III yere of his reign. Enprynted XXIIII Juyll next following. Fol. 1489. XVIII. The Boke of Eneydos -- made in Latyn by that noble Poet, and grete Clerke Vyrgyle ... tranſlated from the Frenche into Engliſhe XXII Juyn, fyfthe of Hen. VII, Fol. 1490. XIX. The Recueyll or gadryng togeder of the hiſtoryes of Troye, tranſlated out of French. Fol. XX. The Lyf of the gloryous Vyrgyn and Martyr Saynt Katheryn of Sene; with the Revelacyons of Saynt Elyſabeth the Kynges Doughter of Hungarye. Fol. XXI. Speculum Vite Chriſti, or the Myrroure of the bleſſed Lyf of Jheſu Chryſte, compiled from the Latin Book of Dr. Bonaventure de Meditacione Vite Chriſti; ... together with a ſhorte treatyce of the hyeſt and moſte worthy Sacrament of Criſtes bleſſid Body and the merveylles thereof. Fol. XXII. The Curlace of Maſter Aleyn Charetier, tranſlated out of French into Engliſh. XXIII. Vitas Patrum. The ryght devout and ſolytary Lyfe of the auncient or olde holy Faders Hermytes dwelling in the deſertes -- upon which have wrytten St. Jerom -- tranſlated out of Frenſhe into Engliſhe by William Caxton of Weſtmynſtre late deed, and fyniſhed at the laſt daye of his Lyff. Enprynted in the ſaid Towne of Weſtmynſtre by me Wynken de Worde. 1495. XXIV. The Hiſtory of Lombardy in one Book. XXV. John Tinmouth's Sanctilogium Britanniæ, epitomized by Capgrave, and tranſlated into Engliſh by Caxton. XXVI. A Collection of Chaucer's Poems. H.

CAYET (a) (PETER VICTOR PALMA) firſt a Miniſter of the Reformed Church [A], and afterwards a Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris, ought to be reckoned amongſt the learned men: but there were very ſtrange reports of him, which caſt a blemiſh upon his reputation; for he was accuſed not only of having wrote an Apology for public ſtews [B], but alſo of having ſold himſelf to the Devil [C]. The Synod deprived him of the office of a Miniſter, upon which he turned Catholic in the year 1595, and as

(v) In Latin Cajetus or Cajetanus.

[A] He was firſt a Miniſter of the Reformed Church.] I find in a Letter (1), which I ſhall mention in the laſt remark, that he was born at Montrichart in Touraine (2) of very poor parents; that in his youth he was maintained at the grammar ſchool by a worthy Gentleman; that having made a progreſs there, they of the Proteſtant Religion conceived ſome hopes of him, and furniſhed him with the neceſſary means to ſtudy Divinity, and admitted him a Miniſter; that about the year 1582 they made him Paſtor of the Congregation of Poitiers, which uſed to meet at Montreuil-Bonnin, and that Cayet finding an opportunity to enter into the King's houſehold, he left his Church and followed the Court, and was made Chaplain to the Princeſs Catherine Henry IVth's ſiſter, to inſtruct and confirm her in her religion.

(1) It is inſerted in the 1ſt vol. of the Memoires de la Ligue, pag. 343, &c.

(2) Obſerve therefore, that the ſurname of Navarrus, which is given him in the Gallia Orientalis, pag. 144. and in Konig, Bibliath. pag. 151. ſignifies only, that he was a Doctor of Divinity of the College of Navarre.

To this we may add the account, which we read in the remarks upon the Catholic Confeſſion of Sanci, page 268, of the edition publiſhed in 1699. "Peter Cayet "of Montrichard in Touraine, born of very poor "parents, who with their ſon had embraced the Pro-"teſtant Religion (a), ſtudied in his youth at Geneva, "at which time Calvin, whoſe ſervant he was, fore-"told the child's father, that his ſon would become one "day the plague of the Church, and wage war with "God (e). However he acquired a great deal of learn-"ing, eſpecially in the Oriental Languages, and was "choſen a Paſtor firſt at Poitiers, and afterwards in "Mr. de la Noue's Family (i) at Monſtreuil Bonnin, "and gave in theſe two places great proofs of his am-"bition and inconſtant mind; he was afterwards "made Chaplain to King Henry the Great's ſiſter."

(a) See Beza's Epigram upon Cayet's Apoſtaſy amongſt Beza's Latin Poems, publiſhed at Geneva in 4to, 1597, pag. 201.

(e) Avis aux fidéles ſur l'Apoſtaſie de Mr. Pierre Cayet, pag. 7. of the edit. of the year 1596.

(i) Vie de Mr. De la Noue, pag. 203. under the year 1576.

[B] He was accuſed . . . of having wrote an Apology for public Stews.] D'Aubigné aſſerts it in ſeveral paſſages of his works. Here follow the words, which he makes Sanci ſpeak. "We ſhould not have look'd up-"on ſimple fornication or adultery committed out of "love, amongſt unlawful actions, according to Ca-"hier's doctrine in his learned Book concerning the "Reſtoration of Stews, and his learned Commentary "on the ſeventh Commandment. In this Command-"ment, which is non mœchaberis, only the ſin of "the children of Onan is prohibited; for μοιχάω, ac-"cording to this modern Theology, comes ἀπὸ τῦ "μοίχω & χέω quod eſt humidum fundere (to ſpill a li-"quid) (3)." The verſes, which are at the end of the ſame book, are ſtill more ſharp.

(3) Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci, liv. 2. chap. 2. pag. 392. edit. of Amſterd. 1693. See alſo Le Baron de Fæneſte, liv. 2. chap. 12.

Cahier voulut loger les Putains en franchiſe,
Canoniſer pour ſaints les vérolez perclus;
Nôtre Egliſe le prit, quand vous n'en vouliez plus:
Catholique il pourſuit encor ſon entrepriſe.
La paillarde le voit martir pour les Bordeaux, L'Avocat des Putains, Sindic des Maquereaux.
Elle ouvre ſes genoux, l'acole très humaine,
Honteux, banni, puant, vérolé, ladre vert,
Hugenots, confeſſez, que l'Egliſe Romaine,
Tient ſon giron paillard a tout venans ouvert (4).

(4) Pag. m. 446.

It is a Roman Catholic that ſpeaks here; the ſenſe is, "Cayet made an Apology for the ladies of pleaſure, "and would canonize all thoſe, who had got ſome "diſtemper in the Temple of Venus. When you "rejected him (he ſpeaks to the Reformed) our Church "received him with all poſſible kindneſs, tho' he was "very much ſeaſoned. Own then, ye Huguenots, "that the Church of Rome opens her lap to the firſt "comers."

The following paſſage has much more weight, ſince it is borrowed from an Hiſtory, and not from a ſatyrical piece. "It happened alſo that Cayet, who appli-"ed himſelf to Magic, was ſoon after depoſed; be-"ing alſo accuſed of having wrote two Books, the "one in which he laboured to prove, that neither for-"nication nor adultery were prohibited in the ſixth "* Commandment, but only the ſin of Onan; the o-"ther to prove that it was neceſſary to reſtore all the "ſtews. Hereupon having been rejected (by the Re-"formed) he went over to the other ſide, and was "very well received by the Sorbonne, but not by "the Jeſuits (5)." The Author of the Notes upon the Confeſſion of Sanci obſerves, that D'Aubigné is here miſtaken, and that all thoſe fine maxims, aſcribed to Cayet were to be met with in one piece only, entitled: Diſcours contenant le remede contre les Diſſolutions publiques, preſenté à Meſſieurs du Parlement (6). i. e. "A Diſcourſe containing a Remedy againſt the pub-"lic immoralities; offered to the conſideration of the "Parliament."

* According to the Roman Catholics, the ſeventh according to the Proteſtants.

(5) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſelle, tom. 3. liv. 4. chap. 11. pag. m. 502. under the year 1595.

(6) Notes ſur la Conf. de Sanci, pag. 53. edit. 1699.

[C] . . . . Of having ſold himſelf to the Devil.] Theodore Tronchin, Profeſſor of Divinity at Geneva, and one of the Fathers of the Synod of Dort, ſpeaks thus in one of his Books (7). Amongſt the other facts, for which Cayet was deprived of his office of a Miniſter, he was alſo accuſed by creditable witneſſes of a correſpondence with the Devils. After he was depoſed, inſtead of repenting, he grew worſe and worſe, and forſook the true Religion. He came afterwards to ſuch a degree of wickedneſs, that he entered into an agreement with Satan under the name of Terrier the Prince of the ſubterraneous Spirits, gave himſelf up to him ſoul and body for ever, on condition that this evil Spirit would promiſe him, that he would make him gain the victory in all his diſputes with the Reformed, and render him perfectly ſkilled in the knowledge of the languages. This Contract ſigned with blood was found after his death, and has been ſeen by ſeveral of the Gens du Roy †. Mr. Colomiés, who has quoted theſe words, will furniſh me with another paſſage, which is as follows. "The "complaints againſt the Sieur Cayet were, that he "had left his Church at Poitiers, which had been "committed to his care, and had made uſe of wicked "practices to intrude himſelf firſt into the King's "houſhold, and then into that of his Majeſty's ſiſter, "that he applied himſelf ſo much to magical Arts, "that he was commonly called Petrus Magus, (the "Magician,) and that he behaved himſelf indecently "with regard to a certain Lady (9)." I wonder that Montigny ſays nothing of the two Books, which according to D'Aubigné were the chief and firſt cauſes of Cayet's deprivation. Le chaſſaſtes vous pour la Magie? Did you depoſe him for his magical Arts? This is Fæneſte's queſtion; to which it is anſwered. At firſt he was only accuſed of having compoſed two Books, in the one of which he maintained, that neither fornication nor adultery was the ſin prohibited in the ſeventh Commandment, which forbids only τὸ μοίχον χέειν, meaning the ſin of Onan, whence he drew upon him the hatred of the ſacred Society. His deſign in the other Book was to reſtore the public ſtews. But whilſt this affair was depending, he was alſo accuſed of Magic, and the Books he wrote upon that ſubject to Tiel Chauvin were produced before us (10). In the ſame work D'Aubigné relates in a very pleaſant manner a ſtory of Baron; here follow his own words. Cayet "m'a monſtre de Libres "de Magie compouſez par lui de dûs pieds de haut; "il m'a fait boir dans une couque d'uf où il faiſet "l'ou petit home avec des germes des Mandragores, "de la ſoye cramauſie, & un fu lent, pour parbenir à "des choſes, que je ne bus pas dire; il m'a monſtrai "les images de cire, qu'il faiſoit fondre tout velle-"ment pour echauffer le que de la galande, & celles "qu'il vleſſoit d'une petite fléche pour faire périr un "Prince à cent lieues de là (11). That is, "Cayet "ſhewed me a heap of Books of Magic written by "himſelf, and two feet high; he made me look into "an egg-ſhell, in which he made a little man with "young buds, Mandrakes, crimſon ſilk, and a ſlow "fire, in order to arrive at ſuch things, which I will "not tell; he ſhewed me images of wax which he "uſed to melt, and thereby inſpired a woman with "love for her ſweet-heart; he had other images, "which he wounded with a ſmall arrow, and by that "means could kill any Prince at an hundred leagues "diſtance."

† The Gens du Roy are the King's Advocates and Attornies General in Superior Courts, and only the King's Advocates and Attornies in Inferior Courts.

(7) Preface ſur la Défenſe de nos Verſions, 1620.

(8) Colomeſ. in Gallia Orient. pag. 145.

(9) Idem, ibid. pag. 44. Ex libello cui titulus, Avertiſſement ſur la Dépoſition du Sieur Cayet du S. Miniſtére, & ſur ſa revolte. Auctore Franciſco Loberano, Domino de Montigni, Pariſienſi quondam Eccleſiaſte, pag. 5.

(10) Baron. de Fæneſte, liv. 2. chap. 12. pag. m. 81.

(11) Ibid. pag. 79.

as he was known to Henry IV [D], he was soon after made Regius Reader for the Oriental Languages [E]. He commenced Doctor of Divinity in the year 1600 (b). He wrote several books against those he had abandoned [F], in which amongst other things he

(b) Launoius, Hist. Gymnas. Navarr. pag. 791.

"distance." This may pass for a raillery; but what follows is related in a serious manner, as a matter of fact, and attended with all its circumstances. "The "Scripture tells us, that there are Conjurers, and Sorcerers; the former are scarce; witness a Duke of "Savoy who spent an hundred thousand crowns to "find some; the latter are but too numerous; I "reckon Cayet amongst them, who sold himself to "the Devil by a Note signed with his own hand, and "required from him by the buyer. You have heard "how dreadful and terrible his death was. But I "have seen the original in the hands of Monsieur "Gilot, when the Court was consulting, whether they "should have his corpse burned, or hanged by the "feet at Montfaucon; but there were so many Lords "and Ladies of an high rank, who were his accom-"plices in these abominations, that this affair was "hush up, as a great many others are at present, "which it is better to bury in an eternal oblivion, "than to publish them (12)." It is surprizing, that D'Aubigné, who was so well acquainted with this whole affair, should yet have been ignorant of the most remarkable circumstance of this story. He did not know, that the Devil carried Cayet away with and body, and they, who took care of his burial, were obliged to fill the coffin with stones instead of Cayet's corps, which the Devil had carried away; and this they were obliged to do, in order to deceive those, who carried the coffin to the burying-ground. Maresius Tom. 2. contra Tirinum, pag. 434, ait, Vict. Cabierum, qui superiori sæculo vixit ex Ministro Reformatæ Ecclesiæ Sorbonistam, Caballistam, & Magum factum, ejusque corpus a Diabolo ablatum esse, ut lapides vice illius ejus in loculo condendi fuerint. i. e. "Ma-"resius, (Des Marets) in his second volume against "Tirinus, page 434, says, that Cabierus (Cayet) "who in the last Century was a Minister of the Re-"formed Church, turned a Sorbonist, a Caballist, "and a Magician, and that the Devil carried his "body away, so that they were obliged to bury stones "instead of him." This is what we read in Konig's Bibliotheca, under the word Cabierus (13).

(12) Ibid. pag. 80.

I am obliged, I think, to observe here, that I did not find any thing concerning these strange and abominable crimes laid to Cayet's charge, in the Roman Catholic Writers; except these words of Leo Allatius. His quam simillima inter quotidianos congressus quibus utor familiarissimis, ab omnis honestioris eruditionis Mysta Gabriele Naudæo de Unicor. Palma (14) Cajetano & Constantino Chymista frequenter audivi (15). He had related some stories concerning the conjuring up of Devils, and adds that his good friend Gabriel Naudé often told him the like stories of Victor Cayet and of Constantine the Chymist. But we must observe two things here. First, it does not appear that Naudé ever believed the stories that are told of Sorcerers and Magicians. Secondly, that having had some opportunities in his works to mention Cayet with regard to these matters, he has not said the least thing, to charge him with sorcery. Read his Dialogue of Mascurat, you will find there the following words (16). "S. "The Devill take either of us, who ever heard it "mentioned. M. At that rate he would take us both. "S. However, it would not be in the manner he took "D. Faustus and his servant, for I would not hold "you by the feet. M. You mention there an ima-"ginary person, a chimera of the Germans, which "silly story, that great Doctor Peter Victor Palma Ca-"jetanus, or rather Caillete, credulum illud animal & "stultum, (that credulous and foolish animal) has trans-"lated into French, as it had already been into English. *Adeo omnia * si nescis loca sunt plenissima nugis, quarum tota cohors est inimica mihi.* i. e. "All the books "are full of such idle fancies, and I hate the whole "band of these Writers." Add to all this, what we shall observe in the remark [H].

(13) Observe, that Konig did not know Cayet's true name, and thought that Victor Cabierus, and Petrus Victor Cajetanus, and Petrus Victor Palma Cajetanus, were three different persons. In the Journal of Oxford, it is supposed that Victor was Cayet's true name, whereas it was only the name he took at his Confirmation.

(14) Read Naudæo de Victore Palma.

(15) Allatius de Patria Homeri, pag. 5.

(16) Pag. 519, 520. The letter S. signifies Saint Ange, a Bookseller, and one of the persons who speak in the Dialogue. M. signifies Mascurat, a Printer, the other person, who speaks here.

* Sariberiens. in Eutheico.

Take notice, that one might judge, by the Dedication of that Book, which Naudé turns into ridicule, and which is signed V. P. C. that our Cayet was wonderfully zealous against the art of Magic. Let us also transcribe the whole title of his Translation: L'Histoire prodigieuse & lamentable du Docteur Fauste; avec sa mort épouvantable. Là où est monstré combien est miserable la curiosité des Illusions & des Impostures de l'Esprit malin. Ensemble la corruption de Satan par luimesme, estant contraint de dire la vérité. i. e. "The "wonderful and lamentable History of Dr. Faustus, "with his terrible death: In which is shewed, how "dangerous it is to enquire after the fallacies and im-"postures of the evil Spirit; together with Satan's "corruption by himself, being forced to speak the "truth." The edition I make use of is that of Roan, 1604, in 12mo.

[D] He was known to Henry IV.] He had followed that Prince almost constantly, since he entered into that Prince's service with the Sieur de la Gaucherie, who had been the King's Tutor. These are Mr. Maimbourg's words, in his Preface to the History of the Leagues.

[E] He was soon after made Regius Reader for the Oriental Languages.] He has that title in the Privilege or Licence which he obtained for his controversial works June the 15th, 1596, and we find the following words in page 26 of a Book (17), which he published in 1597. I do not blame the study of the Hebrew, Chaldaic and other languages, far from it; I teach them myself, God be praised, for his service, and for that of the Church, with the most Christian King's leave. Mr. de Launoi was therefore mistaken, when he asserted that Cayet was preferred to that post in 1599 (18). I am indebted for this observation to the Author of the Notes upon the Confession of Sanci. But I must observe, that according to James Du Breul our Cayet succeeded Francis Jourdain Regius Reader and Professor of the Hebrew Tongue, who died in September 1599 (19). We may reconcile this; if we suppose, that Cayet had the title of Reader, and read Lectures as soon as the year 1596, but that the place not being yet vacant, he was not, properly speaking, promoted to it nor installed in it till after the death of Jourdain in the year 1599.

(17) Intitled, Instance de la Réunion en l'Eglise Cathol. Apost. & Romaine.

(18) Launoii, Hist. Gymnasii Navarr. pag. 701.

(19) Du Breul, Antiquites de Paris, pag. mi. 567.

[F] He wrote several Books against those he had abandoned.] You will find a Catalogue of them in the History of the College of Navarre (20); I shall only give here the title of the first which we meet with in that Catalogue; it is as follows. Remonstrance Chrestienne & très utile à Messieurs de la Noblesse de France, qui ne sont point de la Religion Catholique; a Paris, 1596. i. e. "A Christian and very important admonition "to those of the Nobility of France, who are not of "the Catholic Religion." Mr. de Launoi observes, that this Book contains the Letter, which the Author had received from Clement VIII, and several other things relating to the Origin and Progress of the Huguenots (21). When Cayet published that Book, he lodged at the same place where Postel died; for he dates his Admonition à Mrs. du Tiers Etat, qui ne sont point de la Religion Romaine ("Admonition to the Com-"moners of France, who are not of the Catholic Re-"ligion") from the Abbey of St. Martin's in the Fields. This Admonition was printed in the year 1596. You will find this in the Remarks upon the Catholic Confession of Sanci (22), where the Author of these Remarks explains the following words of the Preface: "They should at least keep Spondanus in an "honourable prison in the Abbey of St. Mathurin (or "Martin) as they did formerly Postel, and now Cayet, "all learned and mad." This may make us suspect that Mr. de Launoi is guilty of another mistake: for he asserts, that Cayet lived already in the College of Navarre, when Pope Clement VIII wrote him a Letter, dated March the 20th 1596. Quo tempore datæ sunt hæ literæ, jam Cajetus . . . in Navarræ Collegium secesserat (23). I do not know in what Book of Controversy this Proselyte quotes seventy four Propositions asserted by John Hus, and which are contrary to John Calvin's Doctrine (24). Mr. de Launoi's Catalogue does not mention the Book which Peter Cayet published concerning the Minister Rotan who wrote an excellent answer in the year 1596 (25).

(20) Page 792.

(21) Launoii, Hist. Gymnas. Navarr. pag. 792.

(22) Printed at Amsterdam in 1693. pag. 458.

(23) Launoii, Hist. Gymnas. Navarr. pag. 790.

(24) See Feuardentius, Theomachia Calvinistica, tom. 2. B. 13. chap. 8. pag. 178. edit. of Cologne, 4to, 1629.

(25) Remarques sur la Confession de Sanci, pag. 523.

he complains of their Satyrs [G]; he also had a conference with the celebrated du Moulin. This conference lasted several days [H], and, as it is usual in such cases, both parties published very different accounts of it. Cayet had also the title of Chronologer, and wrote several Histories [I]. He lived almost constantly (c) in the College of Navarre at Paris (d), after he had embraced the Roman Catholic Religion, and died there July the 22d 1610,

(c) We shall observe in the Remark [F] that he lodged some time in the Abbey of St. Martino.

(d) Launoi, Hist. Gymnas. Navarr. pag. 790.

[G] . . . He complains of their Satyrs.] He renewed his complaints in his novenary Chronology; he says, that the Protestants had published several Answers to the Motives of his Conversion, and that the persons, who collected the Memoirs of the League inserted one of these Answers amongst them, without inserting at the same time Cayet's Answer; he flatly denied the story of his amours with a Lady of Bearn (26), he observes, that none of those who spread these slanders abroad named himself, so that he did not know to whom he ought to direct his Answers. He adds, that no reply was made to his Vindication concerning the Book the Restoration of Stews. He says positively, that he was not the Author of it, and that Robert Stephens acknowledged, that he had passed his word never to shew the manuscript of it to any person whatsoever. He also says, it was not this Book that vexed the Ministers, but the Consilium primum de componendo Religionis dissidio: (the pious Method for adjusting the religious disputes) of which they knew that he dispersed several copies. Since that time, adds he, they spread abroad, that I intended to turn a Roman Catholic, and that the King had given me for that purpose an Abbey near la Rochelle, . . . and yet it is true, that till this very time, which is the year 1607 . . . I have neither an Abbey, nor any other living (27). There is a great deal of moderation in this part of his History. Monsieur Maimbourg has been much more passionate in his behalf. "This, says he (28), speaking of Cayet's "conversion, which was supported with arguments, and "imitated by a great many persons (a), exasperated his "ancient brethren the Ministers to such a degree, that "they inveighed most furiously against him; they "loaded him with injuries, and endeavoured to blacken "his reputation with the most abominable calumnies, "which they published in several libels, and amongst "others in that, which they inserted amongst the "Memoirs of the League (e), dissembling in the most "shameful manner, the solid and convincing answers "he had published against them; which alone is sufficient to expose the falsity of all that they have "written to defame him according to the genius of "their heresy. For of all the heretics, none have "ever been so cruel and malicious as the Calvinists, "none ever revenged themselves more barbarously of "their pretended enemies by the sword, or by other "violent means, when it was in their power to do it, "or when they could not do otherwise, by their shame"ful libels, and by traducing and reviling their ad"versaries by all kind of injuries and impostures." This is indulging one's passion too much. Mr. Maimbourg might have complained in a more moderate manner of the Protestants for their repeating the same Satyrs over again, without answering the least thing to the arguments offered in favour of the person accused. See the Remark [O]; you will find in the Remarks upon the Confession of Sanci the titles of some other pieces, which were published against Cayet soon after he changed his Religion (29).

(26) The Baronness d'Aros.

(27) Chronologie novenaire, liv. 7. under the year 1595, folio 545 verso 546, 547.

(28) Maimbourg, Preface de l'Histoire de la Ligue.

(a) Lettre d'un Gentilhome Catholique a un sien ami, 1595.

(e) Memoires de la Ligue, tom. 6. pag. 343. Cayer f. 545.

(29) In pag. 97. of the edition publish'd in 1699.

[H] His Conference . . with du Moulin lasted several days.] We read in the Life of du Moulin (30), that he was challenged to this dispute by Cayet; that he had no second to attend him, tho' Cayet was assisted by two Carmelites; that they disputed fifteen days following: that when the dispute had lasted a week, Cayet was severely reproved by the Sorbonne, because he did not well maintain his cause, and that he suffered his adversary to dive into matters more than was consistent with the interest of the Catholics; that the Bishop of Paris forbad Cayet to sign the Acts of the Conference; that since that time Cayet disputed very cautiously, and declared several times, that he did it without any public Commission; That the Sorbonne went in a body to the Advocate-General, to acquaint him that if this dispute was not prohibited by authority, there were reasons to fear it would occasion a sedition; that it is not known what the Magistrates ordered, but that du Moulin coming to the place where the Conference was held, found the door shut; that they opened it soon after to Cayet; and Du Moulin being also entered, the Master of the house received a letter, by which he was advised not to admit these Gentlemen any more, for that otherwise he would be imprisoned; upon which these Gentlemen lost all hopes of finding another place where they could meet; that Cayet being challenged to sign the Acts of Conference, refused it, and on his going away said to Du Moulin, you will hear of me another time (31); that after this he never spoke of beginning the Conference again; that some years after they heard the history of his death which was but too true and infamous (32), namely that the Devil had killed him; and that they found the contract he had made with the Devil Terrier; and that Archibald Adair a Scottish Bishop, who had been witness to all that passed on both sides in this dispute, published an exact account of it. Matthias Zimmerman has committed a blunder with regard to the conclusion of this account. It is in page 300 of his Florilegium Philologico-Historicum, printed at Meissen * in the year 1687. His words are; Cayetus . . . tergum obvertens dixit, Tu de me alias audies; sed nihil de iteranda disputatione auditum, vere ENIM a Diabolo necatus, & membranæ inventæ, quibus cum Dæmone Terrier fœdus percusserat. i. e. "Cayet (Cayet) turning his "back, said, You will hear of me another time; but "nothing was heard afterwards about renewing the "disputation, FOR Cayet was killed by the Devil, "and his contract with the Devil Terrier was found." This ENIM is a falsification of the History of Du Moulin, for the Author of that History did not say, nor would he or could he say, that Cayet did not mention the dispute any more, because the Devil killed him. Cayet published three pieces concerning this Conference. I. Le Sommaire véritable des Questions proposées en l'entrevue entre le Docteur Pierre Victor Cayet, & le Ministre Du Moulin. Ensemble la Réponse à l'escrit calomnieux publié par Du Moulin. i. e. "A true Account of "the Questions proposed in the Conference between "Dr. Peter Victor Cayet, and the Minister Du "Moulin: Together with an Answer to the slander"ous Account published by Du Moulin." II. Les Actes de l'entrevue dite Conference avec le Ministre Du Moulin. i. e. "The Acts of the meeting called the "Conference with the Minister Du Moulin." III. La Defense & Arrest de la Vérité, contre Archibaud Adair Ecossois (33). i. e. "A Defence and Assertion of "Truth, against Archibald Adair a Scotsman."

(30) You will find it in Dr. Bates's (in Latin Batesius) Book, published at London in 1681, and intitled, Vitæ selectorum aliquot Virorum, qui Doctrina, Dignitate aut Pietate inclaruere. See pag. 703 of that book.

(31) Tu de me alias audies.

(32) This conference was held in 1602, and Cayet died in 1610.

* In Upper Saxony.

(33) Launoi, Hist. Gymnas. Navarr. pag. 792.

Let us not omit the Book which Cayet published against Du Moulin in the year 1603, and which he entitled, La Fournaise ardente, & le four de reverbere, pour evaporer les prétendues eaux de Siloë, & pour corroborer le feu du Purgatoire. i. e. "The burning Fur"nace, and the reverberate Fire, proper to make the "waters of Shiloah evaporate, and to corroborate the "fire of Purgatory." This Minister observes in a new edition of his Eaux de Siloé (Waters of Shiloah) that notwithstanding the Approbation, which the Sorbonne had granted to Cayet's Book, the Jesuits caused him to be chastised and treated severely, and cried him down in their Sermons, so that he was thereby disgraced for ever (34).

(34) Notes sur la Conf. de Sanci, pag. 98. edit. 1699.

[I] He wrote several Histories.] La vraye Narration de la Guerre d'entre les Turcs & les Chrestiens d'Hongrie, depuis le Mois de Septembre 1597 jusqu'au Printemps de l'Année 1598, à Paris, 1598. i. e. "A true account "of the war between the Turks and the Christians of "Hungary from September 1597, to the spring in the "year 1598; Paris, 1598." Chronologie Septenaire de l'Histoire de la Paix entre les Rois de France & d'Espagne . . ., depuis le commencement de l'an 1598, jusqu'à la fin de l'an 1604. i. e. "A Chronological ac"count for seven years, containing the History of "the peace between the Kings of France and Spain . ., "from the beginning of the year 1598, to the end "of the year 1604." Chronologie novenaire, contenant l'Histoire de la Guerre sous le Régne de Henry IV . . ., depuis

1610, and was buried at St. Victor's (e). He had endeavoured to find the Philosopher's Stone [K] by all that be true, which some relate of him, concerning the disguel with the Count of Soissons had of marrying the Lady Catherine sister to Henry IV, would assert, that Cayet acted sometimes like an honest man [L]. It is surprising, that when some Authors say, that the Devil killed him (f), and that the Parliament of Paris had some design to deny him a Christian burial, others should assert that he always led a good moral life after his abjuration [M]. I wonder that Scaliger did not write the character of this man; could he forget the crimes which were laid to his charge, or did he think they were not sufficiently proved? However it be, he only says this: When Cabier was a Minister, he preached better extempore, than when he took a great deal of pains to compose his Sermons, which were then very bad (g). Observe that he calls him Cabier. Most Authors commit the same blunder [N]. I could not meet with any of the books which Cayet published, to clear himself of the crimes for which he was deposed from his office of a Minister; but his own confession concerning the book upon public stews, is a strong argument in favour of the Synod that deposed him [O]. The Authors of the Supplement

(e) Idem, ibid. pag. 792. Du Breul Antiquitez de Paris, pag. 561. affirms, that he died July the 22st on St. Victor's day.

(f) See the Remarks [C] and [H].

(g) Scaligerana, pag. m. 46.

depuis le commencement de son Regne l'an 1589 jusqu'à la Paix faite à Vervins en Juin 1598 (35). i. e. "A "Chronological account for nine years, containing the "History of the war under the reign of Henry IV . . . . "from the beginning of his reign in the year 1589, "to the peace concluded at Vervins in June 1598." These four letters P. V. P. C. with which he subscribes his Dedications, signify Petrus Victor Palma Cayet. Monsieur de Launoi did not know, that this Writer published in the year 1600 Appendix ad Chronologiam Genebrardi (An Appendix to the Chronology of Genebrard.) Anthony de Laval mentions this Work in a very honourable manner. To those, who desire to read a complete body of universal History, says he (36), I would recommend the Chronology of the learned Genebrard, continued and improved by that oracle of all languages Doctor Cayet.

(35) Launoii, Hist. Gymnas. Navar. pag. 791.

(36) Desseins des Professions notables, pag. 322. edit. 1613, quoted by Colomies, Gall. Orientol. pag. 145.

[K] He had endeavoured to find the Philosopher's Stone.] The Author of the Mercure François tells us this particular, with some others, which the Reader will not be displeased to find here. We shall therefore transcribe the whole passage. Doctor Peter Victor Cayet . . . . never had any enemies, but those to whom he had done some kindness. This was his fate, and under this misfortune he laboured all his life time. He died in the College of Navarre, and was buried at St. Victor's. His cloaths, his manner of living, and his curiosity after the Philosopher's Stone, rendered him despicable as much as he was esteemed for his learning, and it was on account of his learning that all who knew him, mourned at his death. As for my part, I knew him for a true born Frenchman, who did not in the least favour the principles of the Italians; he has acquainted me with several considerable things he had done for the King's service (37).

(37) Mercure François, tom. 1, folio 350, under the year 1610.

[L] If that be true, which some relate of him concerning . . . . the Count of Soissons . . . . he acted sometimes like an honest man.] There is an Author, who has made some remarks upon the book intitled, Histoire des Amours du Grand Alcandre, i. e. "the History "of the amorous intrigues of the Great Alcandre;" this Piece is printed with the Journal of Henry III. As Henry IV is there described under the name of the Great Alcandre, so the great persons of his Court are also described under borrowed names. This Prince's sister is called Grassinde, and the Count of Soissons Palamede. Now one of the Remarks is as follows. "The marriage of Palamede with Alcander's sister "was in so great a forwardness, that Peter Cayet "Grassinde's Chaplain, was commanded to marry them "immediately, but he desired to be excused; where- "upon Palamede threatened to kill him, but the "Chaplain answered to Palamede, that he chose ra- "ther to be put to death by a Prince, than by the "common Executioner (38)."

(38) See the Journal de Henri III, pag. 295. of the edition of Amsterdam, 1693.

[M] Others assert that he always led a good moral life after his abjuration.] All that the Huguenots wrote with so much, I do not say passion, but even fury, against Cayet, soon after his conversion, cannot in the least prejudice his reputation, any more than their ridiculous predictions, in which they asserted, that in a short time, he would be neither a Huguenot nor a Catholic, and that he would raise a third party between the two Religions. For he always lived so well amongst the Catholics, that after he had given on several occasions great proofs both of his virtue and learning, he was found worthy to receive Priest Orders, and to be admitted a Doctor of Divinity, and was made Regius Reader and Professor for the Oriental Languages (39). The Protestants will no doubt have more regard for the testimony of Mr. de Launoi, I shall therefore quote his words here. Multis modis claruit evasit (Cajetus) imprimis quod Hæresim puræ sinceræque mentis deposuerit, deinde quod Jacobus Perronius Ebroicensium Episcopus eum judicaverit dignum qui eâ super re literas a Clemente VIII acciperet, tum quod Clemens ei per literas conversionem gratulatus fuerit . . . . postremo, quod sui temporis Historiæ memoriæ prodiderit, & vitam insuper virtute conjunctam transduxerit, postquam effectus est Catholicæ communionis particeps (40). i. e. "Cayet has "gained a reputation several ways, particularly be- "cause he renounced his heresy with a sincere heart; "and also because James du Perron Bishop of Evreux "thought he deserved to be recommended to Pope "Clement VIII, who wrote him a letter to congra- "tulate him for his conversion. . . . Lastly, his re- "putation is owing to the Histories he wrote of his "own time, and to the virtuous life he led since his "admission into the communion of the Catholic "Church."

(39) Maimbourg, Preface de l'Histoire de la Ligue.

(40) Hist. Gymnas. Navarr. pag. 791.

[N] Most Authors commit that blunder, of calling him Cahier.] This blunder would be pardonable, if that man had not prefixed his name to most of his Books; for as the pronunciation of names differs very often from the manner in which they are spelt, and that men, especially in France are not used to sound the last letter of a word, they, who only heard the name of our Author, without seeing it written or printed, might easily imagine that his name was Cayer or Cahier; but the mistake of those who wrote against him cannot be excused. Had they not seen how his name was spelt in the Books they undertook to confute? It might perhaps be said in their behalf, that his name is spelt Cayer in the Avertissement sur les Points de la Religion pour en composer les differens. "Advertisement "concerning the controverted points in Religion, in or- "der to reconcile the different opinions," which this Author published at Paris in 1596; that this name, I say, is there found in the title-page, in the Epistle to the King, in that to the Bishop of Evreux, in the approbation of the Doctors, and in the license (41); but this will not excuse them. They ought to have observed, that since his name was written Cayet in the Books he published before that time, and in those many, which he published since, there was an error of the Press in the passages of the Advertisement, where his name was spelt Cayer. There are so many Authors, who write a bad hand, that it may very well be supposed, that the Printers of this Advertisement could not guess, whether Cayet had put an r or a t at the end of his name; and having once mistook an r for a t, they put the first of these letters every where in the Licence, in the approbation of the Doctors, &c.

(41) The Author of the Notes upon the Confession of Sanci has acquainted me with this.

[O] His confession concerning the Book upon public stews, is a strong argument in favour of the Synod that deposed him.] He has thought it to say something upon this subject in his History of Henry the Great (42). But if he could not defend himself better in other respects, than he has done on this occasion, it is my opinion, that his cause was very bad. He owns, that he ment up Motin's own (a), that he wrote the Remede aux dissolutions publiques (the Remedy for public loosenes). This is the book concerning the reformation of public flews. I forgot to observe, that he disputed for a Professorship in the Canon-Law at Rheims in 1597, but he did not carry it. Mr. Doujat acquaints me with this particular (b).

(42) Chronologie Novenaire, under the year 1595, folio 545.

(a) Doujat, Præn. Canonic. pag. 643.

(b) Under the word Cahier. They mention him again under the word Cayet. This is a very good way to encrease the number of Ministers at a little expence.

he lent R. Stephens the Book concerning the reformation of public Stews, and does not say a word against the testimony of his adversary. This testimony was, that the Manuscript, which was in the Synod's hands, had been transcribed from a copy written in Cayet's own hand. The letter, which is inserted amongst the Memoirs of the league, represents that Book as something so abominable, that Clergymen ought not to be tolerated, when they keep such Books in their Libraries; how much less can they be excused, when they give them to a Printer? The letter I have just now mentioned, is a very good Piece; the Author of it speaks like a true Roman Catholic, and knows how to give things a likely turn; he seems to be very well skilled in Ecclesiastical History. He charges Cayet with a very odious crime; namely, that he kept for his own use, the money which Princess Catherine gave him for charitable uses (43). He also charges him with saying, that his Manuscript was only a translation of an Italian Book, printed at Venice forty years before that time, and written by one Nicholas Perrot (44); he accuses him besides of having lodged at a tavern which was a noted bawdy-house in the street called de la Huchette, of having continued there above three months, taking his ordinary meals with the Judge of Candon, who is one of the greatest Sorcerers and Magicians on earth, and was very intimate with one L'Etoile a Mountebank, who believed nothing less than the being of God. He adds, that Cayet had been formerly publickly loaded with infamy, because he applied himself to Magic, and to the occult Sciences; witness his frequently casting up of Nativities, and his so much celebrated opinion delivered to the late Sieur de la Rochefoucaud, concerning the success of the Siege of La Rochelle, and of the Sieur de Strosse; voyage into Africk. See the Remarks upon the Confession of Sancy, page 553 of the Edition published in 1699.

(43) Mem. de la Ligue, tom. 6. pag. 347.

(44) Some printed copies were shewed with this title, Discorso del remedio delle publiche dissolutione, di Nicolo Perroto.

A REFLEXION upon the bad effects of a false zeal.

Let us not end this remark without making an observation which shews, that a false zeal for Religion completes what the sin of Adam had but too effectually begun. There are certainly very great disorders in all civil Societies; who can deny this? And yet we do not find, that when a man is banished from a city by a legal sentence, in which it is declared, that he has been convicted and found guilty of several villainous and wicked actions, we don't find, I say, but such a man is so kindly received in another city, as to be promoted to honourable posts, before he has perfectly cleared himself. Some remains of good sense and justice hinders men from acting after that manner. But these remains of good sense are not to be observed in Ecclesiastical Bodies; here you see Cayet deposed and loaded with infamy by a sentence of the Synod grounded upon the most odious actions of which he was accused; he renounces the Reformed Religion, embraces the Catholic Faith, and is admitted with the utmost kindness; the Catholics boast of so glorious an acquisition, he is promoted to Ecclesiastical Honours and Dignities, without the least information whether he has been justly or unjustly deposed;

Tantum Religio potuit suadere malorum.

The same persons, who acted thus in an affair relating to Religion, would not have done it in an affair purely civil. The Readers cannot too much consider this observation (45).

(45) See above, the end of the Remark [B] in the Article BEZANITES.

CEA or CEOS an Island in the Ægean Sea, or Archipelago. See ZIA.

CECIL (WILLIAM) Lord Burghley or Burleigh, Lord High Treasurer of England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was descended from an antient and good family [A], and son of Richard Cecil Esq; Groom of the Robes to King Henry VIII (a), by Jane, daughter and heiress of William Heckington (b) of Bourn in the County of Lincoln Esq;. He was born at Bourn September the 13th 1521 (c), and educated in the schools

(a) Camden's Life and Reign of Queen Elizabeth, ad ann. 1598. pag. 609. in the Complete History of England, vol. 2. edit. London 1706. David Lloyd's State-Worthies, p. 473. 2d edit. London 1670. and the Account of the Family of Cecil by Arthur Collins Esq; prefixed to his edition of the Life of William Cecil Lord Burghley, published from the original manuscript wrote soon after his Lordship's death. London 1732, in 8vo.

(b) Collins's Account of the Family of Cecil, pag. x. Camden calls it Ekinton.

(c) Life of William Cecil, Lord Burghley, published from the original Manuscript, pag. 3.

[A] Was descended from an antient and good family.] Mr. David Lloyd (1) observes, that some were of opinion, that the Cecils were descended from the Roman Cæcilii. But we have the most exact account of this family by Arthur Collins Esq; prefixed to his Edition of the life of that great Statesman William Cecil Lord Burghley, &c. published from the original Manuscript wrote soon after his Lordship's death, now in the Library of the Right Honourable Brownlow Earl of Exeter (2). He observes (3), that the name of this family has been, like others of long continuance, variously written, as Sitsilt, Sicelt, Seycil, Cicil, &c. yet that is evident (4), that tho' the name was so differently spelt, the persons so written were of the same lineage. It is agreed by Camden and other Genealogists, that ROBERT SITSILT (5), an assistant to Robert Fitz-Hamon, in the conquest of Glamorganshire, in the 4th year of the reign of King William Rufus, anno 1091, was the ancestor to this family. This ROBERT was rewarded with lands by the said Robert Fitz-Hamon, and afterwards by marriage had Alterennis in that part of Herefordshire called Ewyas land, with other lands in Herefordshire and Gloucestershire (6). He was succeeded by his son and heir Sir JAMES SEISEL, Baron of Beaupört, now called Beaupere, in Glamorganshire, killed at the siege of Wallingford Castle in the fourth of King Stephen (7), leaving issue JOHN SEISEL his son and heir; who was taken prisoner at the siege of Lincoln in the ninth of King Stephen (8), and paying for his ransom 400 marks, was obliged to sell his Lordship of Beauport, and all his lands in Gloucestershire. He had by Maud his wife, daughter of .... de Prenes, Eustace his son and heir, who married Eleanor daughter of Sir Walter Pembridge, Knt. and had issue Sir BALDWIN SEISEL, knighted by King Henry II, and slain at the siege of the Castle of Cardiff, his father being then living. This Sir BALDWIN by his first wife, daughter of Maurice de Brampton, had issue five sons (9), Gerard, Eustace, Henry, John, and Walter, and two daughters, Catherine wife of Hugh Mureduke, and Eleanor married to Walter Wallis. By his second wife, Margaret daughter of Sir Stephen Radnor Knt. he had issue, Stephen, Roger, Hugh, David, Maud a Nun, Joan married to John de Solers, and Anne to Owen ap Meredith. The eldest son GERALD SEISSEL married Mabel daughter of Sir William Moigne Knt. and had issue Robert; Owen a Monk in the Abbey of Dore in Herefordshire; Catherine, married to Sir Griffin ap Yereford Knt. then to David ap Evan, and thirdly to Geoffrey son of Sir Walter Bret Knt.; Anne, wife to Robert, son of Richard Bromwich; and Ellen, wife to John, son of Sir Richard Abrahall Knt. He was succeeded by ROBERT SEISCEL, who married Alice, daughter of Sir Robert de Tregoze Knt, and had issue, James, Gerald, Thomas, Baldwin, Margaret, and Elizabeth. JAMES CECIL, eldest son of Robert, married Isabel daughter of Sir John Knowle Knt., by whom he had issue, James, who died young, Gerard, Robert, John, Alice, wife of Walter Monnington, Grace, married to Roger son of William Blunt, Eleanor wife to Thomas Paine, Margery married to Morgan ap Meredith, and Cecilie wife to Hewel ap Blethin, and afterwards to Sir Hugh Bruge Knt. GERARD CECILL, eldest son, by his first wife Margaret daughter of Stephen de la Bere, had issue John; by his second wife, Bridget widow of Sir Simon Ward Knt. had a son James; by his third wife, daughter of Martin Hopton, had issue Martin, Henry, David, and Jane; and by his fourth wife, Joan daughter of Robert Emerton, had issue, Stigand Seissel, killed at the siege of Strivelin in Scotland. JOHN CECIL, the eldest son by the first wife, married Sibil daughter of Robert Ewyas, and had issue Sir John, and George Cecill (10). Sir JOHN CECIL or SEYSSEL,

(1) State Worthies, marginal Note (a) pag. 473. 2d edit. London 1670.

(2) Printed at London 1732, in 8vo.

(3) Pag. 3.

(4) Camden's Remains, Surnames, pag. 140.

(5) History of Wales, pag. 124, 141, and 142.

(6) Barnes's History of King Edward III, pag. 75.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Ex Stemmate, apud Collins, pag. 4.

(9) Ex eodem Stemmate, apud eundem.

(10) Collins, pag. iv, v.

schools of Grantham and Stamford. At the age of fourteen in May 1535 he was sent to the University of Cambridge, and admitted into St. John's College, where he pursued his studies with such application, that he hired the Bell-ringer to call him up every morning at four a-clock. He was Reader of the Sophistry-Lecture, when he was but sixteen years old, and afterwards read the Greek Lecture there, as a Gentleman for his exercise without position, before he was nineteen years of age (d). When he had proceeded Master of Arts, and continued at the University about six years, May the 6th 1541 he removed to Grays-Inn, where he made a considerable progress in the Common Law (e), and his company was extremely valued on account of his agreeable and facetious disposition [B]. About the latter end of King Henry VIII's reign paying a visit to his father at

(d) Ibid. pag. 6.

(e) Ibid. pag. 7.

Stysted, being at the siege of Berwick in the 7th of Edward III. 1333 (11), there arose a great controversy between him and Sir William Falconham (12), concerning a Banner of Arms, charged with this Coat, viz. a field Barry, of ten pieces, argent and azure, on six escutcheons, three, two, and one, sable, as many Lions rampant of the first. These Arms each challenged as his right (13), and offered to maintain the same by combat in his proper person. But the King was pleased to forbid it, and ordering the Heralds to decide the affair by law and justice, they solemnly adjudged the right of bearing those Arms to Sir John Cecil, as heir of blood lineally descended from the body of James Cecil Baron of Beauport, slain at the siege of Wallingford Castle in the fourth of King Stephen. This Sir John married Alice, sister to Sir Robert Baskerville, and had issue John his son and heir, who died in his life time, having married Joan daughter of Sir Richard Mannington Knt., by whom he left Thomas Ceissel of Alterennes in Herefordshire Knt., who succeeded his grandfather Sir John Ceissel. Thomas Ceissel married Margaret daughter and heir of Sir Gilbert Winston Knt. (14), and had issue Richard his son and heir, who married Margaret daughter of Sir John Philips Knt. (15), by whom he had Philip Sicelt, as the name was then written; who married Maud, daughter and heir of William-Philip Vaughan of Tillisglase (16), by Wenlian his wife, daughter and coheir of Sir Thomas Barry, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Richard Lord Talbot; which Sir Thomas Barry was son and heir of Gerald de Barrye, Lord of Castle Scalt in Herefordshire. Philip Sicelt by the said Maud had issue Philip his son and heir, and David Sicelt (17), ancestor to the present Earls of Exeter and Salisbury. Philip, the eldest son, was father of John Sycill (as he wrote his name) of Alterennes, and of the parish of Walterston in Herefordshire (18), who by his last Will and Testament, dated June the 21st 1551 the fifth of Edward VI, orders his body to be buried in the parish Church of St. Peters in Walterston, and leaves to Elizabeth Wennston his wife his Mansion-house of Alterennes, with the lands thereto belonging for life, and after her decease to William his son and heir and his heirs for ever, and entails his other lands in Herefordshire and Monmouthshire on the said William his son, and in default of issue on Thomas his son, remainder to Philip Sycill his son, remainder to Anne and Alice his daughters. David, the younger son of Philip Sicelt abovementioned, having purchased a fair estate in Lincolnshire, in 22 Henry VII, founded a Chantry in St. George's Church in Stamford (19); and in 3 Henry VIII, was constituted (20) Water-Bayliff of Wittlesey-mere in Huntingdonshire, and Keeper of the Swans there, and throughout all the Waters and Fens in the counties of Huntingdon, Cambridge, Lincoln, and Northampton, for the term of thirty years. In the fifth of Henry VIII, he was made one of the King's Serjeants at Arms (21); and having this employment at Court, obtained for Richard his son and heir the office of a Page of the Crown (22). In the eighth of Henry VIII he obtained a grant to himself and his son of the place of Keeper of Clyff-Park in the county of Northampton; and in the fifteenth of that King (continuing still Serjeant at Arms) he was constituted Steward of the King's Lordship of Cole-Weston in that county (23). In the twenty third of Henry VIII, upon the death of Sir William Spencer Knt. he was appointed Sheriff of Northamptonshire for the remaining part of that year, and the next ensuing year (24). And having been Alderman of Stamford three times (25), died in 1541, the thirty second of Henry VIII. as appears from the probates of his last Will and Testament, which bears date that year. Richard, his eldest son, in the eighth of Henry VIII, was made one of the pages of the Crown (26); in the 12th he waited on the King at the famous interview with the King of France between Calais and Guisnes (27); and in the 22d being Groom of the Robes to that King obtained a grant of the office of Constable of Warwick Castle, then in the Crown (28). In the 27th of Henry VIII, being one of the Grooms of the Wardrobe he had a grant of the office of the King's water, called Wittleley-Mere, and the custody of the Swans, and of those Waters called Great-Crick and Merys, in the counties of Cambridge, Lincoln, Huntington, and Northampton, for the term of thirty years, after the expiration of that granted to David Cecyll his father (29). In the thirty first of Henry VIII, he was Sheriff of Rutlandshire (30). The year following, being written Richard Cecyll of Burley in the county of Northampton Esq; he had a grant to him, his heirs and assigns for ever, of the Scite of St. Michael's Priory near Stamford, and the Church, and 299 acres of arable land, lying in the Parish of St. Martin's in Stamford, in the county of Northampton (31). In the thirty fourth of Henry VIII, being then Yeoman of the Wardrobe, he was made Steward of the King's Manors of Nassynton, Yarwell, and Upton, in the county of Northampton for life (32). In the thirty sixth Henry VIII, he purchased the Manor of Esyngdon in the county of Rutland, then also in the Crown, as part of the Earl of Warwick's land (33). The year following he surrendered his custody of Warwick Castle (34). He died March the 22d 1553, and was buried in St. Martin's Church in Stamford, leaving issue by Jane, his wife, daughter and heir to William Heckington of Bourn in Lincolnshire Esq; William, his son and heir, the subject of this article, and three daughters, Margaret married to Roger Cave of Stamford in Northamptonshire Esq; Elizabeth to Robert Wingfield of Upton in the same county Esq; and afterwards to Hugh Allington Esq; and Anne to John White of Tuxford in Nottinghamshire Esq; (35).

(11) Barnes, ubi supra, pag. 75.

(12) Powel's History of Wales, pag. 147.

(13) John Boswel's Concords of Armory, fol. 80.

(14) Chancey's Hertfordshire, pag. 308.

(15) Visit. de Com. Hereford. not. 9. A. 17. in Bibl. Harley.

(16) Ex Stemmate per Camden. penes præhon. Tho. Dom. Lovel.

(17) Ibid.

(18) Ex Registr. vocat. Buck. qu. 16. in Cur. Prærog. Cant. apud Collins, pag. vii.

(19) Pat. 22. H. VII. pag. 1.

(20) Pat. 3. H. VIII. pag. 2.

(21) Ex MS. quodam in Recepta Scacc.

(22) Pat. 8. H. VIII. pag. 2.

(23) Pat. 15. H. VIII. pag. 1.

(24) Fuller's Worthies, Northamptonshire, pag. 299.

(25) Butcher's Survey of Stamford, pag. 43.

(26) Pat. 8. H. VIII. pag. 2.

(27) MS. Not. B. 5. in Bibl. Joh. Anstis apud Collins, pag. ix.

(28) Pat. 22. H. VIII. pag. 1.

(29) Privat. Sigill. 27. H. VIII.

(30) Wright's Rutlandshire, pag. 12.

(31) Pat. 32. H. VIII. pag. 7.

(32) Pat. 34. H. VIII. pag. 7.

(33) Pat. 36. H. VIII. pag. 28.

(34) Collins, pag. x.

(35) Idem, ibid.

[B] His company was extremely valued on account of his agreeable and facetious disposition.] The Author of the Manuscript life of him, written soon after his death, and published by Arthur Collins Esq; has the following passage (36). "But as his yeats and company required, he wold manie tymes be merry amongst young Gentlemen, who were most desirous of his companie for his wittie mirth and merry temper; among the rest I herd him tell this merriment of himself, that a mad companion incited him to plaie, where in short tyme he lost all his money, bedding, and books to his companion, having never used plaie before; and being among his other company told how such a one had misled him, saieing he wold presently have a device to be even with him; and with a long trenche made a hole in the wall near his plaie-fellow's bed's head, "and in a fearfull voice spake thus thorough the trenke; O mortal man, repent, repent of thy horrible synne, plaie, coseinge, and such lewdness, or els thou art damned, and canst not be saved: which at midnight all alone so amazed him, as drive him into a sweate for feare. Most penitent and heavy the next daie in presence of the yewthes he told with tremblinge what a fearful voice spake to him at midnight, vowing never to plaie againe; and calling for Mr. Cecill asked him forgivnes on his knees, and restored all his money, bedding, and books. So two gamsters weare both reclaymed with this merry device and never plaid more. Manie other of the like merry jests I have heard him tell."

(36) Pag. 7, 8.

at Court, he met in the Preſence-Chamber two Prieſts, Chaplains to O Neale, and talking long with them in Latin, he fell into a diſpute with them, in which he ſhewed ſo much learning and wit, that the Prieſts were entirely foiled, and went away in great indignation. The King being told that young Mr. Cecil had confuted both O Neale's Chaplains, ſent for him, and after a long diſcourſe with him, being highly pleaſed with his anſwers, directed his father to find out a proper place for him; upon which he ſollicited for a reverſion of the Cuſtos Brevium Office in the Common-Pleas, which the King readily granted (f). Auguſt the 8th 33 H. VIII he married Mary Cheeke, ſiſter to Sir John Cheeke, a Gentleman of diſtinguiſhed learning (g) [G], who lived with him not above a year and a quarter, by whom he had Thomas (h) afterwards Earl of Exeter. Dec. the 21ſt 38 H. VIII. he married for his ſecond wife Mildred Cooke, one of the daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke, a Lady excellently ſkilled in the Latin and Greek Tongues [D]; by whom he had Robert, afterwards Earl of Saliſbury, Anne, married to Edward Earl of Oxford, and Elizabeth to William heir of the Lord Wentworth, and three other children, who all died young (i). In the firſt year of King Edward VI, the Duke of Somerſet, then Lord Protector, appointed him Maſter of the Requeſts; and the ſame year he attended the Duke to Muſſelborough Field againſt the Scots, where he was like to have been killed, but ſaved by a perſon, who putting out his arm to thruſt Mr. Cecil out of the level of the Cannon, had it ſtruck off. In the ſecond year of King Edward he was committed to the Tower upon the Duke of Somerſet's being firſt called in queſtion, but after a quarter of a year's confinement was ſet at liberty. The Duke perceiving the King's eſteem for Mr. Cecil, preferred him to be Secretary of State and Privy Counſellor (k) [E]. October the 11th 1551 he received the honour of Knighthood (l). The Dukes of Somerſet and Northumberland endeavoured to engage him in their intereſts by great offers and preſents, which he refuſed, and, though with difficulty, carried himſelf even to them both all the King's reign, upon whoſe death he was ſeverely threatened by the Duke of Northumberland for oppoſing the conveyance of the Crown from the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth to the Lady Jane Grey [F], though he was of the number of thoſe who ſubſcribed it (m). When Queen Mary aſcended the Throne, ſhe granted him a general pardon, and offered him the poſt of Secretary of State and Privy Counſellor, if he would change his Religion; which he refuſed [G]; but made his court to

(f) Ibid. pag. 8, 9.

(g) See the Article of CHEEK.

(b) Life of Cecil, Lord Burghley, pag. 5 and 9.

(i) Ibid. pag. 5, and 10.

(k) Ibid. pag. 10.

(l) Mr. Strype's Note (q) on Sir John Hayward's Hiſtory of the Life and Reign of King Edward VI, in the Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 2. pag. 320.

(m) Camden, ubi ſupra, pag. 609; and Life of Cecil, pag. 11.

[C] Auguſt the 8th 33 Henry VIII. he married Mary Cheeke, ſiſter of Sir John Cheeke, a Gentleman of diſtinguiſhed learning.] This the Author of his life aſſures us of (37), and tells us that he married that Lady, after he had ſpent ſome time at the Inns of Court. Camden therefore is miſtaken in aſſerting (38), that at twenty years of age he married her, while he was a ſtudent at the Univerſity of Cambridge, and buried her in a year or two, after which he ſtudied the laws for a year or two at Gray's-Inn in London.

(37) Pag. 9.

(38) Life and Reign of Queen Elizabeth, in the Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 2. pag. 609. edit. London 1706.

[D] Dec. the 21ſt 38 H. VIII. he married for his ſecond wife Mildred Cooke, one of the daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke of Giddy-Hall in Eſſex a Lady excellently ſkilled in the Latin and Greek tongues.] This we are informed of by Camden *, and the Author of the life of Cecil †, who tells us that her perfection in the Greek language was ſo great, that ſhe tranſlated a piece of St. Chryſoſtom out of Greek into Engliſh.

* Ibid.

† Pag. 10.

[E] Preferred him to be Secretary of State and Privy Counſellor.] The Author of his life tells us (39), that it was about the third year of the King's reign, and that he was then but twenty five years old (40). Now this is evidently a miſtake; for ſince Edward the VIth came to the Crown January 28 1547, and this Author aſſerts, that Mr. Cecil was appointed Secretary of State and Privy Counſellor in the third year of that King's Reign, that Gentleman, who was born Sept. the 13th 1521, muſt be then about thirty years of age. Mr. John Strype (41) informs us, that he was made Secretary of State upon Dr. Wotton's reſignation of that office, which was Sept. the 6th, 1550, as it is noted in King Edward the VI's Journal: ſo that Mr. Cecil was then twenty nine years of age.

(39) Pag. 10.

(40) Ibid. and pag. 65.

(41) In his note (q) upon Sir John Hayward's Life and Reign of King Edward VI, in the Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 2. pag. 320.

[F] He was ſeverely threatned by the D. of Northumberland for oppoſing the conveyance of the Crown from the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth to the Lady Jane Grey.] Sir John Hayward in his Life and Reign of King Edward VI ‡ having affirmed, that the Duke in his contrivance to procure the Crown to be ſettled upon his daughter-in-law the Lady Jane, uſed the advice of two eſpecially, the Lord Chief Juſtice Mountague, who drew the Letters Patents, and Secretary Cecil; and that thoſe furniſhed the Patent with divers reaſons, whereof ſome were of law and ſome of policy in ſtate. Mr. John Strype in his Note upon that paſſage * tells us, that he groſsly wrongs the memories of thoſe two Gentlemen, out of what deſign, ſays he, I know not, nor as little do I know whence he had it; for neither Stow nor Sanders mention it. For firſt as for Cecil, he was ſo far from aſſiſting in this matter, or deviſing reaſons for the Patent, that he oppoſed it as much as he could (and ſo Camden expreſly ſaith) tho' he ſigned with the reſt. Moreover I have ſeen an apology of Cecil's own drawing about his concern therein. There he ſhewed, how he refuſed to ſubſcribe the Book, when none of the Council did refuſe, whereby he incurred the indignation of the Duke of Northumberland. That he refuſed to make a Proclamation for the proclaiming Queen Jane, and turned the labour to Throgmorton. That he refuſed the writing of a letter to ſend abroad in the Realm for the ſhewing Queen Jane's title. That this he refuſed, becauſe he would not write Queen Mary Baſtard. And the Duke wrote it himſelf. That he avoided being preſent at the drawing up of the Proclamation for the publiſhing Queen Jane's title, tho' he was eſpecially appointed thereunto. That he avoided anſwering the Queen's Letters, which ſhe wrote from Keninghall to the Council requiring their obedience. That he avoided likewiſe writing all public letters to the Realm upon Jane's Acceſs to the Crown. That he practiſed with the Lord Treaſurer to win the Lord Privy Seal, that he might by the Lord Ruſſel's means cauſe Windſor Caſtle to ſerve the Queen, and they two to levy the weſt parts for the Queen's ſervice. That he opened himſelf to the Lord Arundel, whom he found thereto diſpoſed. That he did the like to the Lord Darcy. That he purpoſed to have ſtolen down to the Queen's Highneſs, and Goſnald offered to lead him thither, becauſe he knew not the way. And that he had his horſes ready at Lambeth for that purpoſe. That when he firſt ſecretly heard of the purpoſe of making the Lady Jane Queen, he diſliked it, and fearing the event, conveyed away his lands, his goods, and his leaſes. All thoſe things conſidered, ſays Mr. Strype, who can think it true, that he furniſhed the Patent of ſettlement with arguments taken from law and policy? The moſt he did, was to ſign with the reſt; which alſo he did as a witneſs to King Edward's deed, and not as an abettor or Counſellor.

‡ [Printed in the Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 2. pag. [325] ad ann. 1553.

* Ibid.

[G] Offered him the poſt of Secretary of State and Privy Counſellor, if he would change his Religion; which to the Lady Elizabeth, who made uſe of him as a neceſſary inſtrument, whilſt ſhe was a private perſon (n), which expoſed him to the malice of his enemies, though he defeated it by his prudence and dexterity. However the Queen ſent him in the ſecond year of her reign to Bruſſels with the Lord Paget to bring over Cardinal Pole (o). Upon Queen Elizabeth's acceſſion to the Throne he was advanced to be Secretary of State, and was the firſt perſon ſworn of her Privy Council at Hatfield (p). He had the principal hand in the ſettlement of Religion, and the alteration of the coin; and in the ſecond year of her Majeſty's reign was ſent Embaſſador into Scotland to treat of peace, which by his management was concluded (q). January the 10th the year following (r), upon the death of Sir Thomas Parry, he was made Maſter of the Wards [H]. In 1569 there was a deſign formed by ſeveral of the Nobility to ruin him; but it was defeated [I]. The ſame year by his prudence and care, though he was Secretary alone, he ſuppreſſed the rebellion in the North without any battle, blood, or danger to the honour of the Queen or ſafety of the Realm (s). In 1570 he was ſent with Walter Mildmay to treat with the Queen of Scots at Chatſworth in Derbyſhire (t); and on February the 25th 157$\frac{0}{1}$ was created Baron Burgley (u). In 1572 he was invited with the Earl of Leiceſter to Paris to the marriage of the King of Navarre with Margaret, ſiſter to the King of France, in order that thoſe two Noblemen might be cut off in the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's Day (w). In June the ſame year he was made Knight of the Garter (x), and July the 15th following Lord High Treaſurer of England, upon the death of William Powlet, Marquis of Winchester (y). This poſt he diſcharged with great fidelity and applauſe [K], and conſiderably augmented the public purſe, and his own private eſtate, tho' he abhorred the baſe and corrupt methods of amaſſing riches; for he ſeldom or never ſuffered any thing to be expended, but for the Queen's honour, the ſecurity of this Nation, or the ſupport of ſome

(n) Camden, pag. 609.

(o) Life of Cecil, pag. 12.

(p) Ibid. pag. 13.

(q) Ibid. pag. 14, 15, 16.

(r) Ibid. pag. 17. See Camden, pag. 609.

(s) Life of Cecil, pag. 17.

(t) Camden, pag. 429.

(u) Idem, pag. 431. and Life of Cecil, pag. 20.

(w) Camden, pag. 444.

(x) Life of Cecil, pag. 20.

(y) Ibid. pag. 21, and Camden, pag. 445.

he refuſed.] This we are informed of by the Author of his life, who tells us (42), that to this purpoſe ſome wiſe men weare under-hand ſett to allure him, and diſcover his diſpoſition; but like himſelf he wiſely and chriſtianly aunſwered, he was taught and bound to ſerve God firſt, and next the Queene; but if her ſervice ſhould put him out of God's ſervice, he hoped her Majeſty would give him leave to chooſe an everlaſting rather than momentarie ſervice; and for the Quene, ſhe had byn his ſo gracious Ladie as he wold ever ſerve and praie for her in his heart, and with his body and goodes be as ready to ſerve in her defence, as anie of her loyall ſubjects; ſo ſhe wold pleaſe to graunt him leave to uſe his conſcience to himſelf, and ſerve her at lardg as a private man, rather than to be her greateſt Counſellor. Camden obſerves (43), that upon his oppoſing in King Edward the VIth's time the pretended conveyance of the Crown from the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth, "he "got into favour of the former, tho' he was in the number of thoſe who ſubſcribed it; and his dexterous "management preferred him to a perfect intimacy "with Cardinal Pool, Tonſtal, and Sir William Peter. "But whereas he had a real and hearty veneration "for the Proteſtant Religion (however he might humour the preſent occaſion) and finding the road to "preferment lay another way, he made his Court to "the Lady Elizabeth."

(42) Pag. 11, 12.

(43) Pag. 609.

[H] Made Maſter of the Wards.] This office he diſcharged, as he did all others, like a good huſband for the Queen and the Wards, very modeſtly in reſpect to his private advantages, and not unprofitably for his followers and dependants, tho' without the leaſt blemiſh upon his intergrity (44).

(44) Idem, ibid. See likewiſe the Life of Cecil, pag. 32, 33, 34, 35, 36.

[I] In 1569 there was a deſign formed by ſeveral of the nobility to ruin him; but it was defeated.] Camden informs us (45), that upon occaſion of detaining the money ſent from Spain to the Netherlands, ſeveral Peers, and amongſt others, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Pembroke, and Leiceſter, began to clamour againſt Cecil, as they had done once or twice before, about the ſupplies ſent to the Proteſtants of France. But the real cauſe was this, that they envied the intereſt, which he had in the Queen; were jealous of his favouring the houſe of Suffolk in point of the ſucceſſion, and apprehended him to be a main obſtacle to the progreſs of their deſigns. They therefore concerted meaſures to procure him to be put into the Tower, Throckmorton (another of thoſe, who could not bear his greatneſs) having inſinuated to them, that if they could once get him confined, it would be no difficult thing to effect his ruin. But the Queen had timely intelligence of theſe deſigns, by what means, I know not; and Cecil had the happineſs of finding the whole project daſhed by the ſole bravery of his Royal Miſtreſs, who ſurprized them in the very inſtant, and by the authority of her Royal Preſence, awed them out of theſe baſe meaſures (46). The Author of his Life in his account of the plots tells us (47), that in the time of his fortunate riſing, the hearts of ſome roſe alſo againſt his fortune, who were more hot in envying him, than able to follow him, detracting from his praiſes, diſcouraging his ſervices, and plotting his danger. "As on a tyme, ſays he, I hard him ſay, that a Book "peſtilently and paſſionately penned againſt the Nobi"lity came to his handes, and was ſeene upon his "table by a great Nobleman and Counſellor, which "Book he had read with great diſlike, noting manie "notable lies and faultes of the Writers. Yet there "was a formall tale told the Lords of the Counſell, "who then weare moſt of them great Noblemen, and "to divers other of the Nobility, inferring and inforcing it to be done or procured by himſelf to diſgrace "the Nobility. Whereupon ſuch a fire was kindled "againſt him in the hartes of all the Lords, as a "platt was laid to cut him off. He was thereupon "called before the Counſell without the Quene's know"ledg and charged; which though he ſufficiently aun"ſwered, yet it was reſolved what aunſwere ſoever "he made, he ſhould be ſent to the Tower, and then "they wold find matter enough againſt him. Where"of he haveing advertiſement, wrote to the Quene of "theire purpoſe, who commanded nothing ſhould be "done againſt him without her privity, or els he had "byn ſent to the Tower without her knowledge. So "the fire was covered, but not quenched; for not long "after a vilaine was hired to kill him, and ſet at a "ſtaires foote to diſpatch him as he came from the "Queen; but being warned of it, he went down an"other waie and eſcaped death. Here maie be noted "howe great miſchiefs maie riſe upon ſmall cauſes; "for this was only for haveinge the Booke, which he "deteſted and condemned as much as they, and "ſought to have the Writer apprehended as belonged "to his place, yet his jelous ennemyes torned his ho"neſt meaninge to a horrible miſchiefe."

(45) Ad ann. 569, pag. 417.

(46) Idem, ibid.

(47) Pag. 18, 19.

[K] Made . . . . High-Treaſurer . . . . which poſt he diſcharged with great fidelity and applauſe.] He had a ſtrict eye upon the Farmers of the Cuſtoms, but without harſhneſs or pedantry. He uſed to ſay, that he never cared to ſee the Treaſury ſwell like a diſordered ſpleen, when the other parts of the Commonwealth were in a conſumption. And he employed all poſſible means (and with good ſucceſs) to enrich the Queen and the Kingdom by his adminiſtration, it being a common expreſſion with him, that nothing could be for the advantage of a Prince, which makes any way againſt his reputation. Wherefore he would never ſuffer the rents of lands to be raiſed, nor the old tenants to be put out (48).

(48) Camden, Pag. 609.

some neighbouring Allies (z). He lived in a very hoſpitable and magnificent manner (aa); and conſtantly beſtowed in alms five hundred pounds a year (bb). He entertained the Queen at his houſe twelve ſeveral times, each of which coſt him two or three thouſand pounds (cc). He was highly reſpected by the Nobility (dd), and endeavoured always to advance men of Quality and merit (ee). He was mild in his anſwers to perſons of all ranks (ff); and took particular care to prefer valuable men in the Church, and in the poſts of the Law (gg). He was ſtrict in his devotion, kind to his friends, gentle to his enemies, averſe to pomp, temperate in diet, and impenetrably ſecret (hh). His chief diverſion was in reading or converſing with his friends (ii). Not long before his death, he was deſirous of leaving his Queen and country in perfect peace and tranquillity; to which end he endeavoured to effect an accommodation with the King of Spain, but in this point was oppoſed by the Earl of Eſſex (kk) [L]. Whilſt his Lordſhip lay ſick, by his prudent conduct a treaty was ſet on foot with the States of Holland, by which the Queen was eaſed of a yearly expence of an hundred and twenty thouſand pounds (ll.) He died at his houſe in the Strand Auguſt the 4th 1598 (mm), with ſtrong ſentiments of piety and reſignation (nn), and interred at Stamford in Lincolnſhire, where a monument was erected to him (oo). We ſhall give ſome account of his poſterity in the note [M]. Camden tells (z) Camden, pag. 609.

(aa) Life of Cecil, pag. 37, & ſeqq.

(ee) Ibid. pag. 46.

(ff) Ibid. pag. 48.

(gg) Ibid. pag. 55, 56.

(hh) Ibid. pag. 38.

(ii) Ibid. pag. 40.

(kk) Ibid. pag. 45.

(ll) Ibid. pag. 56-64.

(mm) Camden, pag. 608.

(nn) Life of Cecil, pag. 68, & ſeq.

(oo) Stowe, ubi ſupra.

(mm) Idem, ibid. pag. 610.

(nn) Stowe's Annals, p. 148.

[L] Endeavoured to effect an accommodation with the King of Spain; but in this point was oppoſed by the Earl of Eſſex.] The Earl having been bred to the ſword, and gained ſome reputation by it, was averſe to an accommodation, and ſtiffly urged the impoſſibility of making any honourable Treaty with Spain, or indeed any Terms, but what they would break, upon theſe and the like ſuggeſtions; "that the Spaniards are a ſubtle and "enterprizing people, and very ambitious of extend-"ing their Empire; that they bore a moſt inveterate "averſion to England, and profeſſed a Religion quite "contrary to it; that the Pope's diſpenſing power "was unlimited, and that axiom generally eſpouſed, "that Faith is not to be kept with heretics." Theſe arguments and the apprehenſion of future dangers and inconveniences he much inſiſted on, ſo that the Lord Treaſurer was provoked to ſay, That he ſeemed intent upon nothing but blood and ſlaughter. And after a very warm debate upon this point he took out a prayer-book, and without uſing any words pointed to this paſſage, Men of blood ſhall not live out half their days. "Some "however there were, continues Camden (49), who "approved Eſſex's meaſures, as conceiving he was prin-"cipally concerned for the honour and welfare of his "country. Others condemned him as a deſigning "and ambitious perſon, who was for advancing him-"ſelf and his creatures at any rate. To ſilence theſe "men he wrote a formal kind of defence, in which "he exhibited what has been already mentioned &c." Mr. Collins at the end of his edition of the Life of Cecil (50) has committed a ſtrange miſtake with regard to this laſt paſſage of Camden, from which he erroneouſly concludes that Lord Burleigh wrote a Defence of his opinion in favour of peace againſt the Earl of Eſſex's party; whereas it is evident from Camden's words, that it was the Earl, who wrote in favour of a war with Spain. Mr. Collins's words, for which he cites the place above quoted, are as follow: Some however there were, who approved Eſſex's meaſures, as conceiving he was principally concerned for the honour and welfare of his country. His Lordſhip (51) therefore to ſilence theſe men, wrote a formal kind of Defence, wherein he exhibited ſuch weighty arguments to ſupport his opinion for a peace, as convinced all diſpaſſionate men. And tho' they produced not the deſired effect, yet whilſt his Lordſhip lay ſick, by his provident conduct, &c.

(49) Pag. 608.

(50) Pag. 74.

(51) Lord Burghley.

[M] We ſhall give ſome account of his poſterity in the note.] His eldeſt ſon THOMAS CECIL, was born in the year 1542 (52), and in the 5th of Queen Elizabeth elected Member of Parliament for the Town of Stamford in Lincolnſhire (53). May 26th 1601 he was inſtalled at Windſor one of the Knights companions of the moſt noble Order of the Garter (54). In the third of King James I. he was created Earl of Exeter (55). He died Feb. 7th 162½, and was interred in Weſtminſter. By his laſt wife the Lady Frances Bridges he had no other iſſue than one daughter Sophia-Anna, buried Sept. 15, 1621; but by the firſt, one of the coheirs of John Nevil, Lord Latimer, he had five ſons and eight daughters, viz. William, who ſucceeded him; Sir Richard Cecil, anceſtor to the preſent Earl of Exeter; Sir Edward Cecil, created Viſcount Wimbleton; Chriſtopher drowned in Germany; and Thomas. His daughters were theſe; Catherine, who died unmarried; Lucie, married to William Marquis of Wincheſter, by whom ſhe had iſſue John Marquis of Wincheſter, Father to Charles late Duke of Bolton; Mildred, firſt married to Sir Thomas Read Knt. and afterwards to Sir Edmond Trafford of Trafford in the County of Lancaſter Knt. Mary to Edward Lord Denny; Suſan, who died unmarried; Elizabeth married firſt to Sir William Hutton Knt. and afterwards to Sir Edward Coke, Knt. Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench; Dorothy, to Sir Giles Allington of Horſheath in the County of Cambridge Knt.; and Frances to Sir Nicholas Tuſton of Hothfield in the County of Kent Knt., afterwards Earl of Thanet. His Lordſhip's third ſon, Sir Edward Cecil, who was one of the moſt famous Generals of his time, was created Baron Cecil of Putney Nov. 9th 1625, and on July 25th the year following made Viſcount Wimbleton. He married three wives; firſt Theodoſia, daughter of Sir Andrew Noel of Dalby in Leiceſterſhire Knt., by whom he had iſſue four daughters, Dorothy who died unmarried; Albinia, married to Sir Chriſtopher Wray of Barlings in Lincolnſhire Knt.; Elizabeth, to Francis Lord Willoughby of Parham; and Frances to James, ſon and heir of William Viſcount Say and Sele. His ſecond wife was Diana, daughter of Sir William Drury of Halſtede in the County of Suffolk Knt. by whom he had iſſue only one daughter Anne, who died in her infancy. By his third wife Sophia, daughter of Sir Edward Zouch of Woking in the County of Surrey Knt., he had iſſue an only ſon, Algernon, who likewiſe died in his infancy. His Lordſhip died at Wimbleton Nov. 16th 1638, and was interred there. His eldeſt brother WILLIAM, Earl of Exeter, was married in his youth to Elizabeth, ſole daughter and heir to Edward Manners Earl of Rutland, who died April 11th 1591, leaving iſſue an only ſon William, who, in right of his mother, bore the title of Lord Roos. His ſecond wife was Elizabeth, ſiſter and coheir of Sir Robert Drury of Halſtede in the County of Suffolk, Knt., by whom he had only three daughters, Elizabeth, wife of Sir Thomas Howard Knight of the Bath, afterward created Lord Howard of Charlton, Viſcount Andover, and Earl of Berkſhire; Diana, firſt married to Henry Earl of Oxford, and afterwards to Thomas Lord Bruce, Earl of Elgin in Scotland, afterwards created Earl of Aileſbury; and Anne to Henry Lord Grey of Groby, afterwards created Earl of Stamford. His Lordſhip's only ſon William Lord Roos married on Feb. 12th 1616 Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Lake Knt., Principal Secretary of State. He died at Naples June 27th 1618 of poiſon, as was ſuſpected. The beforementioned William, Earl of Exeter, his Father, was inſtalled one of the Knights of the Garter at Windſor October 5th 1630, being then one of the Privy Council to King Charles I, and departing this life was interred July 8th 1640, in Weſtminſter-Abbey; and leaving no iſſue, his nephew David Cecil, ſon and heir of his brother Sir Richard Cecil, daughter of Sir Anthony Cope of Hanwell in the County of Oxford, Bart. ſucceeded him in his honours. DAVID, Earl of Exeter, married Elizabeth, daughter of John Earl of Bridgwater, by whom he had ſix ſons and three daughters: Thomas, the youngeſt of the ſons, was buried at Tinwell in Rutlandſhire May 28th 1641; and Elizabeth, one

(52) Ex Stemmate.

(53) Ex Not. Parl. MS. per Brown Willis Arm.

(54) Collins's Memoirs of the Family of Cecil, ſubjoined to the Life of Cecil, pag. 106.

(55) Idem, ibid.

(pp) Pag. 610. tells us (pp), that he was one of thoſe few who lived and died with a ſound and large reputation.

one of the daughters, was buried there Novemb. 13th 1638. Anne, another daughter, died young; and Frances was married to Sir Anthony Aſhly Cooper, afterwards Earl of Shaftſbury. His ſons, who ſurvived him, were John Earl of Exeter, William, and David. His Lordſhip died at London April 18th 1643, and was buried in the Church of St. Martin in Stamford. JOHN, Earl of Exeter, by the Lady Frances his firſt wife, daughter to John Earl of Rutland, had iſſue John, Earl of Exeter; David, who died young, and Frances, married to John Lord Viſcount Scudamore in the Kingdom of Ireland; and deceaſing in June 1694, left iſſue James Lord Viſcount Scudamore, whoſe daughter and heir is married to the preſent Duke of Beaufort. The ſaid John, Earl of Exeter, married to his ſecond wife the Lady Mary, daughter to Mildmay Fane, Earl of Weſtmoreland, widow of Sir Brian Palmes of Aſhwell in the County of Rutland Knt.; but by her had no iſſue. And departing this life at Burleigh-Houſe near Stamford in February 1677 was buried in St. Martin's Church aforeſaid. He was ſucceeded in his honour by JOHN his only ſurviving ſon, who married Anne, only daughter of William Earl of Devonſhire, and ſiſter to William Duke of Devonſhire, widow of Charles Lord Rich, ſon and heir of Charles Earl of Warwick; by whom he had iſſue John his ſon and heir; William Cecil of Snape in the County of York Eſq; Charles, and Edward; and four daughters, Chriſtian, Anne, and Frances, who died young; and Elizabeth, married to Charles Boyle, Earl of Orrery in Ireland, and Baron of Marſtown in England. His Lordſhip, who had a learned education and excellent genius, died at Iſſy near Paris in his return from Rome Aug. 29th 1700, and was interred in the church of St. Martin at Stamford. His eldeſt ſon and heir JOHN Earl of Exeter, married firſt in February 1696 Annabella, daughter of John Bennet Lord Oſſulſton, by whom he had no iſſue, ſhe dying in Auguſt 1698 without iſſue; and ſecondly Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter, and one of the coheirs of Sir John Brownlow of Belton in Lincolnſhire Bart. in Sept. 1699, who died in the 43d year of her age November the 28th 1723. His Lordſhip had iſſue five ſons, John Lord Burghley; Brownlow the preſent Earl of Exeter, William, Francis, and Charles, who died unmarried; and a daughter, Elizabeth, married to William Aiſlabie Eſq; ſon and heir of John Aiſlabie of Studely in the County of York Eſq; Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of the Privy Council to King George I. His Lordſhip departed this life Decemb. 21ſt, 1721, and was buried at Stamford, and ſucceeded by JOHN his eldeſt ſon and heir, who dying unmarried April 9th 1722, was ſucceeded by his brother and heir BROWNLOW, now Earl of Exeter, then Member of Parliament for Stamford. His Lordſhip in the year 1724 married Hannah-Sophia, daughter of Thomas Chambers of the town of Derby Eſq; and Merchant of the city of London, by whom he hath iſſue two ſons and two daughters, the right honourable Brownlow, Lord Burghley, Lady Margaret-Sophia Cecil, the honourable Thomas-Chambers Cecil, and Lady Elizabeth Cecil (56). The Arms of the Earl of Exeter are Barry of ten Argent and Azure, over all ſix Eſcutcheons 3, 2, and 1. Sable each charged with a Lion rampant of the field. The Creſt, in a Chapeau Gules, turn'd up Ermine, a Garb Or ſupported by two Lions, that on the dexter ſide Argent, the ſiniſter Azure. Supporters, two Lions Ermin. Motto, Cor unum, via una.

(56) Collins, pag. 106-118.

We ſhall proceed now to the children of William Lord Burghley by his 2d wife Mildred Cooke (57), daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, by whom, beſides three children, who died young, he had a ſon, Robert, and two daughters, viz. Anne, the eldeſt was married to Edward Earl of Oxford, by whom that Earl had three daughters, Elizabeth, married to William Earl of Derby, Bridget to the Lord Norris, and Suſan to Philip Earl of Montgomery. Elizabeth his ſecond daughter, was married to William, the heir of the Lord Wentworth, who had no children (58). ROBERT CECIL was by Queen Elizabeth made Principal Secretary in 1596 (59), Maſter of the Court of Wards in 1597 (60), and employed in ſeveral negotiations. He was likewiſe Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge. Tho' that Queen, eſpecially in the latter part of her life, was impatient of hearing the name of her ſucceſſor, yet Sir Robert held a correſpondence with the King of Scots, which was once very near being diſcovered. "For the Queen taking the air upon Black-Heath "near Greenwich, a poſt ſummoned her to enquire "from what quarter his buſineſs came; and hearing "from Scotland, ſhe ſtaid her coach to receive the "packet. But the Secretary, Sir Robert Cecil, being "in the coach with her, fearful that ſome of his ſe-"cret conveyances might be diſcovered, having an "active wit, calls for a knife ſuddenly to open it, "leſt put-off and delays might beget ſuſpicion; and "when he came to cut it, he told the Queen, it look-"ed and ſmelt ill-favouredly, coming out of many "naſty budgets, and was fit to be opened and aired "before ſhe ſaw it; which reaſon meeting with her "diſaffection to ill ſcents, hindred her ſmelling out "his under-hand contrivances (†)." May 13th 1603 he was created Baron Cecil of Eſendon in the County of Rutland; and Auguſt 20th the year following Viſcount Cranborn in Dorſetſhire; and May 4th 1605 Earl of Saliſbury (61). He was inſtalled Knight of the Garter May 20th 1606 (62), and made by King James I Lord High-Treaſurer May 6th 1608 (63). He died in his return from Bath at Marlborough in Wiltſhire on Sunday May 24th 1612 (64), and was interred at Hatfield in Hertfordſhire. He married Elizabeth, daughter of William Brook Lord Cobham, by whom he had a ſon named William, and a daughter, Frances, married to Henry Clifford Earl of Cumberland. WILLIAM, Earl of Saliſbury, was made Knight of the Garter, Captain of the Band of Gentlemen Penſioners, and one of his Majeſty's Privy-Council, and died December 3d 1668, aged 78, and was interred at Hatfield. He married on Decem. 1ſt 1608 the Lady Catherine, youngeſt daughter of Thomas Howard Earl of Suffolk, by whom he had a ſon, Charles, and four daughters, viz. Anne married to Algernon Piercy Earl of Northumberland; Elizabeth to William Cavendiſh Earl of Devonſhire; Catherine to Philip Lord Liſle; and Mary to William Lord Sandes of the Tine in Hampſhire. Charles, their brother, dying before his father, left iſſue by Jane daughter and coheir to James Maxwell Earl of Darlton in Scotland ſeven ſons and five daughters; of which daughters Catherine was married to William Earl of Kinnoul in Scotland, and Frances to Sir William Bowyer of Derham-Court in the County of Bucks Bart. Of the ſons JAMES the ſecond (the eldeſt being dead) ſucceeded his grand-father. He was of the Privy Council to King Charles II, and on Auguſt 31ſt 1680 was made Knight of the Garter. He died in June 1683. He married Margaret, daughter of John Maners Earl of Rutland, by whom he had five ſons and five daughters. Catherine, the eldeſt daughter, was married to Sir George Downing of Eaſt Hatley in the County of Cambridge Bart.; Frances to Sir William Halford of Welham in Leiceſterſhire Bart.; Mary to Sir William Foreſter of Dothill in the County of Salop Knt.; Margaret, firſt to John Lord Stawel, and ſecondly to Richard Jones Earl of Ranelagh in Ireland, who died Feb. 21ſt 172$\frac{2}{3}$ in the 55th year of her age; and Mildred, the youngeſt, to Sir Uvedale Corbet of Langnor in the County of Salop Bart. The ſons were James, Robert, William, Charles and George; whereof Robert married Elizabeth daughter and heir to Iſaac Mennil of Mennil-Langley in the County of Derby, and Relict of William Hale of King's-Walden in the County of Hertford Eſq; and died in February 1715. JAMES, the eldeſt, in 1683 ſucceeded his father. He let out Saliſbury-Houſe to build upon, by which means he greatly improved his eſtate, and died in December 1694. He married Frances, one of the daughters and coheirs of Simon Bennet of Beechampton in the County of Bucks, Eſq; and by her, who died July the 8th 1713, had one only ſon JAMES, late Earl of Saliſbury, who was Lord Lieutenant of the County of Hertford, and aſſiſted Octob. 20th 1714 at the Coronation of King George I carrying St. Edward's ſtaff. He married Febr. 12th 1705. the Lady Anne Tufton, ſecond daughter and coheir of Thomas Earl of Thanet; and dying October the 9th 1728, aged 37, by her left iſſue James his ſon and heir, William, and three daughters, Lady Anne, Catherine, and Margaret. JAMES, the preſent Earl of Saliſbury, was born October 20th 1713, and upon his return from his travels (†) Arthur Wilſon's Life and Reign of King James, ad ann. 1603.

(57) Life of Cecil, pag. 5.

(58) Camden, pag. 610.

(59) Idem, pag. 594.

(60) Idem, pag. 599.

(61) Camden's Annals of King James I.

(62) Idem, ibid.

(63) Idem, ibid.

(64) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. 2. Part 1. pag. 77. and Camden's Annals of King James.

(qq) Life of Cecil, pag. 66.

putation. He was of a middle ſtature, and had an agreeable countenance, and an excellent complexion (qq).

travels in 1734 took his ſeat in the Houſe of Lords. The Arms of the Earl of Saliſbury are the ſame with the Earl of Exeter, with a Creſcent for the difference. Creſt, on a wreath fix arrows Or, heads and feathers Argent, girt together with a bandage or belt Azure, garniſhed Or, and over theſe feathers a Morion cap proper. Motto, Sero, ſed ſerio (66). T.

(66) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. 2. Part 1. pag. 77-81.

CERASI (TIBERIO) lived about the cloſe of the ſixteenth Century. He pleaded at the Bar in Rome, for twenty years; and was afterwards made one of the conſiſtorial Advocates in 1589. He was alſo Advocate of the Exchequer, and the Apoſtolical Chamber; afterwards Clerk of that Chamber, and at laſt Treaſurer to the Pope. Tho' he had written a great number of pieces, none of his writings have been publiſhed, except his Anſwers, inſerted in the Councils of Farinatius. He died at Rome the 7th of May 1601, with grief, as it is related, for his having been ſharply reprimanded by Pope Clement VIII (a). He was in his fifty ſeventh year. He bequeathed his whole eſtate to the Hoſpital di Conſolatione, and was interred in the Church of our Lady del Populo (b).

(a) Tiberii mortis cauſam attuliſſe dicitur Clementis Pontificis acris quædam ac vehemens objurgatio. Proſper. Mandoſius, Bibliotb. Romanæ, Cent. 1. pag. 24.

(b) Extracted, ibid.

CERATINUS (JAMES) a learned man of the ſixteenth Century, and an excellent Grecian, aſſumed this name, according to the cuſtom of that age, from his being a native of Hoorn in Holland [A]; all which we ſhall explain [B]. Eraſmus honoured him with very great encomiums [C], not only on account of the regularity of his life and manners, but alſo for his erudition. George, Elector of Saxony, having deſired Eraſmus to make choice of ſome perſon to ſucceed Moſellanus in his employment in the Univerſity of Leipſic, ſent him Ceratinus (a), who was alſo offered the Greek Profeſſorſhip in the College of three Languages at Louvain. Ceratinus did not meet with a very good reception at Leipſic; and we find by ſome letters of Eraſmus (b), that he drew this contempt upon himſelf, for his not diſcovering a ſufficient diſinclination to the Lutheran principles. This was in 1525. Before this he had taught the Greek tongue privately in Louvain (c), whither he had retired, when the war and the peſtilence forced him to quit his employment in the College of Tournay. He died at Louvain the 10th of April 1530, in the flower of his age (d). He was a Prieſt; and a circumſtance happened at his Ordination which deſerves to be known [D]. He was miſtaken when he told Eraſmus by letters,

(a) Eraſm. Epiſt. 29. lib. 20. pag. 994.

(b) The 42d and 44th of lib. 30.

(c) Eraſm. Epiſt. 12. lib. 17. pag. 756.

(d) Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 406.

[A] He aſſumed that name . . . from his being a native of Hoorn.] Moreri ſhould not have been in the leaſt doubt on this occaſion; he does not know whether Ceratinus was born at Hoorn in Holland, or Hoorne in Guelderland. In propriety of ſpeech, the Horne hinted at by him is not in Guelderland.

[B] All which we ſhall explain.] Hoorn ſignifies, in Flemiſh, a horn. In Greek a horn is called κέρας; in this manner James Ceratinus is the ſame as James the horned, or the cuckold, a title which was preferred to that of Hornanus, by which this Author had ſometimes diſtinguiſhed himſelf; and to that of Teyng, which was the name of his family; the name abovementioned, I ſay, was choſe preferably to any other, both as it was Greek, and by that means concealed the infamy affixed to the word horn; as becauſe, perhaps, the celibacy of Ceratinus ſecured him from the malicious alluſions, to which his name would have expoſed him, had he been married.

[C] Eraſmus honoured him with very great encomiums.] Eraſmus thought him a man of ſufficient learning, to be Profeſſor in the middle of Italy, and greatly ſuperior to Moſellanus. Jacobus Ceratinus, ſays he (1), homo tam Græcanicæ literaturæ callens, ut poſſit vel in media Italia profiteri, nec ſe ipſo inferior in literis Latinis. i. e. "James Ceratinus, a man ſo well "ſkilled in the Greek, that he is able to be Profeſſor "of it in the midſt of Italy; nor is he inferior in the "Latin." In another Letter (2) he expreſſes himſelf in ſtill ſtronger terms. Græcanicæ literaturæ tam exactè callens, ut vix unum aut alterum habeat Italia quicum dubitem hunc committere, nec in Latinis ſui diſſimilis eſt. i. e. "He is ſo great a maſter of the Greek "Tongue, that there are ſcarce two perſons in Italy, "whom I would ſcruple to compare with him; nor "is he leſs ſkilful in the Latin Tongue." He ſpeaks as follows in another place (3): Succedit Petro Moſellano ſed decem Moſellanis eruditior, etiam Moſellani doctrinam & ingenium haud vulgariter amabam. i. e, "He ſucceeded Peter Moſellanus, but he had ten times "his learning, and yet I had a more than common "eſteem for Moſellanus's learning and abilities." As to his manners, he declares that he is the moſt good natured creature living, being free from diſguiſe or artifice, and modeſt to a fault. Modeſtia pene immodica, moribuſque plane niveis & ab omni fuco prorſus abhorrentibus. (4). Moribus eſt ſinceriſſimis & ad amicitiam appoſitis; adeo ut non minus videatur natus gratiis quam muſis (5). i. e. "His manners are perfectly upright, and happily "formed for friendſhip; ſo that he ſeems to have been "born for the Graces no leſs than for the Muſes. . . . Habet unum hoc vitium Ceratinus noſter, immodice modeſtus eſt, ſic verecundus ut pene putidulus ſit (6). i. e. "Our Ceratinus has but one fault, and that is, his too "exceſſive modeſty; he is ſo baſhful, that it is almoſt "troubleſome." Valerius Andreas quotes a conſiderable part of theſe paſſages; and alſo cites Junius, who has greatly applauded Ceratinus in his Proverbs (this I ſhall mention hereafter) and in his Batavia, In qua à ſingulari modeſtia ac virginali quodam pudore commendat. i. e. "In which he commends him for his ſin-"gular modeſty, and a certain virgin-like baſhfulneſs." But Valerius Andreas did not obſerve, that the elogium exactiſſimi vir judicii (a man of a moſt conſummate judgment) which he fancies Eraſmus beſtows on Ceratinus, relates to Henry Stromer, to whom he was then recommended. See Epiſt. XXIX of Book XX (7).

(1) Eraſm. Epiſt. 28. lib. 20. pag. 993.

(2) The 31ſt of the ſame book, pag. 995.

(3) Epiſt. 41. lib. 30.

(4) Epiſt. 28. lib. 20. pag. 993.

(5) Epiſt. 29. lib. 20. pag. 994.

(6) Epiſt. 31. lib. 20. pag. 995. See alſo Epiſt. 41. lib. 30. p. 1929.

(7) Pag. 994.

[D] A circumſtance happened at his ordination, which deſerves to be known.] Adrian Junius, Ceratinus's countryman, after having laviſhed the greateſt encomiums on him, adds (8), that he is aſſured from good hands, that Ceratinus being unwilling to diſobey the ſevere commands of his father, went to Utrecht, in order to be ordained Prieſt. He was examined according to cuſtom; and upon his confeſſing ingenuouſly that he did not know by heart ſo much as one of the grammar-rules they put to him, he was diſmiſſed as an ignorant fellow, and ordered to go and apply himſelf more aſſiduouſly to the grammar. According Ceratinus went away as ſilently as poſſible; and only told the reaſon of his being excluded to a learned Clergyman; who going immediately into the room, where the examiners were aſſembled, told them the blunder they had made; that there was not a more learned man in all Louvain than the perſon they had ſent back to read his accidence; and that he had given public proofs of his learning by the exact Latin verſion he had given of St. Chryſoſtom's Books relating letters, that he had ſeen him at Daventer [E]. He wrote a piece intitled de Sono Græcarum Literarum; a tranſlation of St. Chryſoſtom's firſt and ſecond dialogue on the excellency of the Prieſthood, and a Greek and Latin Lexicon [F], which was printed, with a preface written by Eraſmus, anno 1524.

(8) Adag. 4. Cent. 5.

to the Dignity of Prieſthood. The examiners were very ſenſible of their miſtake, ſo that they called back Ceratinus; and excuſed themſelves from the neceſſity (they ſaid) they were under, of going thro' the uſual form, and thereupon he was ordained Prieſt. Had theſe Gentlemen aſked Ceratinus, per quam regulam? (by what rule?), as Scholars are examined from Deſpautere's Grammar, who are obliged to decline their name by rule; had they treated, I ſay, Ceratinus in this manner, becauſe they had been told he was proud, they would not have been to blame. There goes a ſtory, that a preſumptuous young fellow, juſt going to receive Orders, had the mortification to have the following queſtion put to him, Muſa quæ pars orationis? (What part of ſpeech is Muſa?) and that anſwering, Aquila non captat muſcas, i. e. "The eagle "does not catch at flies:" he was anſwered, neque eccleſia ſuperbos "nor the Church at proud fellows," and thereupon was diſmiſſed.

[E] He was miſtaken when he told Eraſmus (by letter) that he had ſeen him at Daventer.] We find by a Letter which Eraſmus wrote to him, in April 1519 (9), and wherein he ſtiles him Hornenſis, I, that Ceratinus had deſired Eraſmus to indulge him his friendſhip; and, among other particulars, that he had had the honour to ſee him at Daventer. II, That he had hinted ſome circumſtances to Eraſmus, which he imagined would recall it to his memory. Eraſmus anſwered, that it was all a dream, and proved it to be ſo from the very ſame circumſtances. He tells him, that when he ſet out from Daventer, the bridge was not yet built, and that he did not go immediately after to England (10). Should I be aſked, why I take notice of ſuch minute particulars, I anſwer, that it is to exhibit an illuſtrious example of a very common illuſion, and for which ſome perſons might better excuſe themſelves than they commonly do, if they conſidered how many learned men fall into it. The illuſion is this: When a Writer becomes very famous, thoſe who ſtudied in the ſame Univerſity with him, take I know not what pleaſure, in declaring in all companies wherein that great Writer is mentioned, that they have known him many years, that they remember him a ſcholar &c. Theſe people imagine, that they hereby ſhare in the glory of ſuch a great man; and thereupon they relate more particulars concerning him, than are believed; and more are believed than are true (11). I am ſure that many perſons will ſee their own pictures on this occaſion. Be this as it will, we ſee here by the example of Ceratinus, that we ought not to depend too much on our memories; for there is no doubt but the laſt mentioned thought he had really ſeen Eraſmus.

[F] . . . He wrote . . . a Greek and Latin Lexicon.] Boxhornius (12) is much miſtaken when he aſſerts, that this is the firſt Greek Lexicon that was ever compiled. Valerius Andreas (13) is little leſs miſtaken, where he tells us that Ceratinus was the firſt, after Aldus Manutius, who augmented and publiſhed ſuch a Lexicon. The Preface (14) which Eraſmus made to this work of Ceratinus, is ſufficient to ſhew, that it had been already enlarged by ſeveral Writers, and borne ſeveral impreſſions. Some perſon or other had even introduced certain proper names into it, a circumſtance, which Eraſmus does not approve. One would ſuppoſe at firſt ſight, that Geſner had imagined, that this cenſure was levelled at Ceratinus (15), which will appear manifeſtly falſe, to any one who examines but ever ſo ſlightly the Preface in queſtion: but if Geſner's expreſſion is carefully weighed, he will be cleared. Boxhornius does not diſtinguiſh the manner how Ceratinus taught the Greek Tongue in Louvain. Græcæ (Linguæ) profeſſorem egit Lovanii, ſays he. Now theſe words are deceitful; they naturally induce every reader to ſuppoſe, that Ceratinus was Greek Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Louvain, which is not true. Swert (16), from whom Boxhornius borrowed Ceratinus's epitaph, with the typographical error Minoritidas for Minoritas, i. e. the Franciſcans, ſhould have made him believe, that Ceratinus taught the Greek only in private (privatim), which word is employed by Valerius Andreas.

(9) It is the 32d of Book 5.

(10) Quod exiſtimas me tibi Daventriæ conſpectum vel hoc argumento facile deprehendes te vana ludi mentis imaginatione, quod cum ego Daventria diſcederem, nondum fluvius qui urbem præterfluit ponte junctus erat.

(11) See on this ſubject, the remark [I] of the article CAMDEN.

(12) In Theatr. Holland. pag. 373.

(13) Biblioth. Belg. pag. 406.

(14) It is the 28th book of his Epiſtles.

(15) Geſner. in Biblioth. in Ceratino.

(16) Athen. Belg. pag. 358.

CERINTHUS, a Hereſiarch contemporary with the Apoſtles, aſcribed the Creation of the World not to God, but to the Angels (a). He taught that Jeſus Chriſt was the Son of Joſeph, and that the uſe of Circumciſion ought to be retained under the Goſpel. He is looked upon as the Head of the converted Jews, who raiſed in the Church of Antioch (b) the tumult of which St. Luke has given the Hiſtory in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts. They cauſed that diſturbance by declaring to the faithful, that without Circumciſion they would unavoidably be damned. It is alſo ſaid that he was one of thoſe who, ſome years before (c), had cenſured St. Peter for having publiſhed the Goſpel to the Gentiles (d). St. Epiphanius, who tells us all this (e), ſuppoſes notwithſtanding that Cerinthus came after Carpocrates: this is to pervert Chronology [A]. Cerinthus paſſes for one of the principal Heads of the Millenarians: he is accuſed of having taught that after the reſurrection the Church ſhould remain on earth one thouſand years, and that this would be the reign of Jeſus Chriſt, a time of temporal proſperity and delights [B]. Whereupon,

(a) Epiphan. adverſus Hæreſ. pag. 110.

(b) In the year 51.

(c) That is, in the year 35.

(d) See the 11th chap. of the Acts of the Apoſtles.

(e) Epiphan. adv. Hæreſ. pag. iii.

[A] St. Epiphanius . . . ſuppoſes that Cerinthus came after Carpocrates: this is to pervert Chronology.] Lambert Danæus very juſtly cenſures thoſe who ſay that the Cerinthians are a ſpawn of the Carpocratians (1). He ſays Tertullian and St. Epiphanius affirm this, that St. Auguſtin alſo affirms it being miſled by S. Epiphanius, and that Iſidore (2) has copied this fault of S. Auguſtin. He ſhews from two reaſons that Cerinthus lived in the time of the Apoſtles; one is drawn from what will be related below, when we take notice that S. John would not enter the bath; the other is taken from that Apoſtle's having, as it ſeems, refuted ſome errors of Cerinthus (3). He maintains on the other hand that Carpocrates lived under Antoninus Pius (4); and he obſerves that Theodoret places him under the reign of Hadrian, and that Euſebius makes him live at the ſame time that Saturninus dogmatized (5). It ſhould have been ſaid that Euſebius aſſerts this no otherwiſe than on the authority of St. Irenæus; which would have added weight to the proof. Danæus forgets not to obſerve, that St. Epiphanius had refuted himſelf, having acknowledged that Cerinthus oppoſed the Apoſtles more than once (6). Let us conclude that Moreri is miſtaken, when he ſays Cerinthus was the ſcholar of Carpocrates.

(1) Lamb. Danæus, de Hæreſ. cap. 8. folio m. 25.

(2) Iſidor. lib. 8. Etymolog. cap. 5.

(3) In his 1ſt Epiſtle, chap. ii. ver. 19, 22; and chap. iv. verſ. 3.

(4) Danæus, de Hæreſ. cap. 7. folio 22 verſo.

(5) Euſeb. lib. 4. cap. 8.

(6) Danæus, de Hæreſ. cap. 8. fol. 25.

[B] He is accuſed of having taught Chriſt's reign of a thouſand years, a time of temporal proſperity and pleaſure.] Caius gives the following account of this opinion (7). In certain relations * which Cerinthus wrote, as if he had been ſome great Apoſtle, he tells us of ſeveral monſtrous opinions, which he feigns the Angels revealed to him: he affirms that the reign of Jeſus Chriſt ſhall be eſtabliſhed on earth after the reſurrection, and that men ſhall live in Jeruſalem ſtill ſubject to their appetites and pleaſures, and that this will be a marriage-feaſt which will laſt a thouſand years. It is thus that Caius repreſents this matter: Dionyſius Biſhop of Alexandria in the time of Euſebius makes uſe of more groſs

(7) Caius adverſus Proclum, apud Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 28. pag. m. 109. * Theſe Relations ſeem to have been no other than the Apocalypſe of S. John, which Caius believed was written by Cerinthus. See Grabe's Spicil. Patrum, Sect. 1. pag. 312.

Whereupon, ſome believed him to be the real Author of the Apocalypſe [C], and that he fathered it on St. John. Every one knows what is told of that Apoſtle with regard to his averſion to Cerinthus; every one, I ſay, knows it is related that he would not enter into the ſame bath where this Heretic was. The Ancients vary as to this fact, and the Moderns have added circumſtances to it which might paſs for a pious fraud [D]. Some have applied to Cerinthus what Theodoret has ſaid concerning certain defenders of the Law groſs expreſſions. Cerinthus, ſays he (8), believed that the reign of Jeſus Chriſt would be on earth; and as he was very much addicted to ſenſual pleaſures, he feigned that the delights which he wiſhed for would be the eſſential part of that reign: he made it to conſiſt in ſatisfying the belly and the inferior members, that is to ſay, in eating, drinking, marrying, feaſting, and ſacrificing; for he covered thoſe pleaſures under theſe laſt terms, which are more decent. I will ſet down the Greek words, with the Latin verſion of Henry Valeſius, that it may be ſeen whether my conjecture have any ſort of foundation (9): Ἐπίγειον ἔσεσθαι τὴν τοῦ Χριστοῦ βασιλείαν. καὶ ἐπειδὴ αὐτὸς ἀφίγετο φιλήδονος· ἐν ᾗ καὶν σαρκικὸς, ἐν τούτοις ὑπειροπολεῖν ἔσεσθαι, γαστρὸς καὶ τῶν ὑπὸ γαστέρα πλησμονῶν. τουτέστι σιτίοις καὶ ποτοῖς καὶ γάμοις, καὶ δι' ὧν εὐφημότερον ταῦτα ὠνόμαζε ποιεῖσθαι, ἑορταῖς καὶ θυσίαις καὶ ἱερείων σφαγαῖς. Regnum Chriſti terrenum futurum. Et quarum rerum cupiditate ipſe flagrabat, utpote voluptatibus corporis obnoxius carnique addictus, in iis Regnum Dei ſitum fore ſomniavit, in ventris, & earum quæ infra ventrem ſunt, partium explenda libidine: hoc eſt in cibo & potu, ac nuptiis, atque ut honeſtiori vocabulo ejuſmodi voluptates velaret, in feſtis (10) & ſacrificiis & hoſtiarum mactationibus. My conjecture is, that Cerinthus did not expreſſly teach that the felicity and glory of the reign of Jeſus Chriſt would conſiſt in ſatisfying gluttony, and luxury: he made uſe of another manner of expreſſion, he had recourſe to the rejoicings which are proper to feaſt-days, and particularly to days deſtined to the offering of victims, and eating of ſacrifices. The Greek words which I have quoted clearly inſinuate that he had ſhrouded himſelf under decent phraſes. But it was thought allowable to draw the vail aſide, and to paraphraſe them in ſuch a manner that all the uglineſs of his opinions might eaſily be ſeen. If my conjecture were certain, there would be ſome unfairneſs in the proceeding of Cerinthus's enemies; for what right has any one to impute to an Author particulars which he does not ſet out? Why cannot he enjoy the benefit he might expect from the generality of his expreſſions? It may not be improper to obſerve, that Henry Valeſius does not approve that inſtead of εὐφημότερον we ſhould read ἰουδαϊκώτερον (11), and he confirms his opinion by the verſion of Rufinus: Nec aliter legiſſe Rufinum ex verſione ejus apparet. Sic enim vertit: Et ut aliquid ſacratius dicere videretur, legales ajebat feſtivitates rurſum celebrandas. Feſtorum ſcilicet & ſacrificiorum nomine libidines ſuas velabat Cerinthus, ut honeſtatem quandam in ſpeciem præferret (12).

(8) Dionyſius, lib. 2. de Promiſſionibus, apud Euſebium, ibid.

(9) Euſebius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 28. ex Dionyſio, lib. 2. de Promiſſion.

(10) The Tranſlation which has been made of theſe Greek Words quoted by Euſebius in the 25th chapter of the 7th Book, ſeems to me to be better; it is this: Et in iis quibus iſta honeſtius parari exiſtimabat; feſtis nimirum, &c.

(11) As Chriſtopherſon does.

(12) Valeſius, Not. in Euſebium, pag. m 54.

[C] . . . Whereupon, ſome believed him to be the real Author of the Apocalypſe.] The ſame Dionyſius whom I have quoted in the preceding Remark, acquaints us, that there were ſome perſons who intirely rejected the Revelations as a Work not written by St. John, or any Apoſtle, or any Eccleſiaſtical Author, and which deſerved not the title of Revelation, becauſe it is covered with ſo dark a vail, that it is impoſſible to make any thing of it; that Cerinthus had compoſed it, and had ſet St. John's name to it, in order to make his own idle imaginations paſs under the authority of ſo venerable an Apoſtle. Κήρινθον δὲ τὸν καὶ τὴν αἵρεσιν ἀπ' ἐκείνου κληθῆσαν Κηρινθιανὴν, συνησάμενον αἱρέσεις, ἀξιόπιστον ἐπιφημίσαι θελήσαντα τῷ ἑαυτῦ πλάσματι ὄνομα. Cerinthum enim, qui nominis ſui ſectam conflavit, cum magnæ auctoritatis nomen ad faciendam fidem commentis ſuis vellet præfigere, Joannis titulum operi ſuo indidiſſe (13).

(13) Euſebius, lib. 7. cap. 25. pag. m. 273, ex eodem Dionyſio. See Rem. [B], Citation (†).

[D] It is ſaid that S. John would not enter into the ſame bath where he was. The Ancients vary as to this fact, and the Moderns have added to it . . a pious fraud.] The variation of the Ancients conſiſts in this, that ſome pretend this fact concerns Cerinthus, and others that it concerns Ebion. You will find in Euſebius, that S. John having entred the bath, and hearing that Cerinthus was there, immediately fled away, and bade his companions do the ſame: let us fly, ſaid he to them, for fear a bath which holds the enemy of the truth ſhould fall. Φύγωμεν μὴ καὶ τὸ βαλανεῖον συμπέσῃ, ἔνδον ὄντος Κηρίνθου τοῦ τῆς ἀληθείας ἐχθροῦ. Fugiamus, inquit, ne balneum corruat in quo Cerinthus eſt veritatis inimicus (14). Euſebius quotes S. Irenæus, who ſays he heard it from S. Polycarp (15), and that the thing happened at Epheſus. If you conſult S. Epiphanius, you will find that S. John, who never went to the bath, was one day moved to go thither by the Holy Ghoſt. But being informed that the Heretic Ebion was there, he underſtood the reaſon of the inſpiration on which he had received; he perceived that the Holy Spirit had cauſed him to take that ſtep, only to give him an opportunity of ſhewing how much truth ought to be eſteemed, and with what diſtinction we ought to treat the friends of God, and the inſtruments of the Devil. He groaned therefore, and ſaid loud enough to be heard by all who were preſent, Haſte, my brethren, let us depart hence, leſt the baths be overturned, and cruſh us together with Ebion, becauſe of his impiety (16). Baronius, to reconcile St. Irenæus and St. Epiphanius, ſays that perhaps Cerinthus and Ebion were together in the bath (17); but Mr. de Tillemont takes notice that there was no neceſſity to fly to this conjecture, it being no unfrequent thing for St. Epiphanius to miſtake in point of Hiſtory (18). He adds to the ſtory before us, ſays he (19), divers particulars leſs certain and leſs important. Obſerve here the progreſs of Relations: St. Irenæus ſeems to have been the firſt who publiſhed the action of S. John: he contented himſelf with relating what he had heard of it; but thoſe who came after him, finding his narrative too naked, added ſome embelliſhments to it. They did not think it glorious for the memory of that Apoſtle, that he might be ſuppoſed to bathe in a public place; wherefore they aſſerted that he never did, and that if he had one day a deſign to do it, it was by an order from above. Then ſome reaſon for the inſpiration was to be ſought for; and they found it in the great importance it was of to acquaint the faithful that they ought to have the enemies of the truth in abhorrence, and to believe that divine juſtice is always ready to give extraordinary examples of ſeverity againſt Hereſiarchs. But as it ſeemed of no uſe to let the readers imagine that S. John was afraid without occaſion, or that the implicite menace contained in his words was vain, it was thought proper to ſuppoſe that the Heretic, with whom he would not bathe, was cruſhed to death under the ruins of the houſe. This is what ſucceeding ages have added to the imbroidery of St. Epiphanius.

(14) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 29. pag. 100. He cites S. Irenæus in the 3d Book againſt Hereſies. See the ſame Euſebius, lib. 4. cap. 14. pag. 128.

(15) Ὡς ἐκ παραδόσεως Πολυκάρπου, that is, according to the Verſion of Henry Valeſius, ait ita ſe à Polycarpo accepiſſe; but ſince Euſebius, lib. 4. cap. 14. pag. 128, obſerves that Irenæus relates that people who were yet living had heard Polycarp ſay this, it is a proof that Irenæus was not of the number.

(16) Epiphan. adv. Hæreſ. num. 30. pag. 148, 149.

(17) Baron. ad ann. 74. num. 9.

(18) Tillemont, Memoires de l'Hiſt. Eccleſiaſtique, tom. 1. pag. 1085, of the Bruſſels Edition.

(19) Ibid. pag. 924.

I ingenuouſly acknowledge that I had never read this Addition, when I met with it in a Letter of the learned Reineſius; but I have ſince found it in ſeveral Authors whom he does not mention. He ſpeaks of it after having obſerved that the contemporary Writers do not ſay the Emperor Frederic Barbaroſſa was trampled on by the Pope, tho' their ſilence has not hindred their deſcendants from inventing that circumſtance, and affirming it boldly. Similis huic hiſtoriæ interpolatio temeratiove, adds he (20), commiſſa eſt ab illis, qui ſive Ebionem ſive Cerinthum (variant enim) Epheſi ruinâ balnearum, in quibus diſputaret unà cum auditoribus ſuis, appreſſum eſſe narrarunt. Cum enim legiſſent apud Iren. l. 3. c. 3. Epiphan. hær. 30. Euſeb. l. 3. Hiſt. Eccl. c. 23. & l. 4. c. 14. è relatu B. Polycarpi, S. Johannem Evang. & Apoſtolum, cum in balneis quas loturus intraverat Cerinthum cum ſuis eſſe audiviſſet, Feſtinate, dixiſſe, fratres; Egrediamur; ne domus corruat & pereamus cum Cerintho, qui intus eſt, inimico Veritatis; quod timere ne fieret dixerat Apoſtolus, id factum ſic eſſe interpretati ſunt. In hac culpa eſt ille qui notas marginales Epiphanio Latino, excuſo Baſil. an. 1560 intulit; fingit enim miraculum à Johanne editum: & Victor. Strigel. qui Schol. ad Proverb. Salom. c. 22. tanquam Irenæi ipſius adfert hæc: Egreſſo Johanne domus ſtatim collapſa Cerinthum & turbam reliquam oppreſſit: quod veterum & proximorum Apoſtoli & Cerinthi temporibus nemo dixerat. Plura ejuſmodi Oratores

(20) Thomas Reineſius, Epiſt. 57. ad Rupertum, pag. 520, 521.

Law of Moſes, who were for having the Angels worſhipped, and grounded their doctrine on this reaſon, that ſince God could neither be ſeen, touched, nor comprehended, it was neceſſary to procure the divine benevolence by the Miniſtry of Angels (f). It is alſo ſuppoſed that St. Paul had this Heretic in view, when he warned the faithful to reject thoſe who through a voluntary humility, and worſhipping of Angels, intruded into thoſe things which they had not ſeen; and we are aſſured that Cerinthus, having had ſome acquaintance at Alexandria with the Jews, with the Pagans, and with the Magicians, framed an Hypotheſis compoſed of Judaiſm, Paganiſm, and Magiſm, and publiſhed it chiefly in Phrygia and Piſidia, and that he even worked wonders by the invocation of Angels (g). He rejected the Acts of the Apoſtles, and the Epiſtles of St. Paul, and admitted only the Goſpel of St. Matthew (b). He did not even admit the whole of that, if we believe St. Epiphanius (i).

(f) See Father Garnier, in Auctario Operum Theodoreti, apud Ittigium, de Hæreſiarch. Seculi I & II. pag. m. 52.

(g) Garnier. in Auctar. Theod. apud Ittigium, ibid.

(b) Philaſtr. cap. 36. apud eund. ibid.

(i) Epiphan. Hæreſ. 28. cap. 5.

tàm Eccleſiaſticos quàm Politicos peccaſſe circà hiſtorias ſine dubio notaſti, (ſanè obſervantur quotidie) deque iis moneri Juventutem veræ hiſtoriæ & elegantiorum literarum intereſt. i. e. "An interpolation or corruption "very like this has been made by thoſe who tell us "that either Ebion or Cerinthus (for they differ as to "the perſon) was killed at Epheſus by the fall of a "bath, in which he was diſputing with his auditors. "For when they had read in Irenæus, &c. who had it "from a tradition of S. Polycarp, that St. John the "Evangeliſt and Apoſtle, when he heard that Cerinthus and his diſciples were in the bath which he had "entered with a deſign to waſh, ſaid, Make haſte, "brethren, let us go out, leſt the houſe fall and we "periſh with Cerinthus, the enemy of the Truth, who "is within; what the Apoſtle had ſaid he feared "would happen, they concluded did really happen. "Of the ſame fault has he been guilty who inſerted "the Marginal Notes in the Latin Edition of St. Epiphanius, printed at Baſil in the year 1560: for he "feigns a miracle wrought by S. John: and Victorinus Strigelius, who in his Scholia on the Proverbs of Solomon chap. 22. quotes this as a ſaying of Irenæus: "When St. John was gone out, the houſe immediately "fell, and cruſhed to death Cerinthus and the reſt: "which had been ſaid by none of the ancients who "lived neareſt the times of the Apoſtle and Cerinthus. "You have, without doubt, obſerved that ſeveral "faults of the like nature have been committed by "Eccleſiaſtical as well as Political Orators, (and indeed they are taken notice of daily,) and it is for "the intereſt of true hiſtory and polite learning that "youth ſhould be warned of them." If I had ſhortened this paſſage, I had deprived ſeveral of my readers of the knowledge of one thing which will pleaſe them; that ſuch falſifications are found in Orators both of the Clergy and of the Laity, againſt which it is of conſequence that young men ſhould be cautioned. A fault a hundred times more common than it ought to be! Let one Author ſay that certain things were feared, and another will ſay they came effectually to paſs. A miſchievous and ſhameful imitation of the News-Writers (21)! Reineſius perhaps recollected no more than the two Authors whom he quotes; but here are ſeveral others. Friar Bernard of Luxemburgh ſays Venerable Bede aſſerts that St. Polycarp relates (22) what St. John ſaid and did; and that ſo ſoon as the Apoſtle was got out, the bath fell, and knocked Cerinthus on the head. De iſto Cherintho dicit Beda ſuper epiſtolam Joann. narrat enim de illo ſcilicet Joanne auditor ejus ſanctiſſimus vir & martyr fortiſſimus Polycarpus Smyrneorum Antiſtes, quod tempore quodam cum apud Epheſum balnea lavandi gratia fuiſſet ingreſſus, & vidiſſet ibi Cherinthum exire, continuo diſceſſit non lotus, dicens: Fugiamus hinc ne balnea ipſa nos corrumpant, in quibus eſt Cherinthus inimicus veritatis. Quo egreſſo, balneum cecidit, & hæreticum cum ſuis oppreſſit (23). Prateolus affirms that St. Irenæus, in the third Chapter of the third Book againſt Hereſies, relates, that S. John found Cerinthus ſitting in the bath with his followers, and diſputing violently, and denying impudently and as a blaſphemer that Jeſus Chriſt was God: S. John roſe up, and warned his friends to retire with him, for that God was going to puniſh ſuch ſhameleſs blaſphemies. So ſoon as he was gone out, the houſe fell, and deſtroyed Cerinthus and all his company. You may believe that Prateolus does not let ſlip ſuch an opportunity without moraliſing againſt the Authors of Sects. "Here, ſays he, may be ſeen the dreadful example of "divine vengeance on thoſe, who with manifeſt im- "piety blaſpheme the name of God and his ſound "doctrine, not fearing to introduce ſects of perdition; "and how ſeldom the divine wrath ſuffers them to "eſcape unpuniſhed." Read his whole narration. Quod verò contemporaneus ſancto Joanni Evangeliſtæ fuerit, teſtatur Divus Irenæus libr. 3. adverſus hæreſes cap. 3. cùm de Beato Polycarpo loquens, ait veniſſe aliquando in balneum Joannem, & illic reperiſſe Cerinthum hæreticum unà cum conſortio ſuorum ſedentem, inter quos Cerinthus acerrimè diſputabat, impudenterque blaſphemus negabat Chriſtum Deum eſſe. Atque ſurgens Johannes monuit amicos ſuos qui ei aſſidebant, ut unà ſecum abirent: nam non velle Deum ampliùs ferre blaſphemias tam impudentes. Illico verò cùm egreſſus eſſet, collapſa domus, Cerinthum cum ſua cohorte extinxit. Ex quo licet videre horrendum exemplum divinæ ultionis & vindictæ in eos, qui manifeſta impietate nomen Dei & ejus ſanam doctrinam blaſphemant, non verentes ſectas perditionis introducere: & quàm ira divina illos non patiatur tandem inultos (24). Join to this Latin the following words of Mr. de Tillemont (25): Feuardentius quotes from St. Jerome againſt the Luciferians, that the bath actually fell, and cruſhed Cerinthus. [I have read that whole Treatiſe on purpoſe, and find no ſuch thing in it.] I have a Catalogue of Heretics, compoſed in form of a Catechiſm by a German Miniſter (26), and here is the Anſwer I find to the Queſtion: Quomodo periit (Cerinthus)? Ruina balnei oppreſſus: Cum enim Johannes Evangeliſta, cum diſcipulis ſuis, Epheſi, lavandi cauſſa, in balneum veniſſet, ac vidiſſet intus eſſe Cerinthum, reſiluit inde ſtatim, ac dixit: Diſcedamus citò, ne ruina balnei opprimamur, cum intus ſit Cerinthus, hoſtis veritatis. Id quod etiam, diſcedente eo, factum eſt. Ut exprimitur in verſibus Strigelii:

Impia Cerinthus ſancto convitia Chriſto
Dum facit, & ſtulta garrulitate furit:
Concidit & rapido blaſphemum contudit ictu
Collapſæ ſubito facta ruina domus.

That is,

"How did Cerinthus come by his end? He was kil- "led by the fall of a bath: for when St. John the E- "vangeliſt, with his diſciples, went into a bath at E- "pheſus to waſh, and ſaw Cerinthus there, he imme- "diately ſtarted back and ſaid: Let us depart quickly, "leſt we be cruſhed to death by the falling of the "bath; for Cerinthus, the enemy of the truth, is in "it. Which happened accordingly, ſo ſoon as he de- "parted; as is expreſſed in theſe verſes of Strigelius:

"While impiouſly Cerinthus Chriſt revil'd.
"Venting his fury in diſcourſes wild;
"The houſe fell ſudden on his guilty head,
"And rapid cruſh'd the bold blaſphemer dead.

Micrælius has not been more exact in conſulting the originals, tho' he cites them: See the margin (27). Ittigius ſeems to think that Prateolus is the firſt who tacked to Irenæus's Narrative what relates to the fall of the houſe where Cerinthus was bathing (28). It is certain that this additional ornament is more ancient than Prateolus.

(24) Prateolus, in Elencho Alphabet. Hæreticor. pag. m. 128.

(25) Tillemont, Mémoires de l'Hiſt. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 1085.

(26) Johannes Pontanus, Eccleſiæ Regiomontanæ in Neomarchia Paſtor, & Vicinarum Inſpector, in Catalogo Hæreticorum, folio B. 3 verſo. This Book was printed in the year 1615, in 12*mo.*

(27) Epheſi, Irenæo teſte lib. 3. cap. 3. è balneo egreſſus (Joannes) Cerinthum hæreſiarcham vidit ædium ruina obrui. i. e. "(St. "John), as is "teſtified by Ire- "næus, going "out of a bath "at Epheſus, "ſaw Cerin- "thus the he- "reſiarch cruſh- "ed by the fall "of the houſe." Micræl. Syntag. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. m. 223.

(28) Ittigius de Hæreſiarch. I & II Seculi, pag. 58. edit. 1690.

(21) There is a paſſage in this Dictionary (the end of the Remark [A] of the Article VIRGILIUS Biſhop of Saltzburgh) where I have ſaid that the News Writers having ſeen Letters which adviſe that the Army of their party is preparing to lay ſiege to a Town, affirm the ſiege is already formed.

(22) It is not true that S. Polycarp relates this: St. Irenæus only ſays that he had been heard to ſay ſo. Here then is already one Addition.

(23) F. Bernardus Lutzenburgus, in Catalogo Hæreticorum, Voce Cherintiani.

CERISANTES, a very ingenious and brave man in the ſeventeenth Century. There is an Article of him in the Supplement to Moreri. The reader muſt not give credit to the inſidious inſidious falſities which may have crept into it; and I muſt deſire him to attend the obſervations I ſhall here give, which are extracted from a manuſcript Apology, ſent to me from London by Mr. de St. Helene (a) two or three months before his death. He had drawn it up for Mr. de Ceriſantes his brother, ſome time after the Duke of Guiſe's Memoirs had appeared in public. Mr. de Ceriſantes is very much abuſed in thoſe Memoirs; but the Author of the Apology aſſerts, that what is therein ſaid againſt him is rank calumny. He does not believe that this work was written by the Duke de Guiſe; and he ſuſpects that Mr. de Sainction (b) either invented the whole, or introduced the ſeveral fictitious Particulars in it; prompted either by the great affection he bore to his maſter, or to make the piece more agreeable (c), and get a better price from the Bookſeller for the manuſcript. He begins with refuting certain contemptuous terms which are employed, and the reproach caſt on Ceriſantes, viz. of his being meanly deſcended [A]. He owns that he had a quarrel with the Duke de Candaule; but aſſerts, that the circumſtances and conſequences of it are falſly related [B]. He does not deny but that his brother was a little

(a) He left France in the time of the laſt perſecution, and fled for refuge to England. He died in London the 20th of January 1697.

(b) Secretary to this preſent Duke. It was he who publiſhed his Memoirs.

(c) The manuſcript Apology. Pag. 3.

[A] Mr. de Ceriſantes is very much abuſed in thoſe Memoirs. . . . His brother who drew up his apology . . . . refutes certain contemptuous terms (1), and the reproach caſt on Ceriſantes, viz. of his being meanly deſcended.] He ſays that theſe words will appear very ridiculous, when it ſhall be known, that Cardinal de Richelieu had ſo good an opinion of Ceriſantes as to ſend him to Conſtantinople in 1641, in order to treat of ſome important affairs there; and that in 1644, Chancellor Oxenſtiern, and the reſt of the regents of Sweden, during the minority of Queen Chriſtina, judged him worthy of being admitted as a Counſellor of State of that Kingdom; and of being afterwards ſent to the Court of France, in quality of Reſident. . . . This appears by the Sieur de Ceriſantes's commiſſion; by a letter which the ſaid Chancellor writ to him at Paris; and by another which the Sieur de Chanut, at that time Reſident of France in Sweden, wrote to Mr. Gueffier at Rome; which pieces are in the hands of Mr. de Sainte Helene, as well as all the reſt, of which mention will be made hereafter (2). It is to be obſerved, that the Queen of Sweden had firſt given Ceriſantes a regiment in the army of Germany; but being come within two days journey of Stockholm, in order to go and take poſſeſſion of it, a Courier who was diſpatched to him, obliged him to return back; the Regents of the Kingdom of Sweden, having thought it more adviſeable to ſend him to France, with the character of Reſident (3). It is alſo to be obſerved, that he had been Lieutenant in the firſt company of the regiment of Navarre . . . and that he performed ſuch glorious actions in the ſeveral employments he exerciſed in this regiment, and diſplayed ſo much vigour, capacity and courage in various engagements, that the Prince, at that time Duke of Enguien, and Marſhal du Chatillon, de la Meilleraye, and de Gaſſion, beſtowed publickly on him, in preſence of all the Officers, ſuch applauſes as might have inſpired the moſt modeſt perſons with vanity (4). The Author of theſe Memoirs to the Duke of Guiſe, is told, that in aſcribing too little merit and experience to Mr. de Ceriſantes, he contradicts himſelf, ſince he owns in the ſame page 177, that he was endued both with wit and eloquence; in the next page, that he was a brave man, and that few perſons equalled him in Latin Poetry. In page 195, that he made a lodgment within ten paces of a poſt in which the enemy had five hundred men; where he behaved as gallantly as before at the attack; and that he put it into ſo good a poſture of defence, that it could not be taken afterwards. In page 254, that the Duke of Guiſe having come to an engagement, only to extricate Jacomo Rouſſa from imminent danger; and finding him ſafe, he only aimed at his retreat, the care of which he gave to the Sieur de Ceriſantes, who came (ſays the Author of the Memoirs) very opportunely for him; then he rejoyned the Duke of Guiſe after a ſlight ſkirmiſh, and without loſing ſo much as one man. To all this is added, that the command of four thouſand Calabrians which that Duke beſtowed upon him, was another indiſputable proof which the King had of his experience in military affairs. This is proved by page 375, as alſo by the Memoirs of the Count of Modena, Tom. III, page 51; and alſo by the commiſſion which the Duke of Guiſe gave Ceriſantes for that employment. The concluſion is, that the reaſons alledged by the Author of the Memoirs, for the refuſal which he pretends the Duke of Guiſe made Ceriſantes of the poſt of Colonel-General, are weak; ſince he afterwards gave him another that was much more conſiderable with reſpect to the function, though not quite ſo honourable (5).

(1) Theſe are in pag. 116. of the Mem. du Duc de Guiſe. Paris edit. 4to.

(2) Manuſcript Apology, pag. 4, and 5.

(3) Ibid. pag. 15. We are referred to Mr. de Chanut's Letter.

(4) Ibid. pag. 11.

(5) Ibid. pag. 6 and 7.

With regard to the meanneſs of extraction, it is obſerved that the author of the Memoirs ſays falſly, that the father of Ceriſantes was a Miniſter (6), and the conſequence which he would draw from it is refuted. It is aſſerted, that this would not prove that Ceriſantes was of noble deſcent; and after follow theſe words: "His "father whoſe name was Mark Duncan, was a famous Doctor of Phyſic, a native of Scotland, and "born a Gentleman. Coming into France in his "youth, he ſettled at Saumur in Anjou, where he "married a Gentlewoman of a good family. He "had not been long here before he gained ſo much "reputation in his art, that James I King of Britain "ſent for him, with an offer of making him his Phyſician in ordinary; and for this purpoſe he ſent "him the patent of it (as a ſecurity of what he was "promiſed) before he croſſed the ſea; but as his wife "was extremely deſirous not to leave her native "country, her relations and acquaintance, he yielded "to the tears of his wife, of whom he was paſſionately fond; and ſo refuſed to accept of an employment that was ſo honourable, ſo advantageous "to his family, and ſpent the reſt of his life at Saumur, where he died in 1640, to the univerſal regret of every one whether high or low, or Papiſt or "Proteſtant. He was admirably well ſkilled in Philoſophy, Divinity, and Mathematicks; beſides Phyſick, which he practiſed with great honour. The "moſt valuable circumſtance in him was, his being "a man of the greateſt probity, and of a moſt exemplary life (7)." Add to this what I ſhall obſerve in the laſt remark.

(6) Memoires du Duc de Guiſe, pag. 178.

(7) Apology, pag. 9. See the following remark.

[B] He owns . . . the quarrel with the Duke of Candale; but aſſerts that the circumſtances and conſequences of it are falſly related.] Here follow the words of the apology, which clear up an incident that will be thought curious by many Readers. "M. de Ceri"ſantes had a quarrel with the Duke of Candale, and "ſent him a challenge; but the Duke of Guiſe, in "caſe he were Author of thoſe Memoirs, would have "leſs reaſon than any one to make him ſuch a reproach; ſince it was purely to ſerve the beautiful "Mademoiſelle de Pons, his miſtreſs, at that time "one of the Queen Regent's Maids of Honour, whom "the Duke of Candale had publickly affronted, as "ſhe was in a coach with Mr. de Ceriſantes. More"over, I will be ſo ingenuous as to confeſs, that be"ing at that time Reſident from the Crown of Sweden, "the ſtricteſt laws of prudence would not permit him to "carry his reſentments to ſuch great lengths; but where "ſhall we meet with the generous men, who are able "to practice ſo ſevere a virtue, when their honour is "attacked? There is no doubt but the ill treatment "which this beautiful Lady had received publickly, "reflected ſo highly on the Gentleman who was then "talking to her, that it was ſcarce poſſible for him "to diſpenſe with endeavouring to repair it. Mr. "de Ste. Helene, his brother, diſcourſing on this ſub"ject ſome months after, told him frankly; that, in "his opinion, he had injured his character by ſuch a "conduct, and in ſome meaſure renounced the privi"leges which the law of nations gave him, as a man "in a public character. You ſay right brother, ſaid "Ceriſantes; but you are to know that the Court"Ladies, from time immemorial, have been the abſolute little too haughty, and perhaps carried his ambitious views too far (d) . . . but, adds he, if such a defect may be excused in any one; it might be in him, . . . who was a handsome man, very witty, very well skilled in polite Literature, extremely brave, greatly skilled in the military Science; and that he possessed in a very eminent degree all those talents, which may recommend a man to society, with regard to the arts either of peace or war. The Author denies his having been removed from his employments by the Queen of Sweden [C], and disapproves his leaving the Court of France. He insinuates (e) that he left her Swedish Majesty's service, in order to execute the resolution he had formed of changing his Religion; and accordingly he quitted the Protestant faith and turned Roman Catholic. He was sent to Naples in quality of the King's Resident, and to watch the motions of the Duke of Guise, of whom the Court of France entertained some little suspicion (f). The Author denies his having assumed the title of Embassador [D]; and declares that the subject and circumstances of his confinement were not faithfully related [E]. Some

(d) Manuscript Apology, pag. 12.

(e) Ibid. pag. 17.

(f) See the note [D].

" solute dispossers of fame and reputation. Had I " suffered a Lady to be affronted in my company, I " should have quite lost my honour in the opinion of " the fair-sex, and should have never dared to appear " before them. But I absolutely deny that this quar- " rel preceded the time of his being Resident, and " obliged him to leave Paris. Several persons belong- " ing to the Court at that time, will remember per- " fectly, that when he challenged the Duke of Can- " dale, he had exercised his employment upwards of " a year; and that he continued it nine or ten months " after, in spite of the sollicitations, which the late " Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Espernon, and " Mr. de Metz, at that time Abbot of St. Germain " des Prez, now Duke of Verneuil, employed with " her Swedish Majesty, in order to have him recalled. " To effect this they set every engine at work; and " attacked him about his birth, (either out of mere " malice, or from the same argument employed by " the Author of the Memoirs, viz. that as he was son " to a man of letters, there was some probability of " his not being a Gentleman) but all in vain, for Mr. " de Cerisantes having been informed by Mr. de Lyonne " of all that was hatching against him, sent with all " imaginable diligence to Sweden, a copy of the in- " strument of his Nobility, which one of the Secre- " taries of State had compared with the Original, with " which the Queen his Mistress seemed entirely sa- " tisfied; so that she laughed at the multitude of " letters which were sent her, in prejudice of her re- " sident, whom she not only continued in his employ- " ment at the Court of France, as I before observed; " but also approved his treatment of the Duke of " Candale (8).

(8) Apology, pag. 12.

[C] The Author denies his having been removed from his employment by the Queen of Sweden.] " This is " also a false assertion, since it appears by a letter Mr. " de Cerisantes sent to his brother Mr. de Ste Helene, " from Stockholm, and dated the 28th of April 1646, " which is still in his hands, that he resigned, and " set out from the Court of France unknown to the " Queen his Mistress. I do not pretend either to de- " fend or excuse his going away without leave; it be- " ing very certain, that he might have been tried for " it. Mr. de Cerisantes was not insensible of the dan- " gerous consequences of this; but hearing from good " hands, that some powerful friends of Mr. Grotius " endeavoured to undermine him, out of hatred from " a supposition that he had supplanted them, he ven- " tured at all, and hazarded undertaking the journey, " to invigorate his party by his presence; and to de- " fend a post which his enemies attacked with so much " fury, or else to bury himself under its ruins. It is " also very evident from the discharge, which Mr. de " Cerisantes obtained from the said Queen his mistress, " that she was extremely well satisfied with his nego- " ciations, and the industry he had employed; and " that she desired to keep him in her service; for " it is expressly said in this discharge, that he himself " desired it, in order to have an opportunity of mak- " ing his fortune that way; and that during the whole " time he transacted the affairs of that Crown, he " acquitted himself with the utmost diligence, fidelity, " and industry. The letter of Mr. Chanut, which " has already been mentioned twice, testifies the same " thing, saying that the Queen had assured him by " word of mouth, that to keep the said Mr. de Ce- " risantes in her service, she had put it to his option, " either to have a regiment or a considerable pen- " sion (9)."

(9) Ibid. pag. 15, & seq.

[D] The Author denies his having assumed the title of Embassador . . . at Naples.] All the French who " were at the same time in Naples, can testify that " he assumed no other title there than that of the " King's Agent, which the Memoirs in question al- " low him to have been, in page 116; as do also " those of the Count de Modena, Vol. II, page 237. " . . . As such he consequently had a right to assem- " ble the Council, and to make such proposals in it " as he judged necessary; having particular orders " for that purpose, and general ones to observe the " Duke of Guise's actions, and give advice of his " conduct; that his designs, even when he was at " Rome, seemed very suspicious to the Ministers of " France (10). The Author of the Memoirs says, " that Cerisantes would place himself on the left hand " of the Duke of Guise, at Mass and in public Ce- " remonies; but that the Duke would not suffer it, " and treated him ill upon that account. The Apo- " logist answers (11), that he had never once heard " of such a quarrel; and that Cerisantes was so brave, " and so tender of his honour, that since he did not " show his resentment by some desperate action, or " by leaving Naples, we ought to believe that the " Duke of Guise did not give him the abusive lan- " guage mentioned in the Memoirs. The whole 205th " page, adds he (12), is filled with injurious and in- " sulting expressions which do not merit an answer, " because it is evident they were dictated wholly by pas- " sion; and that Mr. de Cerisantes's original sin is, his " having devoted himself entirely to the interest of the " Marquis de Fontennai Mareuil, at that time Embas- " sador of France at Rome; and that he was too eagle-eyed " to suffer himself to be over-reached by the artifices of the " Duke. Nevertheless, I will not scruple to observe, " that the slanders of a very passionate Prince, cannot " be put in parallel, with the approbation of the Cardinals " de Richelieu, Mazarine, and Ste Cecile, of Chancellor " Oxenstiern and the rest of the Regents of Sweden; " of the Bishop of Angers, the Marquis de Fontenai, the " Sieurs de Lyonne and Chanut; and of several other " persons of quality and merit, who honoured Mr. de " Cerisantes with their esteem, so far were they from " considering him as a madman, and a chimerical " creature.

(10) Ibid. pag. 5.

(11) Ibid. pag. 19, 20.

(12) Ibid. pag. 22.

[E] . . . and . . . that the subject and circumstance of his confinement are not faithfully related.] Here follows the story as I heard it from his Valet de Chambre (13). " The Duke suspecting that Mr. de Cerisantes " did him some ill offices at the Court of France, " and with the Marquis de Fontenai at Rome, went " one day to his house, with a great train; and com- " ing into his apartment would oblige him, partly by " fair words, and partly by threats, to deliver up his " cyphers to him, in order to clear the suspicions he " entertained, concerning some letters he had inter- " cepted; which Mr. de Cerisantes however refused ab- " solutely, protesting, that as he was not to give him " an account of his actions, he would never part with " those letters unless they were forced from him. " Upon this, they came to high words on both sides; " and the Duke flying into a great passion, caused " his guards to put him under an arrest; with orders " from them to watch him so narrowly, that he " might

(13) The Author of the Apology, pag. 19. says, that he undertook a journey to Paris, purposely to be informed by Cerisantes's Valet de Chambre, who was lately returned from Naples, of the several transactions of Mr. de Cerisantes his master, ever since his leaving Sweden, as well in the Courts of Poland, Muscovy, and the Imperial, as particularly at Rome and at Naples. He adds, pag. 26. that this Valet de Chambre was a very worthy man, and acknowledged to be so brave by the Duke of Guise himself, that he gave him a Cornet's commission after the death of Cerisantes.

Some complaints are made of the truth being diſguiſed with regard to his death [F]; and the particulars concerning his will are rejected as fabulous [G]. This is perhaps, of all the calumnies which have been publiſhed againſt Mr. de Ceriſantes, that which may expoſe him moſt to the laughter of all readers; but at the ſame time no circumſtance can be refuted in ſo unanſwerable a manner; there being a copy of his will regiſtred in due form by a Notary Public, to produce againſt all thoſe who publiſh and ſpread ſuch a report. The Apologiſt does not fail to obſerve (g), that this alone is ſufficient to invalidate all the other calumnies; for that man who has the aſſurance to publiſh falſities, which are afterwards invalidated by the Regiſter of a Public Notary, does not deſerve the leaſt credit. Nevertheleſs, the particulars relating to Ceriſantes inſerted in the Memoirs of the Duke de Guiſe made a ſtrong impreſſion on the readers, and have been tranſcribed into other books. Du Maurier has taken them in; the Continuator of Moreri copied du Maurier; and it appears by the Menagiana, that they ſerved as topicks for converſation to the wits who uſed to meet at Mr. Menage's [H]. In this manner does fortune exerciſe her

(g) Manuſcript Apology, pag. 28.

" might not have the leaſt communication or correſpondence with any perſon whatſoever. A few " days after, the Duke's paſſion being cooled, he with- " drew his guards; and after making an excuſe to " Mr. de Ceriſantes, for his rigorous proceeding, and " imputing the cauſe of it to ſome malicious and ill- " deſigning people, who by their inſidious diſcourſes " had exaſperated him (the Duke) againſt Ceriſantes; " he ſo ſoothed and flatterred him, the Duke, (having " a peculiar talent in winning the affections of " people, and captivating them, whenever he deſired " to do it) that they were ever after good friends, " or at leaſt pretended to be ſuch (14)."

(14) Manuſcript Apology, pag. 23.

[F] Some complaints are made, of the truth's being diſguiſed with regard to Ceriſantes's death.] " Here " (15) the Duke, as in ſeveral other places of the " Memoirs, is very ſparing of the truth; for I know " from perſons of credit, that Mr. de Ceriſantes hav- " ing already packed up his baggage, in order to " go back to Rome, whither he was ſent for, in or- " der to be Chamberlain to Pope Innocent X (16); the " Duke intreated him to ſuſpend his journey till after " the general attack, which he intended to make upon " all the poſts of the enemy at the ſame time; which " requeſt Mr. Ceriſantes made no ſcruple to grant " him, he being overjoyed at meeting ſo favourable " an opportunity of acquiring Glory. And indeed, " he diſplayed his valour in a moſt ſignal manner at " the attack, on that ſide where the gate Chiaia " ſtood, as is affirmed by ſeveral perſons who were eye " witneſſes to it; which may be farther juſtified by " the Paris Gazette of April 22, 1648, the extract " whereof is contained in a letter which Mr. Rauſſin, " Secretary to Mr. de Ceriſantes, writ to Saumur to Mr. " de Ste Helene, dated the 18th of May 1648, from " Paris, where the ſaid Mr. de Ceriſantes had left " him upon ſome affairs; which was afterwards con- " firmed to him by the Valet de Chambre abovemen- " tioned. . . . Altho' Hiſtorians are anſwerable for the " truth of all they write, and their miſtakes will " not admit of any excuſe, I yet will not take much " advantage of the falſity we meet with in the Me- " moirs, concerning the date of Mr. de Ceri- " ſantes's death, becauſe it is of no great importance, " and may be looked upon as a very innocent error. " I ſhall only obſerve, that the Poſts were attacked the " 12th of February 1648, (according to the Memoirs) " and that he died three days after; which is evident- " ly falſe, ſince his will is dated the 27th of the " ſame month, and that he died one or two days " after, that is, the 28th or 29th; with which the " Gazette abovementioned alſo agrees. Thoſe who " have heard of the funeral honours which were paid " to the corps of Mr. de Ceriſantes; of the great con- " courſe of people who accompanied it to the grave, " and the grief of all the Calabrian Officers as well " as Soldiers; of the French Gentlemen and the com- " mon people, will conſider this as an infallible con- " ſequence of the great merit of this Gentleman (17)."

(15) i. e. pag. 574 and 375.

(16) The Apologiſt, in pag. 31. complains that this was not mentioned in the Memoirs of the Duke de Guiſe; and declares this ſilence to be a wilful omiſſion.

(17) Manuſcript Apology, pag. 25, 26.

This laſt incident ſeems to be produced, as the reproach of a willful omiſſion: It is true indeed, that the complaints are not exactly made as in the words of page 31. The Memoirs of the Duke of Guiſe take no notice of Mr. de Ceriſantes's being ſo well beloved by the people of Naples, that they gave him a fine country ſeat a few miles from the city, where his menial ſervants continued ſome days after his deceaſe.

[G] The particulars concerning his will are rejected as fabulous.] " This Author of the Memoirs, to " crown the work, finiſhes his calumnies by the moſt " notorious falſity that was ever publiſhed, ſaying that " Ceriſantes, carrying his vanity to its utmoſt height, " appointed the Duke his Executor; to which he adds, " that he left either as endowments, donations or pious " bequeſts, upwards of five and twenty thouſand crowns, " tho' he was not worth a ſhilling (theſe are the very " words of the Memoirs) which may be very eaſily " diſproved by a copy of the Will it ſelf, delivered " by the Notary who drew it up, and which is in the " hands of Mr. de Ste Helene. It appears by this Will, " that Signior Carlo is named Executor of it; and that " the legacies, donations and endowments amount only " to the ſum of five hundred and fifty ducats. He " alſo ordered, that the monies ariſing from the ſale " of 80 tuns of wine, which belonged to the ſaid de- " ceaſed, ſhould be employed by the ſaid Executor, " in adorning St. Anne's Chapel of the Carmelites " Church in Naples, where he will have his body in- " terred; and in having an epitaph made for him; " all this is far from five and twenty thouſand " crowns (18).

(18) Manuſcript Apology, pag. 27, 28.

[H] It appears by the Menagiana, againſt the particulars abovementioned relating to Ceriſantes . . . ſerved as topicks for converſation . . . at Mr. Menage's.] The Apologiſt informs us (19), that he ſhould not have taken his manuſcript from among the heap of papers under which he had buried it, had Ceriſantes been ſlandered by no one beſides the Author of the Duke of Guiſe's Memoirs. He at firſt intended to publiſh his apology; but he changed his reſolution, after his friends had obſerved to him, I, that theſe Memoirs being conſidered as a Romance, tho' very well writ and extremely diverting, were yet very much fallen in reputation, becauſe of the great number of fictitious ſtories inſerted in them. II. That his brother's reputation was too well eſtabliſhed to need a defence. But when he found that other Authors copied as true the incidents related in theſe Memoirs; and added other particulars to them, he thought it his duty to be no longer ſilent. Here follows another paſſage from his manuſcript. In the Book entitled, Menagiana, Menage is made to ſay (20), that Ceriſantes, being removed from his employment of Reſident of Sweden at the French Court, reſolved to turn Mahometan, in hopes of being made Grand Viſier, in leſs than two years; and by that means to find an opportunity of revenging himſelf on Sweden. . . . Now all this is falſe and ridiculous. . . . Mr. de Ceriſantes was ſent by Cardinal Richelieu to Conſtantinople in 1641; and was not Reſident in Sweden, till anno 1644, as I before obſerved in page 5 of this manuſcript. . . . He afterwards ſays, that Mr. de Ceriſantes died in the Duke of Guiſe's ſervice: this alſo is a falſity, he being the King's Agent, and not in the Duke's ſervice. . . . He adds, that Ceriſantes, by his will, bequeathed to his eldeſt brother, his lands and jewels, and to another relation, his ready money and moveables, with two hundred thouſand livres in pious bequeſts; and that he had the aſſurance to appoint the Duke of Guiſe his Executor. . . It appears by the will of the Sieur de Ceriſantes, that he left but 550 ducats in pious bequeſts; and that he ordered that the monies ariſing from the ſale of 80 tuns of wine, which the city of Naples had preſented him with, ſhould be applied to the adorning a Chapel in the Carmelites Church, in which he deſired to be interred; and in getting an epitaph made for him. . . . At the time of Mr. de Ceriſantes's death, he had only a younger brother named Ste Helene. . . The Duke was not Executor, but one Carlo (21).

(19) Ibid. pag. 36.

(20) Menagiana, pag. 401, and 402. Dutch edit.

(21) Manuſcript Apology, pag. 72.

her capricious tyranny over the memory and reputation of men; and hence we see how dangerous it is for a perſon to have his character drawn by an Hiſtorian who is reſolved to divert his readers, and has the art of pleaſing. I will communicate to the public ſome particulars, with which a friend of the Apologiſts has been pleaſed to favour me [I].

[I] I will communicate ſome particulars with which a friend of the apologiſt has been pleaſed to favour me.] Here follows an Extract from his letter. "Duncan "ſettled in Saumur, where he practiſed Phyſic with "great reputation. He was at firſt, Philoſophy Pro- "feſſor, and publiſhed an Epitome of Logic (22). "He reſigned this employment and was head of the "College. He had three ſons, Ceriſantes, Sainte "Helene and Montfort (fictitious names) and three "daughters. He writ a Book relating to the Nuns "of Loudun, concerning their being poſſeſſed by the "Devil, as was falſly ſuppoſed (23); for which Lau- "bardemont would have brought him into great trou- "ble, had he not been protected by Marſhal de Breze's "Lady whoſe Phyſician he was, and who had a great "affection for him. He had a footman whoſe ſon, "(a boy about twelve or thirteen) being ſeized with a "violent fit of coughing, ſpit out his tongue; when "carrying it to his father; here, ſays he, is my "tongue which I juſt now ſpit out. The boy ſpoke "as diſtinctly after this accident (which doubtleſs was "owing to the ſmall pox that had eat the root of his "tongue) as before; except that the ſounding of the "letter r gave him ſome trouble. He was ſhewn all "over Europe, and lived a great many years. A "Surgeon of Saumur having publiſhed a treatiſe on "this ſubject to which Mr. Duncan gave the title of "Agloſſoſtomographia; another Phyſician of Saumur (24) "who had a pique againſt Duncan, printed a trea- "tiſe to prove that it ſhould be Agloſſoſtomatographia, "and prefixed theſe lines to his Piece:

(22) Burgersdiſcius applauds it highly in the preface to his Inſtitutiones Logicæ, which he compoſed on that model.

(23) See the remark [B] of the article GRANDIER at the beginning.

(24) His name was Benoiſt. It was he who gave a Latin Tranſlation of Lucian.

"Lecteur tu t'eſmerveilleras
"Qu'un garçon qui n'a point de langue
"Prononce bien une harangue;
"Mais bien plus tu t'eſtonneras
"Qu'un barbier qui ne ſçait pas lire
"Le Grec, ſe meſle d'en eſcrire.
"Que ſi ce plaiſant Epigramme,
"Doux fruit d'un penſer de mon ame,
"Te ſemble n'aller pas tant mal,
"C'eſt que je l'ai fait à cheval.
That is,
"Reader, 'twill certainly excite thy wonder
"To hear a tongueleſs boy harangue the crowd:
"But what will raiſe thy admiration higher;
"A Tonſor, who can't read a word of Greek,
"Pretends (O ſtrange!) to write that lofty language.
"Now ſhould this pretty Epigram, (the fruit,
"And ſoft production of my leiſure moments)
"Seem to creep tolerably on all four,
"The reaſon's this—I made it when on horſeback.

"Some waggs changed the laſt verſe in all the co- "pies as they could meet with, and in the following "manner,

C'eſt que je l'ai fait en cheval.
That is,
"The reaſon's this — I made it like a horſe*.

* Or as we ſhould ſay in Engliſh, I made it like an Aſs.

"There is another circumſtance which appears to me "ſingular enough, viz. that Mr. Duncan, his three "ſons, and the only ſon of Ste Helene, (the five per- "ſons who formed the whole male line of that branch) "ſhould die and be buried in five different Kingdoms; "Mr. Duncan in France, Ceriſantes at Naples, Mont- "ford at Stockholm, Sainte Helene at London, and "his ſon in Ireland."

It is with joy I here embrace the opportunity of mentioning Mr. Duncan, who practiſes Phyſic at Bern with great reputation; and for whom I have always preſerved the utmoſt eſteem and friendſhip ever ſince we ſtudied Philoſophy together, in 1668. He is deſcended from a famous Philoſophy Profeſſor (25) who was of the ſame family with the Phyſician of Saumur. He was born at Montauban, and practiſed Phyſic there with great reputation, when a deſire of living purſuant to the dictates of his conſcience, obliged him to retire to Bern, after the repeal of the edict of Nantes. The works he has publiſhed are excellent in their kind, and do him great honour. He is Author of the new and mechanical explanation of the animal actions, printed at Paris in 1678: Natural Chymiſtry; or a chymical and mechanical explanation of the nouriſhment of the animal, in three parts, printed at Paris, the firſt in 1681, and the two laſt in 1687; Hiſtory of the animal, or the knowledge of the animated Body, by Mechanicks and Chymiſtry, printed at Paris in 1687. The Journaliſts have mentioned it with applauſe (26).

(25) In the Univerſity of Montauban.

(26) See the Apparatus ad Hiſtoriam Literariam of Mr. Van Beughem, pag. 128. of Part I; and pag. 107 of Part II.

[Mr. Duncan, who is living (this 9th of February 1726 in London, has publiſhed ſeveral other works; and among the reſt, a French piece entitled, Avis Salutaires &c. i. e. "Salutary Ad- "vice to the "public, con- "cerning the ill "uſe of hot ſub- "ſtances, parti- "cularly Coffee, "Tea and Cho- "colate," 8vo. Rotterdam 1705. And Chymiæ Naturalis Speci- men in 8vo. Amſt. 1710. Addit. to the Amſterdam Edit.]

CETHEGUS, a Roman Family, and a branch of the Houſe of the Cornelii, produced ſeveral perſons whoſe memory has been preſerved. I ſhall ſpeak of ſome of them. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS, created Conſul with Quintus Flamininus, diſtributed adulterated wine to the people after his election was over (a). Thoſe two Conſuls were obliged to reſign their office, becauſe there had been ſome irregularity in their creation. This was in the year of Rome 421 (b). MARCUS CORNELIUS CETHEGUS was raiſed to the office of Cenſor in the year 544, before he had been Conſul; which was contrary to cuſtom [A]. He obtained the Conſulſhip five years after. This perſon was a great Orator [B]. CAIUS

(a) Invenio muſtum rutatum populo datum à Cornelio Cethego in Conſulatu collega Quintii Flaminini comitiis peractis. Plinius, lib. 9. cap. 8. pag. m. 612.

(b) See Father Hardouin on this paſſage of Pliny.

[A] M. CORN. CETHEGUS was . . . Cenſor . . . . before he had been Conſul; which was contrary to cuſtom.] This is what may be gathered from the following words of Livy: Cenſores hic annus (1) habuit L. Veturium Philonem, & P. Licinium Craſſum Pontificem maximum. Craſſus Licinius nec Conſul nec Prætor ante fuerat quam Cenſor eſt factus: ex ædilitate gradum ad cenſuram fecit (2). i. e. "The Cenſors for this year "were L. Veturius Philo, and P. Licinius Craſſus who "was Pontifex Maximus. Licinius Craſſus had been "neither Conſul nor Prætor before he was made Cen- "ſor; but ſtepped at once from the Office of Ædile "to that of Cenſor." I imagine Livy would not have made this remark, if it had not been ſomething extraordinary for a man to obtain the Cenſorſhip before he had been Conſul. The year following they were obliged to proceed to the creation of other Cenſors; for one of them dying, his Collegue quitted the Office (3). M. Cornelius Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, who were choſen, had not yet been Conſuls. Livy takes notice of it expreſly. Creati Cenſores ambo qui nondum Conſules fuerant, M. Cornelius Cethegus, P. Sempronius Tuditanus (4).

(1) That is, the year 543.

(2) T. Livius, lib. 27. pag. m. 405.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Idem, ibid. pag. 468.

[B] . . . This perſon was a great Orator.] Conſidering the time; for he who ſhould have compared him with the Orators of the ſubſequent ages, would have judged him barbarous. Here is what Cicero has ſaid of him: Quem vero extet, & de quo ſit memoriæ proditum eloquentem fuiſſe & ita eſſe habitum, primus eſt M. Cornelius Cethegus: cujus eloquentiæ eſt auctor, & idoneus quidem mea ſententia, Q. Ennius, præſertim cum & ipſe eum audiverit, & ſcribat de mortuo: ex quo nulla ſuſpicio eſt, amicitiæ cauſa eſſe mentitum, eſt igitur ſic apud illum in nono, ut opinor, annali (5). i. e. "The firſt we have an account of, "and who is recorded to have been eloquent, and "to have been ſo eſteemed, is M. Cornelius Ce- "thegus: the witneſs of whoſe eloquence, and in my "judgment a very proper one, is Q. Ennius; eſpe- "cially ſince he himſelf had been his auditor, and "wrote of him when dead: for which reaſon he can- "not be ſuſpected to have advanced a falſhood for "friendſhip's ſake. Thus therefore he writes in the "ninth Book, as I take it, of his Annals." The verſes

(5) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 103.

Caius Cornelius Cethegus, who before he had been Ædile, was Proconsul in Spain, gained a signal victory there (c). He was made Ædile a little after in his absence, in the year 555 (d). Sigonius confounds him with Cneius Cornelius Cethegus (e), who was Consul in 556, and triumphed over the Insubrians (f). He falsly supposes that Cicero and Livy give this Consul the Prænomen of Caius: they give him that of Cneius. Let us pass on to Publius Cornelius Cethegus, who ardently espoused the party of Marius against Sylla (g), and was for that reason declared an enemy of the Roman people (h), when that party was broken. He escaped into Africa to Marius (i), and afterwards implored the mercy of Sylla, and offered to serve him in all things (k). He was received into favour; and perhaps he ought not to be distinguished from that Cethegus, who had so great interest in Rome, that nothing could be obtained without his interposition: but as he had a mistress to whom he would refuse nothing, it happened that an ill woman had the whole city at her disposal. Lucullus was obliged to make his court to this woman [C], when he had a mind to obtain the commission for carrying on the war against Mithridates; for without that he would not have obtained that glorious imploy.

(c) Titus Livius, lib. 31. sub fin. pag. m. 588.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Sigonius, in Fastis, ad ann. 556.

(f) See Livy, lib. 32. pag. 603, and lib. 33. pag. 611.

(g) Appian. de Bellis Civil. lib. 1. pag. m. 204.

(h) Idem, ibid. pag. 196.

(i) Idem, ibid. pag. 197.

(k) Idem, ibid. pag. 204.

Several verses of Ennius cited by Cicero, and which I have freed from the interruptions inserted by him, are these:

Additur orator Cornelius suaviloquenti
Ore Cethegus Marcu' Tuditano Collega,
Marci filius, is dictus popularibus ollis
Qui tum vivebant homines, atque ævum agitabant,
Flos delibatus populi, suadæque medulla.

Wherein the Poet acquaints us, that Cethegus, on account of the prevailing sweetness of his tongue, was called by his contemporaries the flower of the people, and the marrow of persuasion. Cicero observes in another place, that the same Orator when he grew old took care notwithstanding to improve his talent with extreme application (6).

(6) Idem, de Senectute, cap. 14. pag. m. 425.

[C] A Cethegus . . . . had a mistress to whom he could refuse nothing: . . . . Lucullus was obliged to make his court to this woman.] To know the character of this Cethegus, we need only read the following words of Plutarch (7): Lucullus . . . . thought that if Pompey (8) returned to Rome . . . . he would easily do and obtain whatever he pleased; especially since Cethegus, a very popular man both for words and actions, the chief manager of affairs in Rome, had conceived a mortal hatred against him (Lucullus), for declaiming against his debauched, insolent, and lewd life (9): Lucullus therefore openly set himself against him. Plutarch adds that the government of Cilicia becoming vacant, several persons appeared Candidates for it, and courted Cethegus, as the man best able to serve them. Lucullus, hoping that if he obtained it, he should likewise be employed in the war against Mithridates "used all his "interest that that Province might be allotted to him, "and to none other; which put him upon a project, "not so honest and commendable, as expedient for "compassing his design, submitting to necessity against "his own inclination. There was one Præcia, a "most celebrated wit and beauty, but in other things "nothing better than an impudent harlot, who to the "charms of her person, adding the reputation of one "that loved and served her friends, by making those "who came to her, as they discoursed of the designs "and promotions of their friend, had got a great "interest. She had seduced Cethegus, the chiefest man "in esteem and authority of all the city, and enticed "him to her love, and so made all authority follow "her. For nothing of moment was done wherein "Cethegus was not concerned, nothing by Cethegus "without Præcia. This woman Lucullus gained to "his side by gifts and flattery (and great cost it was "to procure so stately and famous a dame, to be earnestly concerned for Lucullus) and presently found "Cethegus his friend, using his utmost interest to procure Cilicia for him: Which when once obtained, "there was no more need of applying himself either "to Præcia or Cethegus; for all unanimously voted "him to the Mithridatic war, by no hands likely to "be so successfully managed as his."

(7) Plut. in Lucullo, pag. 494. Mr. Bayle makes use of the Version of Amiot: the Translator of that of Mr. Thornburgh.

(8) He commanded then in Spain.

(9) Here is Plutarch's Greek: Κέθηγος ἐχθραν τινὰ πρὸς Λεκκιλλον εἶχε, βδελυττόμενον αυτῦ τὸν βίον, αἰσχρῶν ἐρωτων καὶ ὕβρεως καὶ πλημμελίας μεστὸν ὄντα. Cethego simultas intercedebat cum Lucullo qui illius detestabatur vitam, infamibus amoribus lustrisque atque omni improbitate delibutam. Plut. in Lucullo, pag. 494.

Is it not a deplorable thing, that an illustrious man, and so worthy to command the Roman Army against Mithridates, and who acquitted himself of the employment with so much glory, was not able to obtain that commission but by submitting to make his court to a lady of pleasure! Had there been a Juvenal in that age, would he not have found in such a state of the Commonwealth sufficient reason to satirize? Would he not have said,

Difficile est satiram non scribere, nam quis iniquæ
Tam patiens urbis, tam ferreus, ut teneat se (10)?

That is,

"'Tis hard to write, but harder to forbear.
"To view so lewd a town, and to refrain,
"What hoops of iron could my spleen contain!

Mr. Dryden.

(10) Juven. Sat. 1. ver. 30.

But the misery is, that the like disorder has been renewed a thousand and a thousand times in all countries of the world. This way of preferment has always been practised; it has raised to high fortunes those who were unworthy of them, and even those who deserved them; it has obtained success to unjust Lawsuits, and even to suits which had justice on their side, but must have failed without such protection. We wonder sometimes that certain people advance by large strides to the most eminent dignities: they do not rise to them step by step, or by degrees; but they fly from the lowest to that in the middle, and from thence to the highest. We ask ourselves, on what account, what has he done? If he has merit, he does not equal, or does not surpass such and such who continue a long while in the same posts? The solution of all this is, that a woman of unlimited power protects him by the interest she has gained, and which she preserves at the expence of her virtue. The same complaints will be made a thousand years hence, if the world lasts so long: and as a private person is not capable of reforming this abuse, mankind will be of opinion that prudence will allow him to take advantage of it, as Lucullus did; and they will blame those Embassadors who make a scruple of doing the same thing. Signor Leti, speaking of those capricious humours which may prevent an Embassador from serving his Prince well, produces two examples thereof. An Embassador of Spain at the Court of Rome under Urban VIII, having received orders to discover the intrigues of Cardinal Antonio, was told by a Roman Abbot that there was but one way of succeeding therein. He would not follow it, because he must have offered incense to a mistress of the Cardinal's, named la Cadora; and so he got but very bad information of the secret. Let us set down the terms of Signor Leti: Ad ogni modo stimava difficile di penetrar quelle del Cardinale Antonio, e perche era ben servito da' suoi Domestici, e perche non mancava di precautioni: ma come questo Cardinale era idolatra delle Femine, che credeva potesse assai servire il mezo della Cadora gran Favorita allora del Cardinale, & acciò meglio facilitasse l' Abbate all' Ambasciatore il camino, gli mostrò i mezi per ottener da questa Cortegiana quanto si voleva. Turbossi non poco di questa proposta l' Ambasciatore, rispondendo che questa non era propositione à farsi da un' Abbate Romano, ad un' Ambasciatore Spagnolo; che vi andava della sua conscienza, e della grandezza della Monarchia l'incensar le Puttane, e ch' era par abbracciare ogni altro mezo fuori che questo, e cosi il Cardinale fece il fatto suo con la Francia, nè mai all' Ambasciatore venne in cognitione che la scorza de' trattati (12). The other example is more recent; it is that of a Spanish Embassador in England under the reign of Charles II. You will find in the following words the advice which was given him, and his answer.

(11) Note, I do not say they will judge rightly.

(12) Leti, Ceremoniale Politico, Part 1. lib. 1. pag. 76, 77.

Several other great Lords ſubmitted to a hundred mean actions, that they might riſe to offices by the recommendation of this Cethegus; for it is of him, without doubt, that Cicero ſpeaks in one of his Paradoxes [D]. He has ſpoken of a Cethegus an Orator, who in all likelihood is not a different perſon from that woman's gallant [E]. CAIUS CORNELIUS CETHEGUS was convicted of having, in concert with Catiline, conſpired the ruin of his country, and was therefore ſtrangled in priſon (l). He was the moſt violent of all his accomplices [F], and was always of opinion that they ſhould haſten the execution.

(l) Salluſt. in Bello Catilin. pag. 173.

anſwer. Parlando queſto con un Milord ſuo grande Amico, e d'antico tempo divoto à quella Corona, ſopra i mezi che foſſero più propri à tirare il Rè d'Inghilterra ad abbracciare all' aperta con pronti ſoccorſi la protettion della Fiandra, il Milord ſi laſciò dire, che tutti i rimedi eran buoni, mà che ſtimava quello della Porchemouth Favorita del Rè il migliore: l'Ambaſciatore con certe Rodomontate Spagnole che mal tal volta gli ſaltano adoſſo quaſi ſdegnato gli riſpoſe; Milord, amarei meglio che il mio Rè perdeſſe la metà del corpo della ſua Monarchia, che di conſervarne un membro col favore d'una Cortegiana. Il medeſimo Milord me lo riferi à me, anzi mi diſſe, che gli aggiunſe, e per me hò riſoluto più toſto di non far niente, che molto con queſto mezo. E veramente niente egli hà fatto: mà però il Barillon Ambaſciator Franceſe non ha laſciato di far tutto, e con qual mezo non voglio ſaperlo, ſo bene ch' egli è ſavio e prudente (13). i. e. "This Embaſſador diſcourſing with "an Engliſh Nobleman his great friend, and of a "long time devoted to the Crown of Spain, concern- "ing the moſt proper means of inducing the King "of England openly to embrace the protection of "Flanders with ſpeedy ſuccours, that Lord happened "to ſay, that all methods were good, but he thought "the beſt would be to apply to the Dutcheſs of Portſ- "mouth, the King's favourite miſtreſs: the Embaſſador, "uſing certain Spaniſh Rodomontades, which ſome- "times ſeized him very unſeaſonably, anſwered with "a kind of indignation; My Lord, I had rather the "King my Maſter ſhould loſe half his Monarchy than pre- "ſerve one limb of it by the favour of a ſtrumpet. I had "this relation from the Lord himſelf, who told me "farther, that he added, and for my part I am re- "ſolved rather to do nothing at all, than a great deal "by this means. And indeed he did nothing: how- "ever the French Embaſſador Barillon has done every "thing, by what means I will not inquire; only thus "much I know, that he is wiſe and prudent."

(13) Idem, ibid. pag. 78, 79.

We ſhall ſee below (14), in a fine paſſage of Cicero, how very deplorable the calamity of thoſe times are in which juſtice is obliged to ſupport it ſelf by the intereſt of a Curtezan.

(14) In the Article CHELIDONIS, Remark [A].

[D] . . . . Cicero ſpeaks of him in one of his Paradoxes.] It is in that wherein he ſhews that none but wiſe men live free from ſervitude (15). He obſerves that the ambitious did things which were a real ſlavery. They ſent preſents to Cethegus, they viſited him by night, they made ſupplications to him. Illa cupiditas (quæ videtur eſſe liberalior) honoris, imperii, provinciarum, quam dura eſt domina! quam imperioſa! quam vehemens! Cethego homini non probatiſſimo ſervire coegit eos, qui ſibi eſſe ampliſſimi videbantur; munera mittere, noctu venire domum ad eum, precari, denique ſupplicare, quæ ſervitus eſt, ſi hæc libertas exiſtimari poteſt (16). This whole paſſage is ſo beautiful, that it could not be ſhortened without wronging the Reader.

(15) Solum ſapientem liberum eſſe.

(16) Cicero, in Paradoxo V, pag. m. 573.

[E] . . . . and of one Cethegus an Orator, who in all likelihood is not a different perſon from that woman's gallant.] Cicero ſpeaks of him in this manner: Ejus æqualis P. Cethegus, cui de republica ſatis ſuppeditabat Oratio: totam enim tenebat eam, penituſque cognorat, itaque in Senatu conſularium autoritatem aſſequebatur, ſed in cauſis publicis nihil, privatis ſatis vetus orator videbatur (18). i. e. "In his time lived P. "Cethegus, who ſpoke well enough in debate con- "cerning the Common-wealth: for he was thoroughly "acquainted with its management, and perfectly un- "derſtood its intereſt; for which reaſon his autho- "rity in the Senate was equal to that of thoſe of "conſular dignity: but in public cauſes he was no- "thing, tho' in private ones he ſeemed crafty and "well experienced." He is the ſame perſon, if I am not deceived, who is mentioned in the Oration for Cluentius (19), as a man who had endeavoured to diſſuade one Stalenus from meddling with the affairs of the Republic, or had, for other reaſons, given him ill counſel. Aſconius Pedianus confirms what Cicero obſerves concerning this man's credit; for he ſays that Marcus Antonius, he who obtained ſo general an authority over all the ſea coaſts, was ſupported by the Conſul Cotta, and the faction of Cethegus. Hic eſt M. Antonius, ſays he (20), qui gratia Cottæ Conſulis & Cethegi factione in Senatu curationem infinitam nactus totius oræ maritimæ, &c. I do not believe that the whole of this paſſage is true; for according to Paterculus (21), that Commiſſion was granted two years before Pompey obtained one of the ſame kind. Now Pompey obtained it in the year of Rome 686, and we find no Cotta in the Conſulſhip without going up ſo high as the year 679. Beſides, according to Paterculus, that great authority was given to Marcus Antonius the Prætor, who died in his Prætorſhip according to the Epitome of Livy (22), after having ſucceeded very ill in making war on the inhabitants of the iſle of Crete, about the year 682. Therefore, either the Chronology of Paterculus, or that of the Summaries of Livy, deceives us.

(19) Idem, in Orat. pro Cluentio, folio 113, A.

(20) Aſcon. Pedian. in Verrin. pag. m. 113.

(21) Vell. Paterculus, lib. 20. cap. 31.

(22) Epitome Liviana XCVII.

[F] CAIUS CORN. CETHEGUS was convicted of having conſpired with Catiline. . . . He was the moſt violent of all his accomplices.] It was he who was appointed to murder Cicero. Cethegus Ciceronis januam obſideret, eumque vi aggrederetur. . . . Inter hæc parata atque decreta, Cethegus ſemper querebatur de ignavia ſociorum: illos, dubitando, & dies prolatando, magnas opportunitates corrumpere; facto, non conſulto, in tali periculo opus eſſe; ſeque, ſi pauci adjuvarent, languentibus aliis, impetum in curiam facturum. Natura ferox, vehemens, manu promptus erat: maximum bonum in celeritate putabat (23). i. e. "Cethegus was to beſet "Cicero's gate, and to aſſault him by force. . . While "theſe things were preparing and reſolving on, Ce- "thegus continually complained of the ſlackneſs of "his companions; ſaying they loſt excellent opportu- "nities by raiſing doubts, and by delays; that an af- "fair of ſo perillous conſequence required deeds, and "not conſultations; and that he himſelf, if a few "would aſſiſt him, tho' the others were remiſs, would "make an attack on the Curia †. He was natu- "rally fierce, vehement, and ready for action: and "thought the greateſt advantage lay in expedition." He was in the right to think diſpatch was to be uſed; for if in almoſt all important affairs a man ſhould avoid loſing his time in deliberation, it is above all things neceſſary in a conſpiracy. On the leaſt backwardneſs to put it in execution, ſome falſe brother fails not to diſcover it, in hopes of obtaining his pardon, and an ample recompenſe. It is alſo true, on the other hand, that one may ſpoil all by precipitation. The accomplices, whom Catiline left in Rome, were not at all like one another: ſome had not flegm enough, and others had too much. Cethegus was of the firſt ſort; for which reaſon Cicero was not afraid of him. Quem quidem ego cum ex urbe pellebam, ſays he (24), hoc providebam animo, Quirites, remoto Catilina, nec mihi eſſe P. Lentuli ſomnum, nec L. Caſſii adipem, nec C. Cethegi furioſam temeritatem pertimeſcendam. i. e. "Whom when I drove out of the city, "I foreſaw this in my mind, that Catiline being re- "moved, I had nothing to fear either from P. Len- "tulus's drowſineſs, L. Caſſius's fat, or the furious "raſhneſs of C. Cethegus." Some think this Cethegus is the ſame who had recourſe to the clemency of Sylla (25); but I do not think them in the right: for if he had had a hand in the enormous diſorders and maſſacres which the faction of Marius committed in Rome, it would not have been paſſed over in ſilence, when mention was made of his journey to Spain, (23) Salluſtius, de Bello Catil. pag. m. 114, 115. See alſo Cicer. Orat. II. in Catilinam, & Orat. pro Sylla.

† Where the Senate aſſembled.

(24) Cicero, Orat. III, in Catilin. folio 139, A.

(25) See the Variorum Commentary on Salluſt, pag. 41, 163, ed. Lugd. Bat. 1654.

cution. CETHEGUS, a Roman Senator, was beheaded for the crime of adultery, under the reign of Valentinian in the year 368 (m). Note that thoſe of this family affected a particular way of dreſs [G].

(m) Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 28. cap. 1. pag. m. 511.

Spain, and the wound of Metellus Pius. Quis de C. Cethego, atque ejus in Hiſpaniam profectione, ac de vulnere Q. Metelli Pii cogitat; cui non ad illius pœnam carcer ædificatus eſſe videatur (26)? i. e. "Who thinks "on C. Cethegus, and his going to Spain, and on "the wound of Q. Metellus Pius, that does not judge "the priſon to have been built for his chaſtiſement?" Cato, if I am not miſtaken, had this journey in view, when he ſaid that Cethegus, by conſpiring with Catiline, made war on his country a ſecond time (27). Whoever ſhall have read this will eaſily underſtand the following paſſage of Juvenal:

(26) Cicero, Orat. pro Sylla, folio 161, B.

(27) Ignoſcite Cethegi adoleſcentiæ, niſi iterum jam patriæ bellum infert. Salluſt. de Bello Catil. pag. 163.

Quis cœlum terris non miſceat, & mare cœlo,
Si ſur diſpliceat Verri, homicida Miloni,
Clodius accuſet mœchos, Catilina Cethegum (28)?

That is,

(28) Juvenal. Sat. 2. ver. 25.

"'Twould make you ſwear the Planets from their "ſpheres,
"Should Verres peach thieves, Milo murderers,
"Clodius tax bawds, Cethegus Catiline."

Mr. Tate.

[G] Thoſe of this family affected a particular way of dreſs.] You will find it explained in Mr. Dacier's note on this verſe of Horace, Fingere cinctutis non exaudita Cethegis (29). "He here repreſents the Cethegi "as hardy and laborious men, who had retained in "their dreſs the ancient manner of their fathers, "who deſpiſing the tunic, as too cumberſome, wore "only a ſort of apron which ſerved them for drawers "from the waſte downwards; and put their gown "over it, ſo that the lappet which they threw over "the left ſhoulder, and went behind the back, came "round and girded them, and left the right arm "naked: and this is what they properly called cinctus "Gabinus, which was commonly uſed by the Conſuls "and Prætors when they performed their functions "(30)." That it was the peculiar faſhion of this family we learn from Silius Italicus.

(29) Horat. de Arte Poetica, ver. 50.

(30) Dacier, ſur l'Art. Poetique d'Horace, pag. 121. of the Dutch Edition.

Parebat legio audaci permiſſa Cethego
. . . . . .
Ipſe humero exertus, GENTILI MORE parentum,
Difficili gaudebat equo, roburque juventæ
Flexu cornipedis duro exercebat in ore (31).

(31) Silius Italicus, lib. 8. pag. m. 374.

That is,

"A Legion was by bold Cethegus led.
. . . . . .
"He, with one ſhoulder bare, the ancient guiſe
"Of his Progenitors, in pride beſtrode
"A fiery courſer, in whoſe managing
"He gave his youthful vigour exerciſe."

Dauſqueius's note may be of ſome uſe to us. Cethegis, ſays he (32), amicum ex papillato brachio depugnare, notum illud Lucani,

(32) Dauſqueius in Silium Italic. pag. 376.

-- Exertique manus veſana Cethegi (33).

(33) Lucan ſays this, Phar. lib. 2. ver. 543, ſpeaking of Catiline's Accomplice. Add what he ſays lib. 5. ver. 794, nedique Cethegi.

Ut enim habilius valentiuſque telum evibrarent, ſubſtrictiores erant. Inde Horat.

-- Cinctutis non exaudita Cethegis.

Ubi Porphyrio à cinctu qui tunicæ aptatus eſſet infra pectus, Acrone melius expoſuit Horatium. Tales olim Exſilati dicebantur.

That is,

"The Cethegi loved to fight with their arm bare,
"according to that known expreſſion of Lucan,

"And mad Cethegus' naked arm....

"For they girded themſelves up the tighter that they "might throw their javelin with the greater eaſe and "force. Hence Horace,

"By the ſtrait-girt Cethegi never heard.

"Where Porphyrio has explained Horace better than "Acron, from the cincture which was fitted to the "tunic beneath the breaſt. Such were anciently called
"Exſilati."

CHABOT (PETER GAUTHIER) a learned Humaniſt, born at Sainloup in Poitou, in 1516 [A], was an Oilman's ſon. He ſtudied the Latin tongue at Sainloup, and afterwards went to Poitiers, at twenty four years of age, to ſtudy the Greek there; but he was ſoon recalled from thence, in order for him to teach youth in his native place. He taught there ſix years, after which he went to Paris (a), and there went through a courſe of Philoſophical Studies, under Omer and Talon, in the College de Prêle. Having ſpent three years and a half in ſtudy, he took his Maſter of Arts degree, and profeſſed teaching. The children of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were committed to his care; and he acquired ſo much reputation, as a Preceptor, that Chancellor de l'Hôpital reſolved to engage him to live in his ſeat in the country, there to teach his grandſons (b). He got Peter Ramus and John Mercier the Regius Profeſſors, to make propoſals to him. Chabot accepted them, and lived twelve years in the Chancellor's family, viz. five years before the Chancellor died, and ſeven years after (c). His chief work was a Commentary on Horace [B], on which he exhauſted all the fruits of his ſtudies

(a) He went thither in October 1546.

(b) They were ſix in number; their father, Mr. Belesbat, was of the family of Huraut, and had married the Chancellor's daughter.

(c) The Chancellor died in 1573.

[A] He was born in 1516.] Boiſſard, who had been extremely intimate with him, was nevertheleſs not able to inform us exactly of the month or day of his birth. He made ſo exact an enquiry on this occaſion, that he wanted to know the very hour, in order to mark it in his Elogium, according to the German cuſtom (1). But all he could learn was, that he had heard Chabot's relations and many of his neighbours ſay, that he was born in 1516. Fando tantum a propinquis multiſque vicinis eſt receptum, ipſius ortum ſub 1516 cecidiſſe (2). I am to inform the reader, that ſome people ſay his true name was Gualtherus and not Chabotius (3). He yet is better known by the latter, which was his mother's name, than by the former, which was that of his father.

(1) Roland Des-Marets, Epiſt. Philolog. 25. lib. 2. blames them for it. He obſerves that ſuch things are proper to be obſerved only of Kings or eminent perſons.

(2) Boiſſard. in Iconibus.

(3) Draudius, Bibliotb. Claſſ. pag. 1088 and 1209, edition 1625; and the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque.

[B] His chief work was a Commentary on Horace.] His Commentary is drawn up in a very uncommon method. It contains the analyſis of the text, as well according to the Rules of Grammar, as to thoſe of Rhetoric and Logic. I'll repeat here what I ſaid in my plan or ſpecimen, with reſpect to a paſſage that may be ſeen above (4), and which is pretty much confuſed. Such confuſions are frequently found in this Commentary of Petrus Gualtherus Chabotius on Horace, printed in 1615, folio. We muſt not aſcribe theſe to the author, who was a very learned man; and who not only ſpent a great number of years on this Poet, but drew up his Commentary in a very ſingular and very uſeful manner. The misfortune is this, as he lived nine or ten years after he had publiſhed his Commentary at Baſil, in 1587, he naturally collected remarks for his ſecond edition, but had not an opportunity of putting his deſign in execution. After his death, James Graiſerus being poſſeſſed of his collections, inſerted them, ſtudies. He was extremely regular in his life and manners; and ſubmitted three times, with great patience, to the plunder of his poſſeſſions, during the fury of the civil wars. He was always fond of leading a very ſolitary life [C], and lived upwards of fourſcore years (d). He died about 1597. I learn from a good authority (e), that he had been Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Paris; and yet I doubt the truth of this, from its not being mentioned by Boiſſard.

(4) Remark [G] of the Article CASSIUS SEVERUS (TITUS) Citation (31).

(d) Extracted from John James Boiſſard in Iconibus Virorum Illuſtrium.

(e) In the Preface to the Methodo Græcæ of Dom. Lancelot, pag. 22.

to the beſt of his powet, in their reſpective places, in the edition of 1615. But not being able always to diſtinguiſh, as the author himſelf would have done, the citations from thoſe remarks which Chabot added; he has often given a reflection of Chabot, as the citation of an ancient author. Beſides, it plainly appears that the author's reflections were merely as ſo many firſt ſketches, which an author inſerts in his collections, to prevent their ſlipping his memory, and which he deſigns to reviſe before they go to preſs. But when another perſon has the ordering of theſe, he does not always perceive where any defect lies. We therefore are not to wonder to ſee poſthumous pieces, enlarged from the unfiniſh'd Memoirs of authors, ſo defective as they are found. There are too many typographical errors in this Commentary; and the French expreſſions with which the author blended it, to give his countrymen the better idea of the Text of Horace, are in moſt places diſguiſed. It is ſurprizing that Draudius ſhould not have had any knowledge, either of the analytical Explication of Horace, publiſhed by Chabot at Paris anno 1582, in 8vo, as an extract of the whole Commentary; nor of the two editions of this Commentary. He only mentions a Letter which Chabot had wrote upon his condition, and the way of life he had led (5). We alſo may wonder, that the Theatrum of Paulus Freherus, which gives an abridgment of Chabot's Life, ſhould mention only the little Analyſis of Horace. It is very abſurd to aſſert, that Chabot tranſcribed almoſt the whole Commentary of Torrentius on Horace (6); for Chabot was dead when that Commentary was printed, which was in 1607 (7).

(5) Draudius, Bibliotb. Claſſica, pag. 1088 and 1289. edit. 1625.

(6) This is nevertheleſs aſſerted in the Decas Decadum of Albert Fabri, num. 99. printed at Leipſic, in 1689.

(7) Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belgic. pag. 610.

(8) Boiſſardus, in Iconibus.

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Idem, ibid.

[C] He was always fond of leading a very ſolitary life.] He was ſo extremely abſtemious, that it is literally true he eat merely to ſupport nature; and hence it was that he could never be prevailed upon, even in his youth, to partake of grand entertainments. Tale porro temperantiæ ſtudium exſtitit illi cauſa, cur ſemper vel juvenis intereſſe ſodalitatibus epuliſque ampliſſimis pertinaciter recuſârit (8). He was very ſeldom ſeen in places of public reſort, or in thoſe walks, where ſo many people meet, either to hear or ſpread news (9). In a word, he never indulged himſelf ever ſo little in the pleaſures of the world, he living unmarried, without ſociety; and would never divert himſelf abroad, or go to feaſts. This was not owing to a ſevere, unſociable temper, but to four bodily infirmities, viz. crebra melendi brevitas, audiendi gravitas, mandendi imbecillitas, frequens alternatio deambulandi & conquieſcendi propter ramices inguinum (10), i. e. "a frequent "inclination to make water, a thickneſs of hearing, a "difficulty of chewing; and his being obliged to walk "and ſit alternatively, upon account of a rupture "with which he was troubled." But he lived to upwards of fourſcore, notwithſtanding theſe infirmities.

CHALVET (MATTHEW DE) in Latin Calventius, Preſident of the Enquetes in the Parliament of Toulouſe. His article, extracted from the Elogiums of Sammarthanus (a) is inſerted in Moreri; I nevertheleſs will give it complete, becauſe I am poſſeſſed of a greater number of circumſtances. I therefore ſay that Matthew de Chalvet, ſprung from the family of the Chalvets, of Roche-montez in upper Auvergne, was born in May 1528. He was brought to Paris in 1539 by Mr. Lizet his uncle, at that time Advocate General in the Parliament of Paris (b), who kept him ſix years to his ſtudies under Orontius Fineus, Tuſan, Buchanan, and ſome other learned perſons. He went to Toulouſe in 1546. to learn the Civil Law, and lodged in the ſame houſe with Turnebus, Mercerus, and Govea (c). He travelled into Italy in 1550, in order to purſue his ſtudies, and was Alciat's diſciple at Pavia, and Socinus's at Bologna. Being returned to France, he went to Toulouſe, and there compleated his courſe of Law-ſtudies, and was aſſociated with Roaldes and Bodinus, they reading Law Lectures together in the public ſchools with reputation. Having taken his Doctor's Degree in that Univerſity, he reſolved to go to Paris, in order to make his fortune; but though this reſolution of his was ſtrengthened by ſome letters he received from Mr. Lizet, he yet did not put it in execution, he chooſing rather to ſettle in Toulouſe, where he married, in 1552, Jane de Bernuy daughter of the Lord de Palficat, Baron of Villeneuſve. He was admitted Counſellor in the Parliament of that City anno 1553, afterwards created Judge of French Poeſy, and Maintainer of the Floral Sports. He was appointed Preſident of the Inqueſts by the Parliament in 1573. Being of an innocent and peaceable temper, he retired to his houſe in Auvergne, during the firſt and laſt furies of the civil wars, in order that he might not be an eye-witneſs of the confuſions, which he ſaw would break out in Toulouſe. It was in this retirement he ſtudied and tranſlated Seneca [A] to adminiſter ſome conſolation to himſelf during the wild havock that was then making, and to employ his leiſure to advantage. Not to mention his bodily advantages, he obſerved the ſtricteſt fidelity, among his many other good qualities, to his Sovereign [B]. It was this gained him the particular eſteem of

(a) Lib. 5. pag. m. 130, & ſeq.

(b) He afterwards was firſt Preſident of that Parliament. See the Article LIZET.

(c) And not Goudan, as 'tis expreſſed in the piece where this Article is extracted.

[A] He ſtudied and tranſlated Seneca.] He dedicated this verſion to Henry IV, in 1603. It was reprinted in folio, at Paris, for William Loyſon, anno 1624; and for John Richer, in 1634. "Sammarthanus declares, that he ſhowed a great induſtry, fidelity, and application in his tranſlation of Seneca *." Huetius nevertheleſs ſays, that he did not ſubject himſelf much to his Author, nor tranſlate him literally; and whereas nothing can be dryer and more conciſe than Seneca. Chalvet's verſion, on the contrary, is very diffuſe †. This is Mr. Baillet's judgment (1).

* Sammarth. Elogior. lib. 5. pag. 150.

† Huetius, de claris Interpret. lib. 2. pag. 185.

(1) Baillet, Jugem. des Savans, tom. 4. pag. 535, 537.

[B] Not to mention his bodily advantages, he obſerved the ſtricteſt fidelity (among his many other good qualities) to his Prince.] "In the midſt of his ſtudies "during his youth, he uſed often to unbend his mind, "by the moſt polite bodily exerciſes which he had "learnt in Italy; he being a fine Horſeman, an excellent Dancer, and the beſt Player at tennis of his time. "He uſed alſo to ſoften the ſeverity of the ſtudy of "the Laws with the ſweets of Latin and French Poetry, in which he was very well ſkilled, as will appear by his Poems, in caſe his heirs do not envy "the Public what is ſo worthy their peruſal (2). . . . "He had a great number of friends, and he knew "how to cultivate them; but above all, there was a "ſingular and perfect friendſhip between Mr. du Faur "de of Henry IV, who, in 1603, appointed him Counſellor of State and Privy Counſellor. The year after, he reſigned his dignity of Preſident to Francis Chalvet Sieur de Fenouillet, one of his ſons, and retired from buſineſs to devote himſelf wholly to God, and to ſpend the remainder of his days in peace, and among his books. He ſpent two years in this retirement, with ſo much ſatisfaction to himſelf, that he uſed frequently to declare to his relations, that he could not ſay he had lived during the paſt years of his life [C] . . . . He died in a pious and Chriſtian manner at Toulouſe, the 20th of June 1607, being ſeventy nine years of age (d). Several Authors have honoured him with Elogiums [D].

(2) Summary of the Life of Matthew Chalvet, prefixed to his Seneca.

(d) Extracted from the Short Account of his Life, prefixed to his Tranſlation of Seneca.

" de St. Iory, firſt Preſident of Toulouſe, and our " Chalvet; as well upon account of their mutual love " for learning, as of their near affinity. He was tall " and well-ſet, had a pleaſant eye, fair hair, a ſweet and " venerable aſpect; a grave, modeſt and majeſtic de- " portment; and he was vaſtly entertaining in con- " verſation (3). No one ſpoke with him but he was " immediately charmed; for he was naturally affable, " courteous, kind, ingenuous; free from hypocriſy, " ambition and avarice; employing much more pains " in other people's affairs, than in his own; fearing " God, deteſting and condemning all kinds of vice, " and eſpecially violent practices and innovations, " even in matters of Religion. He loved order, inte- " grity and peace. Amidſt the confuſions of France, " he perſevered conſtantly in obedience to his Prince, " whoſe party, as judging it the only juſt and lawful " one, he always faithfully followed. Therefore, " when the Parliament was removed from Toulouſe to " Chaſtelſarraſy, he was ſelected from the reſt, to go " and compliment, in their name, the King who was " then (1594) at Lyons; which gave his Majeſty the " higheſt ſatisfaction, as appeared by the gracious re- " ception he gave Mr. Chalvet, and the preſent he " made him; and he thought himſelf vaſtly happy, " in having been the firſt Officer of the Parliament " of Toulouſe, who waited upon the King ſince " his acceſſion to the throne, and ſince the beginning " of the reduction of Languedoc by his Majeſty's " arms. Again he was deputed in 1603 by the ſame " Parliament to that King, on ſeveral important af- " fairs; in which journey, his Majeſty, as an honoura- " ble recompence for all his ſervices, appointed him, un- " aſked by any, or even by Mr. Chalvet himſelf, " Counſellor of State and Privy Counſellor; for which " he took an oath before the Chancellor de Bellievre, " to whom he was ſome way related (4)."

(3) See, on theſe Subjects, the Latin verſes of Critton, Regius Profeſſor, prefixed to his Tranſlation of Seneca.

(4) Summary of the Life of Mr. de Chalvet.

[C] He ſpent two years in this retirement, with ſo much ſatisfaction to himſelf, that he uſed frequently to declare . . . that he could not ſay he had lived, during all the paſt years of his life.] He therefore might have compared himſelf to an illuſtrious man who was Præfectus Prætorii under the Emperor Adrian. The perſon I mean is Similis, who was raiſed to this employment much againſt his will, and reſigned it voluntarily; after which he retired into the country, and after ſpending ſeven years there, left the world. He would have the following inſcription fixed on his tomb. Here lies Similis, who tho' his age was very long, yet lived but ſeven years (5). * [This inſcription is thus imitated in a modern work.

(5) Xiphilin. in Hadriano, pag. m. 266.

* The PLAIN-DEALER; being ſelect Eſſays on ſeveral curious ſubjects. num. 114. London 1730. 8vo.

Should curious readers wiſh to know,
Whoſe duſt their feet are preſſing;
SIMILIS, fam'd in war, lies low,
His country's boaſt and bleſſing.
Long did he toil, and graſp and ſtrive,
Yet loſt his time he fears;
For tho', till ſeventy ſix, alive,
He lived but ſeven ſhort years.]

The reader will find a great many pieces on ſuch ſubjects, in Camerarius's hiſtorical Meditations, Chap. V. Book III, of Vol. I.

[D] Several Authors have honoured him with Elogiums.] I ſhall give but one inſtance, and that is a Latin Epigram, addreſſed to him by Peter le Loyer.

Cum ſua quiſque tibi culto munuſcula verſu
Offerat, & genio dedicet illa tuo,
Haud ego poſtremos inter numerabor amicos,
Et levia, at ſaltem munera grata dabo.

That is,

" Whilſt every one inſcribes his flowing verſe,
" An humble offering to thy noble genius;
" Lo I advance, (not laſt of all thy friends)
" And pay a grateful, tho' but ſlender, tribute."

This Epigram follows the French Verſes, by which the Author dedicated his Comedy intitled le Muet inſensè (the frantic dumb man) to this Preſident of Inqueſts. His encomium begins at, Quand j'aurois autant d'or, i. e. " . . . Tho' I had as much " gold" down to Muſe, incluſively. And, Et encore mon Chalvet, cher teſte. i. e. " And again Chaulvet, " dear man." . . . to Prens doncque (take then) excluſively, in the Oeuvres & meſlanges Poëtiques de Pierre le Loyer, folio 122 verſo. Paris edit. 1579.

CHAMIER (DANIEL) one of the greateſt Proteſtant Divines, was born in Dauphiné. He was many years Preacher at Montellimart (a), whence he went in 1612 to Montauban, to be Profeſſor of Divinity in that City, and was killed by a canon ball during the ſiege in 1621 (b) [A]. It is very ſurprizing that no one ſhould have wrote his Life; no people in the world would have been ſo negligent on ſuch an occaſion but the French. Had Chamier been of another country, his Life would have been wrote in a voluminous

(a) Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 86. See the Remark [D].

(b) The 16th of October.

[A] He was killed by a cannon-ball, during the ſiege of Montauban, in 1621.] Some Hiſtorians relate, that he was killed under arms, that is, pike in hand, and defended with a coat of mail; and that he had three times repeated with a loud voice, in the pathetic Sermon preached by him that day, the following words -- They ſhall not enter. Chamierus . . quamquam propugnaculo tegebatur, tormentaria pila in fruſta diſcerpitur, vix agnito unde globus, & qua immiſſus; in utrumque paratus homo audax, thorace ferreo, haſtaque ad manum venerat in hunc locum, additurus militi animos, poſtquam eademmet die concione in templo pathetico habita, de regiis loquens, finierat in hæc ipſa verba, quæ diſtincta ter voce diſtincta repetierat, Non ingredientur (1). We don't find, by the relation of the ſiege of Montauban, that he had taken up arms, but only, that he was carried off by a cannon-ball, at the entry of the baſtion du Paillas; and that in his Sermon, the preceding day, on the 34th verſe of chapter 37 of Iſaiah, he applied to the city of Montauban, the promiſe (in the name of the Lord) made to Jeruſalem, beſieged by Rabſhakeh, General of Sennacherib's Army; in the following words, which he repeated with great vehemence.— By the way that he came, by the ſame ſhall he return, and ſhall not come into this city, ſaith the Lord. Some of his friends, adds the relation, heard Chamier ſay, that he believed he ſhould die in that ſiege by a cannon-ball, . . . and he propheſied accidentally that Sunday morning, what happened to him in the evening. Joſſion his collegue aſking him whether it was not his turn to preach in the afternoon? By no means ſays he, it is my reſting-day (2). The Romiſh Writers have commented in a moſt horrid manner on the death of this famous Clergyman; and thence have taken occaſion to rail againſt him as an incendiary, who not ſatisfied with preaching rebellion, took up arms and fought as a ſoldier; without conſidering, ſay theſe, that as the Laity are not allowed to aſſume any of the ſacerdotal functions, neither are Miniſters of the Goſpel permitted to draw the ſword. To theſe it is anſwered, (as in the caſe of Zuinglius) that it is lawful for them to take up arms in order to implore a bleſſing upon their cauſe, and to comfort and ſtrengthen thoſe who ſtand in need of ſuch aſſiſtance.

(1) Barthol. Gramondus, Hiſtor. Galliæ, lib. 10. pag. m. 592.

(2) Siege de Montauban, pag. m. 155.

voluminous ſize, and have had a place in every public Library, eſpecially as he left ſeveral ſons of his own profeſſion, and whoſe poſterity are Clergymen (t). He was as famous among the French Proteſtants for his politicks, as in his preaching. No man was ever more ſevere, inflexible, or untractable [B], with regard to the artifices which the Court of France employed to weaken the Proteſtants. It is ſaid that Chamier drew up the edict of Nantz [C]. He had the honour of being deputed on ſeveral occaſions [D], and preſided over ſome Synods (d). Though he ſpent ſo much time in negotiations, he nevertheleſs acquired a great fund of learning, of which his diſputes with father Coton [E], and the books [F] written by him are a proof. The aſſertion of thoſe who make him the

(t) I write this in 1694.

(d) Among others, to the national Synod of Gap in 1603.

[B] No man was ever more ſevere and inflexible.] The Author of the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantz, gives a very good deſcription of Chamier's turn of mind. He danced attendance to no purpoſe at Court, ſays he (3), whither he had been deputed by the Synod of Rochelle . . . and after ſix months ſtay in it, he could not get acceſs to his Majeſty. The King was not pleaſed with him, becauſe he was one of the hot-heads of the Synod (4), whom the King did not love; of that claſs of people who are inflexible; of thoſe hearts that are proof againſt fears and hopes, which are the ſtrongeſt engines the Court has to play off. He had ſaid elſewhere (5), ſpeaking of the Deputies ſent on the affair of the Edict of Nantz, that Chamier was one of the moſt obſtinate of them, and upon that account was ſo odious to the Court, as he was revered by the Churches. We ſhall relate in the Remark [B] of the Article FERRIER, that in 1611, being in the Aſſembly of Saumur, he was at the head of thoſe who would have the Edict of Nantz obſerved in the moſt ſtrict and rigorous ſenſe. But if the reader is deſirous of knowing the humour and diſpoſition of Chamier and ſuch like men, let him read what d'Aubigné has written in a very facetious ſtyle. "Now thoſe people appeared more ſaucy, ſays he (6), "in the laſt treaty of Peace, and in thoſe Aſſemblies "which were held four years, wherein thoſe ſtubborn "men reſiſted, not only the moſt honourable men the "King could ſelect out of his Council of State, but "alſo the greateſt Noblemen of the Kingdom; when, "weighing the affairs of the Kingdom, they would "fain have prevailed with them to ſhew ſome civility. "One of theſe roſe up with a face of braſs, and an"ſwered freely, Theſe propoſals don't anſwer the good "opinion which thoſe by whom we are ſent, entertain "of us. An explanation of theſe words was deſired, "when la Valiere comes forward, and explaining it, "cries, This, Gentlemen, may be called betraying the "Church of God. T'other day I heard Mr. de Villeroy "tell, how that himſelf, Meſſ. de Roſny and de Thou, "and others, being at a conference with four of theſe "ill-bred men, whilſt Calignon, in the King's name, "endeavoured to ſoften their ſtubborn minds, by gentle "and perſuaſive eloquence, unweildy Chamier, throwing his cloak under his back-ſide, had brought forward his left arm to the middle of the table; paring his nails with his ſciſſors, when the clippings "flew on the Orator's beard and into his mouth; one "of them flew into Roſny's eye; and this air and "manner annulled all that could be ſaid in his favour."

(3) Tom. 1. pag. 446, 447, ad ann. 1607.

(4) The Author had ſaid, pag. 443. that there were certain perſons in the Synod who were called, by the Courtiers, the hotheads of the Synod; from a ſuppoſition that they were too ſtubborn, and too careful of their own ſecurity.

(5) Pag. 253.

(6) Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci, lib. 2. cap. 7. pag. m. 422, 423.

[C] 'Tis ſaid that Chamier drew up the Edict of Nantz.] I have read this in an Epiſtle Dedicatory of Mr. de Varillas. As the Hereticks, ſays he (7), will ſcarce ever obtain ſuch a ſecurity as they may think ſufficient for themſelves; the Calviniſts had obtained by their importunities, that whatever was of advantage to their party in the Edict of Pacification, ſhould be included in that of Nantz. Daniel Chamier, the Clergyman, who had the greateſt abilities among them, was ordered to draw it up. He had employed full three months for this purpoſe; and boaſted his not having omitted any thing which might conduce to ſtrengthen the tranquillity of his Sect.

(7) Varill. Epiſt. Dedic. of tom. 1. de l'Hiſtoire de l'Héréſie.

[D] He had the honour to be deputed on ſeveral occaſions.] What Varillas aſſerted above, may perhaps be falſe; but it is certain that Chamier was one of the chiefs in the aſſemblies of the French Proteſtants, in which the laſt pacification with Henry IV was debated and concluded. La Trimouille, du Pleſſis, d'Aubigné, and himſelf were made choice of, "in order "to debate and conteſt ſuch matters as could not, "without creating too much confuſion, be digeſted by "the whole Aſſembly, which then conſiſted of ſeven"ty and ſometimes eighty, perſons (8)." There were as many in the Aſſembly of Saumur, anno 1611. "Chamier had the firſt vote in it, as being aſſiſtant "to the Preſident; and as he was well ſkilled in af"fairs, the concluſion depended in a great meaſure "on the turn he gave to things in voting (9). The "Author from whom I borrow theſe particulars tells "us an incident that is worthy of being told. It "was reſolved, ſays he (10), to bring a perſonal trou"ble upon him, in order that he might take a diſlike "to public Aſſemblies, in which he had too great "weight and authority. The Conſiſtory of Montelimar, where he was Miniſter, took the opportunity "whilſt he was abſent on a Deputation, and put ano"ther in his place. This was done without "once conſulting with, and hearing him, by I "know not what intrigues, in which it is pro"bable, that Leſdiguieres had a hand, ſince all was "done in his Province under his eye, and in a city "where he did what he pleaſed. But, to heighten the "affront ſtill more, the Conſiſtory commanded his "houſe to be ſearched; and made a great havock in "his Library, upon pretence that there were ſome "papers in it belonging to the Church. This action "of the Conſiſtory was ſo injurious, and contemptu"ous with regard to Chamier, that he was highly af"fronted at it, eſpecially as it affected his intereſt no "leſs than his honour. He complained of this to the "Aſſembly, as though it had been wounded through "his ſides; and ſeem'd upon the point of leaving "Saumur, to go and ſettle his affairs at home. This "was the very thing the Court wanted, in order that "the party might by this means be deprived of an "able man, whoſe reſiſtance it feared. But Chamier "was prevailed upon to ſtay there, by his having ju"ſtice done him; and the Aſſembly continued him "in his Church at Montelimar." I find that he had left this Church in 1606; and went to the Univerſity of * Die, and was Profeſſor of Divinity there (11). I know not what were the reaſons that engaged him to return to his former poſt.

(8) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. tom. 3. lib. 5. cap. 10. pag. m. 623.

(9) Hiſt. de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 55.

(10) Ibid. pag. 56.

(11) Simon Goulart wrote this to Scaliger. See the French Letters written to Scaliger, lib. 3. pag. 447.

[E] He . . acquired a great fund of learning, of which his diſputes with Father Coton . . . are a proof.] Here follows what is related on this ſubject by a modern Author, a good Proteſtant. "Chamier had had a "conference at Nimes, in 1600, with this Jeſuit, each "of whom he boaſted, as uſual, his having all the ad"vantage. The truth is, this Jeſuit had dazzled the "auditors by eloquent digreſſions, whereby he ram"bled every moment from the ſubject of the diſpute; "but Chamier being a man of more ſolid learning "and better acquainted with School-Divinity, had "obliged, by his arguments, the Jeſuit to get off by "this artifice. Thoſe very perſons who have wrote the "Life of this Jeſuit, diſcover ſufficiently, that Cha"mier's dineſs would have quite diſconcerted their "Hero, had he not eluded the arguments by eloquent "diſcourſes that were nothing to the purpoſe, and "which he always had ready at hand (12)."

(12) Hiſt. de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 1. pag. 447.

[F] . . . And the Books written by him.] His Treatiſe de Oecumenico Pontifice and his Jeſuitical Epiſtles were eſteemed by Scaliger (13). Severe complaints were made of Chamier's publiſhing the Letters of ſome Jeſuits with his own gloſſes and remarks. If the Proteſtant Clergy are treated mildly, this is but inviting them to attempt worſe things, and give them an opportunity of turning honey into poiſon. This has been ſeen during theſe late years in the Clergy of Dauphiné, particularly in Chamier, to whom Father Coton and Father Ignatius Armand had written privately, touching ſome article of Faith, by way of conference, and always in the kindeſt terms. But what uſe did he make of them? He printed them without their privity and contrary to their intentions; and adding his own remarks to them, has made public thoſe particulars that were communicated to him only, which is a treacherous affront; for many things are written in a private way, which a man would not be of Henry IV, who, in 1603, appointed him Counſellor of State and Privy Counſellor. The year after, he reſigned his dignity of Preſident to Francis Chalvet Sieur de Fenouillet, one of his ſons, and retired from buſineſs to devote himſelf wholly to God, and to ſpend the remainder of his days in peace, and among his books. He ſpent two years in this retirement, with ſo much ſatisfaction to himſelf, that he uſed frequently to declare to his relations, that he could not ſay he had lived during the paſt years of his life [C] . . . . He died in a pious and Chriſtian manner at Toulouſe, the 20th of June 1607, being ſeventy nine years of age (d). Several Authors have honoured him with Elogiums [D].

(13) Chamierus de Oecumenico Pontifice & Epiſtolas Jeſuiticas edidit, bona Opera! How admirably does Chamier write the Greek tongue! and how much better than Coton! Scaligerana, pag. 48.

(d) Extracted from the Short Account of his Life, prefixed to his Tranſlation of Seneca.

" de St. Iory, firſt Preſident of Toulouſe, and our " Chalvet; as well upon account of their mutual love " for learning, as of their near affinity. He was tall " and well-ſet, had a pleaſant eye, fair hair, a ſweet and " venerable aſpect; a grave, modeſt and majeſtic de- " portment; and he was vaſtly entertaining in con- " verſation (3). No one ſpoke with him but he was " immediately charmed; for he was naturally affable, " courteous, kind, ingenuous; free from hypocriſy, " ambition and avarice; employing much more pains " in other people's affairs, than in his own; fearing " God, deteſting and condemning all kinds of vice, " and eſpecially violent practices and innovations, " even in matters of Religion. He loved order, inte- " grity and peace. Amidſt the confuſions of France, " he perſevered conſtantly in obedience to his Prince, " whoſe party, as judging it the only juſt and lawful " one, he always faithfully followed. Therefore, " when the Parliament was removed from Toulouſe to " Chaſtelſarraſy, he was ſelected from the reſt, to go " and compliment, in their name, the King who was " then (1594) at Lyons; which gave his Majeſty the " higheſt ſatisfaction, as appeared by the gracious re- " ception he gave Mr. Chalvet, and the preſent he " made him; and he thought himſelf vaſtly happy, " in having been the firſt Officer of the Parliament " of Toulouſe, who waited upon the King ſince " his acceſſion to the throne, and ſince the beginning " of the reduction of Languedoc by his Majeſty's " arms. Again he was deputed in 1603 by the ſame " Parliament to that King, on ſeveral important af- " fairs; in which journey, his Majeſty, as an honoura- " ble recompence for all his ſervices, appointed him, un- " aſked by any, or even by Mr. Chalvet himſelf, " Counſellor of State and Privy Counſellor; for which " he took an oath before the Chancellor de Bellievre, " to whom he was ſome way related (4)."

(3) See, on theſe Subjects, the Latin verſes of Critton, Regius Profeſſor, prefixed to his Tranſlation of Seneca.

(4) Summary of the Life of Mr. de Chalvet.

[C] He ſpent two years in this retirement, with ſo much ſatisfaction to himſelf, that he uſed frequently to declare . . . that he could not ſay he had lived, during all the paſt years of his life.] He therefore might have compared himſelf to an illuſtrious man who was Præfectus Prætorii under the Emperor Adrian. The perſon I mean is Similis, who was raiſed to this employment much againſt his will, and reſigned it voluntarily; after which he retired into the country, and after ſpending ſeven years there, left the world. He would have the following inſcription fixed on his tomb. Here lies Similis, who tho' his age was very long, yet lived but ſeven years (5). * [This inſcription is thus imitated in a modern work.

(5) Xiphilin. in Hadriano, pag. m. 266.

Should curious readers wiſh to know,
Whoſe duſt their feet are preſſing;
SIMILIS, fam'd in war, lies low,
His country's boaſt and bleſſing.
Long did he toil, and graſp and ſtrive,
Yet loſt his time he fears;
For tho', till ſeventy ſix, alive,
He lived but ſeven ſhort years.]

* The PLAIN-DEALER; being ſelect Eſſays on ſeveral curious ſubjects. num. 114. London 1730. 8vo.

The reader will find a great many pieces on ſuch ſubjects, in Camerarius's hiſtorical Meditations, Chap. V. Book III, of Vol. I.

[D] Several Authors have honoured him with Elogiums.] I ſhall give but one inſtance, and that is a Latin Epigram, addreſſed to him by Peter le Loyer.

Cum ſua quiſque tibi culto munuſcula verſu
Offerat, & genio dedicet illa tuo,
Haud ego poſtremos inter numerabor amicos,
Et levia, at ſaltem munera grata dabo.

That is,

" Whilſt every one inſcribes his flowing verſe,
" An humble offering to thy noble genius;
" Lo I advance, (not laſt of all thy friends)
" And pay a grateful, tho' but ſlender, tribute."

This Epigram follows the French Verſes, by which the Author dedicated his Comedy intitled le Muet inſensè (the frantic dumb man) to this Preſident of Inqueſts. His encomium begins at, Quand j'aurois autant d'or, i. e. " . . . Tho' I had as much " gold" down to Muſe, incluſively. And, Et encore mon Chalvet, cher teſte. i. e. " And again Chaulvet, " dear man." . . . to Prens doncque (take then) excluſively, in the Oeuvres & meſlanges Poëtiques de Pierre le Loyer, folio 122 verſo. Paris edit. 1579.

CHAMIER (DANIEL) one of the greateſt Proteſtant Divines, was born in Dauphiné. He was many years Preacher at Montellimart (a), whence he went in 1612 to Montauban, to be Profeſſor of Divinity in that City, and was killed by a canon ball during the ſiege in 1621 (b) [A]. It is very ſurprizing that no one ſhould have wrote his Life; no people in the world would have been ſo negligent on ſuch an occaſion but the French. Had Chamier been of another country, his Life would have been wrote in a voluminous

(a) Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 86. See the Remark [D].

(b) The 16th of October.

[A] He was killed by a cannon-ball, during the ſiege of Montauban, in 1621.] Some Hiſtorians relate, that he was killed under arms, that is, pike in hand, and defended with a coat of mail; and that he had three times repeated with a loud voice, in the pathetic Sermon preached by him that day, the following words -- They ſhall not enter. Chamierus . . quamquam propugnaculo tegebatur, tormentaria pila in fruſta diſcerpitur, vix agnito unde globus, & qua immiſſus; in utrumque paratus homo audax, thorace ferreo, haſtaque ad manum venerat in hunc locum, additurus militi animos, poſtquam eademmet die concione in templo pathetico habita, de regiis loquens, finierat in hæc ipſa verba, quæ diſtincta ter voce diſtincta repetierat, Non ingredientur (1). We don't find, by the relation of the ſiege of Montauban, that he had taken up arms, but only, that he was carried off by a cannon-ball, at the entry of the baſtion du Paillas; and that in his Sermon, the preceding day, on the 34*th verſe of chapter* 37 of Iſaiah, he applied to the city of Montauban, the promiſe (in the name of the Lord) made to Jeruſalem, beſieged by Rabſhakeh, General of Sennacherib's Army; in the following words, which he repeated with great vehemence.— By the way that he came, by the ſame ſhall he return, and ſhall not come into this city, ſaith the Lord. Some of his friends, adds the relation, heard Chamier ſay, that he believed he ſhould die in that ſiege by a cannon-ball, . . . and he propheſied accidentally that Sunday morning, what happened to him in the evening. Joſſion his collegue aſking him whether it was not his turn to preach in the afternoon? By no means ſays he, it is my reſting-day (2). The Romiſh Writers have commented in a moſt horrid manner on the death of this famous Clergyman; and thence have taken occaſion to rail againſt him as an incendiary, who not ſatisfied with preaching rebellion, took up arms and fought as a ſoldier; without conſidering, ſay theſe, that as the Laity are not allowed to aſſume any of the ſacerdotal functions, neither are Miniſters of the Goſpel permitted to draw the ſword. To theſe it is anſwered, (as in the caſe of Zuinglius) that it is lawful for them to take up arms in order to implore a bleſſing upon their cauſe, and to comfort and ſtrengthen thoſe who ſtand in need of ſuch aſſiſtance.

(1) Barthol. Gramondus, Hiſtor. Galliæ, lib. 10. pag. m. 592.

(2) Siege de Montauban, pag. m. 155.

voluminous ſize, and have had a place in every public Library, eſpecially as he left ſeveral ſons of his own profeſſion, and whoſe poſterity are Clergymen (t). He was as famous among the French Proteſtants for his politicks, as in his preaching: No man was ever more ſevere, inflexible, or untractable [B], with regard to the artifices which the Court of France employed to weaken the Proteſtants. It is ſaid that Chamier drew up the edict of Nantz [C]. He had the honour of being deputed on ſeveral occaſions [D], and preſided over ſome Synods (d). Though he ſpent ſo much time in negotiations, he nevertheleſs acquired a great fund of learning, of which his diſputes with father Coton [E], and the books [F] written by him are a proof. The aſſertion of thoſe who make him the

(t) I write this in 1694.

(d) Among others, to the national Synod of Gap in 1603.

[B] No man was ever more ſevere and inflexible.] The Author of the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantz, gives a very good deſcription of Chamier's turn of mind. He danced attendance to no purpoſe at Court, ſays he (3), whither he had been deputed by the Synod of Rochelle . . . and after ſix months ſtay in it, he could not get acceſs to his Majeſty. The King was not pleaſed with him, becauſe he was one of the hot-heads of the Synod (4), whom the King did not love; of that claſs of people who are inflexible; of thoſe hearts that are proof againſt fears and hopes, which are the ſtrongeſt engines the Court has to play off. He had ſaid elſewhere (5), ſpeaking of the Deputies ſent on the affair of the Edict of Nantz, that Chamier was one of the moſt obſtinate of them, and upon that account was ſo odious to the Court, as he was revered by the Churches. We ſhall relate in the Remark [B] of the Article FERRIER, that in 1611, being in the Aſſembly of Saumur, he was at the head of thoſe who would have the Edict of Nantz obſerved in the moſt ſtrict and rigorous ſenſe. But if the reader is deſirous of knowing the humour and diſpoſition of Chamier and ſuch like men, let him read what d'Aubigné has written in a very facetious ſtyle. "Now thoſe people appeared more ſaucy, ſays he (6), "in the laſt treaty of Peace, and in thoſe Aſſemblies "which were held four years, wherein thoſe ſtubborn "men reſiſted, not only the moſt honourable men the "King could ſelect out of his Council of State, but "alſo the greateſt Noblemen of the Kingdom; when, "weighing the affairs of the Kingdom, they would "fain have prevailed with them to ſhew ſome civility. "One of theſe roſe up with a face of braſs, and anſwered freely, Theſe propoſals don't anſwer the good opinion which thoſe by whom we are ſent, entertain of us. An explanation of theſe words was deſired, "when la Valiere comes forward, and explaining it, "cries, This, Gentlemen, may be called betraying the Church of God. T'other day I heard Mr. de Villeroy "tell, how that himſelf, Meſſ. de Roſny and de Thou, "and others, being at a conference with four of theſe "ill-bred men, whilſt Calignon, in the King's name, "endeavoured to ſoften their ſtubborn minds, by gentle "and perſuaſive eloquence, unweildy Chamier, throwing his cloak under his back-ſide, had brought forward his left arm to the middle of the table; paring his nails with his ſciſſors, when the clippings "flew on the Orator's beard and into his mouth; one "of them flew into Roſny's eye; and this air and "manner annulled all that could be ſaid in his favour."

(3) Tom. 1. pag. 446, 447, ad ann. 1607.

(4) The Author had ſaid, pag. 443. that there were certain perſons in the Synod who were called, by the Courtiers, the hotheads of the Synod, from a ſuppoſition that they were too ſtubborn, and too careful of their own ſecurity.

(5) Pag. 253.

(6) Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci, lib. 2. cap. 7. pag. m. 422, 423.

[C] 'Tis ſaid that Chamier drew up the Edict of Nantz.] I have read this in an Epiſtle Dedicatory of Mr. de Varillas. As the Hereticks, ſays he (7), will ſcarce ever obtain ſuch a ſecurity as they may think ſufficient for themſelves; the Calviniſts had obtained by their importunities, that whatever was of advantage to their party in the Edict of Pacification, ſhould be included in that of Nantz. Daniel Chamier, the Clergyman, who had the greateſt abilities among them, was ordered to draw it up. He had employed full three months for this purpoſe; and boaſted his not having omitted any thing which might conduce to ſtrengthen the tranquillity of his Sect.

(7) Varill. Epiſt. Dedic. of tom. 1. de l'Hiſtoire de l'Héréſie.

[D] He had the honour to be deputed on ſeveral occaſions.] What Varillas aſſerted above, may perhaps be falſe; but it is certain that Chamier was one of the chiefs in the aſſemblies of the French Proteſtants, in which the laſt pacification with Henry IV was debated and concluded. La Trimouille, du Pleſſis, d'Aubigné, and himſelf were made choice of, "in order "to debate and conteſt ſuch matters as could not, "without creating too much confuſion, be digeſted by "the whole Aſſembly, which then conſiſted of ſeven-"ty and ſometimes eighty, perſons (8)." There were as many in the Aſſembly of Saumur, anno 1611. "Chamier had the firſt vote in it, as being aſſiſtant "to the Preſident; and as he was well ſkilled in af-"fairs, the concluſion depended in a great meaſure "on the turn he gave to things in voting (9). The "Author from whom I borrow theſe particulars tells "us an incident that is worthy of being told. It "was reſolved, ſays he (10), to bring a perſonal trou-"ble upon him, in order that he might take a diſlike "to public Aſſemblies, in which he had too great "weight and authority. The Conſiſtory of Monteli-"mar, where he was Miniſter, took the opportunity "whilſt he was abſent on a Deputation, and put ano-"ther in his place. This was done without "once conſulting with, and hearing him, by I "know not what intrigues, in which it is pro-"bable, that Leſdiguieres had a hand, ſince all was "done in his Province under his eye, and in a city "where he did what he pleaſed. But, to heighten the "affront ſtill more, the Conſiſtory commanded his "houſe to be ſearched; and made a great havock in "his Library, upon pretence that there were ſome "papers in it belonging to the Church. This action "of the Conſiſtory was ſo injurious, and contemptu-"ous with regard to Chamier, that he was highly af-"fronted at it, eſpecially as it affected his intereſt no "leſs than his honour. He complained of this to the "Aſſembly, as though it had been wounded through "his ſides; and ſeem'd upon the point of leaving "Saumur, to go and ſettle his affairs at home. Thi "was the very thing the Court wanted, in order tha "the party might by this means be deprived of an "able man, whoſe reſiſtance it feared. But Chamier "was prevailed upon to ſtay there, by his having ju-"ſtice done him; and the Aſſembly continued him "in his Church at Montelimar." I find that he had left this Church in 1606; and went to the Univerſity of * Die, and was Profeſſor of Divinity there (11). I know not what were the reaſons that engaged him to return to his former poſt.

(8) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. tom. 3. lib. 5. cap. 10. pag. m. 623.

(9) Hiſt. de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 55.

(10) Ibid. pag. 56.

(11) Simon Goulart wrote this to Scaliger. See the French Letters written to Scaliger, lib. 3. pag. 447.

[E] He . . acquired a great fund of learning, of which his diſputes with Father Coton . . . are a proof.] Here follows what is related on this ſubject by a modern Author, a good Proteſtant. "Chamier had had a "conference at Nimes, in 1600, with this Jeſuit, each "of whom he boaſted, as uſual, his having all the ad-"vantage. The truth is, this Jeſuit had dazzled the "auditors by eloquent digreſſions, whereby he ram-"bled every moment from the ſubject of the diſpute; "but Chamier being a man of more ſolid learning "and better acquainted with School-Divinity, had "obliged, by his arguments, the Jeſuit to get off by "this artifice. Thoſe very perſons who have wrote the "Life of this Jeſuit, diſcover ſufficiently, that Cha-"mier's drineſs would have quite diſconcerted their "Hero, had he not eluded the arguments by eloquent "diſcourſes that were nothing to the purpoſe, and "which he always had ready at hand (12)."

(12) Hiſt. de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 1. pag. 447.

[F] . . . And the Books written by him.] His Treatiſe de Oecumenico Pontifice and his Jeſuitical Epiſtles were eſteemed by Scaliger (13). Severe complaints were made of Chamier's publiſhing the Letters of ſome Jeſuits with his own gloſſes and remarks. If the Proteſtant Clergy are treated mildly, this is but inviting them to attempt worſe things, and give them an opportunity of turning honey into poiſon. This has been ſeen during theſe late years in the Clergy of Dauphiné, particularly in Chamier, to whom Father Coton and Father Ignatius Armand had written privately, touching ſome article of Faith, by way of conference, and always in the kindeſt terms. But what uſe did he make of them? He printed them without their privity and contrary to their intentions; and adding his own remarks to them, has made public thoſe particulars that were communicated to him only, which is a treacherous affront; for many things are written in a private way, which a man would not be the leader of a party, and of the Metaphoriſts [G], does not deſerve to be refuted. It is more abſurd than the audaciouſneſs of thoſe, who pretend that there really is ſuch a ſect as the Bezanites.

(13) Chamierus de Oecumenico Pontifice & Epiſtolas Jeſuiticas edidit, bona Opera! How admirably does Chamier write the Greek tongue! and how much better than Coton! Scaligerana, pag. 48.

(14) Richeome, Letter to a Gentleman of Provence, prefixed to his Categorical Examination of the Anti-Coton.

he very willing to have publiſhed (14). But the moſt conſiderable work written by Chamier is, his Panſtratia Catholica, or, Wars of the Lord (15). He therein treats very learnedly the controverſies between the Proteſtants and the Roman Catholicks, and endeavours chiefly to refute Bellarmin. This work conſiſts of four volumes in folio, and yet was not finiſhed; the controverſy concerning the Church which is a vaſt field, being ſtill wanting, and would have found the fifth volume. The Author died before he had an opportunity of completing it. What follows was written from Geneva (16) concerning the Panſtratia, in 1606. "Mr. Chamier "beſtows great application to controverſial matters. "If he continues as he has begun, and he meets with "Printers to ſecond his diſpatch, he will write as "many volumes as Baronius in his eccleſiaſtical legends "or rather Lugends, which he entitles Annals." This body of Controverſy was printed at Geneva, in 1626 (17). Adrian Chamier, Miniſter of Montelimar, the Author's ſon, dedicated it to the National Synod of the Proteſtant Churches of France; as a work they might claim, not only as it had been written at their requeſt; but alſo becauſe they had favoured Daniel Chamier with ſeveral gifts, to encourage him to purſue that work; and that after his death they had extended their liberality to his family, and contributed to the charges of the impreſſion. Benedict Turretin, Profeſſor of Divinity in Geneva, was the editor of this Panſtratia, and prefixed to it a ſhort and excellent Preface. There was publiſhed at Geneva, in 1643, in one volume in folio, an Epitome (by Father Spanheim) of the Panſtratia, under the title of Chamierus contractus. Will thoſe who know that the Panſtratia conſiſts of four large volumes in folio, conclude that the Author of the Bibliotheque of Dauphiné, knew the ſize of the work; when he entitles it, a Penſtratia, or Diſcourſes on the controverted points of the two Religions? In this manner would a little duodecimo &c. be ſpoken of; ſuch, for inſtance, as that written by Chamier againſt Father Toloſain, Abbot-General of St. Anthony (18); or the Conſiderations he publiſhed in 1600, againſt the Avertiſſements of Porſan. In 1653, there was printed at Geneva, his Corpus Theologicum; it is a ſmall folio, and contains alſo his Epiſtolæ Jeſuiticæ.

(15) This is the title employed, (in citing Chamier) by Mr. Saurin, Examen de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu, tom. 2. pag. 573.

(16) By Simon Goulart, to Joſeph Scaliger. See the French Letters wrote to Scaliger, lib. 3. pag. 445.

(17) In the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, it is 1606, which is an error.

(18) Gualter. Tabula Chronograph. pag. 822.

[G] They make him . . . chief of the Metaphoriſts.] A Jeſuit, James Gaultier by name, than whom no man was ever leſs ſcrupulous of multiplying the Sects of the Proteſtants, enumerates ſeven in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century. The firſt is that of the Metaphoriſts, whoſe errors he aſcribes to Daniel Chamier only. He declares, that the firſt error of the Metaphoriſts, and that which has given the name to their Sect, conſiſts in aſſerting, that Jeſus Chriſt is not properly the Word and Image of God the Father, but only in a metaphorical ſenſe. He adds, that Daniel Chamier repeated this blaſphemous aſſertion ſeveral times, in the conference he had with him James "Gaultier in the beginning of January 1601. Hoc ſpeciatim ineunte Januario anni 1601, notatum fuit in Danielè Chamerio, Montilienſi miniſtro, quum illi mecum Alani eſſet diſceptatio, in qua ille non ſemel ſed multoties in pleno conſenſu hanc ipſam blaſphemiam enunciavit, dictavit ſuaque manu ſubſcripſit (19). We have here an inſtance of what prejudice can do; for 1ſt; there never was ſuch a Sect as that of the Metaphoriſts among the Proteſtants, and their Synods never had any debates on that ſubject, nor with any perſons of ſuch principles. II. Where did this Jeſuit learn, that it is heretical and blaſphemous, to ſay that the expreſſions Word and Image are not taken in the proper but the figurative ſenſe, when they are ſpoke of Chriſt with reſpect to God the Father? In the proper ſenſe, the firſt of theſe words ſignifies only the action of a man, who ſpeaks; and the ſecond implies only a figure which repreſents a body. It is very certain that in that ſenſe nothing can be either the Word or the Image of God the Father. But does it follow from thence, that Chriſt ſhall be the Word and Image of his Father in a figurative ſenſe only? Here lies the preſſeſſion; is a perſon blinded by his prejudices, he imagines there is nothing real in Metaphors (20), and will no longer hearken to reaſon. Does not the Poet who calls two of the Scipio's, thunderbolts of war (21), aſcribe to them every thing that is moſt real, moſt active and ſolid in military bravery? It is nevertheleſs very undoubtedly true, that he made uſe of a metaphor, and that a man muſt be beſide himſelf, to aſſert, that the Scipio's are thunder, in a metaphorical or figurative ſenſe only. An Author who is mentioned in the preceding remark, aſſerts very gravely, that Chamier was one of the chief Sectariſts of the faction of the Metaphoriſts (22). How many people will repeat this untruth, without enquiring into it; without ſuſpecting that this faction of the Metaphoriſts is a chimera of James Gaultier's; and without knowing that themſelves, the Jeſuit in queſtion, and all perſons in general, who are moſt rigidly orthodox, are Metaphoriſts, in the ſenſe that Chamier was one? I have obſerved elſewhere (23), how ridiculous it is to ſwell the catalogue of Sects.

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) Read but Vaugelas, Father Bouhours, Menage, &c. in their Remarques ſur la Langue Françoiſe, and it will appear by the difference of the proper and figurative ſenſe, that the latter is no leſs expreſſive of real objects than the former.

(21) Gemines, duo fulmina belli, Scipiadas, cladem Libyæ. Virgil. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 843. Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 24. cap. 6. pag. m. 409. whom he calls Longæ loquantur ætates Sophanem, & Aminiam, & Callimachum & Cynægirum Medicorum in Græcia fulmina illa bellorum. Lucretius, lib. 3. ver. 1047, ſuggeſted that thought to Virgil. See Drelincourt, in Indice Achilleo, pag. 44. num. 119. and pag. 46. num. 124.

(22) Allard, Bibliotheque de Dauphiné, pag. 62.

(23) In the article of the BEZANITES.

CHANGY (PETER of), Eſquire, lived in the ſixteenth Century. He tranſlated into French the Latin work of Ludovicus Vives, intitled Of the Inſtitution of the Chriſtian Woman, as well in her Infancy, as in her marriage and widowhood. Likewiſe the Duty of the Huſband (a). The edition in my poſſeſſion is not either the firſt or ſecond; but was printed at Paris by James Kerver, 1543 in 8vo, and was not known either by la Croix du Maine, or by Du Verdier Vau-Privas (b). There was afterwards added to it, a very brief and uſeful Inſtitution of the virtue of Humility; with an Epiſtle of St. Bernard concerning the buſineſs and government of a family. This was a poſthumous piece. He had dedicated his work to his daughter Margaret; was upwards of threeſcore when he ſet about that verſion, and was ſeverely afflicted by the gout (c). He had been a ſoldier in his youth, and made a French verſion of ſix of Pliny's books [A], amidſt the

(a) See at the end of the remark [M] of the article SAINT-ALDEGONDE Plantin's judgment on this Verſion.

(b) La Croix du Maine had not heard of any of theſe editions. Du Verdier Vau-Privas mentions only that of Poitiers in 1544, 16°, and that of Paris 1579, in 16o.

(c) See (prefixed to the work) the Latin verſes of Simonis Romyglæi Andegavenſis.

[A] He made a French Verſion of ſix of Pliny's Books.] He is made to ſpeak in the following manner, in ſome verſes (1) prefixed to his Tranſlation of Ludovicus Vives's piece.

Me miſerum (aiebat) qui bella ferocia geſſi
Pro patria, corpus dum juvenile foret.
Qui Plini bis tres in Gallica verba libellos,
Mars, verti in Caſtris, ſanguinolente, tuis

That is,

"Unhappy me! whom in the bloom of life,
"Engaged in cruel wars to ſerve my country;
"Who whilſt I fought beneath thy bloody banners
"O Mars! taught ſix of Pliny's books our lan"guage."

(1) Simonis Romyglæi Andegavenſis.

Neither la Croix du Maine, nor du Verdier Vau-Privas, make any mention of the Tranſlation of theſe ſix Books of Pliny; but they obſerve, that his Summary of the XVI firſt Books of Pliny, was printed at Lyons, by John de Tournes, anno 1551, in 16mo. It was publiſhed by Blaſius de CHANGY, one of his ſons (2). He was Rector of Deſpoyſſe, as I learn by ten verſes prefixed to the Tranſlation of Ludovicus Vives. Peter Poſſeliere, born in Auxerre, is Author of it. JAMES DE CHANGY another of our Writer's ſons, was a Counſellor; I believe that the eſtate or tract of land called Changy, is in Burgundy; for the Epiſtle Dedicatory of this Tranſlator begins thus:

(2) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 389.

To

the noiſe and alarms of a Camp. He had ſome ſons who were men of Letters, as I ſhall obſerve in the Note.

To my Daughter MARGARET.

Thy brother James, Doctor of Laws, brought me to Changy from the Library of the Seigneur Saint Anthot, Counſellor in our ſovereign Court at † Digeon, a Latin Book, written by an eloquent man, treating of the virtuous education of the Chriſtian woman.

† Dijon, capital of Burgundy. Add. Rem.

Du Verdier aſcribes to James de Changy, Doctor of Laws and Advocate at Dijon, a French Tranſlation of J. Ludovicus Vives's Education of the Chriſtian Woman, &c (3). He tells us, that it was printed at Lyons in 16mo for Sulpice Sabon; and that Leys Torquet (4) alſo made a later Tranſlation of the ſame Book. It is plain that he aſcribes to the ſon in page 597, what he declares to have been written by the father in page 1000. Why did he not point out to us the date of the Lyons edition?

(3) Du Verdier, Bibliotb. Françoiſe, pag. 597.

(4) He ſhould have ſaid Turquet, as in page 821.

CHARLES the Fifth, Emperor and King of Spain, born at Ghent the 24th of February (St. Matthias's day) anno 1500, was one of the greateſt men to which the illuſtrious Houſe of Auſtria gave birth. He was a warrior and politician; ſo that being poſſeſſed of ſo many Kingdoms and Provinces, he might have ſubdued all Europe, had not the valour of Francis I checked his progreſs [A]. There was an everlaſting ſtruggle between thoſe two Princes, on which occaſion fortune generally declared againſt France; which muſt be aſcribed, partly to the ſuperiority of the Armies of Charles V, and partly to the ill conduct of the Council of France, which committed more errors than it was poſſible for the valour of the French troops to repair. Notwithſtanding this, Charles V was frequently unſucceſsful in his expeditions againſt France. It is related, that he was one of thoſe heavy genius's, which are far from darting forth in their childhood the leaſt glimmerings of what they will one day become. It is even ſaid that this was of great advantage to him when he was elected Emperor, preferably to Francis I [B]. Although he had a very ſkilful Preceptor (a) he yet made very little progreſs in Latin (b), but acquired great proficiency in the living Languages. He was ſo great a maſter of the French-tongue, that he wrote his own Annals in it [C]. It is aſſerted nevertheleſs, that he had a greater eſteem for the Spaniſh.

(a) He afterwards was Pope Adrian VI.

(b) See the remark [F] of the article ADRIAN VI.

[A] He might have ſubdued all Europe, had not the valour of Francis I check'd his progreſs.] He was almoſt the only Power that ſtemm'd the flood; and, if we examine the Hiſtory of thoſe times, we ſhall find, that the Emperor had generally more Allies than Francis I; and England, ſo far from endeavouring to preſerve the balance of power between thoſe two Princes, joined very often with the Emperor. Don't we know that in 1544 Charles V and Henry VIII had already agreed upon the partition of France between them; and that the Treaty declared, that they ſhould join their armies before Paris, to plunder that great city (1)? They endeavonred, by concert, to put this plan in execution; ſince, at the ſame time that the Emperor was making an inroad into Champagne, the Engliſh made a deſcent on Picardy. This recompence did the King of France meet with for all the ill ſteps he had taken to favour the paſſion of Henry VIII for Anna Bullen. In this manner could Charles V be ſo ſupple and pliant, as to forget the affronts which were put on his repudiated aunt, and the promiſes he had made the Court of Rome (2). It is pretended, that this was one of the circumſtances with which his conſcience reproached him afterwards, and for which he abdicated the throne. Eſſe non pauca quæ Caroli vellicarent animum pietatis omnino non ſurdum. Iciſſe fœdus cum Henrico Angliæ rege, a fidelium ſocietate, diriis pontificiis, in Caroli gratiam expuncto. In quo ille & injuriam, quam ab Henrico acceperat, repudiatâ Catharinâ uxore, Cæſaris materterâ, & conſtantiam promiſſi, nunquam ſe cum hæretico Rege, niſi is Pontificiæ dignitati ſatisfaceret, in gratiam rediturum, nimis quàm impotenter poſthabuerat, atroci inexplicabilique in Gallum indignationi (3). i. e. "Several things tortured the mind of the Emperor Charles, who was not altogether deaf to the inſpirations of piety; his having entered into a league with Henry King of England, whom the Pope had excommunicated, purely to gratify Charles: on which occaſion his violent and implacable hatred againſt the French King, too meanly prevailed over the injury King Henry had done him, in divorcing Catherine his conſort, who was his (the Emperor's) aunt; and the firm promiſe he had made, never to reconcile himſelf to that heretical King, unleſs he made the Pope ſatisfaction." What follows is more remarkable than the reader may at firſt imagine. Charles V had a greater number of troops than Francis I; and yet by his artifices, or becauſe the other Powers did not think that his ſuperiority would be ſo dangerous to them, as that of the French Monarch; he generally concluded a greater number of alliances than his enemy. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that Brantome has ſpoke too contemptuouſly of the reſt of the Princes, who oppoſed the ambition of Charles V. Had it not been, ſays he (4), for our mighty Monarch Francis I, nay for his ſhadow only, the Emperor would eaſily have compleated his deſign. And as for all the little Princes and Potentates who might have oppoſed him, he would have tipped them down like ſo many ninepins; and their power would have been as ineffectual on that occaſion, as that of the little imps and bull-beggars of Rabelais, who only ſhower down hail on cabbages and parſley: it is plain the Pope could not have reſiſted him, he having been taken priſoner in his caſtle of St. Angelo, that was ſaid to be impregnable.

(1) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 6. pag. m. 628.

(2) The Emperor made no ſcruple to have a Prince for his Ally, who was branded with the fulminations of the Church; a mortal enemy to the holy See, and who had treated his aunt ſo ſeverely. Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 620.

(3) Famianus Strada, de Bello Belg. Dec. 1. lib. 1. pag. m. 19.

(4) Brantome, Capit. Etrangers, tom. 1. pag. 24.

[B] It is ſaid he was one of thoſe heavy genius's .. and that this was of great advantage to him, when he was elected Emperor, preferably to Francis I.] It is certain that after the death of the Emperor Maximilian, which happened the 22d of January 1519, Francis I ſet up publickly enough for one of the competitors for the Empire; and that he gave money to ſome of the Electors, who after promiſing to vote in his favour, declared for his rival. The height of glory this Monarch had attained to, was one of the reaſons for which he was excluded, "The greater merit he "ſeemed poſſeſſed of, the more it was apprehended "he would reduce the petty Princes of Germany, in "the ſame manner as his predeceſſors had reduced "thoſe of France; and that if oppreſſion was to be "feared from both thoſe Monarchs, that of Charles "did not appear ſo formidable; this competitor being "five years younger than Francis I, and in all ap-"pearance a Prince of very little abilities. In fine, "from theſe reflections, and by the aſſiſtance of three "hundred thouſand crowns, which had been ſent into "Germany the year before, and had been diſtributed "very ſeaſonably, Charles prevailed; and was elect-"ed at Frankfort the 20th of June, he being at that "time in Spain, where he had ſpent near two years "(5). This confirms what I have remarked more "than once (6), that on ſome occaſions a ſuperiori-"ty of forces and of merit, ſhall, inſtead of giving "ſucceſs to a deſign, rather render it abortive.

(5) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 493.

(6) In the remark [A] of ANTHONY (MARK) ſirnamed Creticus; and the remark [X] of the article BELLARMIN, before the break.

[C] He was ſo great a Maſter of the French Tongue, that he wrote his own Annals in it.] I have read no where but in Jerom Ruſcelli, that Charles V compoſed the Memoirs of his reign in French; and this is the only Author mentioned by Valerius Andreas (7), where he ſpeaks of Charles V. I am ſurprized that theſe Memoirs were never publiſhed, ſince there were copies of them; and that William Marindo had tranſlated them into Latin, with the deſign of publiſhing them immediately. This Ruſcelli aſſures us. Egli ſteſſo il predetta Imperator Carlo Quinto era venuta ſcrivendo in lingua Franceſe gran parte delle coſe ſue principali,

(7) Bibliot. Belg. pag. 123.

Spaniſh [D]. He made ſpeeches on ſome occaſions, but he forgot himſelf moſt unaccountably, in the ſpeech he delivered in Spaniſh before the Pope in 1536 [E]. The French pali, come già di molte delle ſue proprie fece il primo Ceſare, & che ſ'aſpetta di hora d'haverle in luce fatte Latine du Guglielmo Marindo (8). i. e. "The Empe- " ror Charles V wrote, in the French Tongue, a great " part of his principal actions, as Julius Cæſar had " anciently wrote many of his; and that a Latin " Tranſlation of this work, by William Marindo, " is expected to be publiſhed." Brantome obſerved very juſtly, that this piece muſt have ſold very well; but he ſhould not have doubted of the reality of ſuch a Tranſlation, upon account (as he imagined) that it had remained in obſcurity. He imagines that the Author cited by him, ſpoke of this verſion, as of a piece already publiſhed, and this he ſhould not have ſuppoſed. Here follow his words: I have ſeen a Letter (9), printed among thoſe of Belleforeſt, tranſlated by him out of Italian into French, which declares, that Charles V wrote a Book like that of Julius Ceſar, and that it had been tranſlated into Latin at Venice by William Marindre, which I cannot very well believe; for in that caſe every one would have run to purchaſe it with as much eagerneſs, as to buy bread in a famine; and certainly a ſtrong deſire to poſſeſs ſo beautiful and uncommon a work would have raiſed the piece much higher than it has been at, and every one would have bought one (10). Ghilini has ranked this Prince among Authors, and aſſerts that the work in queſtion had been printed. Opere ſue, ſays he (1), che publicate, accreſcono non poca fama al ſuo per altro celebratiſſimo nome, e ſono, Iſtoria delle coſe da lui fatte, la qual ſcriſſe in lingua Franceſe ad imitazione di. C. Giulio Cæſare. i. e. " He " added no ſmall luſtre to the great fame he had ac- " quired in war, by the Hiſtory of his own Actions, " that has been made public; written by himſelf in " the French Tongue, in imitation of Julius Cæſar." He then gives the titles of ſome letters and manuſcripts of that Emperor. This alſo is an error; for this Emperor uſed to have theſe kind of writings drawn up by his Secretaries. I believe that had father Bouhours recollected what Ruſcelli relates, he would have mentioned it in that part of his Entretiens, where he ſays; " The Emperor Charles V entertained a very advan- " tageous opinion of our language. He thought it " adapted to mighty affairs, and uſed to call it the " State Language, as we are aſſured by Cardinal du " Perron †. This perhaps was the reaſon, why he " made uſe of it in the moſt famous action of his life. " We are told in the Hiſtory of the Wars of Flanders *, " that he ſpoke in French to the States of Bruſſels, " when he reſigned all his Kingdoms to Philip II (12)." To thoſe words we will add theſe of Brantome: " A- " mong the ſeveral languages, he thought the French " was the moſt majeſtic; . . and uſed to take a pleaſure " in ſpeaking it, tho' he ſpoke very fluently many o- " thers (13).

(8) Ruſcelli, Letter to Philip II, among the Lettere di Principi, tom. 3. fol. 219.

(9) It is that of Ruſcelli, cited above.

(10) Brantome, Capit. Etrangers, tom. 1. pag. 42.

(11) Ghilini, Teatro, Part 2. pag. 51.

† Perroniana, under the word (Langue).

* Strada, de Bello Belgico, lib. 1.

(12) Bouhours, Entretiens II, d'Ariſte & d'Eugene, pag. m. 82.

(13) Brantome, Capit. Etrang. tom. 1. pag. 19.

[D] It is aſſerted nevertheleſs, that he had a greater eſteem for the Spaniſh.] Here follows another relation from Father Bouhours: " Were Charles V to return " again into the world, he would not be pleaſed at their " ranking the French above the Spaniſh; he who " uſed to ſay, that he would addreſs Ladies in Italian; " to men he would ſpeak French; to his horſes Ger- " man; but that if he were to ſpeak to God, he would " employ the Spaniſh Language. He ought to have " aſſerted roundly, replied Eugenius, that the Caſtil- " lian was the natural language of the Almighty, as " a learned Gentleman of that country aſſerted one " day very ſtrenuouſly, in good company, that in the " terreſtrial Paradiſe the ſerpent ſpoke Engliſh; that " the woman talk'd Italian, the men French, but " that God ſpoke in Spaniſh (14)." This is very different from what a German declared to a Spaniard, This Spaniard was Petrus Royzius, a famous Poet of that Age, and one of the King's Counſellors. The German was John Langus. Theſe two Gentlemen were extremely delighted in one another's company; and Royzius uſed to laugh at the German Tongue. Being one day at table, and Langus's ſervants who were waiting there, pronouncing their German with a very harſh, rough accent, " the Germans, ſays Royzius, don't ſpeak, " but they thunder; and it is my opinion that God " made uſe of their language, when he thunder'd forth " the ſentence of condemnation on Adam." Says Langus; " the Serpent employed the ſmooth inſinuat- " ing expreſſions of the Caſtillian Tongue, to delude " Eve." Theſe witty repartees made all the company laugh, and very much pleaſed the King himſelf. Petrus Royzius Mauræus Hiſpanus, Poeta illo ſeculo celeberrimus, conſiliarius regius, & ob eruditionem Lango (15) acceptiſſimus; etiam in quotidiana convictu; ſed qui velut ἀναλφάβητος Germanicam linguam ridere ſolet. Itaque famulos Langi Oratoris, menſæ aliquando adſtantes, atque dura pronunciatione & accentu affectatè voces Germanicas exaſperantes, iſto ſcommate jecoſe illuſit; Germani, inquit, non loquuntur, ſed fulminant. Et credo ego, mi Lange Orator, Deum ex indignatione hoc ſermonis fulmine uſum, cum primos parentes extruderet Paradiſo. Cui Langus; Ego rurſus, inquit, verifimile cenſeo, ſerpentem ſuavi & blando vocis Hiſpanicæ ſuco uſum, cum impoſuit Evæ. Hoc argutulo Royzium & convivis & adſtantibus propinavit deridendum; quod & ipſum regem hoc audientem mirè delectavit (16). I have lengthened this quotation, that the reader may ſee that the King of Poland himſelf was diverted with theſe waggeries. But here follows another diviſion, which does not agree entirely with Charles V, and pleaſed very much a Spaniſh Doctor. The German language is for ſoldiers, the French for women, the Italian for Princes, and the Spaniſh for God. De præſtantia . . illarum (linguarum) quæ Europæis frequentiores ſunt, ſic Tympius * diſtinguendum putat, ut ſi quiſpiam cum Deo locuturus eſſet, Hiſpanicè deberet liqui, ob linguæ majeſtatem; ſi cum aliquo Principe, Italicè propter hujus elegantiam; ſi cum fœminis, Gallicè ob ſuavitatem; ſi cum militibus, Germanicè quod ſit omnium robuſtiſſima; ac ſic omnes ſuo encomio evexit, ſed Hiſpanicam cæteris ſuperiorem merito extollit (27). There is ſtill a farther diviſion made, according to which, the Spaniſh tongue is fit for commanding, the Italian for perſuading, and the French for excuſing one's ſelf. Hence it was, ſaid a Spaniard, that God made uſe of the Spaniſh to prohibit the firſt man from eating a certain fruit; that the ſerpent employed Italian, to delude Eve, and that Adam ſpoke French, to juſtify his fault (18).

(14) Bouhours, Entretien II, d'Ariſte & d'Eugene, pag. 81.

(15) This was John Langus, Ferdinand's Embaſſador in Poland.

(16) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Juriſc. pag. 81.

* In Muſa Theſſillarum (linguarum) quæ Europæis frequentiores ſunt, ſic Tympius * diſtinguendum putat, ut ſi quiſpiam cum Deo locuturus eſſet, Hiſpanicè deberet liqui, ob linguæ majeſtatem; ſi cum aliquo Principe, Italicè propter hujus elegantiam; ſi cum fœminis, Gallicè ob ſuavitatem; ſi cum militibus, Germanicè quod ſit omnium robuſtiſſima; ac ſic omnes ſuo encomio evexit, ſed Hiſpanicam cæteris ſuperiorem merito extollit (27). There is ſtill a farther diviſion made, according to which, the Spaniſh tongue is fit for commanding, the Italian for perſuading, and the French for excuſing one's ſelf. Hence it was, ſaid a Spaniard, that God made uſe of the Spaniſh to prohibit the firſt man from eating a certain fruit; that the ſerpent employed Italian, to delude Eve, and that Adam ſpoke French, to juſtify his fault (18). philos. pag. 2.

(17) Gaſpar. à Reies, Elyſio jucund. Quæſt. Campo, Quæſt. 55. ſub fin. pag. 695.

(18) See La Mothe le Vayer, Problemes Sceptiques, cap. 15. pag. 259. tom. 13.

[E] He forgot himſelf moſt unaccountably, in the Speech he delivered in Spaniſh before the Pope, in 1536.] This was a great cauſe, which the Emperor himſelf was deſirous of pleading, in preſence of the Pope, the Cardinals, the foreign Embaſſadors, and ſeveral Prelates and Noblemen of high rank. He laid down very artfully whatever he thought would beſt juſtify his conduct, and condemn that of Francis I. He declared the conditions on which he was ready to conclude a Treaty of Peace with France. He ſaid, that in caſe this offer did pleaſe Francis I, he would offer him another, the anſwer to which he expected in twenty days, viz. that in order to avoid the ſhedding of blood, they ſhould determine their quarrel perſonally, . . . by fighting either in an iſland or on a bridge; or in a boat on ſome river; and that, as to the weapons, they two might pitch upon ſuch as were equal; and that they would be approved by him, whether they fought with ſwords or daggers, and in their ſhirts (19). If this method did not pleaſe, he offered a third, and that was war. He declared, that if this laſt ſhould be reſolved upon, he would take up arms, " in ſuch a manner that nothing " ſhould be able to divert him from it, till one or other " of them ſhould become the pooreſt Gentleman in his " Dominions: which misfortune he was certain would " fall upon the King; and that God would aſſiſt him " as he had hitherto done (20)." See the margin (21). He adds, that he was ſure to overcome for three reaſons. I. Becauſe he had right on his ſide. II. Becauſe the juncture was more favourable to him than might be imagined. III. Becauſe he found his ſubjects, officers and ſoldiers ſo well inclined, bearing ſo much love and affection towards him; and ſo well ſkilled in the ſcience of war, that he could rely entirely upon them; a circumſtance which he knew to be very reverſe with regard to the King of France, whoſe ſubjects, officers and ſoldiers were ſuch wretches, that did his reſemble them, he would tie his hands, put a rope about his neck, and in this condition, would wait upon the King of

(19) Memoires de Guillaume du Bellai, lib. 5. pag. m. 506.

(20) Ibid. pag. 507.

(21) Zenocarus in Caroli vita etiam magnificentius ſcribit Carolum ad duellum Gallum provocaſſe ſeptem oblatis optionibus, ut mari vel terra, vel flumine, equo vel pedibus, colle vel planitie, inter ſe decertarent. Spondanus, ad ann. 1536, num. 7. i. e. " Zenocarus, in the " Life of Charles " V. expreſſes " himſelf in " ſtill more " pompous " terms, ſaying " that the Em- " peror Charles " challenged the " K. of France " to fight him in " ſingle combat, " and gave him " the option of " ſeven methods, " viz. to fight " either at ſea, " or on land; " on a river, on " horſeback, or " on foot; upon " a hill or in a " plain."

French Court was very juſtly diſſatisfied with its Embaſſadors, who aſſiſted at this ceremony [F]. Several people think he was guilty of a ſtrange error, in relying on the honour of Francis I, when he paſſed through his dominions [G]. But a man muſt be of a very ſatyrical diſpoſition to call this an error [H]. The Flemiſh Hiſtorians were either very weak, or very malicious, in the relation they gave of what was tranſacted on this occaſion [I]. Nothing mortified him more than the raiſing of the ſiege of Mets; and of France, and ſue for mercy (22). It is here we may aſk the queſtion which Ulyſſes put to Agamemnon:

(22) Memoires de Guillaume du Bellai, pag. m. 508.

Ἀτρεΐδη, ποῖόν τε ἔπος φύγεν ἕρκος ὀδόντων (23).

(23) Iliad. lib. 4. ver. 350.

That is,

" What words are theſe (Atrides) thou haſt ſpoke!

It is here we may juſtly be ſurprized, that a ſet of words, more ſuitable to a ſtage Drawcanſir or Spaniſh Knight, than of an Emperor of Germany, ſhould have eſcaped ſo wiſe a Prince, before ſo auguſt an Aſſembly. Sane mirati ſumus vehementiſſime cum hanc orationem legimus apud Bellaium & alios, potuiſſe ejuſmodi verba & alia quamplurima, nec minus ferocia, quæ iidem auctores recitant, excidere in tali conventu adeo ſapienti ac prudenti ab omnibus habito Principi, quæ magis Pyrgopolinici Militi glorioſo Plautino convenire videntur (24). But, as a modern Hiſtorian obſerves, Fortune-tellers, Panegyriſts and Prophets, had all conſpired to fill the mind of the Emperor with vaſt deſigns. " Ever ſince he, " at the head of two great armies, had made Solyman " retire, and put Barbaroſſa to flight, he breathed no- " thing but war. Flatterers, who deprave the mind " of the wiſeſt Princes by their exceſſive praiſes, pro- " miſed him no leſs than the Empire of all Europe; " the Poets and Panegyriſts impudently aſſured him " of it; and Fortune-tellers and Aſtrologers, who are " as bold liars, had ſpread this belief to ſuch a de- " gree by their predictions, that they had made an " impreſſion on weak minds (25)." It was at the ſame time that the Emperor, puffed up with the victories he had juſt gained, and of thoſe he thought himſelf ſure of obtaining, ſaid to Paulus Jovius, " Get ready " a large quantity of paper and ink, for I have cut you " out work enough (26)." But never was the Providence of God ſeen to mortify more viſibly the Preſumption of the creature. Charles V, at the head of ten thouſand horſe, and upwards of forty thouſand foot, and ſupported by a ſtrong fleet commanded by the famous Andrew Doria, ruſhed upon Provence; and at the ſame time cauſed another Army of thirty thouſand men to enter Picardy (27). Here we may apply the words of Horace,

(24) Spondanus, ad ann. 1536, num. 7.

(25) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 591.

(26) See Brantome, Diſcourſe on Catherine of Medicis, init.

(27) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 595.

Parturiunt montes, naſcetur ridiculus mus (28).

(28) Horat. de Art. Poet. ver. 139.

That is,

" The mighty mountain did bring forth -- a mouſe.

The army of Provence was carried before Marſeilles, and was reduced to a wretched condition without once giving battle; and that of Picardy miſcarried before Peronne (29).

(29) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 595, 599.

[F] The French Court were juſtly diſſatisfied with its Embaſſadors, who aſſiſted at this ceremony.] The Biſhop of Mâcon, who was then Embaſſador from Francis I at Rome; and the Sieur de Velli, who was in the ſame quality in the Emperor's Court, were preſent at this ſpeech. The firſt could make but very little anſwer, becauſe he did not underſtand Spaniſh; and neither of them had time to ſay much. The worſt is, they did not give their maſter a faithful account of the propoſals made by Charles V; for they ſuppreſſed the challenge to fight in ſingle combat, the applauſes he had beſtowed on his own ſoldiers, and the contemptuous words in which he ſpoke of thoſe of France: all theſe particulars they ſuppreſſed at the Pope's deſire, for fear, leſt this ſhould exaſperate their maſter, and thereby delay the concluſion of the Treaty of Peace (30). Brantome deſcribes very humorouſly the whimſical poſtures of one of the Embaſſadors who was a ſoldier, during the ſpeech; and thoſe of the Sieur de Velli, a Gentleman of the Long-robe (31).

(30) Memoires de Guillaume de Bellai, pag. 519, 520. Brantome, Hommes illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. m. 246.

(31) Ibid.

[G] Several people think he was guilty of a ſtrange error, in relying on the honour of Francis I, when he paſſed thro' his dominions.] The citizens of Ghent revolted in 1539, and offered to deliver themſelves to the King of France. The King not only refuſed this offer, but gave the Emperor notice of it, who not being able to think of a better remedy to an evil, the conſequences of which might be dangerous, than to go thither in perſon, deſired leave to paſs thro' France, he looking upon every other way as long and dangerous. The Emperor's requeſt was granted, and extraordinary honours were paid him in every part of the Kingdom, eſpecially at Court. This behaviour of Francis I was certainly noble and generous; but it is ridiculous to praiſe him, for his not having made any attempt on the Emperor's liberty. Is a perſon to be applauded, becauſe he forbore to commit an action of the blackeſt perfidy?

[H] . . . A man muſt be of a ſatyrical diſpoſition, to call this an error.] Moſt of thoſe who have blamed Charles V for truſting ſo much to the generoſity of Francis I, did not thereby intend to calumniate that Emperor, but to give a horrid idea of the King of France; for if a Monarch acts repugnant to the maxims of prudence, in truſting to the word and honour of Francis I; it is a ſign that it is very probable he will commit a baſe and treacherous action whenever it is in his power. I confeſs that ſome Writers ground themſelves on the knaviſh arts, which according to them, Charles V was for ever practiſing with regard to the King of France, and they argue in the following manner. This Emperor ought naturally to have ſuſpected, that Francis I would have invented a great many ſpecious excuſes, for that he, after receiving ſo many injuries, would violate the laws of hoſpitality; and therefore, that would not be prudent in him to truſt that Monarchy. But whatever thoſe people ſay, their thoughts will reflect greater diſhonour on Francis I, than on Charles V; and it would be highly derogatory to the memory of the former, to aſſert that he had debated in his council, whether he ſhould ſeize on the perſon of Charles V. Camerarius, a German Author, does not look upon this as any way probable (32).

(32) Meditat. Hiſtoriques, vol. 3. lib. 3. cap. 3. I mean the firſt Tranſlation, publiſhed by Simon Goulart.

[I] The Flemiſh Hiſtorians were either very weak, or very malicious, in the relation they gave of what was tranſacted on this occaſion.] The Belgic, Germanic &c. candor of Hiſtorians is generally a mere chimæra. There is not perhaps any part of the world, where there are more equitable, and at the ſame time, more partial pens, than in that country. Their ſlander is as ſharp and wounds as deep, at that of the Italians, and beſides this, it is ſometimes grounded on very abſurd fables. I ſhall not cite all thoſe they have invented concerning the paſſage of Charles V through France, and ſhall only quote thoſe of a French annaliſt (33). *Nec ullo modo audiendus inſipidus quidam Belgicus Chronologus * dum ſcribit, Cæſarem paſquillis quibuſdam totam per urbem Lutetiam diſſeminatis præſentiſſimum ſui periculum cum vitaſſet, perniciſſimo curſu primum Cameracum, hinc Gandavum conceſſiſſe. Inſulſiora namque ſunt iſta quam ab homine mente ſobrio proferantur. Ac ſic lubet pleriſque Belgis cum de Francis agitur, fatuari & ineptire, qualia permulta apud Maierum, Maſſæum, & alios ejus generis homines reperire liceat.* i. e. " Nor " are we to give the leaſt credit to a certain inſipid " Belgic Chronologer, where he tells us, that Charles " V being laſhed by Paſquinades in every part of the " city of Paris, and having eſcaped the moſt immi- " nent danger, fled with the utmoſt ſpeed, firſt to " Cambray and afterwards to Ghent. But theſe par- " ticulars are too ſtupid for any man in his ſenſes " to write; nevertheleſs, moſt Flemings delight in " publiſhing ſuch ridiculous ſtories whenever they are " ſpeaking of Frenchmen; as is frequently ſeen in " Maierus, Maſſæus, and ſuch like Writers." The long wars that were carried on between France and the houſe of Burgundy, had exaſperated the Flemings to ſuch a degree, that ſuch as were not able to exerciſe hoſtilities ſword in hand, would war with their pens or and a ſmart ſaying is aſcribed to him, with regard to the aſcendant which Henry the IId's ſtar had over him [K]. Notwithſtanding the mighty ſucceſs of his enterprizes, it is certain that his Hiſtory is a compound of good and ill fortune [L]. His abdication is a very ſingular circumſtance, and furniſhed a noble theme for thoſe who delight in making reflections. Theſe gave very different accounts of the motives which prompted him to it [M], and the manner in which he employed his ſolitude [N]; and ſome writers pretend, that Charles or tongue. Now in theſe various ſorts of war, many perſons employ equally this maxim, Dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requirat? What ſort of an Hiſtorian muſt he be, who dares aſſert that Charles V fled with the utmoſt ſpeed; and who either does not know, or pretends he does not, that this Prince was accompanied to the frontiers by two Princes, (ſons to the French King) and received in all the cities thro' which he paſſed, with the ſame honours that would have been paid to the King himſelf?

(33) Spondanus, ad ann. 1540, num. 1.

* Locri, hoc an.

[K] A ſmart ſaying is aſcribed to him, with regard to the aſcendant which Henry the IId's ſtar had over him.] I ſee plainly, ſays he, that fortune is like women, ſhe preferring young men to thoſe in years. Strada relates, in general terms, this reflection of Charles V (34); Scioppius cenſures him very unjuſtly on that account (35); and it is merely from a ſpirit of contradiction that he doubts, whether this Emperor ever made ſuch an aſſertion. He acts the Divine very unſeaſonably; and is miſtaken in declaring that the Emperor, by this ſaying, aſcribes all things to chance. But does blind chance make women prefer a young huſband to one in years? Nothing can be more oppoſite to fortune, than an inclination or pretenſion, whatever it be, to favour one thing more than another. In caſe the maxim of Charles V were true, it would prove infinitely better the tenet of providence, (to ſpeak in general) than it would prove the oppoſite opinion. Scioppius is more in the right, when he ſays, that this maxim is found in Machiavel; for thus the laſt mentioned Author writes in his XXVth Chapter of his Prince. Io giudico ben queſto, che ſia meglio eſſere impetuoſo che riſpettivo, perche la Fortuna è donna: & è neceſſario volendola tener ſotta, batterla & urtarla. Et ſi vede che la ſi laſcia piu vincere da queſti, che da quelli che freddamente procedano. Et però ſempre (come donna) è amica dè giovanni, perchè ſon meno reſpettivi, piu feroci, è con più audacia la commandano. i. e. "In my opinion, it is more for a perſon's "intereſt to be bold than modeſt, becauſe fortune is a "female; and thoſe who would keep her under, muſt "beat and buffet her. And experience ſhews, that "ſhe is ſooner ſubjected by thoſe who treat her in "that rough manner, than by ſuch as proceed cooly: "and indeed, as a female, ſhe is ever a friend to the "young; becauſe theſe are leſs reſpectful, more ſa-"vage, and command more imperiouſly over her.

[L] His Hiſtory is a compound of good and ill fortune.] He confeſſed, in the ſpeech he made when he reſigned all his dominions, that the moſt proſperous actions he had ever been favoured with, had been branded with ſo many adverſities that he might juſtly ſay, he had ever found any content (36). It is related, that after his abdication he uſed to ſay, that he taſted more ſatisfaction in one day of his ſolitude, than in all his triumphs put together (37).

[M] His abdication . . . . very different accounts are given of the motives which prompted him to it.] Strada obſerves, that the abdication of this Emperor, was made a theme for declamation in ſchools. Non ignoro eam rem vario tunc hominum ſermone fuiſſe diſceptatam, hodieque declamatorum in ſcholis (38), politicorum in aulis, argumentum eſſe CÆSAREM ABDICANTEM (39). Charles V, according to ſome Writers, not being capable, upon account of his bodily infirmities, to ſuſtain the weight of his glory, he artfully prevented the ſhame of a greater decay of his reputation. It has alſo been ſaid, that the vexation to ſee his fortune ſo much below that of ſo young a Prince as Henry II; his fortune, I ſay, which had triumphed on ſo many occaſions over that of Francis I, obliged him to reſign his Crown. I ſhall obſerve in the following Remarks, that the vexation at his loſing the Papal Throne, and a deſire of ſerving God after the Proteſtant manner, have alſo been looked upon as the cauſe of his retreat from the world. But every one has not conſidered this great action with a critical eye: for ſome perſons have aſſerted, that a private deſire of meditating on the emptineſs of all human grandeur, and the ſolid bleſſings of heaven, prompted him to fly to ſolitude; in order to expiate, by the exerciſes of penance, the evils he had brought upon the Chriſtian world; and to prepare himſelf early and uſefully for death, by devoting himſelf entirely to the care of his ſalvation. Strada (40) has given a noble deſcription of all theſe, and ſeveral other particulars.

[N] And the manner in which he employed his ſolitude.] He for this purpoſe, made choice of the Monaſtery of St. Juſtus, ſituated on the frontiers of Caſtile and Portugal near Placentia. The Friars of this Monaſtery are called Hieronymites. He cauſed a ſmall houſe, (contiguous to this Convent) to be built, and conſiſting of ſix or ſeven rooms; and ſecluded himſelf in it, in February 1557. He kept only a dozen ſervants and a horſe. He was not ſo entirely wrapt up in exerciſes of devotion, as to forbear all amuſements; for he uſed to ride on horſeback, would dreſs his garden, make watches, and divert himſelf with experiments in Mechanicks with a famous engineer (41). Some days before his death, he cauſed his own funeral obſequies to be ſolemnized, and aſſiſted in perſon at that occaſion (42). Some relate, that he endeavoured to ſet ſeveral clocks ſo very exactly, that they might all ſtrike at the ſame inſtant; and that this deſign was not ſo difficult to put in execution, as the notion he had formed, at the time of the Interim, of reconciling all Religions. He had not ſo abſolutely renounced all human affairs, as to forbear enquiring how the wars went on, and giving his opinion on them; as is manifeſt from what it is related he ſaid and did, after hearing that his ſon having won the battle of St. Quintin, did not make a proper advantage of his victory. The relation is as follows. "Tho' he was wholly a Friar, and half a "Saint, he yet could not forbear (as we are told was "the common report at that time) when the King "his ſon had won the battle of St. Quintin, to aſk "the inſtant the Courier had brought him the news, "whether he had purſued his victory in a proper "manner, and as far as the gates of Paris? And be-"ing told that he had not, he ſaid, that had he "been of his age, and gained ſo glorious a victory; "he would not have ſtopt in ſo noble a career, but "would have run much better; and was ſo exaſperated "at what he heard, that he would not look into the "diſpatches which the Courier brought (43)." I muſt not omit what was ſaid to him by a young Monk; "The Emperor going one morning to awake "the reſt of the Friars in his turn, he found the "youth, who had not yet put on the habit, bu-"ried in ſo deep a ſleep, that he could ſcarce awake "him. At laſt the novice riſing with very great "regret, and but half awake, could not forbear ſay-"ing to him; that he ought to be ſatisfied with hav-"in diſturbed the repoſe of thoſe who were in the "world, ſo long as he had continued in it; and not "continue to interrupt the tranquillity of thoſe who "were retired from it (44)." I have read a particular which I think worthy of being mentioned. It is the extract of a Piece, relating to the abdication of Charles V ſent from Rome to Balzac, who (45) relates the beginning as follows: When Charles V, being grown tired of the world, reſolved to die under the Empire of his brother, and under the reign of his ſon. The Author of the Piece, after making ſeveral moral reflections, tells us this little ſtory. "Nevertheleſs, as there is "nothing ſo clear, but ſlander will defile it; nor ſo "good, but that it may be miſinterpreted by it; ſome "have hinted, as tho' that Prince had repented his ab-"dication; and that it had brought ſo much grief "upon him, as had even diſordered his ſenſes. To "prove this aſſertion they relate the following ſtory. "The Emperor had five hundred Crowns in a black "velvet purſe, which he never would ſuffer to go out "of his hands, but always carried it to bed with him "every night. If theſe people may be believed, he "uſed to kiſs, hug and idolize that purſe: ſo that af-"ter

(34) Quin & vulgo credebatur, Cæſaris fortunam faſtidio ac ſatietate jam captam retrocedere incepiſſe: felicemque Imperatoris hactenus invicti genium in Henricum Galliæ Regem immigraſſe. Ipſo Cæſare non diſſimulante, quem auditum ferebant, quum diceret, Nempe FORTUNAM eſſe juvenum amicam. Strada, de Bello Belg. Dec. 1. pag. m. 17. He quotes a Letter of Hippolyto, Chizzala inſerted in vol. 3. of the Lettere de Principi, folio m. 212 verſo. He cites it, I ſay, for the firſt part of the paſſage.

(35) Infam. Fam. Strad. pag. m. 36.

(36) Memoires de Beauvais-Nangis, pag. 120.

(37) Camerarius, Meditat. Hiſtor. vol. 1. lib. 3. cap. 5.

(38) This calls to my memory the following verſes of Juvenal, Sat. 1. ver. 13. which ſhew that the ſcholars in his time uſed to declaim on the abdication of Sylla. Et nos ergo manum ferulæ ſubduximus, & nos Conſilium dedimus Sullæ privatus ut altum Dormiret.

(39) Strada, de Bello Belgic. lib. 1. Dec. 1. pag. 16.

(40) Idem, ibid.

(41) Strada, ibid. pag. 13, 14. calls him Jannellus Turanus, and relates ſome very ſingular particulars concerning him.

(42) Ex Strada, lib. 1. Dec. 1. pag. 14.

(43) Brantome, Mem. des Capitaines Etrangers. tom. 1. pag. 12.

(44) Saint Real Hiſt. de Dom. Carlos, pag. m. 21, 22.

(45) Entretien premier, pag. m. 10.

Charles ſoon repented the reſignation he had made of his dominions, eſpecially to a ſon who diſcovered ſo little gratitude for it [O]. He did not forget, as we are told, to ſcourge himſelf in his retirement [P], and in general ſome Authors give a very advantageous idea of his piety [Q]. According to other writers, this Prince was more ambitious than religious [R], and he profeſſed almoſt the Lutheran principles at his death;

" ter having deſpiſed the riches of Europe, Aſia, A" frica, and thoſe of the new found world, and " the pearls and diamonds of ſo many crowns as " he had wore, he became avaritious for ſo trifling a
" ſum as five hundred crowns. I was formerly told
" this ſtory by a Spaniard, but I laughed at it, and " looked upon it as fabulous. It is much more pro" bable, that if the Emperor repented of any thing
" in his ſolitude, it was for his not having retired
" ſooner from the world, or, as an Italian writes,
" for not having obliged fortune to throw up the cards
" ſooner; for by that, ſaid he, he overreached that
" fickle Goddeſs, notwithſtanding her great cunning,
" and the inſidious arts ſhe employs (46).

(46) Ibid. pag. 12, 13.

[O] Some Writers pretend, that Charles ſoon repented the reſignation he had made, eſpecially to a ſon who diſcovered ſo little gratitude for it.] We are told an anſwer which Philip II made to Cardinal Granvelle, whence we ſhould be obliged to infer, that Charles V repented before the day after his reſignation; and that his deſire of renouncing the Empire, did not exceed the twenty four hours. It is this day, ſays Cardinal de Granvelle to King Phillip, a year, ſince the Emperor reſigned all his dominions. The King anſwered; and it is this day, a year ſince he was ſorry for what he had done. Writers who are not ſo malicious, ſay, that he did not begin to regret the Kingdoms he had reſigned, till travelling thro' ſeveral Provinces of Spain, in his way to Burgos, he ſaw ſo few of the Nobility wait upon him; not to mention, that upon his arrival in that city, he was obliged to ſtay a conſiderable time in it, before he could get the ſum he had reſerved to himſelf, paid him. He wanted part of it, to pay the ſalaries of ſuch of his ſervants as he intended to diſmiſs; and the payment was put off from day to day, which diſguſted him very much. Here follows a long paſſage from Strada (47), in which we ſhall find, that he does not affirm any thing with regard to the repentance in queſtion (48). Quum in Cantabriam appulſus, ac profectus inde Burgos, raros admodum ſibi obvios vidit Hiſpanos Proceres, (quos nempe ſolus, incomitatuſque tituli ſui, Carolus non allexerat) ſenſit tum primùm nuditatem ſuam. Acceſſitque & illud, quòd ex centum nummûm aureorum millibus (quem ſibi reditum ex immenſis opibus tantummodo ſepoſuerat) quum eorum parte opus tunc eſſet, qua famulos aliquot donaret, dimitteretque, expectandum ei pluſculum, nec ſine ſtomacho Burgis fuit, dum ea videlicet ſumma aliquando redderetur. Quam ille offenſionem ſicut diſſimulanter haud tulit, ita occaſionem nonnullis forte præbuit affirmandi, Regnis vix ejuratis, cœpiſſe Carolum initi conſilii pœnitere. Quamquam alii ipſo ejurationis die mutaſſe illum ſententiam, ex eo narrant, quod aliquot poſt annis, quum Cardinalis Granvellanus ex occaſione Philippo Regi revocaſſet in mentem, anniverſarium illum eſſe diem, quo Carolus pater imperio Regniſque ceſſerat; reſponderit illico Rex; Et hunc quoque diem anniverſarium eſſe, quo illum ceſſiſſe pœnituit. Quod incerto rumore prolatum facilè percrebuit apud homines, non ſibi in tam inaudito facinore conſtantiam vel unius diei perſuadentes. Niſi fortè Philippus non putavit in parente laudandum, quod imitandum ſibi non ſtatuerit. It is pretended that King Philip did much worſe, than his not being punctual in the payment of his penſion, viz. that he retrenched two thirds of it. Brantome writes as follows. " I have " read in a little work compoſed in Flanders, enti" tled (An Apology for the Prince of Orange) a very " odd particular, which I neither can nor will be" lieve probable, it being invented by ſome of the " King of Spain's enemies: and yet it may poſſibly
" be true tho' I affirm nothing, except what I myſelf
" have ſeen, and know to be undoubted fact, viz.
" that the King his ſon retrenched two thirds of the " hundred thouſand crowns, or other revenues which " (the Emperor) he had reſerved to himſelf; ſo that " during the greateſt part of the time, he had not
" monies ſufficient to ſubſiſt himſelf and his domeſtics;
" nor for giving of alms, or for extending his charity
" to ſuch of his old ſervants and faithful ſoldiers who " had ſerved him ſo well; a circumſtance that grieved
" him ſo much, that it haſtened his end (49)." We may aſſert in general, that ingratitude is ſeen chiefly in children, with regard to their parents.

(47) Strada, Decad. I. lib. 1. pag. 10, 11.

(48) After the words which follow this citation, he rejects this report of his repentance, as entirely groundleſs.

(49) Brantome, Capit. Etrang. tom. 1. pag. 39.

[P] He did not forget (as we are told) to ſcourge himſelf in his retirement.] Strada affirms this in the moſt poſitive terms. Quin etiam plexo è funiculis tormento . . . . exigere à ſeſe anteactæ vitæ pœnas perſeverè cœpit. Quos inde funiculos à Philippo Rege reverenter habitos, ab eoque morti proximo afferri ad ſe juſſos, &, ut erant cruore Caroli patris aſperſi, filio Philippo tertio traditos, inter Auſtriacæ monumenta pietatis aſſervari fama eſt (50). i. e. " And likewiſe making a " ſcourge of cords, he began to chaſtiſe himſelf very " ſeverely for the errors of his paſt life. Which ſcourge
" being afterwards had in great veneration by King
" Philip; and brought to him by his command,
" when he lay on his death-bed; and delivered tinc-
" tured with the blood of the Emperor Charles his fa" ther, to Philip III his ſon, is ſaid to be kept
" among the monuments of the Auſtrian piety."
Strada is not the only Author, who affirms, that the ſcourge employed by Charles V, and tinctured with his blood, is preſerved as a kind of relick. What he aſſerts, viz. that King Philip II cauſed his father's ſcourge to be brought him, and gave it to his ſon, is confirmed by other Hiſtorians. This is related in the Memoirs de Chiverni (β) (51), and Brantome's Memoirs, the laſt of which I ſhall only cite. He alſo cauſed to be taken, out of a little trunk, a whip that was bloody at the ends; and holding it up, he ſaid; this blood is from my blood, and yet not properly my blood, but that of my father, (may God abſolve him) who uſed to ſcourge himſelf with this whip. This I thought proper to declare (52). Scioppius boaſts his having had this whip, (which was ſaid to be ſtained with the blood of Charles V) in his hand in the monaſtery of the Eſcurial. Quod ego in monaſterio Laurentiano manibus tractavi & Car. V, ſanguine, ut aiebant, adhuc oblitum vidi. He ſneers at Strada for obſerving, that this whip is ſtill tinctured with that Emperor's blood: ſince this is a proof that his deſcendants never made uſe of it; and conſequently never laſhed their ſhoulders with it, which Scioppius would not be offended at. What he there ſays againſt Flagellation is curious enough. Vereor ne Auſtriaci Principes pietatem ſuam frigide laudatam putent, cum flagellum illud adhuc Caroli ſanguine notatum prædicetur; quod argumento eſt, id ipſos jam octoginta annos ferreatum de parietibus clavo pependiſſe, nec vel filii ejus vel nepotis ac pronepotum dorſo moleſtiæ multum creaſſe (53).

(50) Strada, Dec. 1. lib. 1. pag. 14.

(β) All theſe incidents are extracted from a little book in 8vo, printed in 1600, at Mentz, for Zechariah Durant, intitled, The laſt Will and Teſtament of Philip II. REM. CRIT.

(51) Pag. 294. Paris edit. 1636, in 4to.

(52) Brantome, Capit. Etrang. tom. 2. pag. 105.

(53) Scioppius, Infam. Fam. Stradæ, pag. 19.

[Q] Some authors give a very advantageous idea of his piety.] William Zenocarus aſſerts, that Charles V compoſed prayers for every expedition he undertook; that he wrote them with his own hand; that they were as long as the ſeven penitential Pſalms; and that after his Confeſſors had approved them, he uſed to repeat them every day in the midſt of his army. Sometimes, when he found himſelf inſpired by ſome devout compunctions and emotions, he would withdraw to a ſolitary place, upon pretence of ſome natural call, in order that he might continue the longer in the fervor of Prayer. He uſed to give theſe Prayers to Adrian Sylvanus, enjoining him, at the ſame time, to tear them to pieces, and throw them away, in caſe any evil accident ſhould happen to him. Several perſons having obſerved the long time this Prince uſed to ſpend in prayer, ſaid that he ſpoke oftner to God than to men (54).

(54) Guill. Zenocarus, lib. 5. de Vita Caroli V, apud Matthiam Caſtritium de Virtutibus Principum Germaniæ, lib. 1. cap. 34.

[R] According to other Writers, this Prince was more ambitious than religious.] Thoſe aſſert, that a deſire of aggrandizing himſelf in prejudice of Francis I, was the cauſe why he ſuffered Soliman to take Belgrade and Rhodes; and did not make uſe of thoſe favourable opportunities which God indulged him againſt the Turks, both in Hungary and in Africa. It was a greater pleaſure to him, to march and make a wild havock in France, than to make uſe of the advantages which death [S]; the former of which is more probable than the latter. The apology for the Prince which he gained over the Infidels. He is accuſed of favouring the Lutheran Principles, which he might eaſily have extirpated. He found his account in the diviſions which that Sect occaſioned; and he for ever made his advantage of them, ſometimes againſt the Pope, ſometimes againſt France, and at other times againſt the Empire itſelf. He rejected (as we are told) the offers the Proteſtants made him, of fighting under his Enſigns againſt the Turks, provided he would grant them liberty of conſcience; but he indulged it them in its utmoſt latitude, the inſtant they promiſed to break off their alliance with France (55). If this be true, it cannot be denied but that this is an example of what was obſerved above (56) concerning the Religion of Kings. As men, they are zealous for the Religion they profeſs; they offer up their prayers to God, and go very devoutly to Church; but the inſtant they conſider themſelves as inveſted with the regal character, they then bend all their thoughts to the vanquiſhing of their enemies; and attack with the greateſt vigor, not that Monarch who differs moſt from them in belief; but him for whom they have the greateſt averſion, either from fear or jealouſy, tho' he ſhould be the greateſt ſupport of their Religion. By the way, the following great falſity has been related in the Life of the Emperor Charles V (57). "This Monarch being obliged to fly "from Duke Maurice, he being accompanied only by "ſix horſemen, the Princes of Germany made him "the following offer; that provided he would only "give an order to have diſputations made on their "opinions, they then would furniſh him an hundred "thouſand men, to oppoſe the Grand Signior who "was going to invade Hungary; and that they would "maintain them, till ſuch time as he ſhould poſſeſs "himſelf of Conſtantinople. But that the Emperor "anſwered, he would not purchaſe Kingdoms at ſo "dear a rate, nor even Europe itſelf on ſuch a condi"tion; and that he deſired nothing but CHRIST "JESUS (58)." It is univerſally known, that after this flight of Charles V from Duke Maurice, the Proteſtants were indulged almoſt every thing they deſired. Read Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm (59). I refer to this Book, becauſe it is infinitely ſooner met with than Sleidan, Thuanus and Chytreus, cited by Maimbourg.

[S] That he profeſſed almoſt the Lutheran principles at his death.] The firſt Author I will cite is Brantome. "This Book (60) ſays much more, viz. that it was "once decreed by the Inquiſition of Spain, (the King "his ſon being preſent, and conſenting to it) to take "his body out of the tomb, and burn it as an here"tick, (how horrid was this cruelty!) for having for"merly ſaid ſome ſlighting things of Religion; and "therefore that he was unworthy of being buried in "conſecrated ground, but ought to be burnt as an "heretic; and alſo that he had adhered too much to "the opinions and perſuaſions of the Archbiſhop of "Toledo, who was look'd upon as an heretic; and "for that reaſon had been a long time impriſoned in "the Inquiſition, and deprived of his Biſhoprick, the "yearly revenue of which is an hundred or an hundred "and twenty thouſand crowns. This indeed was the "true way to make him be conſidered as an heretic, "and to have his eſtate (61)." The Author I ſhall now cite, gives a more curious account of theſe particulars. Among the reports which had been ſpread, ſays he (62), with regard to the Emperor's retreat from the world, the ſtrangeſt of all was, that his perpetual intercourſe with the Proteſtants of Germany, had inclined him a little to their ſentiments; and that the reaſon of his withdrawing to a ſolitude was, to have the liberty to end his days in ſuch exerciſes of piety as were agreeable to his ſecret diſpoſitions. He made choice of perſons who were all ſuſpected of hereſy, to be his ſpiritual guides, as of Dr. Cacalla his Chaplain in ordinary; of the Archbiſhop of Toledo, and eſpecially of Conſtantine Pontius, Biſhop of Droſſen, and his ghoſtly Father. It was known after his death, that his cell where he died, in the Monaſtery of St. Juſtus, was filled on all ſides with writings in his own hand, on Juſtification and Grace; and in ſuch a manner as agreed almoſt with the doctrine of the Proteſtants (63). But no circumſtance confirmed this opinion ſo much as his Will. There was ſcarce one pious donation, nor any ſums left for prayers; and it was drawn up in ſo different a manner from thoſe of zealous Catholicks, that the Inquiſitors of Spain thought they might be juſtly offended at it. However they did not dare to take any notice of it till the King was arrived; but this Prince having ſignalized his arrival in that country, by putting to death all who adhered to the new opinions; the Inquiſitors emboldned by the example he ſet them, attacked firſt the Archbiſhop of Toledo, afterwards the Emperor's Chaplain in ordinary, and at laſt Conſtantine Pontius. The King having impriſoned them all three, the common people conſidered his patience, as the maſterpiece of his zeal for the true Religion; but all the reſt of Europe ſaw with horror, the Confeſſor of the Emperor Charles V (in whoſe arms that Prince had breathed his laſt, and who had received, as it were, that great ſoul in his boſom) delivered up to the moſt cruel and moſt ignominious of all puniſhments, and that too by the hands of the King his ſon. And indeed, in the courſe of the proſecution, the Inquiſitors thinking proper to impeach the three great perſons in queſtion, for having had a hand in the Emperor's Will; they had the boldneſs to ſentence them together with the Will to the flames. The King hearing of this ſentence, was waked as by a clap of thunder. At firſt, the jealouſy he entertained at his father's glory, made him feel a kind of pleaſure, in ſeeing his memory expoſed to this affront; but afterwards, having reflected on the conſequences of this inſolent attempt, he prevented the effects of it by the gentleſt and moſt ſecret methods, in order to ſave the honour of the Inquiſition, and not to leſſen its authority. . . Nevertheleſs, Doctor Cacalla was burnt alive, with the effigy of Conſtantine Pontius, who died ſome days before in priſon. The King was obliged to wink at theſe executions, in order that the Inquiſitors might be prevailed upon to permit the Archbiſhop of Toledo to appeal to Rome, and that no farther mention might be made of the Emperor's will. In caſe theſe particulars are true, the Emperor muſt either have been an arch hypocrite, or the Hiſtorians who ſpeak of his devotions, (64), and the hatred he bore the hereticks (65), muſt have been arrant impoſtors. It is pretended that Charles V ranked among the number of his crimes, his not burning Luther, notwithſtanding he had granted him a ſafe conduct (66).

If the reader will read the remarks of the article CARRANZA, he will there meet with ſeveral particulars relating to this ſubject. What follows may ſerve as a ſupplement, and will point out ſome errors in the Hiſtory of Don Carlos. I. The Spaniſh Hiſtorians do not allow, that Conſtantine Pontius (67) was Charles Vth's Director or Confeſſor; and only ſay, that he had been his Preacher or Chaplain in ordinary. II. He was not Biſhop of Droſſen. I don't find any Biſhoprick in Spain, or in any other country, that is ſo called. Thuanus indeed ſpeaks of an Epiſcopus Droſſenſis (68) (which doubtleſs led the Author of Don Carlos into an error;) but he does not ſay that Conſtantine Pontius was Biſhop there; he being a Preacher of Seville, and his name, Giles, who held the ſame opinions, and met with the ſame fortune as Conſtantine Pontius; for both died before the Auto da fe was held, and were both burnt in effigy (69). This Giles was nominated Biſhop of Tortoſa by the Emperor (70). III. It is falſe to aſſert, that the Inquiſitors waited till Philip was arrived in Spain, before they proſecuted Dr. Cacalla and Conſtantine Pontius; that King did not arrive in that Kingdom till the beginning of September 1559; and theſe two men were impriſoned by the Inquiſitors before Charles Vth's death, which, as every one knows, happened the 21ſt of September 1558. The Count de la Roca relates what this Emperor ſaid with regard to Cacalla's ſentence (71), and Conſtantine's impriſonment (72). Another Hiſtorian (73) relates, that Cacalla, in whoſe houſe the Proteſtant Aſſemblies in Valladolid were held, was executed whilſt Philip was ſtill in the Netherlands, the 21ſt of May 1559. IV. Since Conſtantine Pontius was impriſoned in the Inquiſition in the life-time of Charles V; he conſequently did not aſſiſt that Monarch when on his death-bed, ſo far was he from receiving that great ſoul into his boſom. Thuanus led the Author of Don Carlos's Hiſtory into an error. Conſtantius, qui a ſacris confeſſionibus diu Cæſari, eique in ſolitudine ſua poſt impe-

(55) See la Mothe le Vayer, tom. 2. pag. 113, 114, 115. edit. in 12mo 1681. See alſo Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Lutheraniſme, tom. 1. pag. 247, 248. and tom. 2. pag. 159.

(56) In the remark [H] of the Article AGESILAUS II; and in the Remark [C] of the Article ARISTIDES.

(57) Written by John Anthony de Vera & Figuerva, Count de la Roca.

(58) Count de la Roca's Hiſtory of Charles V, pag. 335. Bruſſells edit. 1663, in 12mo.

(59) Tom. 2. pag. 158. ad ann. 1552.

(60) That is, The Apology for the Prince of Orange. I do not find this in my edition, which is, of 1581; nor what is cited above, in the note [O], citation (49). See the remark [T].

(61) Brantome, Capit. Etrang. tom. 1. pag 39.

(62) Abbot St. Real in his Hiſtory of Don Carlos. He cites Thuanus, Aubigne, &c.

(63) Apply here a circumſtance, whether true or falſe I ſhall not determine, related by Melanchthon, in cap. 25. Matthieu, pag. m. 558. Carolus quintus juſſit amoveri monachos à conjuge moritura, & juſſit præceptorem filii ſui proponere conſolationes de Chriſto. i. e. "Charles V "gave orders to "have the "Monks put away from his "conſort, when "ſhe was dying, "and commanded his ſon's "Preceptor, to "adminiſter "ſpiritual comfolation to "her."

(64) See Strada, Decad. 1. lib. 1. pag. 14, 15.

(65) See Count de la Roca, pag. 334.

(66) See La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 2. pag. 199. edit. in 12mo.

(67) His true name was not Pontius, as I obſerved in citation (20) of the Article CARRANZA. See alſo the beginning of the Article PONTIUS.

(68) Thuan. lib. 23. pag. 470. ad ann. 1559.

(69) Idem, ibid.

(70) He therefore ſhould have called him Epiſcopus Tortoſenſis, or Dortoſenſis, or rather Dertuſenſis.

(71) Hiſt. de Charles Quint, pag. 334.

(72) Idem, pag. 335.

(73) Herrera, Hiſtoria General. lib. 6. cap. 16. pag. m. 400.

CRITIQUE of Abbot St. Real.

Prince of Orange is very improperly cited on this occaſion [T]. Charles V was not exempt from human frailty with regard to the fair-ſex, and was much more ſober than chaſte.

rii ac regnorum abdicationem, ac poſtremo animam agenti ſemper præſto fuerat, ad idem mox tribunal raptus &c. i. e. "Conſtantine, who was a long time Confeſſor "to the Emperor, and was in that quality in this "Monarch's ſolitude, after his abdication; and laſtly "in his expiring moments, was ſeized ſoon after by "that Tribunal (74)." Which may ſerve as a warning to all Authors, not to truſt blindly to any one. If a Writer miſtakes in following Thuanus, into what errors may he not be led, when he follows paltry Hiſtorians. V. Every injurious reflection caſt on Philip, upon pretence of his granting leave for the impriſoning of Cacalla and Conſtantine, after his return to Spain, is entirely groundleſs; for both of them were impriſoned before the Emperor's death. VI. Some Hiſtorians aſſert (75), that Cacalla repented; and that he endeavoured, but all in vain, to convert one of his accomplices, who nevertheleſs was ſo obſtinate, that he choſe rather to be burnt alive. This is aſſerting plainly enough, that Cacalla was not burnt till after his death. VII. However this be, he was not burnt alive, with an effigy repreſenting Conſtantine Pontius; for Cacalla was executed at the Auto da fé, held the 21ſt of March 1559 at Valladolid; and Conſtantine Pontius was executed in an another Auto da fé held at Seville (76). VIII. The King did not oblige the Inquiſition, to permit the Archbiſhop of Toledo to appeal to Rome; for I, this Archbiſhop's cauſe was not removed by appeal to the Court of Rome, but was ordered thither; and the Pope, who would have had the Spaniſh Inquiſitors ſend the priſoners immediately to him, and found himſelf obliged to allow this Tribunal to carry on its proſecution; reſerved to himſelf the pronouncing of the definitive ſentence (77). II. King Philip was ſo far from deſiring Carranza to appeal to Rome, that he a long time reſiſted the intreaties made by the Pope, to have the Archbiſhop tried by him. The Fathers of the Council of Trent complained ſeveral times to the Legates, of the Spaniſh Inquiſitors treatment of Carranza; the Legates wrote to the Pope on that ſubject; the Pope charged his Nuncios to exert themſelves with vigor; and we find by Pallavicini (78), that thoſe who ſhould imagine, his Holineſs did not act with as much vigor as he ought to have done in this affair, muſt not conſider the neceſſity he was under, of yielding from prudential motives, to the oppoſitions made by Philip.

(74) Thuan. lib. 23. pag. 470. ad ann. 1559.

(75) Herrera, Hiſtor. General. ubi ſupra.

(76) Herrera, ibid.

(77) Palavicin. Hiſt. Conc. Trident. lib. 21. cap. 7. num. 7.

(78) Ibid.

We do not meet with any of theſe remarks in the Sentiments d'un homme d'Eſprit ſur la Nouvelle intitulée Don Carlos (79). i. e. "The thoughts of a man of "wit, on the novel entitled Don Carlos;" and nevertheleſs this man of wit endeavours to the utmoſt of his power, to cenſure this Novel on all occaſions. This circumſtance ſurprizes me; for ought a man to ſet up publicly for the Cenſor of a Book, without enquiring whether it claſhes with Hiſtory?

(79) The edition cited by me, is of Amſterdam 1674.

[T] The Apology for the Prince of Orange is improperly cited on this occaſion.] Brantome boaſts that he had there read, that King Philip II conſented to have the corps of Charles V taken out of the ground and burnt as an heretic. But he is miſtaken; and I perhaps have not ill accounted for his error. My conjecture is, that he had read this Apology bound up with little pieces, which had been written againſt Philip II, in favour of Prince William. He fancied, either that all theſe pieces were parts of the Apology, or elſe did not call to mind, in which of thoſe pieces it was that he had met with the particulars related by him; and as the Apology had made the greateſt impreſſion on him, he imagined that he had read this ſtrange incident in the Apology in queſtion. The truth is, this reproach is not met with there (80); but is found in an anonymous piece publiſhed anno 1582, under the following title: Diſcours ſur la Bleſſure de Monſigneur le Prince d'Orange. i. e. "A Diſcourſe on the wound of "his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Orange:" and we there find the following words: Can there have been a more execrable creature among men, than a ſon, ſo ungrateful and ſo unnatural towards a father of ſo illuſtrious a character as the Emperor Charles V; an Emperor ſo highly renowned and of ſuch prodigious authority, who, in his life-time, had laviſhed ſuch vaſt treaſures to his wretch of a ſon; reſerving to himſelf only the yearly income of two hundred thouſand ducats, in Spain; and yet was not paid any part of it, after the reſignation of his Kingdoms? A ſon, I ſay, who ſuffer'd ſuch a father to ſpend the remainder of his days among Friars; and to ſubſiſt himſelf merely by the ſale of the rings he had left, and of his moveables, which he was forced to pawn and ſell upon that account? This ungrateful ſon had ſuffered the Inquiſitors to debate, whether they ſhould cauſe his father's bones to be taken up and burnt, as of an heretic; for having confeſſed, in his expiring moments, by the advice of the Archbiſhop of Toledo, that he relied wholly on the merits of CHRIST JESUS, and that theſe were his only hope. An unnatural ſon, who ſeized upon all the poſſeſſions of this excellent Archbiſhop, for having attended on the Emperor till he died, and for having inſtructed him in the way of ſalvation; and who detained him in priſon, till ſuch time as he was forced to permit him to go to Rome, where, after this good Archbiſhop had gained his cauſe, he was poiſoned by the Miniſters of that King, to prevent his being reſtored to his archiepiſcopal See of Toledo, the annual revenue of which amounts to two hundred thouſand ducats. Had this been related in the Apology for the Prince of Orange, a Writer would have ſome reaſon to introduce it in a Hiſtory; for the name of ſo great a Prince, and the authorities by which he ſupported his Manifeſto, are teſtimonies ſufficient; but as for the numberleſs multitude of Pamphlets which were diſperſed at that time, without the name either of the Author or Printer, they as little deſerve being quoted, as thoſe which overſpread Europe within theſe thirty or 40 years, and were printed for Pierre Marteau. It is not that theſe ſort of pieces (whether they firſt began to be in vogue in the time of the Duke of Alba, during the remainder of the ſixteenth Century; or whether they began firſt to be ſpread in our time) are abſolutely falſe in every article; but after all, when a perſon does not know where they come from, it will be prudent in him not to regard them; much leſs ought a grave Author to quote them, and rely on their authority. Theſe Books are generally the refuſe of Duck-Lane. As thoſe who write them are ſure of never being called to account, they advance with the utmoſt boldneſs whatever things they hear. We here ſee an evident falſity advanced with regard to the Archbiſhop of Toledo. He did not gain his cauſe, he was obliged to abjure, he was ſuſpended during five years (81), and he was ſeventy three years of age. Could any one imagine that he would live five years after being ſo long impriſoned? Be this as it will, they would not have made away with him, till the five years were near expiring.

(80) We may obſerve that the ſilence of this Prince is a mark that he did not think there was any grounds for ſuch a report; he not ſparing Philip II in any manner, but reproaches him with the commiſſion of very horrid crimes; and therefore would have objected this to him with as much freedom as he did the reſt, had he thought it true.

(81) See Varillas's Preface to vol. 5. of l'Hiſtoire de l'Hereſie.

(α) It may even be affirmed, that all the aſſertions advanced in the Apology for the Prince of Orange are falſe. Grotius aſſures us, that the Writer who drew it up, as well as he who drew up the Decree which proſcribed this Prince, intermixed truth with falſhood in their digreſſions (82). Adverſus novi moris edictum, Arauſionenſis apud Ordines Belgicos & Chriſtianos principes libello ſe defendit, adjuvante Petro Villerio (83), homine Gallo, qui ſubactum rebus forenſibus ingenium, ad religionem docendam, & hinc ad intima Arauſionenſis conſilia tranſtulerat. Extat ſcriptum utrumque pari acerbitate, qua poſt crimina ad cauſam pertinentia, hinc animum ingratum & perduellem, inde ſævam ac perfidam dominationem, VERIS FALSISQUE NARRATIONIBUS PERMIXTIS, porro ad alia, rixantium more, prolabebantur. i. e. "In oppoſition to this new ſort of Edict, "the Prince of Orange defended himſelf to the "States of Holland and the Chriſtian Princes, in a "little Book, partly written by Petrus Villerius a na-"tive of France, who having laid aſide the Law, had "applied himſelf to the teaching of Religion; and "thence had gained the intimate confidence of the "Prince of Orange. There are extant the two pieces "written on each ſide, both equally filled with ran-"cour, in which, after expoſing the ſeveral accuſa-"tions that are pertinent to the ſubject, as ingratitude "and a rebellious ſpirit on one ſide, and on the other "a cruel and perfidious thirſt of power, THE WHOLE "INTERMIXED

(82) Grot. Annal. Belgic. lib. 3. ſub fin. pag. m. 99, 100.

(83) We ſhall obſerve in the remark [E] of the Article LANGUET, that it was thought that this Apology for the Prince of Orange, was wrote by Languet.

chaſte [U]. He died the 21ſt of September 1558, in the monaſtery of the Hieronymites, which he had made choice of for his retirement. His corps was depoſited here till the arrival of Philip II into Spain; and he was interred with very great magnificence ſome time after. The funeral honours paid him at Bruſſels in St. Gudula's church, were infinitely pompous. Not a ſingle exploit of this Emperor was omitted in the inſcriptions with which the Church was embelliſhed (c); and I believe no Prince in the world ever had ſo many titles beſtowed on him, as were laviſhed on the Emperor Charles at that time. If the ſubject was great, the imagination and rhetoric of the Spaniards was equal to it; and it is certain that the Hiſtorians of that Nation would have done greater honour to his memory, had they been leſs extravagant in their encomiums. A ſingle page in Thuanus (d) is preferable to a volume of Sandoval; becauſe Thuanus, a Frenchman of honour, is not ſuſpected of flattery. Writers did not fail to obſerve, that ſeveral preſages foretold this Emperor's death (e). It is even ſaid, that his corps did not rot [X]. His Life was publiſhed in Italian, anno 1559, by one Alfonſo Ulloa a Spaniard; and ſince

(c) See Brantome, Memoires de Capit. Etranges, tom. 1. pag. 44.

(d) It is 430 of Book 21. of the Frankfort edit. 1625.

(e) See on this ſubject, the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 265; and alſo pag. 279 and 294.

" INTERMIXED WITH TRUTH AND FALSHOOD, they " then, (according to the cuſtom of thoſe who are " quarrelling) proceed to other matters."

[U] He was much more ſober than chaſte.] " It " is related . . . that he always drunk three times at " dinner and ſupper; and was very ſober in his eating " and drinking. Whenever he went to bed to a fair La- " dy, (for he was ſo fond of the ſex, that it did the gout " with which he was afflicted no ſervice) he never left " her till after he had enjoyed her three times (84)." We here have a great inequality in the ſame number; three draughts of wine at table, and the ſame number of love, in the amorous dalliance, cannot be put in parallel; the former is an account of moderation, the laſt of exceſs. However by this means he would ſecure himſelf from the following reproach, Inachia langues minus ac me.

Inachiam ter nocte potes: mihi ſemper ad unum
Mollis opus (85).

That is,

" Inachia's dearer far to you than I.
" Inachia thrice you every night embrace;
" Once is too much for me ———

(84) Brantome, Capit. Etrang. tom. 1. pag. 18, 19.

(85) Horat. lib. Epod. Od. 12. ver. 14.

To give my readers ſome little exerciſe, by examining whether Brantome is more worthy of credit than the reſt, I ſhall obſerve, that William Zenocarus not only applauds the frugality of Charles V, but likewiſe his chaſtity. This Emperor, ſaid he (86), uſed often to ſhut his windows himſelf, when he ſaw any beautiful women coming forward, or knew that ſuch were to come. The Author, who informs us of this (87), ſays, that the Emperor acted in this manner whilſt the Empreſs lived. Others have obſerved, that he did not violate the nuptial bed (88), and did his utmoſt endeavours to conceal his intrigues (89); Si non caſtè, ſaltem cautè.

(86) Zenocarus, in vita Caroli V. lib. 3. apud Caſtritium, de virtutibus Princip. Germaniæ, pag. 224.

(87) Idem, lib. 5. apud eundem.

(88) Ea (conjuge) vivente ſervaſſe Carolum perquam ſanctè conjugalem fidem fama eſt. Strada Dec. 1. lib. 10. pag. m. 612.

(89) Thuan. lib. 21. pag. 431.

It is generally ſaid, that he had but two illegitimate children, Margaret Ducheſs of Parma, and Don John of Auſtria; but Imhof tells us, that Bernard Juſtiniani, in his Hiſtory of Spain, declares he had two more, viz. Priam Conrad of Auſtria, and another John of Auſtria, who died in 1530, at ſeven years of age (90). I fancy this Priam Conrad is the ſame with a certain Priamus Conrad whom I mentioned above (91), who was look'd upon as half-brother (by the mother's ſide) to Don John of Auſtria. I am to obſerve, that it was reported Charles V had the foul diſeaſe. Imperator, ut nonnulli confirmant, ex morbo Gallico laborat. Accedit ad morbum hujus belli (Turcici) impendentis metus. Hanc ego in malis voluptatem capio, quod eum qui in nos tam crudelis fuit, non ſolum corpore ægrotare, verum etiam animo angi videre mihi videor (92). i. e. " It is affirmed by ſome, that the Empe- " ror has the foul diſeaſe, and is at the ſame time a- " fraid of the Grand Signior's arms. It is a pleaſure " to me in the midſt of theſe evils, that the Monarch, " who exerciſed ſo much cruelty towards us, is not on- " ly ſick in body, but alſo tortured in mind." We find theſe words in a Letter of Bunel, dated from Venice in June 1532; and here follows Graverol's note on this paſſage. *An illud (ex morbo Gallico) κατὰ πόδα, an in ſenſu myſtico intelligendum ſit, diſquirunt multi: ſane quæ ſequuntur, Imperatorem ex morbo venereo laboraſſe confirmant: utatur quiſque hac in re judicio ſuo. Hoc unum ſcio, non omnes qui gravioris ſunt ſupercilii, rigidæ virtutis eſſe ſequaces: amavit Franciſcus I, amavit & Carolus V, & ne quid tam ſtrenuo rivali in ludo amatorio exprobaret, morbo vitium Gallico laboravit. Felix! & nimium felix, ſi graviori non laboraſſet, ſed norunt Hiſpani quid ſit* el remedio de Carlos quinto.

(90) Jacobus Wilhelmus Imhofius, Notitia Germaniæ Procerum, pag. 2. edit. Tubing. 1693.

(91) In the remark [C] of the article AUSTRIA (John of).

(92) Bunellus, Epiſt. 28. pag. 111, 112. edit. Toloſ. 1687.

[X] It is pretended that his corpſe did not rot.] Some Spaniſh Authors pretend that it was preſerved entire (93); and as it had not been embalmed, they aſcribe its continuing in this manner, free from putrefaction, to the ſanctity of his manners, and the purity and candor, which, according to them, ſhone forth in the conduct of this Prince. *Cum nullis balſamis aut medicamentis pollinctum fuerit regale cadaver, quæ à corruptione præſervare potuiſſent, ipſo Imperatore ſic ante obitum jubente; quid aliud dicere poſſumus, niſi eximium illius animi candorem & virtutis ſplendorem, cujus * ingens ſemper dedit ſpecimen, poſteris Deum oſtendere voluiſſe? cujus adhuc multo antea certiſſima indicia præſtolatus fuerat: nam cum anno 14 ab illius obitu, in cœnobio S. Juſti corpus exhumaretur, non ſolum integrum & incorruptum inventum eſt, ſed thymi quoque ramuſculi, quibus monachorum more reſperſum fuerat, virides & optimum odorem adhuc ſpirantes apparuerunt* (94). . . . Anno 1556, cùm potentiſſimi Regis noſtræ Philippi juſſu anteceſſorum ſuorum regia cadavera ad inſigne illud Pantheonis monumentum traducerentur, invictiſſimi Imperatoris Caroli V cadaver adhuc incorruptum repertum eſt, labe nullâ, nullâ temporis edacitate, aut putredinis carie infectum; ſpectaculum ſanè mirificum, & planè admirandum poſt annos 96 incorruptum permanſiſſe, ut tradit P. F. Franciſcus de los Sanctos in Deſcriptione Fabricæ D. Laurentii & Pantheonis (95). i. e. " Since the " royal corpſe was not embalmed, to preſerve it from " putrefaction, according to the Emperor's deſire be- " fore his death; what can we conclude, but that " God was deſirous of ſhewing to poſterity the native " candor of his mind, and that bright aſſemblage of " virtues, which were always ſo greatly conſpicuous " in him; and of this we have a ſignal example; for " when fourteen years after his death, his corpſe was " buried in the monaſtery of St. Juſtus, it was found " not only entire and without the leaſt putrefaction; " but even the ſprigs of thyme, which were ſtrewed " over it, according to the practice of the Monks, ap- " peared green, and diffuſed a moſt grateful odour . . , " Anno 1656, by the command of our moſt potent King " Philip, the bodies of his royal predeceſſors were remov- " ed to that famous ſepulchral edifice, of Pantheon, the " corpſe of our invincible Emperor Charles V was found " unputrified, ſound and uninjured by time; a ſurprizing " ſpectacle, and worthy of admiration, that a corpſe " ſhould not rot in any manner during the courſe of 96 years " as Franciſcus de los Sanctos relates, in his Deſcription " of the Fabricks of St. Laurence and Pantheon." * [The latter is a chapel in the Eſcurial in Spain, and is ſo called, becauſe it is built in a circular form like the Pantheon at Rome. It is thirty five foot in diameter, and thirty eight in height. The inſide of it is all of black marble, the Covers excepted, and a few ornaments made of jaſper ſtone and red marble. The black marble is enriched with various ornaments of architecture, which have a very beautiful aſpect. There are eight arches or vaults in this chapel. In one of theſe is the gate, and the altar in that oppoſite to it; and in the other ſix are the urns for the bodies of the Kings and Queens. There is place but for twenty ſix bodies, and there are * yet but eight depoſited in them.] Addit. by the Tranſl.

(93) See the citation (95).

* It is ingentem in the edition I tranſlate from, but it ſhould be ingens.

(94) Gaſpar. à Reies, in Elyſio jucundar. Quæſt. Campo. Quæſt. 34. num. 26. pag. m. 413.

(95) Idem, ibid.

* I write this in 1736.

ſince that time, this noble theme has exerciſed a great many pens [Y]. I forgot to obſerve, that it is ſaid Charles V aſpired to the Papal Throne, purely that he might experience every ſpecies of ſuperiority [Z]. Had he himſelf, when in that quality, met with the treatment he had exerciſed towards Clement VII, he would have been extremely ſorry that his prayers had been heard. It is pretended, that all the wild havock of Alaric and Totila, and in general all the cruelties exerciſed by the moſt barbarous Nations in Rome, fall greatly ſhort of the dreadful hoſtilities which this army of Charles V exerciſed in that city. There was a remarkable circumſtance on that occaſion. This Prince went into mourning for this victory; he forbid the ringing of the bells (f); and commanded proceſſions to be made, and prayers to be offered up in all Churches for the deliverance of the Pope his priſoner (g); and yet did not inflict the leaſt puniſhment on thoſe who treated the Pope and the City of Rome in ſo inhuman a manner (h). Theſe artifices of the moſt profound policy have been as much taken notice of, as thoſe he employed in the rebellion of Naples [AA]. Thoſe who declare this Emperor to be ſuperior to the greateſt Monarchs that have lived ſince the Romans (i), flatter him; for what did he complete? Did not the war which he raiſed in the Empire for the ſake of the Roman Catholick Religion, end to the advantage of the Proteſtants? and ſo far from making any conqueſt over France, he was not able to recover thoſe places which the French King had conquered. If his Succeſſor won back the greateſt part of them, it was by vertue of a treaty of peace in which the French ſuffered themſelves to be ſhamefully overreached and betrayed.

(f) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 2. pag. 178.

(g) Maimb. Hiſt. du Luther. tom. 1. pag. 163.

(h) Le Mothe le Vayer, tom. 2. pag. 178.

(i) Bautru did this. See St. Evremont, Oeuvres Melées, tom. 1. on the word Vaſt, pag. 103. Dutch edit. tom. 4. pag. 21. Dutch edit. of 1726.

The Hiſtorians of the Emperor Charles V have imitated the Poets too much; and frequently crouded together a great number of prodigies, which, as they pretend, preceded his victories. This they have done eſpecially with reſpect to the battle of Mulberg, won by that Monarch the 24th of April 1547. They relate, that the Sun ſtood ſtill [BB]; and [Y] His Life . . . was publiſhed anno 1559, by . . Alfonſo Ulloa . . . and ſince that time, this noble theme has exerciſed a great many pens.] Ludovico Dolce wrote the Hiſtory of that Emperor. It was alſo compoſed by William Zenocarus of Schawenburgh (96). La Vida del Emperador Carlos V, por Don Antonio Figueroa, was printed at Bruſſels in 4to, anno 1656. La Vida y Hechos del Emperador Charles V, por Prudencio de Sandoval was publiſhed at Pampelona, anno 1614, in two volumes, folio (97). I omit moſt of the reſt; for were I to enumerate all thoſe who have wrote on ſome parts of this Hiſtory, I ſhould never have done (98). I ſhall only mention William Godelevæus, who has drawn up the Hiſtory of the Abdication. But I muſt not paſs over James Maſenius, a German Jeſuit, who publiſhed at Colen, anno 1672, in 4to, Anima Hiſtoriæ hujus temporis in junctо Caroli V & Ferdinandi I fratrum imperio repræſentata. This work was worthy of being mentioned by the Jeſuit who continued Alegambe.

(96) In Latin, printed at Antwerp in 1596, folio.

(97) They had been printed before, one after the other, at Valladolid; the firſt in 1604, and the ſecond in 1606.

(98) Michael Hertzius, in Biblioth. Germanica, printed at Erfort in 1679, num. 811, & ſeq.

[Z] It is ſaid that Charles V aſpired to the Papal Throne.] Brantome, whom I have already cited very often, is the only Author who mentions this circumſtance. Could he have accompliſhed, ſays he (99), the deſign he had of raiſing himſelf to the Papal Throne, he would have enlightened the world ſtill better, as he was all divine; but he could not obtain this by the ſuffrages of the Cardinals, as Duke Amadeus of Savoy did, who was elected, after which he withdrew to his Monaſtery at Ripaille, as the Emperor did to his. Nevertheleſs I have heard ſay, that had he then been as ſtrong in body as in mind, he would have marched to Rome with a powerful army, and have got himſelf elected Pope either by affection or by force of arms. But he attempted this deſign too late, he not being ſo vigorous as formerly; and indeed God would not permit it, for he would have made the Papal Throne hereditary (an unheard of attempt) in the Houſe of Auſtria. What a deſign was this! and how ambitious muſt this man have been! Not being able therefore to get himſelf elected Pope, he turned Friar, which was ſtooping very low. Could he, (like the Duke abovementioned) have had ſome experience of the Papal power, 'twould have been ſo much the better for him; and he then might have ſaid in his expiring moments, that he had paſſed through all the gradations of good fortune, and enjoyed the ſeveral orders of human grandeur. Chancellor de Chiverni obſerves (100), that it was thought Philip II would reſign his crown, and procure himſelf a Cardinal's hat, in order that he might be elected Pope the firſt opportunity that offered.

(99) Capit. Etrangers, tom. 1. pag. 36.

(100) Memoires, pag. 293.

[AA] He employed artifices . . . in the rebellion of Naples.] He rewarded the chiefs of the rebels, but gave no recompence to thoſe who had ſerved him faithfully. Omnes qui Cæſarem adjuvarunt, qui bona, qui vitam pro eo depoſuerunt, irrenumerati remanſerunt, qui adverſæ factionis hoſtes illius nati ſunt, quia arma contra illum tulerunt, omnes fuerunt optime & ſecundum vota ſua expediti. i. e. "All thoſe who had aſſiſted the "Emperor, who had ſpent their eſtates and laid down "their lives to ſerve him, went unrewarded; whilſt all "who were of an oppoſite faction to, and bore arms a-"gainſt him, were gratified to the utmoſt of their wiſhes." This we find in Agrippa's Letters (101). Such a conduct ſeems imprudent at firſt ſight, as it ſerves only to diſguſt good ſubjects; and to embolden the factious. Nevertheleſs, experience muſt have thought the contrary, ſince the greateſt Princes have, and ſtill do, make uſe of this method. They neglect thoſe they think themſelves ſecure of, and endeavour chiefly to win over thoſe they ſuſpect. Complaints, like thoſe of the prodigal ſon, are often heard among the faithful part of ſubjects, after the commotions are appeaſed. In the time of Henry IV, the Partizans of the League were favoured with many more poſts and employments (a), than his old ſervants (102). This is a political maxim that remedies the preſent evil, which is the very thing the Monarch wants. He runs a hazard with regard to future times, but hopes that God will then order every thing in his favour; and, at the worſt, this is not a certain evil.

(101) In the 10th Letter of Book 7. pag. 1010. It was written to Agrippa by a Friend, and is dated from Ratiſbon the 17th of July 1532.

(102) See the Apology for this Prince, aſcribed to the Ducheſs de Rohan. It is printed with the Journal of Henry III, edition of 1693. I ſpeak of this in the Article PARTHENAI (Catherine of) Remark [E]. See alſo the Remark [P] of the Article HENRY IV.

a. §. Let us add what John Nerizan * has obſerved on the ſame ſubject: Quandoque, ſays this facetious Writer, Princeps ut inimicum vincat obſequio . . . eum plus extollit ſervitore ſuo, adeò quod quandoque boni ſervitores indignati dicant, ſi quiſpiam à Principe noſtro velit quicquam obtinere, oportet quod in eum aliquam committat proditionem. i. e. "Sometimes too a Prince "overcomes his enemy by ſoothing methods . . extols "him more than he does his own ſervant; ſo that good "ſervants may ſometimes ſay out of indignation, if "any perſon wants to obtain any thing from our So-"vereign, he muſt betray him." La Ruffia, in his Diſcourſe ſeems to have had an eye to theſe words.

* L. IV. n. 152. of the Forêt Nuptiale.

† L. I. chap. 5. of the Confeſſ. de Sancy.

[BB] His Hiſtorians . . . . . croud together a great number of prodigies. . . . They relate that the Sun ſtood ſtill.] I have not the Spaniſh original of d'Avila's relation, but here follows the Latin Tranſlation of it (103). The Author ſpeaks as tho' he had been an eye-witneſs to it. Frederico etiam futura clades evidenti prodigio denunciata eſt. Sol enim velut ſanguinolentus apparuit, &, quod mirabilius eſt, perinde ac ſi curſum tardaſſet, ſpatiumque diei addidiſſet, quum intentius intueremur, altior, quàm pro horarum ratione ferri viſus eſt. Conſtans omnium hac de re optime eſt, nec ego certè refellere auſim (104). i. e. "The impending de-"feat of Frederic was foretold by a manifeſt prodigy: "for the Sun appeared as tho' it had been bloody; "and, what is more wonderful, as tho' it had retard-"ed and that God to favour his Catholic Majesty, wrought the same miracle as he had done for Joshua. A prophecy was spread abroad, which assured this Emperor, that he would defeat the French and the Turks; conquer Palestine, &c. [CC]. We shall take some notice

(103) By Gulielmus Malinæus.

(104) Ludovic. ab Avila & Zuniga, Comment. de Bello Germanic. lib. 2. folio 126. edit. Antwerp. 1550.

" ed its course and lengthened the day, it seemed, " when we surveyed it nearer, to be higher than was " natural. This event is believed by every one, nor " dare I disprove it." Florimond de Remond relates the same passage (105) according to the French Translation published of this Spanish piece. He has also cited the very words (in Italian) of Baptista Gribaldi, who had been present in the engagement; and the Spanish words of Gonçalo de Illescas, extracted from the second part of his Pontifical History, and the Latin verses of an anonymous Writer; and endeavours to prove this incident true. He has taken advantage, among other things, of this, viz. that tho' Sleidan appears very much exasperated against Lewis d'Avila, he yet does not refute him with regard to this stopping of the Sun. But Father Maimbourg has justly laughed at this Spanish Dream, as well as some others which relate to the same battle, and has combated them by some arguments (106). He did not forget to relate, " that the Duke of Alva, a man of great solidity, " and who was far from being amused with trifles, " shewed plainly that he did not give any credit to " any thing that was related concerning this pretend- " ed miracle; when being come into France, there to " espouse (in the name of King Philip) Princess Eli- " zabeth, daughter to Henry II, he replied pleasantly " to that Prince who put some questions to him about " it; that he was so much employed that day, about " what was doing upon earth, that he did not take no- " tice of what was doing in heaven." Florimond de Remond relates this answer of the Duke of Alva, and informs his readers, that he had been told it " by a " Biscayan Gentleman, Governor of Acqs, who " spake and lived after the ancient fashion in that " time, very privately, and in great favour, with the " King (107)." This we should take particular notice of; this Historian had not read this particular in any book, but had heard it from a Gentleman who was then at the Court of Henry II. He perhaps is the first Author who has published it, and from whom all the rest took it; and perhaps had he not spoke of it, we should not have found it in the History of the Duke of Alva (108), which was published not long since in French, as the translation of a Latin book printed at Salamanca in 1669, under the title of Vita Ferdinandi Toletani Ducis Albani. The translator of this work assures us, that he has done it with all the accuracy possible; that he has not introduced any thoughts or expressions of his own into it, and has not suppressed any part of the body of the History, nor of the Incidents.

[CC] A prophecy was spread abroad, which assured this Emperor, that he would defeat the French, the Turks; conquer Palestine &c.] Antonius Pontius, who had carried arms in the expedition of Tunis under Charles V, writ an account of it, which was not published till a year since (109). He says in his Proem, that to raise the courage of the soldiers, he will relate two things; the first is an old Prophecy; the second is a discourse of an apparition, which revealed it self at the time of Odet de Foix's expedition into the Kingdom of Naples. But we will leave what relates to the apparition, and only relate what concerns the Prophecy. Duo hæc ante prælibentur, non quod Historiæ inserviunt, sed ut animi nostrorum militum alacres nunc his auditis ad arma fiant alacriores. Quorum illud unum imprimis subvenit, & ut vulgatissimum ita quoque antiquissimum vatis illius, quæ Prophetia dicitur, verbum divinum, quod quidem tale circumfertur; Carolum Philippi filium ex natione Lilii, ut ejus verba præstringam, post Gallos Hispanosque domitos Romam quoque & Florentiam congregato magno exercitu Regem Græcorum vocari, indeque post victos Turcas, Chaldæos, Palestinosque, sanctam Hierusalem recuperaturum, atque inibi a Dei nuncio coronatum in summi principis sinu vitam expiraturum, facietque prius edictum, ut qui sanctæ crucis signum non adoraverit morte puniatur (110). i. e. " I shall first present the Reader with " the two following incidents, not as tho' they were " absolutely necessary to the History, but in order " that they may enflame still more the courage of our " valiant soldiers. The first that occurs, is that well- " known and very ancient Prophecy, which is as fol- " lows; viz. that the son of Charles Philip, of the nati- " on of the Lilly (to use the Prophet's words) after hav- " ing overcome the French and Spaniards as also " Rome and Florence, assembling a mighty army, " would be called King of the Greeks; and that af- " ter subduing the Turks, and the inhabitants of " Chaldea and Palestine, he would recover the Holy " Jerusalem, and being there crowned by the messen- " ger of God, would expire in the bosom of the " supreme Prince; but he should first publish an edict " or decree, that whoever did not adore the sign of " the Holy Cross, should be put to death." Compare this with a Prophecy, which David Pareus inserted in his Commentary on the Revelations anno 1598, and you will there see a specimen of the frauds which are committed on those occasions. Comiers relates (111), that being in Orange in 1660, he borrowed this book of Pareus, printed at Heidelberg; and that in page 930, he there read a Prophecy which the Author had found in the house of an Officer, (in ædibus Præpositi Saleziani), and contained the following words: Surget Rex ex natione illustrissimi Lilii, habens frontem longam, supercilia alta, oculos longos, nasumque Aquilinum: Is congregabit exercitum magnum, & omnes tyrannos Regni sui destruet, & morte percutiet omnes fugientes montibus, & cavernis sese abscondentes à facie ejus. Nam ut Sponsus Sponsæ, ita erit justitia ei associata, cum illis usque ad quadragesimum annum deducet bellum subjugando Insulanos, Hispanos, & Italos. Romam & Florentiam destruet & comburet, poteritque sal seminari super terram illam. Clericos qui sedem Petri invaserunt morte percutiet: eodemque anno duplicem coronam obtinebit. Postremum mare transiens cum exercitu magno, intrabit Græciam, & Rex Græcorum vocabitur. Turcas & Barbaros subjugabit, faciendo edictum; Quicunque Crucifixum non adoraverit, morte morietur. Et non erit qui resistere poterit ei, quia brachium sanctum à Domino semper cum eo erit, & Dominium Terræ possidebit. His factis Sanctorum requies Christianorum vocabitur &c. i. e. " A Monarch shall arise out of the nation of the most " illustrious Lilly, having a long forehead, lofty eye- " brows, large eyes, a Roman nose: This King shall " assemble a mighty army, and extirpate all the ty- " rants of his Kingdoms; and shall kill all who fly " to the mountains, and hide themselves in caverns " from his face. For as a bridegroom is united to " his bride, so shall justice be to him; and with them " he shall carry on war to that fortieth year, subduing " the Islanders, the Spaniards and Italians. He shall " burn and destroy Rome and Florence, so that salt " may be sowed on the spot where they stand. He " shall kill such of the Clergy as have usurped St. " Peter's chair, and the same year shall obtain a dou- " ble crown. Lastly, crossing the sea with a great " army, he shall enter Greece, and be called King " of the Greeks. He shall subdue the Turks and " Barbarians, publishing a decree, that whoever " does not worship the crucified Saviour shall be put to " death. And no one will be able to resist him; " because the holy arm of the Lord will be always " with him, and he shall possess the Sovereignty of " the earth. These things being done, he shall be " called the rest of the Holy Christians or Saints, " &c." Comiers gives a French version of this, both in prose and verse, and adds (112) that he had met with the same Prophecy, but expressed in other words, in the ninth volume of St. Austin's works, in the middle of the Treatise of Antichrist (113), page 454; printed at Lyons, in 1586; and I am to observe, that he applies both these Prophecies to Lewis XIV. As the world, says he (114), cannot be conquered in one day; we ought at least to hope, that next year (1666) our mighty Monarch will lay the first foundations of that universal Empire. But consider still more attentively the fraudulent conduct of the flatterers of Charles V; they laid hold of the first of these two predictions; and in order to make them suit this Emperor, they curtailed one part, and enlarged another part of it. They foisted in his name and that of his father, as also the conquest of France; they took away the Roman nose, (105) Flor. de Remond, Hist. l'Heresie, lib. 3. cap. 16. pag. m. 362.

(106) Maimbourg, Hist. du Lutheran. tom. 2. pag. 55, & seq. Dutch edit. See also the Pensées diverses sur les Cometes, pag. 274, 275.

(107) Flor. de Remond, Hist. de l'Heresie, lib. 3. cap. 16. pag. m. 362.

(108) Cap. 10. of lib. 3. pag. 218. Paris edit. for John Guignard 1696.

(109) At Leyden 1698, in the Veteris ævi Analecta of Matthæus.

(110) Anton. Pontius Consentinus, in Hariadeno Barbarossa, pag. 2.

(111) Claude Comiers, Priest, Provost or Superior of the Collegiate Church of Ternan, and Canon in the Cathedral of Ambrun, de la Nature & presage des Cometes, pag. 469, edit. de Lion. 1665.

(112) Ibid. pag. 478.

(113) See concerning this Treatise, Audigier, de l'Origine des Francois & de leur Empire, tom. 2. pag. 465, & seq.

(114) Comiers, de la Nature des Comètes, p. 480.

(115) I write this in 1699.

tice of a lilly which this Emperor had ſet in the garden of his ſolitude [DD]. I know not whether any one has reflected on a remarkable circumſtance that happened during the ſiege of Mets. Charles V had not formed any enterprize that was more juſt than this, and which at the ſame time was more unfortunate [EE]. I muſt not omit the obſervation he made to Francis I. We both, ſays he, command over Nations of ſo headſtrong, ſo turbulent and fiery a nature, that in caſe we did not now and then engage in ſome wars to amuſe them, and to weaken their warlike impetuoſity; our own ſubjects will turn their arms againſt us, which will be much worſe (k). He left his ſon ſome inſtructions, wherein, among other counſels, he gives him the following: "to lower the ſails when the ſtorm "is too violent; not to oppoſe the wrath of the Fates; to ſhun thoſe blows by artifice "which cannot be eluded otherwiſe; to ſuffer them to paſs; to remove on one ſide, and "watch for ſome favourable revolution, and for better times (l)." He himſelf put this counſel in practice at the battle of Paſſaw, which would have reflected ſhame on the Empire, had not the Emperor been obliged to this more out of neceſſity than inclination. He practiſed it at the peace of Soiſſons, in which the ſucceſs of his arms was interrupted by his want of money; and he was obliged to offer himſelf as an hoſtage to the Germans, who otherwiſe had deſigned to ſeize his perſon (m). Himſelf and his ſon imagined themſelves very capable of ſnatching opportunities, this being one of their common expreſſions, Yo y el tiempos para dos otrõs (n). The Author now cited by me (o), relates a particular which proves the great fondneſs this Emperor had for Aſtronomy, and his intrepidity

(k) Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, lib. 1. Narrat. 2. pag. m. 66, 67.

(l) Silhon, Miniſtre d'Etat. tom. 1. lib. 3. cap. 9. pag. m. 361.

(m) Ibid.

(n) Ibid.

(o) See Melchior Adam, in the Life of Philippus Apianus, pag. 349 of Vitæ Germanorum Philoſophorum.

and ſome other features of the face. I my ſelf have met with ſome credulous people, infatuated with Prophecies, who during the laſt war (115), applied, as well as they could, all this pretended oracle to his Britannic Majeſty King William. To conclude, obſerve what Pontus confeſſes, viz. that the Motive of his publiſhing that Prophecy, was to enflame the courage of Charles the Vth's ſoldiers; and be aſſured, that moſt of the inventors and encouragers of Predictions, have no other deſign but merely to amuſe the common people, and to fire them with ſuch paſſions as may ſuit their purpoſe; and to ſucceed the better in their deſigns, they ſuppreſs truths and advance falſities.

(115) I write this in 1699.

[DD] We ſhall take ſome notice of a Lilly the Emperor had ſet in the garden of his Solitude.] He ſet it at the end of Auguſt 1558, and died the 21ſt of February following. In the moment when he expired, the root of this Lilly ſhot forth on a ſudden a ſtalk or ſtem two cubits in length, with a wonderful flower, as full blown and as fragrant as thoſe flowers are in Spain, in their uſual ſeaſon. I borrow the expreſſions which were employed by the ſuperior of the fathers of the Oratory at Paris in his ſpeech to the Queen of Spain, an. 1679 (116). I ſhall omit the ridiculous omen which he finds in this vegetation (117); but muſt obſerve, that Count de la Roca does not relate this incident with the ſame circumſtances. His words are theſe. "An impartial Author relates, that he had there ſeen "the root of a Lilly in a little garden, into which "the windows of one of the Emperor's apartments "looked, which, in the beginning of Spring, threw "out two ſtems, one whereof burſt its films, diſcloſed "its flower, diffuſed a grateful odour, and at laſt died; "whilſt the other, tho' ſet at the ſame time, and "not ſo forward, continued ſtill in the bud; at "which many wondered, becauſe it did not want "either water or ſun; and the very night that the "ſoul of this Emperor, left the priſon of its body, "this beautiful flower opened its beauties, was cropt "with reſpect and admiration, and placed on the "high altar (118)." The greateſt part of the marvellous in the harangue made by the ſuperior of the Fathers of the Oratory vaniſhes, when we examine with attention the relation of the Spaniſh Hiſtorian. I do not know this impartial Author, who is cited; but I imagine, that either he or Count de la Roca were copied by Famianus Strada. This the reader well eaſily believe, if he compares the Count's words with the following Latin paſſage. Nec illud admiratione caruit. In Caroli, quem dicebam hortulo, bini eodem tempore ſtyli emiſerat candens lilium. Alter Majo menſe, uti aſſolet, calice delucente floruit; alter quamvis eadem cultura provocatus, tumorem tamen ac partus ſigna vere toto atque æſtate ſuſtinuit; eademque demùm nocte, quâ Caroli animus integumento ſeſe corporis evolvit, ille explicato repente folliculo, intempeſtivâ nempe atque inſperatâ germinatione promiſit florem. Id verò & obſervatum ab omnibus, & lilio ſuper aram templi maximâ ad ſpectandum propoſito, fauſti candidique ominis loco acceptum eſt (119). i. e. "Nor did what "follows paſs unadmired. In Charles's little garden, "a white lilly threw out two ſtems at the ſame time. "The one, as is uſual, appeared in bloom in the "month of May; whilſt the other, tho' raiſed at "the ſame time and in the ſame manner, it never-"theleſs ſwelled and ſeemed as tho' it were going to "bloſſom, during all the ſpring and ſummer following; "at laſt, the ſame night in which the ſoul of Charles "diveſted itſelf of its tabernacle of the body; this ſtem "burſting on a ſudden its films, and budding forth "immaturely and unexpectedly, promiſed a flower. "This was taken notice of by every one; and the "Lilly being placed on the high altar ſo as to be "ſeen, was conſidered as a propitious omen." I here call to mind an obſervation which I read in a Work of Mrs. Schurman. She tells us (120), that at the time that du Lignon, one of Labadie's diſciples, was endeavouring to ſettle his ſect in Herford, there happened three prodigies. The firſt was, that the trunk of a tree which had been withered four years ſhot forth on a ſudden ſome boughs four or five foot long, all cloathed with leaves. This happened in autumn, and in a covered ſpot of ground, near the Church, which was afterwards made uſe of by the Labadiſts. The ſecond Prodigy was, that all the trees in the Princeſs's garden were in bloom in autumn, when ſhe promiſed to protect their little Church. The third was, that a ſwarm of bees came and ſettled in the ſame garden, and that no body knew whence they came. Now all this, according to this ſyſtem or hypotheſis of omens, ſhould naturally have promiſed a long and glorious eſtabliſhment; and yet this ſect was ſoon forced to leave Herford.

(116) His whole ſpeech is inſerted in Part 2. of the Mercure Galant, for October 1679. See the Penſées ſur les Cometes, pag. 294.

(117) See Penſées ſur les Cometes, ibid.

(118) Count de la Roca's Hiſtory of Charles V, pag. m. 349, 350.

(119) Famian. Strada, de Bello Belgico, Decad. 1. lib. 1. pag. m. 16.

(120) Anna Maria à Schurman, in cap. 2. Part. 2. Euclerias.

[EE] Charles V had not formed any enterprize more juſt . . . than the ſiege of Metz, . . . and which at the ſame time was more unfortunate.] Henry II, in conjunction with ſome Princes of Germany, had been declared protector of the liberties of Germany (121); and he boaſted his never having acted but as ſuch (122). Nevertheleſs, he ſeized upon Metz, an Imperial city: he took away its liberties, and that by the moſt flagrant treachery. No one can read without horror, the pretended ſtratagem that was employed to ſubject this little Republic, who looked upon this Monarch no otherwiſe than as its guardian and defender. It was then people had juſt reaſon to cry out, who will watch the guardians; Sed quis cuſtodiet ipſos cuſtodes (123)? Thus, Charles V was juſtly authorized to reunite, to the body of the Empire, a city which had been ſevered from it ſo ignominiouſly. He employed the fineſt of his forces for that purpoſe, and yet miſcarried ſhamefully (124), inſomuch that at laſt, at the peace of Munſter, the Empire was forced to reſign all claim to that City, and give it up to France. Now this Emperor had been vaſtly ſucceſsful, in ſuch enterprizes as were altogether unjuſt.

(121) Mezerai, Abregé Chron. tom. 4. pag. 670, ad ann. 1552.

(122) See Sleidan, lib. 24. fol. m. 695.

(123) Juven. Sat. 6. ver. 345.

(124) There were ſpread at that time a thouſand pieces both in proſe and verſe, as glorious to the French, as they were injurious to the Emperor; and malicious people took occaſion from thence to change his motto plus ultra, to plus citra. Hiſtoire du Duc d'Albe, lib. 3. cap. 24. pag. 284.

dity at the same time. I must not forget the magnificent reception he met with from the Fuggers, when he lodged at their house in his way through Augsburg [FF].

(125) In the article FUGGER, remark [A].

(126) Journal des Savans, for 8 Jan. 1685. p. m. 12. in the Extract of the 4th Part of Entretiens sur les Vies & Ouvrages des Peintres.

[FF] I must not forget the magnificent reception he met with from the Fuggers.] We shall speak of their riches below (125); here follows a noble specimen of it. "Felibien (126) relates a very pretty incident relating to "the Fuggers, those famous German Merchants, who, "to shew their gratitude to the Emperor Charles V, "who, at his return from Tunis, had done them the "honour to lodge at their house as he passed thro' "Ausburg; among other magnificent things with "which they regaled him, caused a faggot of Cin-"namon, (a commodity of very great price) to be "put into the chimney, and set fire to it, the Em-"peror having promised them a very considerable sum "of money (127)."

(127) See the article HADRIAN or ADRIAN, the Emperor, citation (22)

CHARLTON or CHARLETON (WALTER), an eminent Physician and Author [A] in the 17th Century, was descended of an antient family, and son of Walter Charlton M. A. Vicar of Ilminster, and afterwards Rector of Shipton-Mallet in Somersetshire. He was born at Shipton-Mallet February the 2d 1619, and was entered a Commoner of Magdalen Hall in the University of Oxford in Lent-Term 1637, under the tuition of Mr. John Wilkins, afterwards Bishop of Chester, by whose instruction he made a progress in Logic and Philosophy beyond his years (a). But his genius soon after inclined him to the study of Physic, in which he made such great advances, that by the favour of King Charles I he was actually created Doctor of that Faculty in February 1642, as Mr. Wood tells us in his Athenæ Oxonienses (b), or January the 16th as the same Writer affirms in his Fasti (c). About the same time he was made one of the Physicians in ordinary to his Majesty, "he being then, says Mr. Wood (d), observed by "those, that knew him, to set an high value upon his own worth and parts, as he al-"ways afterwards did." Upon the declining of the King's cause he retired to London, where (a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1112. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Ubi supra.

(c) Col. 28.

(d) Athen. Oxon, ubi supra.

[A] An eminent . . . Author.] We shall give a Catalogue of his Works as follows: I. Spiritus Gorgonicus vi suâ saxipartâ exutus, sive de causis, signis, & sanatione Lithiasews. Leyden 1650 in 8vo. This Book is usually called De Lithiasi Diatriba (1). II. The darkness of Atheism discovered by the light of nature. A Physico-Theological Treatise. London 1651 in 4to. III. The Ephesian and Cimmerian Matrons, two remarkable examples of the power of Love and Wit. London 1653 and 1658 in 8vo. IV. Physiologia Epicuro-Gassendo-Charltoniana: or a Fabric of natural Science erected upon the most ancient Hypothesis of Atoms. London 1654 in fol. V. The Immortality of the human Soul demonstrated by Reasons natural. London 1657 in 4to. VI. Oeconomia Animalis novis Anatomicorum inventis, indeque desumptis modernorum Medicorum Hypothesibus Physicis superstructa & mechanicè explicata. London 1658 in 12mo. Amsterdam 1659 in 12mo. Leyden 1678 in 12mo. Hague 1681 in 12mo. It is likewise added to the last edition of Gulielmi Cole de secretione animali cogitata (2). VII. Natural History of Nutrition, Life, and voluntary motion containing all the new discoveries of Anatomists &c. London 1658 in 4to. VIII. Exercitationes Physico-Anatomicæ de Oeconomiâ Animali. London 1659 in 8vo. Printed afterwards several times beyond sea (3). This Book is omitted in Father Niceron's Catalogue of our Author's Works in his Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Hommes Illustres, Tom. XVIII (4). IX. Exercitationes Pathologicæ in quibus morborum pænè omnium Natura, generatio, & causæ ex novis Anatomicorum inventis sedulò inquiruntur. London 1660, and 1661 in 4to. X. Character of his most sacred Majesty Charles II. King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland. London 1660 in about one sheet in 4to. XI. Disquisitiones duæ Anatomico-Physicæ; altera Anatome pueri de cælo tacti, altera de Proprietatibus Cerebri humani. London 1664 in 8vo. XII. Chorea Gigantum, or the most famous Antiquity of Great Britain, vulgarly called Stone-henge, standing on Salisbury-Plain, restored to the Danes. London 1663 in nine sheets in 4to. Inigo Jones Esq; Surveyor-General of the Works to King James I. Queen Anne, Prince Henry, and Christian IV King of Denmark, and afterwards to King Charles I, drew up at the command of King James I in 1620 a discourse concerning Stone-henge, wherein he concludes, that it was a Temple built by the Romans while in Britain, and dedicated by them to Cælus or Cælum, from whom the Antients imagined all things derived their origin. This discourse being left imperfect at his death in the year 1652, it came into the hands of Mr. John Webb of Burleigh in Somersetshire, who compleated and published it with this title, The most notable Antiquity of Great Britain, vulgarly called Stone-henge on Salisbury Plain restored. London 1655, in fifteen sheets in fol. Dr. Charlton being not at all satisfied with that discourse, sent a copy of it to Olaus Wormius, a celebrated Antiquarian in Denmark, who writing his sentiments upon it in several letters to Dr. Charlton, he compiled the Book abovementioned, with the assistance of the Books of Wormius and other Danish Authors. This Book, says Mr. Wood (5), tho' exploded by most persons when it was published, yet some of the most noted Antiquaries of this nation, particularly Sir William Dugdale, did applaud it, and hath said in my hearing more than once, that he verily believed that Dr. Charlton was in the right in what he delivered in the said Chorea Gigantum. But Mr. Webb undertook the defence of Mr. Inigo Jones's Book in his Vindication of Stone-henge restored, in which the orders and rules of Architecture observed by the Romans are discussed &c. London 1665 in fol. XIII. Onomasticon Zoicon, plerorumque Animalium differentias & nomina propria pluribus linguis exponens. Cui accedunt Mantissa Anatomite, & quædam de variis Fossilium generibus. London 1668 and 1671 in 4to. Oxon 1677 in fol. XIV. Two Philosophical Discourses; the first concerning the different wits of men; the second concerning the Mystery of Vintners, or a Discourse of the various sicknesses of wines, and their respective remedies at this day commonly used &c. London 1668, 1675, 1692 in 8vo. XV. De Scorbuto Liber singularis, Cui accessit Epiphonema in Medicastros. London 1671 in 8vo. Leyden 1672 in 12°. This Book contains several remarkable things (6). XVI. Natural History of the Passions. London 1674 in 8vo. XVII. Enquiries into humane Nature in six Anatomy-Prelections in the new Theatre of the Royal College of Physicians in London. London 1680 in 4to. XVIII. Oratio Anniversaria habita in Theatro inclyti Collegii Medicorum Londinensis 5to Augusti 1680. in Commemorationem Beneficiorum a Doctore Harvey aliisque præstitorum. London 1680 in 4to. XIX. The harmony of natural and positive Divine Laws. London 1682 in 8vo. XX. Three Anatomic Lectures concerning, 1. The motion of the blood through the veins and arteries. 2. The organic structure of the heart. 3. The efficient cause of the heart's pulsation. Read in the 19th, 20th, and 21st day of March 1682 in the Anatomic Theatre of his Majesty's Royal College of Physicians in London. London 1683 in 4to. XXI. Inquisitio Physica de causis Catameniorum, & Uteri Rheumatismo, in quo probatur sanguinem in animali fermentescere nunquam. London 1685 in 8vo. XXII. Gulielmi Ducis Novicastrensis vita. London 1668 in fol. This is a translation from the English original written by Margaret, the 2d wife of William D. of Newcastle, and printed at London 1667 in fol. under the following title; The Life of the thrice noble, high, and puissant Prince, William Cavendishe, Duke, Marquis, and Earl of Newcastle, &c. written by the thrice noble, illustrious, and excellent Princess, Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle,

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1112. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Niceron, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Hommes Illustres, tom. 18. pag. 112. edit. de Paris 1732.

(3) Wood, ubi supra.

(4) Pag. 111, & seq.

(5) Ubi supra, pag. 1113.

(6) Niceron, ubi supra.

where he practiſed Phyſic, and became one of the College of Phyſicians. After the Reſtoration he was appointed Phyſician in ordinary to King Charles II, and was choſen Fellow of the Royal Society. September the 30th 1689 he was elected Preſident of the College of Phyſicians, in which ſtation he continued till the year 1691. He retired afterwards to the Iſle of Jerſey (e); and died very aged. Mr. Wood ſaid of him during his life (f), "that he was a learned but unhappy man, aged and grave, yet too much given to "romances;" and that he wrote many books; but great part of them collected from other Authors.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Ibid.

Newcaſtle, his wife. XXIII. A Ternary of Paradoxes, of the magnetic cure of wounds, Nativity of Tartar in Wine, and Image of God in Man. London 1650 in 4to. This was tranſlated from the Latin original of John Baptiſt Van Helmont. XXIV. The errors of Phyſicians concerning defluxions called Deliramenta Catarrhi. London 1650 in 4to. This was likewiſe tranſlated from Van Helmont, and printed with the Ternary of Paradoxes. XXV. The Morals. London 1655 in 4to. written, ſays Mr. Wood (6), by Epicurus, but Father Niceron (7) obſerves that this is a miſtake; ſince that Philoſopher left no work behind him; but that it was probably extracted from Diogenes Laertius and other Writers of the ſame kind, like the Baron des Coutures's Book, which was publiſhed ſeveral years after under the ſame title. XXXVI. The Life of Marcellus, tranſlated from Plutarch, and printed in the ſecond Volume of Plutarch's Lives, tranſlated from the Greek by ſeveral hands; London 1684 in 8vo. T.

(6) Ubi ſupra, col. 1114.

(7) Ubi ſupra, pag. 1174.

CHARNACE (a) (BARON DE) executed ſeveral embaſſies very ſucceſsfully under Lewis XIII [A]. He was as brave in the field as ſkilful in negotiations; and he was, in Holland, at the ſame time, Embaſſador and Colonel. He was killed in the latter capacity, at the laſt ſiege of Breda in 1637 [B]. The ſtory told in the Mercure Galant [C] relating to the unhappy accident which the wife occaſioned in him, is entirely falſe.

(a) He was baptized Hercules.

[A] He executed ſeveral Embaſſies very ſucceſsfully, under Lewis XIII.] "He had been nominated by "Cardinal Richelieu, a circumſtance that makes us "entertain, at firſt ſight, a favourable opinion of the "Embaſſador. But he of whom I ſpeak, had no oc"caſion for ſuch an advantage. The negotiations he "has carried on with Guſtavus Adolphus King of "Sweden, which gave riſe to the treaty of Berwalde, "concluded the 23d of January 1631, and which had "ſo great an effect in Germany, are very convincing "proofs, tho' there had been no other. It was he "who occaſioned the Swedes to march into Germany; "and who laid the firſt foundation of the alliance, "that has been ſo advantageous as well as glorious "to the two Crowns, and which is ſtill ſo to the "Crown of Sweden. He continued to negotiate with "the ſame King, and with the Chancellor Oxenſtern, "till after the battle of Lutzen, which obliged him "to retire to France. He alſo had negotiated with "the Elector of Bavaria at Munich, but with little "ſucceſs, which was owing to the moroſeneſs of St. "Etienne (1), a relation of father Joſeph; who be"ing jealous to ſee a man of greater abilities than "himſelf at this Court, traverſed all his negotiations "to the great prejudice of their Sovereign. It was "Charnaſſe, who ſigned the 25th of April 1634, the "treaty of the Hague, after which it was thought "proper, to conclude that of the 8th of January fol"lowing, where he bore the title of one of his Ma"jeſty's commiſſaries. By the treaty of 1634, the "King promiſed to raiſe, and keep in pay, in the "ſervice of the States, a regiment of foot and horſe, "the command of which was given to Charnaſſé, "who being a military officer as well as an Embaſ"ſador, was reſolved to act in both characters; "and going to the laſt ſiege at Breda, he was killed "in the trenches (2)." As we do not find in Wicquefort, the ſubject of Charnace's embaſſy to Holland, we muſt look for it elſewhere. In peruſing the life of Cardinal de Richelieu, we here find that the motive of Charnace's journey to Holland, was to divert the States from liſtning to the propoſals of a truce which the Spaniards made them; He directed ſo artfully the inclination of the Directors and Deputies of the States; and ſet the artifices and evil deſigns of the Spaniards in ſo ſtrong a light, . . . that they at laſt reſolved . . . to prefer as much out of neceſſity as from reaſon, the carrying the war to the concluding of a truce. To which the order given Charnace did not contribute a little, viz. not only to ſollicite the Prince of Orange, whoſe intereſt it was (as was well known) to prolong the war; but alſo to offer the States a ſuccour of ten or twelve thouſand Swedes, a warlike nation, and in alliance with France; who had made a very advantageous uſe of it within theſe three years, or thereabouts, when Guſtavus Adolphus King of Sweden had made an inroad into Germany, and filled that great Empire with terror (3).

(1) Wicquefort, p. 780. of tom. 1. of the Traité de l'Ambaſſadeur, ſays as follows: Charnace and St. Etienne being at the Bavarian Court, on the part of France, in 1632, carried matters to ſuch great lengths, that they were going to fight a duel; ſo that quarrelling in this manner, they did no good at the Elector's Court.

(2) Idem, tom. 2. pag. 442.

(3) Auberi, Hiſt. du Cardinal de Richelieu, lib. 4. cap. 42. pag. m. 390, 391.

[B] He was killed, acting in his poſt as Colonel, at the laſt ſiege of Breda in 1637.] We have ſeen in the preceding remark, what Mr. de Wicquefort ſaid on this head; let us now add the words of another Author (4). "Monſieur de Charnace did all that "lay in his power, to engage the Prince of Orange to "beſiege another town, of greater importance to the "common advantage of the Allies, than Breda, in "which this Embaſſador had greater concern than "he imagined, ſince that ſiege was to be fatal to "him, he having been ſhot in the head by a muſket"ball, as he was attacking a horn-work. He was "very much regretted by the Court, as well for the "good qualities he poſſeſt, and for the great ſervices "he did his country, as for his being related to Mar"ſhal de Brezé, by Jane de Brezé his wife. His "heart was brought into France, and lies in the "Carmelite Church at Antwerp, with an epitaph over "it, which fixes his death to the firſt of Septem"ber."

(4) Ibid. lib. 5. cap. 52. pag. 596, 597.

[C] The ſtory told in the Mercure Galant, relating to the unhappy effect which the news of the death of Baron de Charnace's wife produced on him, is entirely falſe.] Abbé Deſlandes, chief Archdeacon and Canon of Treguier, ſent a letter to the Mercure Galant (5), in which he aſſerts, that Charnace being in Germany with Guſtavus, was ſo affected with the news that was brought of the death of his wife, who was of the houſe of Brezé, that he was ſtruck dumb, and never recovered his ſpeech afterwards. It is plain to every one that this is an untruth. Guſtavus loſt his life in the battle of Lutzen, anno 1632; and Charnacé diſplayed all the maſter-ſtrokes of his rhetoric, in 1634, to prevent the concluding of a truce with Spain. Now could a dumb man do this? It is not poſſible to rectify this fiction, by changing the time and place where Charnacé heard of his wife's death; for we have ſeen, that he endeavoured to diſſuade the Prince of Orange, not from beſieging Breda but another town, the taking of which might be more diſadvantageous to Spain. His advice was ineffectual; Breda was beſieged, and Charnacé loſt his life at it. Where then ſhall we find the time when he was dumb? We ſhall take notice in another place (6), that Abbot Deſlandes has related a ſtory equally as falſe, with regard to Fernelius.

(5) In November 1693.

(6) In the remark [G] of the article of FERNELIUS.

(a) Thuanus, lib. 53. pag. m. 1092, col. 2.

CHARPENTIER in Latin Carpentarius, was born at Toulouſe (a) in the ſixteenth Century, and was of the Reformed Religion, but he publiſhed a Pamphlet which made him be be reputed one of the most bitter enemies of the Protestants [A]. He taught the civil Law for some time at Geneva (b), and left that City with great discontent, and without taking leave of his creditors, as appears from a Letter which Beza wrote to him April the 1st 1570 (c); it appears from the same Letter that he had a wife and children. He published some

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) It is the 52d of Beza's Letters.

[A] He published a Pamphlet, which made him be reputed one of the most bitter enemies of the Protestants.] This piece was buried in oblivion; but a Benedictine Monk (1) having inserted it in his Entretiens touchant l'Entreprise du Prince d'Orange sur l'Angleterre. i. e. "Dialogues concerning the Prince of Orange's invasion of England;" printed at Paris in 1689, this has been the occasion why that piece has often been mentioned since. Mr. Jurieu thought that the best method to sink the reputation of this piece, was to publish what Thuanus had said both of this Pamphlet and of the Author of it; and as this was judged to be a very proper method, I shall transcribe Thuanus's account here (2). "One Peter Charpentier, a native "of Toulouse, who had taught the Law publickly at "Geneva, being very intimate with Bellievre, took "sanctuary at his house during the massacre of the "Protestants, with several other persons of a lower "rank; for it would have been too dangerous for a "Courtier to shelter persons of distinction on such an "occasion. Charpentier, who was a time-server, and "whose temper was such, that he always chose to sup"port that party, which it was his interest to follow, "began to exclaim very bitterly, not against the au"thors of the massacre, nor against the horrid slaugh"ter they had committed, but against what he called "the cause; that is, the Faction of the Protestants, "against whom he shewed a great hatred, and said, "that God had justly punish'd them for all the dis"turbances they had occasioned in the State, because "they had made Religion serve as a cloak to cover "their spirit of sedition and rebellion; that the pre"tended devout people amongst them had raised with "fire and sword against their own countrymen, when "they should have employed no other arms but their "tears, prayers and fasting; that they seized upon se"veral cities of the Kingdom; that they had put to "death an infinite number of persons, and carried "their audaciousness so far as to make open war a"gainst their Sovereign. He said, that their Assem"blies, in which formerly they only used to pray, "were now become Conventicles, and seditious meet"ings, in which neither piety, nor the mysteries of "religion, nor the reformation of manners were ever "mentioned, but in which they treated only of rais"ing money, gathering forces together secretly in the "several Provinces, and settling a correspondence "with foreign Princes. He added that they kept "seditious persons in every city of the Kingdom, in "order to disturb the public tranquillity, which had "been procured by the peace the King had granted "out of his own good-will to his Protestant Subjects, "and that nothing but the sword of God, which "Princes wear, could repress their arrogance. He ac"knowledged that it was God himself, who had inspir"ed a King, who was naturally of a very meek tem"per, with a design of curbing their pride by the "most severe method. At first Charpentier used to "talk after this manner only in his private and fami"liar conversations with Bellievre; but as it was ob"served that he afterwards held the same discourses "abroad, he was thought a proper person for the de"sign which the King and Queen had of justifying "the massacre as much as lay in their power. He "took the task very willingly upon himself; and to "encourage him they gave him a sum of money, and "promised to prefer him to very great employments, "which promise was afterwards religiously kept, tho' "he was very unworthy of it. With his money and "his expectations he set out from Paris with Bellievre, "whom he left in Switzerland and retired to Strasburg, "where he had formerly read Lectures: he chose that "city because from thence he would very easily spread "what reports he pleased over all Germany. As soon "as he was arrived at Strasburg, he wrote a Letter "to Francis Portes (3) of the Island of Candia, a man "very well skilled in the Greek Tongue, and who "had been formerly educated in the Family of Renée "Princess of Ferrara. In this Letter, which was dat"ed September the 15th, he said, that there were two "parties amongst the Protestants; the one consisting "of peaceable persons, who acted with sincerity and "from a religious principle, and who followed the "maxims of the Religion they professed: the other "consisting of persons, who acted from a spirit of fac"tion, and were seditious men, and enemies of the "public peace and tranquillity: that each of these "parties had their Pastors; that at the head of the "former were d'Espina, Sorel (In Charpentier's Letter published by F. de Sainte Marthe we read Des Rosiers "(4) instead of Sorel) Albrai, Capel, la Haye, Mer"cure; but that the other Ministers could not bear the "moderation of these, who were odious particularly "to Beza, whom he calls the Trumpet of Seba (a), "and against whom he exclaims most bitterly in his "book. He not only excuses the slaughter; but also "proves at length and in a very artful manner, that it "was very just, and necessary in order to subdue an "impious faction, which had no other view, but to o"verthrow the authority of the King, to draw the chief "Cities of the Kingdom from the allegiance they owed "to their Sovereign, and to disturb the public tran"quillity; a faction which seemed to have been form"ed for the ruin of the Protestant Religion itself, by "some seditious persons, who were enemies of their "country. There was an Answer to this Letter pub"lished under the name of Portes, and dated March "the 1st of the following year. This Answer was "full of very sharp expressions. Thuanus adds, that "Francis Baudouin a Civilian, who having formerly "embraced the Protestant Religion, suffered himself to "be prevailed upon by the moderate counsels of Cas"sander, and returned into the Pale of the Roman "Church, and was then teaching the Law at Angers, "was very strongly pressed by the Duke of Anjou, "to labour the same point with Charpentier, that is to "say, to vindicate the massacre. But this Civilian mo"destly declined the task, alledging, that considering "the controversies, in which he had been engaged "with those of Geneva, his authority upon this sub"ject would be of no weight at all; but the true "reason why he would not vindicate the massacre, was, "that he abhorred it from his heart, and that having "read Charpentier's Letter, he had observed several "oversights, and even very great blunders in what he "related from ancient history."

(1) Called F. Denis de Sainte Marthe.

(2) Thuanus, Historiæ, lib. 53. pag. m. 1092. ad ann. 1572. I follow Mr. Jurieu's Translation of this passage, in his book concerning the Religion of the Jesuits (De la Religion des Jesuits) printed at the Hague 1689, pag. 129, &c.

(3) He should have said Portus. Mr. Jurieu had committed a very gross blunder in pag. 81. where he mentioned a Letter of one Charpentier to Candiot against the Protestants. He took Candiot to be a proper name, whereas it signifies one born in the Island of Candia.

(4) You will find in the Article ROSIERS that F. De Sainte Marthe and Thuanus say the same, so that this parenthesis is to no purpose, or should have contained something else. Mr. Bayle means, probably, that Mr. Jurieu should have observed, that Des Rosiers's name was Sureau, which Thuanus renders Sorellus.

The Benedictine Monk published another part of his Entretiens, in which he endeavoured to evade as much as he could Thuanus's testimony (5).

You will find the substance of the same Letter of Charpentier in the third volume (6) of Mezerai's large History. This Historian asserts, that this Letter was a Reply to Wolfgangus Prishrachius (b) a Polander, who had wrote a very sharp Answer to Bellievre's Oration (7). D'Aubigné (8) says on the contrary, that Wolfgang Prisbrach and Portus of Candia, whom Charpentier quoted for his vouchers (9), wrote against Bellievre and Charpentier. But he expresses himself inaccurately; he should have said that Portus wrote against the latter, and Prisbrach against the former. It does not appear that Charpentier intended to answer the work of Portus; I believe therefore, that Mezerai was mistaken. Charpentier's Letter served as an episode to a Roman Catholic Writer (10) to adorn the Preface of a Book of Controversy, which he published in the year 1585 (11). He inserted the greatest part of it in his Preface, and gave his readers notice of it in another work (12). I must also observe, that this Letter is printed in the first volume of the Memoires de l'Etat de France sous Charles IX (13). i. e. "Memoirs concerning the con"dition of France under Charles IXth;" with a French Translation of Portus's Latin Answer to that Letter. This Answer contains a great many particulars of Charpentier's Life, which are not much to his honour, not to say, that they are very dishonourable to him.

(5) See the Journal des Savans for November the 12th 1691, pag. 651. of the Dutch edition.

(6) Page 264.

(7) Made before the Assembly of the Cantons of Switzerland at Baden, to justify the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day.

(8) D'Aubigné, Histoire Universelle, tom. 2. ch. 7. pag. 565, under the year 1572.

(9) He ought to have said, that Charpentier addressed his Letter to Portus.

(10) Cornelius Schultingius.

(11) See the Preface of the 4th vol. of his Confessio Hieronymiana.

(12) See his Biblioth. Catholica, tom. 4. pag. 256.

(13) Pag. m. 600, &c.

(a) The Trumpet of Seba.] This is the anagram of Beza's name, and is an allusion to Seba (or Sheba, as we spell it) that seditious man, of whom it is said in ſome other books [B], and was alive in the year 1584, being then the King's Advocate in the Great Council (d). Rivetus, who was ſo well acquainted with all ſorts of Authors, had but little knowledge of this Writer [C].

(d) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. pag. 389.

* Chap. xx. ver. 1.

the ſecond book of Samuel *, that he blew the trumpet to raiſe a ſedition againſt David. Let us obſerve here, that Charpentier's Letter dated September the 15th 1572, Francis Portus's Anſwer, and an Extract from Francis Baudouin's Obſervations upon Charpentier's Letter are inſerted in the Memoirs de l'Etat de France ſous Charles IX Tom I. folio 322 — 368 of the edition printed in 1579. CRIT. REM.]

(β) Wolfangus Priſsbrachius.] We read Priſsbach in the Memoires de l'Etat de France, &c. Tom. II. fol. 20 verſo, where that piece is inſerted. CRIT. REM.]

[B] He publiſhed ſome other Books.] According to la Croix du Maine, he wrote ſeveral Books both in Latin and in French, moſt of which have been printed. But I doubt whether he would acknowledge for his all thoſe which are publiſhed under his name; for ſeveral perſons have fathered upon him ſome Books of which he was not the Author. . . I have ſeen a Latin Treatiſe of his concerning the bearing of Arms; but I cannot tell whether he be the Author of the French Tranſlation of it. It was printed at Paris in both languages (14). This work of Charpentier is entitled, Pium & Chriſtianum de Armis Conſilium; i. e. "A pious and Chriſtian advice concerning the bearing of Arms," and was printed at Paris in 1575. I have mentioned in another place (15) an Anſwer that was wrote againſt it.

(14) La Croix, du Maine, pag. 389.

(15) Num. 18. of the Diſſertation upon JUNIUS BRUTUS printed at the end of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary.

[C] Rivetus . . . had but little knowledge of this Writer.] The Roman Controverſiſts are continually reproaching the Proteſtants with the civil wars of France, as a thing, which had been approved by their Miniſters, and quote ſometimes Charpentier's authority for it (16). The Jeſuit Petra Sancta publiſhed a Book againſt du Moulin, in which he had the confidence to aſſert, that they had took meaſures at Geneva to deſtroy at once Francis II, Catherine de Medicis his mother, Mary Stuart his conſort, his brothers &c (17). He quotes Surius l. 4. ad ann. 1561. Petrus Carpentarius, Genebrardus in Chronol. Rivetus, who anſwered the Jeſuit's Book, ſaid amongſt other things, that theſe three witneſſes were of no credit; that Baronius had convicted Surius of calumny, in abuſing Victorinus Biſhop of Poitiers (18), and that Charpentier and Genebrard being two obſtinate Leaguers had drawn the King's diſpleaſure upon themſelves. Carpentarius & Genebrardus qui inter Regis perduelles vixerunt, & juſtam ejus indignationem incurrerunt, inter eos qui ultimi ſteterunt in adverſis partibus, an digni ſunt, quorum teſtimonio contra tales habeatur fides (19)? i. e. "Do "Charpentier and Genebrard deſerve to be credited a-"gainſt ſuch men; ſince they lived amongſt the re-"bels, and juſtly drew the King's indignation upon "themſelves, becauſe they continued to the laſt in the "enemy's party?" If Rivetus had known, that the Author quoted againſt him was the ſame Peter Charpentier, who wrote an Apology for the ſlaughter commited on St. Bartholomew's day, and whom Thuanus had marked with a hot iron, if I may ſay ſo, would he have paſſed all this unobſerved? I imagine, that he was miſled by the undetermined quotation of that Author, and that he expreſſed himſelf but faintly, becauſe he durſt not take the Carpentarius, quoted by the Jeſuit, for that Lawyer, who was broke upon the wheel for his correſpondence with Spain about the year 1596 (20), and who was the ſon of Jacobus Carpentarius, Ramus's great antagoniſt.

(16) See Breſleius, Apolog. Proteſtantium pro Romana Eccleſia, pag. 642.

(17) Sylveſter Petra Sancta Notis Epiſt. Pet. Molinæi ad Balzaiam, pag. 102.

(18) Baron. tom. 3. an. 324, num. 226. apud Rivet. Operum tom. 3. pag. 538.

(19) Rivetus, in Jeſuita vapulante, cap. 13. num. 12. p. 538. tom. 3. Operum.

(20) See Mezeray's Large Hiſtory, tom. 3. pag. 1189.

CHARRON (PETER) Author of a Book which made much noiſe, and is intitled OF WISDOM, was born at Paris in the year 1541, where he made a great progreſs in School-learning and Philoſophy. He afterwards ſtudied the Civil and Canon Law at Orleans and at Bourges, and had the Degree of Doctor in that faculty conferred on him in the laſt of thoſe two Univerſities. He then returned to Paris, and having been admitted an Advocate in the Parliament, he attended the bar with a great deal of diligence for five or ſix years; but as he foreſaw it would be difficult for him to advance himſelf that way, becauſe he found himſelf incapable of ſubmitting to make his court to the Attornies and Sollicitors, he applied himſelf in good earneſt to the ſtudy of Divinity, and to the Pulpit, and became ſo great a Preacher, that ſeveral Biſhops were very deſirous of drawing him into their Dioceſe. Arnold de Pontac, Biſhop of Bazas, having heard him preach in St. Paul's Church in the year 1571, conceived a great affection for him, and took him with him to Xaintes, to Bourdeaux, and into his Biſhoprick, and to other places of Gaſcony and Languedoc (a). Charron acquired ſo great a reputation by his eloquence, that he was courted every where, and the Biſhops of ſeveral Dioceſes where he had preached, very generouſly offered him the Divinity Canonſhips of their Churches, and other dignities and benefices, and made him ſeveral . . . preſents. He was ſucceſſively Theologal of Bazas, Acqs, Lethoure, Agen, Cahors, and Condom, Canon and School-maſter in the Church of Bourdeaux, and Chanter in the Church of Condom. Queen Margaret retained him for her Preacher in ordinary . . . . He was alſo in the retinue of Cardinal d'Armagnac Legate of Avignon. He affected neither the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, nor that of Licentiate, or Doctor, or Profeſſor of that Science; he was contented with the character of Prieſthood. He was ſeventeen or eighteen years abſent from Paris, and when he returned thither in the year 1588, he had a mind to end his days among the Carthuſians. He had made a vow to embrace their Order, and diſcovered his intention to the Prior of the Charter-houſe (b). They had ſome reaſons not to receive him [A]: he addreſſed himſelf to the Prior of the Celeſtines,

(a) I ſet down the very words of the ELOGY which I ſhall cite below, Citation (1).

(b) His name was John Michel; he died Prior General of the great Monaſtery of the Carthuſians in Dauphiné.

[A] They had ſome reaſons not to receive him:] Leſt it might be thought that theſe reaſons were founded on any defect of Peter Charron, or that he renounced his vow too lightly, I muſt comment on the Text of this Remark by the following words: He preſented himſelf to the Prior of the Charter-houſe near Paris. . . . But he could not be received there, whatever ardent prayer and earneſt application he made for that purpoſe, and this merely becauſe he was too far advanced in years; for he was then about 47 or 48 years old; and they excuſed themſelves by repreſenting the neceſſity there was that a man ſhould be accuſtomed from his youth to undergo the auſterity of that religious order. On this refuſal he addreſſed himſelf to the Provincial of the Celeſtines of the ſame city, to be in the like manner received into their order, where he met with the ſame difficulty, impediment, and refuſal. So that having done all that in him lay, and it being no fault of his that his vow was not performed, he was aſſured by Meſſieurs Faber, Dean of the Sorbonne, Tyrius a Scottiſh Jeſuit, and Feuardent a Franciſcan, very learned Divines, that he was in conſcience diſcharged from ſuch vow, and might freely continue in the world as a Secular, and that he was not obliged to enter into any other religious order (1).

(1) The Elogy of Peter Charron, by G. M. D. R; (that is, George Michael de Rochemaillet) prefixed to his Books of Wiſdom, of the Paris Edition, 1604.

Celeſtines, and met with the ſame obſtacles; after which certain Caſuiſts declared him free from his vow (c). For which reaſon he reſolved to finiſh his days under the character of a ſecular Prieſt. He preached a courſe of Lent Sermons at Angers in the year 1589, and then he went to Bourdeaux, where he contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with Michael de Montagne [B]. He publiſhed there his Book of the three Truths, in the year 1594 [C]: which obtained him the dignity of Grand Vicar of the Biſhop of Cahors, with the Divinity Canonſhip. He was deputed to the General Aſſembly of the Clergy in the year 1595 (d), and was choſen firſt Secretary of that Aſſembly. Being returned to Cahors, he continued there till the year 1600, and there compoſed, among other Works, the three Books OF WISDOM. He printed his Chriſtian Diſcourſes at Bourdeaux in 1600 [D]. He had then quitted Cahors, and was already ſettled at Condom, where he had accepted the Divinity Canonſhip and the dignity of Chanter which the Biſhop had offered him. He publiſhed the Treatiſe of Wiſdom at Bourdeaux in the year 1601. Two years afterwards he took a journey to Paris, to return thanks to a Biſhop who had offered him the Divinity Canonſhip of his Church [E], [and to publiſh in that city a new Edition of his ſaid Treatiſe. He lived to ſee no more than three or four ſheets reprinted: for he died ſuddenly in the ſtreet the 16th of November 1603. The impreſſion of the Work was finiſhed, notwithſtanding the almoſt infinite obſtacles which were to be ſurmounted (e) [F]; for as the Author had ſaid a good many things according to the light of

(c) See the Remark [A].

(d) It was held at Paris.

(e) Extracted from the Elogy of Peter Charron, before the Book of Wiſdom.

[B] He contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with Michael de Montagne.] Charron had a wonderful eſteem for that Author's Eſſays, and adopted ſeveral of his maxims. We may believe, without raſhneſs, that of theſe two friends the perſon who ought to have inſtructed the other, was his ſcholar, and that the Divine learned more from the Gentleman, than the latter did from the Divine. There are in the Books of Wiſdom an infinite number of thoughts which had appeared in the Eſſays of Montagne. This docility of Charron contributed very much, no doubt, to the particular affection which Montagne had for him, and which induced him to permit him by his will to bear the full arms of his noble family, after his own deceaſe, becauſe he left no heirs male (2). Charron ſhewed a real gratitude by his will; for he left 500 crowns to Mrs. Leonora de Montagne the wife of the Sieur Camein, Counſellor in the Parliament of Bourdeaux, the good ſiſter of the late Sieur de Montagne Knight of the King's Order, and his Goſſip, and he conſtituted the ſaid Sieur de Camein his ſole and univerſal heir, he paying and diſcharging the legacies bequeathed by his Will, amounting to near the ſum of 15000 livres tournois (3).

(2) Ibid.

(3) Ibid.

[C] He publiſhed his Book of the three Truths, at Bourdeaux in the year 1594.] He did not ſet his name to it. Theſe three Truths are the following: I, that there is a God, and a true Religion: II, that of all Religions the Chriſtian is the only true one: III, that of all the Chriſtian Communions the Roman Catholic is the only true Church. By the firſt, he combates the Atheiſts; by the ſecond, the Pagans, Jews, and Mahometans; and by the third, the Heretics and Schiſmatics. This work is very methodical. He attacked, in the laſt part, the Treatiſe of the Church which Monſr. du Pleſſis Mornai had publiſhed ſixteen years before. A Proteſtant Writer ſoon printed, at Rochelle, an Anſwer (4) in defence of the Treatiſe of du Pleſſis. The Work of the three Truths was applauded by the Catholics: it was printed twice or thrice at Paris, from the Edition of Bourdeaux, and afterwards it was publiſhed in Flanders under the name of Benedict Vaillant Advocate of the holy Faith (5). The publication of this Work made Charron known to Meſſire Antony d'Ebrard de S. Sulpice, Biſhop and Count of Caors, who without having ſeen the ſaid Sieur Charron, merely becauſe he liked his Book, ſent for him, and made him his Vicar-General, and gave him the Divinity Canonſhip of his Church, which he accepted; and while he was there, he cauſed his book to be printed a ſecond time at Bourdeaux, in the year 1595, putting his name to it, and augmenting it with a Reply to the Anſwer, which had been printed at Rochelle, to his third Truth (6). Francis du Jon, or Junius, Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, compoſed an Anſwer (7) to his ſecond Edition of the three Truths, and publiſhed it in French in the year 1599. He inſerted therein the entire Work of his Adverſary. Take notice that Charron had reviſed it, and greatly enlarged it ſince the edition of 1595, and had made another Reply to the ſecond Anſwer to the third Truth (8). All this was found in his ſtudy, ready for the preſs, after his death. Some hopes were given that his univerſal heir would publiſh this manuſcript, and dedicate it to the Cardinal de Joieuſe (9).

(4) Which was reprinted at Geneva, by Gabriel Cartier, in the year 1595, in 8vo.

(5) Elogy of Peter Charron.

(6) Ibid.

(7) It is a large Quarto.

(8) Elogy of Peter Charron.

(9) Ibid.

[D] He publiſhed his Chriſtian Diſcourſes . . in 1600.] They are ſixteen in number: the eight firſt treat of the Euchariſt; the reſt relate to the knowledge and providence of God, the Redemption of the world, and the Communion of Saints (10).

(10) Ibid.

[E] He took a journey to Paris, to return thanks to a Biſhop who had offered him the Divinity Canonſhip of his Church.] Claudius Dormi Biſhop of Boulogne on the Sea, and Prior of St. Martin in the fields at Paris, was the perſon whom he had to thank: he had received very obliging Letters from him, which ſhewed that his Books were very much to that Prelate's taſte, and that he would do him a pleaſure if he would accept the place of Theologal of his Cathedral (11). Obſerve that this Biſhop's approbation related to the three Books of Wiſdom, as well as to the ſixteen Diſcourſes. He did not accept this offer, and he ſaid to an intimate friend of his, that he would willingly have accepted that Divinity Canonſhip for ſome years, but that the air and coldneſs of the climate, which was damp and near the ſea, was not only unpleaſant and diſagreeable to his humour and temper, but unwholſome, and apt to occaſion colds, and rheumatiſms; that he was wholly influenced by the Sun, which was his ſenſible God, as God was his inſenſible Sun, for which reaſon he feared he ſhould never be able to live at Boulogne with either health or pleaſure, or indeed at all (12). He is not the only man of letters to whom cold and moiſt climates are diſagreeable, and to whom the Sun is a ſenſible God.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Ibid.

[F] The impreſſion of the Books of Wiſdom was finiſhed notwithſtanding the infinite obſtacles which were to be ſurmounted.] Let us make uſe of the narrative which is to be found in his Elogy. He had affectionately recommended this Work and the Chriſtian Diſcourſes to one of his moſt intimate friends, an Advocate of the Parliament (13). This friend took ſo much care of them, that they were at length publiſhed "notwithſtanding the traverſes and impediments which "were laid in his way by malicious or ſuperſtitious "men, of mean, weak, and ordinary underſtandings, "who were like owls, perquam ſimiles Noctuis, quarum "oculi tantum ſplendorem ferre non poterant, & ad illius Solis lumen caligabant, not being able to ſupport "the brightneſs and piercing luſtre of that rare, vigorous, marvelouſly elevated and divine wit. For "there was a deſign to hinder the impreſſion of his "Books of Wiſdom in particular, and for that end "they made uſe of the authority of the Rector of the "Univerſity, and certain Doctors of the Sorbonne, "and even of ſome of the King's Counſel, as well "in the Parliament as at the Châtelet, and moreover "Simon Millanges, a Printer of Bourdeaux, was "made a party in the affair, as concerned in intereſt; "complaints were made of it in divers places, at the "Châtelet, in the Court of Green-Cloth, in the Court "of Parliament, and in the Privy Council, and they "even reached the King's ear; the ſheets which were "printed off, and the Author's copy were ſeized three "ſeveral times. But becauſe this faithful friend had of Philoſophy, he could not attack popular and ſuperſtitious opinions, without advancing ſome maxims which ſeemed to claſh with the truths of Religion. For which reaſon there were ſeveral people who roſe up againſt his book, and decried it as a nurſery of impiety. But ſome perſons of ſuperior underſtanding were found who oppoſed this perſecution, and who diſtinguiſhed things as they ought. Happily for the memory of Charron, and for his Book, there were ſome Stateſmen, as illuſtrious on account of the ſtrength of their genius, as of their authority, who interpoſed in the affair: without which he would have been cenſured with ignominy, and his Work would have been ſuppreſſed. Wherefore he had always wiſhed to have perſons of that character for his judges [G]: he hoped not to meet with the ſame equitable treatment from thoſe who are engaged by their profeſſion to act with too much paſſion, and thence contract a habit of condemning precipitately whatever agrees not with their prejudices. Some think it glorious for France, to have permitted the publication of that Book, in ſpite of the oppoſitions and murmurs of a number of people. It thereby appeared that men of ſenſe did not approve of the tyrannical yoke which ſo many perſons endeavoured to put on men's underſtanding, and that they approved of the liberty of philoſophizing when it kept within certain bounds. The moſt violent Declaimer who appeared againſt this Book of Wiſdom was a Jeſuit named Garaſſe. He has put Charron into the Catalogue of the moſt dangerous and wicked Atheiſts [H]. He was too much poſſeſſed by the loweſt prejudices (f), to be able to perceive that a great difference muſt be made between what a man believes by the efficacy of faith, and what he ingenuouſly acknowledges reaſon ſuggeſts to him concerning

(13) Named George Michael de Rochemaillet.

(f) My friend Garaſſe, quæ ſupra nos nihil ad nos; the Books of Charron are a little too much above the reach of ſuch low and popular underſtandings as yours. Ogier, Jugement & Cenſure de la Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 155.

" two or three copies of the Work, and was deſirous " to make appear by convincing proofs that the friend- " ſhip he had born to the deceaſed Sieur Charron did " not end with his life, he took ſuch unwearied pains " that at laſt all the Books were printed; but before " they could be ſold, ſeveral proſecutions were to be " defended in different places, and finally the Chan- " cellor and the King's Attorney General cauſed them " to be peruſed by two Doctors of the Sorbonne, who " gave in writing what objections they had to thoſe " Books, which diſcourſed of nothing but human " Wiſdom, morally and philoſophically treated. And " the whole was put into the hands of the Preſident " Jeannin Counſellor of State, one of the moſt judici- " ous and experienced perſons of that time, who hav- " ing ſeen and examined them, ſaid plainly and " clearly, that thoſe Books were not for the common " and lower claſs of mankind, and that it belonged " only to underſtandings of the greateſt force and elevati- " on to make a judgment of them, and that they were re- " ally Books of State, and having made his report to the " Privy Council, the Bookſeller who had printed them " was permitted to ſell them, and he obtained an entire " diſcharge of all ſeiſures which had been made of " them: After it had been repreſented and proved " that his Books had been corrected and enlarged by " the Author ſince the firſt impreſſion made at Bour- " deaux, in the year 1601, and that by thoſe Additi- " ons and Corrections he had explained and confirmed, " and in ſome places ſoftened his diſcourſes without al- " tering any thing of the ſenſe or ſubſtance, which " he had done to ſtop the mouths of the malicious, " and to ſatisfy the ſimple; that he had ſhewed them " to ſome of his beſt friends, perſons clear-ſighted and " no ways pedantic, who were much edified and pleaſ- " ed therewith, which they would not otherwiſe have " been; and that above all things he ſubmitted him- " ſelf and his books to the cenſure and judgment of " the Catholic, Apoſtolic, and Roman Church."

You will eaſily perceive by this Narrative, that the Paris Edition of 1604 is not conformable in all reſpects to the Edition of Bourdeaux 1601. The latter contained ſome things which in the other were either ſuppreſſed, or ſoftened, and rectified. This made the Bourdeaux Edition the more ſought after by the curious; and thence it came to paſs that the Bookſellers reprinted the Book in divers places, according to that Edition (14), which induced a Bookſeller of Paris to procure an edition to which he ſubjoined all the paſſages of the firſt which had been ſtruck out, or corrected, and all thoſe which the Preſident Jeannin, appointed by the Chancellor to cenſure and examine that Book, had judged to want alteration (15). This Edition, which is of Paris 1607, has been followed in the reimpreſſion of the work at Roan in 1622, and elſewhere: it is without doubt preferable to the firſt; for there the Book appears entirely as the Author had corrected and enlarged it for the ſecond Edition, and beſides it contains what was peculiar to the Edition of Bourdeaux, apart. All the proceedings were by this means rendred perfectly uſeleſs.

(14) See the Adverteſſement to the Readers before the Paris Edition of 1607.

(15) Ibid.

[G] . . . Some perſons of ſuperior underſtanding . . . . interpoſed in the affair . . . he had always wiſhed to have perſons of that character for his judges.] " He was " plainly ſenſible and foreſaw in his life-time, that " his Book of Wiſdom, among others, would not be " welcome to weak and ſuperſtitious minds, and that " it would be cenſured by the preſumptuous, the ar- " rogant, the poſitive and peremptory, the head- " ſtrong, the opinionated, and the obſtinate, who think " they know every thing, and imagine themſelves the " wiſeſt and moſt diſcreet perſons in the world, tho' " they be generally the moſt ſilly and ignorant, ſome " of whom are alſo touched by a diſeaſe almoſt in- " curable and without remedy. Wherefore a few months " before his death, he drew up a ſmall Treatiſe of " Wiſdom, containing a Summary of his Book, and " an Apology and Anſwer to the complaints and ob- " jections made againſt it; which was printed ſepa- " rately in the year 1606, together with ſome Chri- " ſtian Diſcourſes, by David le Clerc, Maſter Printer, " and he deſired the ſame might be dedicated to Monſ. " de Harlay firſt Preſident of the Parliament of Paris, " well knowing that for the defence of his Books, " and to have them judged of without paſſion, he " had need of ſuch men as the aforeſaid Lord, that is, " of a bold, ſtrong, generous, and elevated mind, " neither ſuperſtitious nor addicted to popular opinions; " which was done according to his deſire and inten- " tion (16)."

(16) Elogy of Peter Charron.

[H] Garaſſe has put Charron into the Catalogue of the moſt dangerous and wicked Atheiſts.] Never was ſuch raging malice as his ſeen: it would make a Book ſhould one copy all the abuſive language which he has uttered againſt Charron in his Somme Theologique, in his Doctrine Curieuſe &c. Let us content our ſelves with the following paſſage: I have defined, ſays he (17), the brutal, drowſy, or melancholy Atheiſm, to be a certain fantaſtic humour, which has transferred Diogeniſm into the Chriſtian Religion, by which humour a mind beſotted with its own languid and ſluggiſh melancholy, laughs at every thing, thro' a gloomy, ridiculous, and pedantic gravity. Thoſe who have read the Book of Wiſdom and the three Truths, will eaſily underſtand what I mean by theſe words: for the humour of that Writer is there naturally repreſented. . . In our time, the Devil, the author of Atheiſm, and the ape of God's works, has raiſed up two prophane wits, Chriſtians in appearance, and Atheiſts in effect, to compoſe a Book of WISDOM in imitation of Solomon, the one a Milaneſe (18), who wrote in Latin; and the other a Pariſian, who wrote in his mother-tongue; both equally pernicious, and great enemies of JESUS CHRIST, and of good morals, as we ſhall ſee in a proper place, when we come to report and examine their wicked propoſitions. That is to ſay, in one word, theſe two prevaricators have endeavoured to ſhew that true Wiſdom conſiſts in the deſpiſing of

(17) Garaſſe, Somme Theologique, pag. 66, 67. In his Apology againſt the Prior Ogier, pag. 261, 262, he ſays, Charron is more dangerous to youth and to ſecular who are but moderately learned, than the Books of Theophile & Lucilio Vanini, foraſmuch as he ſays more abominable things than they, and expreſſes them with ſome little decency, that is, ſo much the more dangerouſly, as he keeps himſelf on his guard, and his Wiſdom is read as a Book of devotion.

(18) That is, Cardan.

ing the doctrines of Religion. One of the things which that Jeſuit has cenſured in the moſt arrogant and malicious manner, is at the bottom very reaſonable; and if a man reads it with attention, he cannot help thinking it ſo, or avoid being offended either at the ignorance, or inſincerity of the Caviller. This relates to a certain degree of ſtrength which Peter Charron attributes to thoſe who entirely ſhake off the belief of the being of a God [I]. His of Religion, and good manners. . . . Tertullian in the fourteenth chapter of his Apologetic has a notable ſaying which may ſerve me here for an authority; for ſpeaking of Marcus Varro, who was eſteemed the Wiſdom of the Romans, he ſhews that in his writings, which by good luck and God be thanked are loſt, he was a greater Atheiſt and more a Cynic than Menippus or Diogenes, foraſmuch as he had written Atheiſtical Diſcourſes with ſome ſort of modeſty, reſerve, and probability, whereas others, having written impious pieces, have rendred them ſuſpected merely by their manner of writing. I ſay the ſame of theſe melancholy and languid Writers, who under the name of Wiſdom, Truths, and Catholic Diſcourſes, have underhand deſtroyed all ſenſe of piety. The Abbot de Saint Cyran did not abandon Charron's honour to the venomous calumnies of this Critic: he took his part, when he expoſed the faults of Garaſſe's Somme Theologique (19). I remember, among other things, that he complains of the injuſtice of this Cenſurer, who taking advantage of an error of the preſs, had carried his invectives to a ſtrange length. The whole ſequel of Charron's diſcourſe ſhewed that he intended to ſay that God acts temporally; but the Printers, inſtead of temporellement, put temerairement i. e. raſhly. See what will be cited below from the Prior Ogier.

(19) See the 2d tome of La Somme des Fautes & fauſſetez capitales contenues dans la Somme Theologique du Pere Garaſſe, pag. 346, &c.

[I] . . . This relates to a certain degree of ſtrength which Peter Charron attributes to thoſe who entirely ſhake off the belief of the being of a God.] To judge well of his doctrine on this point, all his words ſhould be weighed, and nothing that he has ſaid ſuppreſſed. Here then follows the paſſage as intire as is neceſſary. " This firſt, eminent, ſyſtematical, and univerſal kind of " Atheiſm (20) can only lodge in a ſoul extremely ſtrong " and daring;

(20) That is, of thoſe who flatly deny the Deity, and pretend to prove by reaſoning that there is no God.

" Illi robur & æs triplex
" Circa pectus erat,

" Sure he . . . . .
" In harden'd oak his heart did hide,
" And ribs of iron arm'd his ſide!
Dryden.

" It muſt be raging and maniac. It is certainly very " reaſonable to think that as great, and (perhaps) " a greater degree of ſtrength and ſtiffneſs of ſoul is " neceſſary to reject and reſolutely to caſt off the ap" prehenſion and belief of a God, than to adhere con" ſtantly and firmly to him: which are the two op" poſite extremes, very rare and difficult; but the " firſt the more ſo. Whatever lies between them, is " of a middle ſtrength and power, which conſiſts in " being unable to get rid of God, and yet adhering " to him faintly and negligently. And this is the caſe " of almoſt all men, either more or leſs, in an infi" nite number of degrees. . . . To adhere firmly and " inviolably to God, requires a very great force and " attention of ſoul, always fixed and intent, a moſt " excellent and ſpecial divine favour and grace, and " a continual aſſiſtance of the Holy Spirit. On the " contrary, to get looſe from and entirely to reject the " ſenſe and apprehenſion of a Deity, a thing which " cleaves to the marrow of our bones, a monſtrous " and inraged force of ſoul is neceſſary, and ſuch as " is very hard to find; altho' the utmoſt ſtudy and " efforts were uſed to acquire it by thoſe grand and " notorious Atheiſts, who through an exceſſive and " daring preſumption have endeavoured to ſhake off " the Deity, and to free themſelves from all ſuperio" rity. But the moſt able who have ſtrove to do it, " could never compaſs their deſign. For though when " at their eaſe, and maſters of their own diſcourſe, " they ſeemed to have gained this point by mocking at " all thoughts of God and Religion; yet when they " came to be cloſely preſſed, they yielded like little " children. If there happened any great and ſud" den prodigy, a terrible inſtance of God's wrath, they " became more frighted and pale than others, hiding " themſelves at a clap of thunder, or at a ſtorm. Being " thus unwilling to confeſs a Deity leſt they ſhould " fear him, the fear of the leaſt things forced them to " confeſs it (21)." Let us now ſee the words of the Cenſurer (22): He lays it down for a maxim, that the firſt and moſt eminent kind of Atheiſm can only lodge in a ſoul extremely ſtrong and daring, and that a greater degree of ſtrength and ſtiffneſs of ſoul is neceſſary to reject and reſolutely caſt off the apprehenſion and belief of a God, than to adhere conſtantly and firmly to him. And though he endeavours to ſoften this propoſition by treacherous expreſſions; I ſay nevertheleſs that it is wicked and dangerous, becauſe it holds up the chin of ſeveral young debauchees, who float between two opinions, and are not yet mad enough to rid themſelves entirely of the belief and fear of the Deity. For as there is no man who is not naturally tickled with the deſire of being thought a ſtrong and mighty wit, if young perſons who are inconſiderate and already wavering happen to fall upon this propoſition, as they do but too frequently, of libertines they become violent Atheiſts. Charron's whole diſcourſe incites the mind of his readers to this furious madneſs of ſhaking off the belief of God, which however is but a ſtupid cowardiſe, as is verified in all Atheiſts, who die either diſtracted or towards; as we have ſeen in the inſtances of Fontanier and Vanini, who after having inſolently braved the Deity, could never ſatisfy themſelves, when in priſon, with making feigned and ſacrilegious confeſſions, that they might appear good men. Obſerve that Garaſſe, in his Somme Theologique, a later Book than the Apology which I have juſt now cited, beſtows a whole ſection (23) on the refutation of this opinion of Charron. He alledges the example of ſome Fathers of the Church who ſhewed an unſhaken courage: he maintains that Atheiſm proceeds only from cowardiſe, he maintains it, I ſay, by conſidering things in another light, and according to different views which do not directly contradict Charron's notions; and he returns to the timorous diſſimulation of the two Atheiſts who had been put to death ſome time before. This refutation is not a ſolid one, ſince Charron had plainly and preciſely owned, I, that to continue firm in the true faith of God, a very great ſtrength of ſoul is requiſite; II, that the grand and notorious Atheiſts, when they come to be cloſely preſſed, yielded like little children. Garaſſe, therefore, may be ſaid to have fought with his own ſhadow; he has proved what his adverſary did not deny, and what Charron formally acknowledged. Wherefore let us take our leaves of this chapter of the Somme Theologique, and the laſt part of the paſſage which I have tranſcribed; and let us conſider only the other half of that paſſage.

(21) Charron, in the 3d chap. of the three Truths, pag. m. 15, and 14.

(22) Garaſſe, Apolog. chap. 21. pag. m. 263, &c.

(23) It is the 3d Section of the 2d Part of the firſt Book, pag. 48, &c.

I find ſeveral faults in it; for, in the firſt place, the Jeſuit has ſuppreſſed every thing which makes Charron's Orthodoxy to appear, every thing which may be of uſe to unfold the true ſenſe, or may remove the ill impreſſions which the maxim propoſed in general, and in a crude manner, might be capable of making. In the ſecond place, he calls all this treacherous expreſſions; now this is a behaviour ſo baſe and unfair, that it ought to be taken cognizance of by the Criminal Judge, and a moſt ſevere Tribunal ought to be eſtabliſhed againſt Authors, who by ſuch ſtrokes of perfidy blaſt a Writer's honour, reputation, and memory. You ſuppoſe a thing, and yet call it treacherous. It ſhould have been here quoted entire, and then you ſhould have given it a name; but you found it more for your purpoſe to ſurprize the readers, by interpoſing your own judgment on a fact which you did not ſhew them, and which you was well aſſured moſt of them would not ſearch after. I ſay in the third place, that Garaſſe builds on a bad foundation: for he relies on this principle; That though Atheiſm were truly the effect of a great force of mind, yet this ſhould not be owned; that a truth of that kind ought either to be ſuppreſſed, or the contrary opinion boldly maintained, leſt preſumptuous men be tempted to fall into a condition which

His Cenſurers did not mind the cautions which he had given, and which were ſo is the characteriſtic of a ſtrong ſoul. It is manifeſt from this Jeſuit's opinion, that he reaſons in this manner (24). Now I leave every equitable perſon to conſider whether this be candid dealing; and whether it be not to introduce into Religion mere human policy, and the great ſecret of the art military? In a word, whether this be not to lay it down for a rule, that provided Orthodoxy triumphs, it matters not how or by what means? Should not a man think it ſufficient to behave in this manner himſelf? Muſt he alſo further require of every Author that he tread in the ſame path? Shall not Peter Charron be permitted to prefer ſincerity to utility? Let us go a little farther, and ſay that he followed the ideas of ſtrict honeſty, without expoſing the uſeful part to any danger. Did he not aſſert that Atheiſm required a ſtrong ſoul, raging and Maniac; and that this ſtrength was monſtrous and raging, and an exceſſive and daring preſumption? Is there any thing here to tempt a man's ambition? and if this be capable of enticing any one, muſt it not be the moſt ill-contrived underſtanding in the world, and a ſoul depraved in the higheſt degree? Do ſuch profligate, ſuch corrupted, and ſuch incorrigible people deſerve that for their ſakes things ſhould not be ſpoken of according to thoſe ideas which ſeem the moſt juſt? When Cicero owned that Mark Antony was poſſeſſed of great ſtrength of body (25), when Tacitus acknowledged the ſame quality in a grandſon of Auguſtus (26), had they any reaſon to fear leſt their readers ſhould wiſh to acquire the like ſtrength? Was it not characterized in ſuch a manner as to create diſguſt? Now I aſk you whether Charron has not made uſe of a corrective yet more proper to inſpire, I will not ſay diſguſt, but horror? Take notice here of St. Auguſtin's maxim, that the greateſt piety and the greateſt impiety are equally rare. Inſania iſta paucorum eſt; ſicut enim magna pietas paucorum eſt, ita & magna impietas nihilo minus paucorum eſt (27). This amounts very near to one of the propoſitions of Peter Charron.

(24) Compare with this l'Addition aux Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 83, 84. of the Edition of 1694. See alſo pag. 74, 75.

(25) Tu iſtis faucibus, iſtis lateribus, iſta gladiatoria totius corporis firmitate. i. e. "You with "thoſe jaws, "thoſe ſides, "and that gladiatorial "ſtrength of "the whole body." Cicero, Philipp. II, pag. m. 738.

(26) Ruidem ſane bonarum artium, & robore corporis ſtolide ferocem. i. e. "Unskilled, "indeed, in the "politer arts, "and in ſtrength "of body bruſtiſhly fierce." Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 3.

(27) Auguſtinus, Sermone X de Verbis Domini.

REMARKABLE differences of the Force of the Soul, and Obſervations thereupon.

It will be thought, perhaps, that he has contradicted himſelf, having acknowledged in Atheiſts both a very great force of mind, and a childiſh weakneſs: but ſurely he has done this without falling into a contradiction, ſince he has conſidered them under different circumſtances. He believed them ſtrong in time of proſperity, and weak in adverſity: ſo that the contrary qualities which he attributes to them are two things which ſucceed one another. It is therefore no contradiction to admit them in the ſame ſubject: for a contradiction ſuppoſes the two terms to ſubſiſt together at the ſame time. It requires alſo that they be affirmed of the ſame ſubject according to the ſame notion; and thence it follows that one may affirm, without departing from the rules of contradictory propoſitions, that the ſame perſons are fearful and bold at the ſame time, fearful with regard to certain objects, and bold with regard to others. This is ſeen every day. There are ſome people of extraordinary intrepidity, who would not for all the world lie in a room, if they were told it was haunted. Others would lie there alone without any fear, tho' they be ſuch rank cowards as to ſhiver at a naked ſword. The uneaſineſs which diſturbs the former on account of a trifle which they may have taken for an ill omen; that uneaſineſs, I ſay, which no reaſoning can diſpel, will not hinder them from fighting like lions. The latter, who laugh at all evil preſages, will run away like a hare if they ſee themſelves attacked by an equal number. He who has not the courage to ſee a man let blood, or to kill a chicken, endures the moſt cruel pains with a heroic conſtancy. Another, who is cool and unconcerned in the midſt of the moſt terrible dangers of war, trembles for fear when a Phyſician tells him he muſt die. That ſtrength of ſoul which has been deſcribed, when it has been ſaid that a ſteady man is neither moved at the menaces of a tyrant, nor at the danger of ſhipwreck, nor at thunder, or lightning, and that the ruins of the world would fall on him without ſtriking him with fear:

Juſtum, & tenacem propoſiti virum,
Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus inſtantis tyranni
Mente quatit ſolida: neque Auſter,
Dux inquieti turbidus Adriæ,
Nec fulminantis magna Jovis manus:
Si fractus illabatur orbis,
Impavidum ferient ruinæ (28).

(28) Horat. Od. 3. lib. 3.

That is,

"An honeſt mind, to virtue's precepts true,
"Contemns the fury of a lawleſs crew;
"Firm as a rock, he to his purpoſe ſtands,
"And thinks a Tyrant's frowns as weak as his commands:
"Him loudeſt ſtorms can't from his center move,
"He braves th' Almighty thunder even of Jove;
"If all the heav'nly orbs, confus'dly hurl'd,
"Should daſh in pieces, and ſhould cruſh the world,
"Undaunted he the mighty cruſh would hear,
"Nor in his breaſt admit a thought of fear.

This ſtrength of mind, I ſay, is no where found in its full extent; it is hardly ſeen but by parcels. There are ſome noble ſouls, which no promiſe, no flattery, could induce to deviate from the path of virtue; but they are not proof againſt the menaces of a dungeon, or the like ill treatment. There are ſome who form the moſt noble and magnanimous reſolutions for the good of their country. In their ideas every thing is grand, every thing ſhews generoſity and fortitude; but they would never be capable of putting them in execution: they would do their duty very ill in a beſieged town, if they were poſted in the breach; an involuntary fear would ſeize them, and make them fly before they diſtinctly perceived it. The body ſeconds not the ſoul in theſe people; a certain diſpoſition of the organs, which mechanically produces fear, dejects the ſuperior part, and puts it out of countenance (29). There is, doubtleſs, a boldneſs, or an intrepidity of mind which is ſometimes attended with a great timorouſneſs of body. The courage and force of Mr. Hobbes regarded only matters of ſpeculation. There was ſcarce any Propoſition or Paradox which embarraſſed him, or to which the ſcruples of his conſcience gave way; but the leaſt bodily danger put him in a fright. Montagne, who ſeemed ſo much above prejudices, and ſo well ſtocked with the pretended force of incredulity, had a ſoftneſs of ſoul which permitted him not to ſee a chicken's throat cut without uneaſineſs, or to hear with patience the cries of a hare under the teeth of his dogs (30). Theſe varieties depend on conſtitution: let us not wonder then that a perſon who has the ſtrength to ſhake off the moſt general and ſacred opinions, has the weakneſs to tremble at the ſight of an Executioner, and to have recourſe to a thouſand diſguiſes to avoid the pains of the rack. The ſtrength of his ſoul is not directed towards the objects of the body, but towards the objects of the mind. A mean ſoul, capable of all kinds of baſe and villanous actions, a ſlave of Cappadocia (31), the greateſt coward and the greateſt raſcal in the world, has ſometimes a ſurprizing fortitude in ſupporting pain: the ſharpeſt torture both ordinary and extraordinary makes him confeſs nothing; but how many men of virtue and of admirable probity are there, who would rather accuſe themſelves falſly, than expoſe themſelves to the rack? How many perſons have there been who had a real attachment to their Religion, and yet had recourſe to all ſorts of diſſembling and equivocation, and practiſed every ſhift in the priſons of the Inquiſition (32)? The fear of puniſhment diſconcerted their ſoul, and ſuſpended the whole ſtrength of their piety. Thus do the laws of the union of ſoul and body diverſify mankind.

(29) One may ſay of them, as of immoderate eating and drinking: Quin corpus onuſtum Heſternis vitiis animum queque prægravat una, Atque affigit humi divinæ particulam auræ. Horat. Sat. 2. lib. 2.

(30) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 2. chap. 11. pag. m. 171.

(31) See above the Article of CAPPADOCIA, Citation (19).

I obſerve all theſe things, in order to reconcile Peter Charron with Mr. de la Bruyere. Do the men of ſtrong ſouls, (les eſprits forts), ſays the latter (33), know that they are called ſo by way of irony? What greater weakneſs can there be, than to be uncertain what is the principle of one's exiſtence, one's life, one's ſenſes, and one's knowledge, and what is to be the end of them? What greater diſcouragement than to doubt whether one's ſoul be not meer matter, as ſtones, and reptiles, and whether it be not corruptible like thoſe vile creatures? Is there not more ſtrength and true greatneſs in receiving into

(32) I uſe this word here to ſignify all Tribunals in general which have condemned men to death on account of Religion.

(33) La Bruyere, Charactéres de ce Siecle, pag. 666. of the Paris Edition 1694. See alſo the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 412.

ſo proper to prevent their paſſing raſh judgments [K]. However that be, Charron's Morals were irreproachable, and it is eaſy to prove, as well by his Writings as by his Actions, that he doubted not of the Truths of Chriſtianity [L]. The great miſchief and diſorder is, that of a hundred thouſand Readers, there are ſcarce three in any age which into our mind the idea of a Being ſuperior to all other Beings? &c. They are both in the right; and their diſagreement lies only in the different applications of the word ſtrength: and I do not think Mr. de la Bruyere would have denied to Charron, that Atheiſts have ſtrength in the ſame ſenſe as that dæmoniac who broke all the chains with which he was loaded, and whom no man could tame (34). As to the reſt, the precaution which Garaſſe would have had obſerved could be of no great ſervice; for it is not eaſy to correct the ideas by which mankind judge, that ſince it is a weakneſs to be frighted at the overturning of a ſaltſeller, it therefore requires ſome ſtrength to ſurmount that fear, and ſo from one degree to another. People could never be corrected in this point. tho' all Authors in general ſhould carefully forbear giving the name of ſtrength to the turn of mind we are ſpeaking of. The Infidels would appeal to their Patriarch Lucretius.

(34) Mark v. 4.

Humana ante oculos fœde cum vita jaceret
In terris oppreſſa gravi ſub relligione;
. . . . . .
Primum Graius homo mortalis tollere contra
Eſt oculos auſus, primuſque obſiſtere contra:
Quem nec fama Deûm, nec fulmina, nec minitanti
Murmure compreſſit Cœlum, ſed eo magis acrem
Virtutem irritat animi, confringere ut arcta
Naturæ primus portarum clauſtra cupiret.
. . . . . .
Quare relligio pedibus ſubjecta viciſſim
Obteritur, nos exæquat victoria cœlo (35).

(35) Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 63.

That is,

" Long time men lay oppreſs'd with ſlaviſh fear;
" Religion's tyranny did domineer.
" . . . . . .
" At length a mighty man of Greece began
" T' aſſert the nat'ral liberty of man,
" By ſenſeleſs terrors, and vain fancies led
" To ſlav'ry: ſtrait the conquer'd fantom fled!
" Not the fam'd ſtories of the Deity,
" Not all the thunder of the threat'ning Sky,
" Could ſtop his riſing ſoul; thro' all he paſt,
" The ſtrongeſt bounds that pow'rful nature caſt:
" . . . . . .
" Thus by his conqueſt we our right regain;
" Religion he ſubdu'd, and We now reign.

Creech.

[K] His cenſurers did not mind the cautions which he had given, and which were ſo proper to prevent their paſſing raſh judgments.] As Charron is not the only man whom it concerns to make the critics ſenſible of what they ought to diſtinguiſh, if they will be equitable, I ſhall tranſcribe the advice he gave them word for word. " I deſire to advertiſe the Reader who ſhall " undertake to judge of this work, that he take " care not to fall into any of theſe ſeven miſtakes, " as ſome have done with reſpect to the firſt edition; " which are, to take that for a matter of right and " a duty, which is only a matter of fact: to take that " for acting, which is only judging: to take that for " a reſolution and a determination, which is only pro- " poſed, diſcuſſed, and diſputed problematically and " academically: to impute that to me and my opi- " nions which is really another's and is only reported: " to refer that to the external ſtate, profeſſion, and con- " dition, which relates to the mind and internal ca- " pacity: to refer that to Religion and divine belief, " which is only humane opinion: to impute that to " grace and ſupernatural operation, which proceeds " only from virtue and from natural and moral action. " All paſſion and preoccupation removed, he will find " in theſe ſeven points, when well underſtood, where- " with to reſolve his doubts, wherewith to anſwer " all objections which he himſelf or others may make, " and to gain a perfect inſight into my intention in " this work. Yet if after all he is not ſatisfied, " and diſapproves it, let him attack it boldly and vi- " gorouſly (for to give ill language only, to bite, and " mangle a man's good name, is eaſy enough, but " too baſe and pedantic) and he ſhall ſoon have ei- " ther a franc confeſſion and acquieſcence, (for this " Book glories and prides itſelf in ſincerity and in- " genuity;) or an examination of his impertinence " and folly (36)." What he had ſaid juſt before is too excellent not to be inſerted in this Remark: a great number of Readers will learn their duty thence; they will there ſee what diſpoſition of mind they ought to put on when they go about to judge of a Book which is not written according to the general taſte, or according to the prejudices of the multitude, that is to ſay, wherein the Author repreſents the thoughts which ariſe in his mind, without dogmatizing, or ſeeking to form a ſect. Some find, it is Charron who ſpeaks (37), this Book too bold and free in contradicting the common opinions, and take offence at it. I return them this anſwer in four or five words. Firſt, that the wiſdom which is not common or popular, has this peculiar liberty and authority; jure ſuo ſingulari, to judge of every thing (it is the privilege of the ſpiritual wiſe man, Spiritualis omnia dijudicat, & a nemine judicatur †) and in judging, to cenſure, and condemn the common and popular opinions, as being for the moſt part erroneous. Who ſhall do it then? Now in doing this, ſhe cannot avoid incurring the diſpleaſure and envy of the world. Beſides, I complain of them, and reproach them with that popular weakneſs, and womaniſh niceneſs, as unworthy and too tender to hear any thing valuable, and utterly incapable of wiſdom: the ſtrongeſt and boldeſt propoſitions are the moſt becoming to a ſtrong and elevated mind, and there is nothing ſtrange to him who knows what the world is. It is a weakneſs to be amazed at any thing, we ſhould confirm our courage, fortify our ſoul, harden and ſteel it, to enjoy, know, underſtand, and judge of all things, let them ſeem ever ſo ſtrange: there is nothing but what is ſuitable to, and within the reach of the mind, but let it not be wanting to itſelf: however, it ought neither to do, nor conſent to any thing but what is right and decent, though all the world ſhould talk of it. The wiſe man ſhews his courage equally in both: but thoſe nice people are capable neither of the one, nor of the other; they are weak in both. Thirdly, in whatever I propoſe, I do not pretend to oblige any body to be of my opinion; I only offer things, and expoſe them to public view. I am not at all angry if my word is not taken; let pedants behave in that manner. Paſſion argues the abſence of reaſon, and he who eſpouſes an opinion for the ſake of the one, cannot eſpouſe it for the ſake of the other. But why are they angry? is it becauſe I am not of their mind in every thing? I am not angry becauſe they differ from me: is it becauſe I ſay ſome things which hit not their taſte, nor that of the vulgar? It is for that reaſon that I ſay them. I advance nothing without a reaſon; if they are capable of perceiving and taſting it, if they have a better which deſtroys mine, I ſhall hear it with pleaſure, and think myſelf obliged to him who produces it. I exhort all my Readers ſeriouſly to meditate on theſe two paſſages.

(36) Charron, Preface to the ſecond edition of his Books of Wiſdom. See alſo the Preface to his ſmall Treatiſe of Wiſdom; where you will find the ſame words. The Prior Ogier in his Cenſure of the Doctrine Curieuſe of Father Garaſſe, pag. 151, 152, alledges them in juſtification of Charron.

(37) Ibid. folio B verſo.

† He that is ſpiritual judgeth all things, yet he himſelf is judged of no man. 1 Cor. ii. 15.

[L] It is eaſy to prove, as well by his writings as by his actions, that he doubted not of the truths of Chriſtianity.] " His innocence, the ſimplicity and can- " dor of his manners, his worth and probity, have " at length overcome and ſurmounted the calumnies " and ſlanders of his adverſaries." It is thus that the Author of the Elogy ſpeaks (38). As to his morals, adds he, his converſation in life, and his actions, as well in private as in public, nothing more ſhall be ſaid here, than that he wholly conformed himſelf to the rules and duties contained in the 12 chapters of his ſecond Book of Wiſdom, and practiſed them very exactly: And what his religion and belief were, ſufficiently appears from his Book of the three Truths . . . and in his Chriſtian Diſcourſes, which have been printed ſince his deceaſe, and make a moderate volume. . . . His good conſcience appears likewiſe in the manner of his poſſeſſing, and quitting his benefices. His piety ſhines in the Will which he wrote with his own hand the 30th of January which can be pitched upon, who are capable of making due distinctions when they are to judge of a Book wherein the ideas of an exact and metaphysical reasoning are opposed to the most common opinions. I wonder Moreri has taken Charron's part [M]; for he might have found himself involved in the criticism which the Cut before the Book of Wisdom exposes to the eyes of the public. It seems to be an Emblem in favour of the Sceptics [N]. We should say something of what the Sieur Sorel observes concerning our Author [O]; which will afford a very natural opportunity of transcribing two passages nuary 1602, ... whereby, after having returned most humble thanks to God for the good things which he had received from him in his life-time, having most earnestly besought him for the sake of his infinite and incomprehensible goodness, and through the mercy of his well-beloved Son our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and all his merits multiplied and diffused through all his members, the Holy Elect, to grant him pardon, remission, and forgiveness of his offences, and that he would be pleased to take and hold him for his, to assist and guide him by his Holy Spirit, so long as he should continue in this world, to preserve and grant him to persevere with a sound understanding in his love and service, and at the hour of death to take his spirit to himself, and receive it into the company and rest of his well-beloved, and to inspire all his Holy Elect to pray and intercede for him: he bequeaths, among other things, 200 livres to the Church of Condom, if he should be buried there, on condition that on the day of his decease yearly a High Mass should be said for him, and an absolution pronounced over his grave: Moreover he gives to poor Scholars, and maids who wanted husbands, 2400 crowns, the income whereof should be annually distributed for ever, one moiety to three or four Scholars, and the other moiety to three, four, or five poor maids. Add to this, 1, the ardent desire he had to confine himself in a Monastery according to the vow which he had made so to do: 2, his precaution in having the decision of three Casuists, before he held himself discharged from that vow (39). Is it not amazing that such a person should be defamed as an enemy to Christianity, and an Atheist? Is not this a visible and deplorable effect, either of the malignity, or of the weakness of the mind of man? Here follow some verses of the Prior Ogier's against Father Garasse in favour of Charron:

(38) The Elogy of Charron: See alſo the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the ſmall Treatiſe of Wiſdom.

(39) See the Remark [A].

Damnatur sic Charro PIUS doctusque Garasso
Execratore, atque puer cunabula fandi
Vix habet, & primæ lallat documenta Minervæ,
Quamvis sancta ejus tot adhuc Ecclesia verbis
Personet eloquii, Verique in triplice libro
Fortiter hæreticæ frangat mendacia sectæ (40).

That is,

" Thus learn'd and PIOUS Charron is condemn'd
" By rude Garasse, as a meer child in speaking,
" Scarce in the rudiments of grammar skill'd;
" While yet the Church his eloquence resounds,
" And while his threefold Truth the lies of heresy
" confounds.

(40) See the Jugement & Censure de la Doctrine Curieuse, printed at Paris 1623, pag. 169.

This Writer's prose is yet more to the honour of Peter Charron. Read the 11th Chap. of his Judgment on the Doctrine Curieuse; where you will find the refutation of Garasse with respect to the pretended proofs of Atheism against the Theologal of Condom. Read also Garasse's Reply (41): it will serve, as much as any thing else, to shew his rashness; but whatever he quotes from Charron is either true, or unfaithfully cited, or may bear a good sense.

(41) That is his Apology against the Author of the Censure of la Doctrine Curieuse, chap. xxi, and xxii, pag. 259, &c.

But, some will say, has not this man declared that all men boast without foundation of having a Religion which comes from God? Here are his words: All Religions must necessarily be conveyed and delivered by extraordinary and celestial revelation, taken and received by divine inspiration, and as coming from heaven. Wherefore all make use of the same jargon, saying they hold and believe it not from men or any creature, but from God. Yet to speak the truth, without flattery or disguise, there is nothing in it. Religions are received from human hands and means, whatever may be said to the contrary (42). I answer, that in the second Edition he excepted the true Religion. This, continues he, is every way true of the false Religions, which are merely human or diabolical inventions: the true Religions, as they fall under another consideration, are also received and taken from another hand; however, a distinction ought to be made. As to their reception, the first and general publication and establishment of them was Domino cooperante, sermonem confirmante sequentibus signis †, divine and miraculous. Had he not said a little before that the misbelievers and irreligious are such because they consult and hearken too much to their own judgment, being desirous of examining and judging of matters of religion, according to their own reach and capacity, and to scan it by their own natural faculties. A man must be simple, obedient, and meek to be qualified to receive Religion, he must believe and keep up to the laws by reverence and obedience, submitting his judgment, and suffering himself to be led and conducted by public authority: Captivantes intellectum ad obsequium fidei (43)? These words may serve him for a shield against all the darts of his enemies; for if you object to him that he makes some Remarks which strike at Religion, and shew that he was more fully persuaded of the force of his Remarks, than of the truths which they attack, he may return you this answer, I should be such a one as you say, if I governed my self according to the feeble light of my reason; but I trust not such a guide, I submit my self to God's authority, and captivate my understanding to the obedience of faith.

(42) Charron, de la Sagesse, liv. 2. chap. v. pag. m. 386.

† Mark xvi. 20.

(43) Ibid. pag. 385.

[M] I wonder Moreri has taken Charron's part.] He has done it with some warmth, and so far as to say that Dupleix is brutishly passionate (44) according to his custom. This expression, methinks, is too harsh: Dupleix, speaking of the Begards †, says (45), they believed a man could not miscarry by following nature " and " that in his youth he had been familiarly acquainted " with Peter Charron Theologal of Condon, who was " prepossessed by the like errors, and preached them in his " Sermons, and that he held several other dangerous " opinions, some of which he had slipped in among the " follies of his libertine Wisdom." Here this Author highly injures Charron. Perhaps there had been some quarrel between them, which made him speak with so much animosity. These are the words of Sorel (46): he likewise is too warm, not perceiving that the design of Dupleix was rather to advance an Antithesis, and play with words, than to give very offensive language. Take notice that Moreri gives a very bad account of what relates to Charron's desire of becoming a Carthusian. He does not explain why the age of forty seven was an obstacle thereto, and he supposes that Charron did not consecrate himself to the Ecclesiastical state till after the fruitless vow of turning Monk. This is most false.

(44) This expression has been, with good reason, struck out of the Dutch Edition of Moreri.

† A Sect which arose in Germany and the Low-Countries about the end of the 13th Century, and held several pernicious opinions. ADD. REM.

(45) Sorel, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 94. citing the History of France by Dupleix, under Charles the Fair.

(46) It is from him that Moreri has taken almost all the Article of Charron.

[N] The Cut before his Book of Wisdom seems to be an Emblem in favour of Scepticism.] Charron, in the frontispiece of his Book, caused Wisdom to be represented by a beautiful woman stark naked . . with a healthy, masculine, and chearful countenance . . . standing with her feet close joined on a cube: she has on her head a crown of laurel and olive, which signifies victory and peace; a space or void around her, which signifies liberty. On her right hand are these words, I KNOW NOT, which is her motto, and on her left these other words, PEACE AND LITTLE, which is the Author's motto. . . . Below there are four little, ill favoured, despicable, wrinkled women, chained, and whose chains reach and are fastened to the Cube which is under the feet of Wisdom, who despises, condemns and tramples on them; two of them are on the right hand of the Title, viz. Passion and Opinion. Passion is meagre, with a disordered countenance; Opinion with wild looks, fickle, heedless, supported by a number of people, that is, the mob. The two others are on the opposite side of the title; viz. Superstition with an appalled countenance, and her hands joined, like a servant who trembles for fear: And false science, artificial, acquired, and pedantic virtue or sufficiency, a slave to laws and customs, with a swollen, proud, and arrogant countenance, and lofty eyebrows, who reads in a book wherein there is written, YES, NO (47).

(47) Taken from the Explication of the Frontispiece, at the end of the Preface to the Book of Wisdom.

[O] We should say something of what the Sieur Sorel observes

ſages which cauſed the greateſt clamours againſt our Theologal: one concerns the immortality of the Soul, and the other relates ſimply to Religion. I think I may ſay, that the ſincerity, with which this learned man repreſented the whole force of the Objections, ſtrongly contributed to the doubts which were raiſed as to his Chriſtianity. It is certain that he did not weaken the difficulties of the Libertines. I ſhall give an inſtance of it, which relates to the diviſions among Chriſtians [P], and the hatred which they bear to one another. It obſerves concerning our Author.] He ſays, among other things, that there are ſome people who aſſert that Charron is more dangerous than Montagne, who was a Cavalier, becauſe he being a Doctor of Divinity and a Preacher, his Book is read as a piece proper for Chriſtian inſtruction, and that nevertheleſs he has very bad notions of Religion (48). Sorel mentions two; but as he abridges the words of the Original too much, I ſhall give them at full length at the end of this Remark. To this it is anſwered, proceeds he, that Charron openly profeſſed to ſpeak freely according to his own thoughts, and that if his words are all interpreted in an ill ſenſe, when his intention was good, the fault ought not to be imputed to him. Let us obſerve, by the way, that a Lay-Writer, who is diſtinguiſhed by no character, ought to enjoy a greater liberty of ſpeaking whatever he thinks, than a Doctor in Divinity, a Preacher, or a Profeſſor; for it is preſumed that ſuch perſons advance nothing but what is deſigned for inſtruction, and that they would have their ſentiments embraced. In conſequence whereof, it is ſuppoſed that they have thoroughly examined their doctrines; and when a man conſiders their character, he eaſily ſuffers himſelf to be drawn away by the weight of authority. But if it be conſidered that it is a lay-man, dignified by no character, who ſpeaks, his arguments make no great impreſſion; his particular opinions are looked upon as advanced at a venture, and therefore his Scepticiſm is of no great conſequence. From whence it follows, that the venom which might be in Montagne's Writings, would be incomparably leſs dangerous than that which might be found in the Books of Charron. I have elſewhere mentioned a particular which Sorel has taken notice of, that a Phyſician named Chanet maintained againſt Charron that brutes do not reaſon. He adds, that ſomebody (49) has ſaid that Charron was no more than the Amanuenſis of Montagne and du Vair. And indeed, Charron has taken a great many Philoſophical ſentences word for word out of Montagne's Eſſays, and his deſcription of the paſſions is wholly Mr. du Vair's. He obſerves that a great many perſons of honour and probity have taken Charron's part (50). The learned Naudé has ſaid in his Bibliographia, "That he eſteemed him ſo highly, that he preferred him to Socrates: That Socrates had only ſpoken to his diſciples confuſedly, and as occaſion required; Whereas Charron had reduced Wiſdom to an Art, which was a divine performance, and that if in ſome places he ſpoke like Seneca and Plutarch, he always carried their thoughts farther than they would have done." In a word, it is not to be believed that a man of good morals, of an unblemiſhed life and exemplary modeſty, as Charron was, had any ill intention in his Writings. This concluſion is infinitely better than the Tranſlation of Gabriel Naudé's Latin. See the Margin (51).

Let us now tranſcribe the two Paſſages which I have promiſed. "We muſt ſometimes legitimate and authoriſe not only things which are not good, but even thoſe which are bad; as though to be good, it were neceſſary to have ſome tincture of evil. And this is ſeen not only in matters of government and juſtice, but even in Religion; which plainly ſhews that the whole human frame and conduct is compoſed and made up of crazy pieces." This is the firſt paſſage: you will find it in the fourth Chapter of the Iſt Book of Wiſdom, page 25 of the Bourdeaux Edition of 1601. The Author ſtruck out the laſt lines in the Paris Edition of 1604. He ſtopped after having ſaid (52) and this is ſeen every where, in government, juſtice, truth, and religion. But take notice that he retrenched nothing of what he had advanced to prove his theſis. He had ſaid, after all, what diſcovers human weakneſs better than Religion? He had proved this from Scripture and by evident notions. This whole paſſage was preſerved in the Edition which he corrected, and which was examined after his deceaſe. Whence we may conclude that on many occaſions a man appears a heretic only by his manner of expreſſing himſelf. Take away certain words which ſeem too harſh, and make uſe of others which ſignify the ſame thing, but are not quite ſo rough, and inſtead of being reputed a heretic, you will paſs for a true believer: the impreſſion of your work will be no longer prohibited, and the ſale of it will be allowed. In the main, this theſis of our Theologal proved, and explained in the manner it appears in his Book, is moſt true. Now follows the ſecond paſſage: "The immortality of the ſoul is a thing the "moſt univerſally, religiouſly, and plauſibly received "by all the world (I mean by an external and pub- * Book II, "lic profeſſion, not by an internal, ſerious, and ſin- chap. v. "cere belief, which will be ſpoken of hereafter *,) "the moſt uſefully believed, and the moſt weakly "proved, and eſtabliſhed by human means and argu- "ments." Theſe words are to be read in the XVth Chapter of the Iſt Book of Wiſdom, of the Edition of Bourdeaux: they were corrected in the following manner. The Immortality of the Soul is a thing the moſt univerſally, religiouſly (for it is the principal foundation of all Religion,) and plauſibly entertained by all the world: I mean with an external and public profeſſion; but not ſo much with a ſerious, internal, and ſincere one; witneſs ſo many Epicureans, Libertines, and Scoffers: however the Sadducees, who were the men of greateſt quality among the Jews, made no ſcruple to deny it: the moſt uſefully believed, and ſomewhat tolerably proved by divers natural and human reaſons, but properly and better eſtabliſhed by the authority of Religion than by any other means (53). After this correction, no fair pretenee for murmuring was left; for it would be very unjuſt to blame a man who ſhould declare that the ſtrongeſt arguments which convince him of the immortality of the Soul, are thoſe which he draws from the word of God. This is what I ſhall amply treat of in the article of POMPONATIUS. Before the correction, the only complaint which could be juſtly made was of the prejudice which ſuch a conceſſion might occaſion, not in reſpect to the ſimple, whoſe faith as to this doctrine is founded ſolely on Revelation (54), but in reſpect to Libertines, who might take advantage of the authority of ſo famous an Eccleſiaſtic. It ſeems, after all, that this prejudice was not much to be feared; for the Libertines who have any learning care very little for a Divine's acknowledging that the philoſophical proofs of the Immortality of the Soul are not ſtrong. They are not ignorant that ſuch a confeſſion will do them no ſervice ſo long as the proofs drawn from Scripture are ſo demonſtrative as they are. They know very well that Ariſtotle's Hypotheſes (55) concerning the mortality and materiality of the ſouls of brutes, and the real diſtinction between matter and extenſion (56) weaken all the natural reaſons for the ſpirituality of our ſouls. Whether this be owned or not, they do not think the thing the leſs clear for that. Even at this day they perſiſt in their prejudices, becauſe they ſee the ſtrong proofs which the new Philoſophy has afforded of the Immortality of the Soul lead to either the one or the other of theſe two concluſions which ſeem equally abſurd, either that the ſoul of brutes is immortal, or that brutes are meer machines.

[P] He did not weaken the difficulties of the Libertines. I ſhall give an inſtance of it which relates to the diviſions among Chriſtians.] "It is indeed a ſtrange "thing that the Chriſtian Religion, which being the "only true Religion in the world, and revealed by "God, ought to be preciſely one, and indiviſible, ſince "there is but one God and one truth, ſhould yet be "rent into ſo many parts, and divided into ſo many "contrary opinions and ſects; ſo that there is not a "ſingle article of faith, or point of doctrine, which "has not been differently debated and diſcuſſed, and "concerning which there have not been contrary "ſects and hereſies. And what makes it ſeem yet "more ſtrange is, that in the other falſe and ſpurious "Religions, the Gentile, the Pagan, the Jewiſh, and

(48) Sorel, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 92.

(49) It is Balzac, if we believe Moreri in the Article of Peter Charron.

(50) Sorel, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 95, 96.

(51) Here are the Words of Naudé, pag. m. 13, of his Bibliographia Politica. Petrus Charondas vel hoc ipſo Socrate ſapientior æſtimandus venit, quod ſapientiæ ipſius præcepta primus, quod ſciam, admirabili prorſus methodo, doctrina, judicio in artem reduxerit. Sane ejus liber, & Ariſtotelem nobis exhibet & Senecam, & Plutarchum, ac divinius etiam aliquid præ ſe fert, quam Antiquioribus cunctis & recentioribus fuerit conceſſum.
It is evident that Sorel has perverted Naudé's thought.

(52) In the 38th chapter of the 1ſt Book, pag. m. 188.

(53) Charron, de la Sageſſe, liv. 1. chap. 7. Ed. Paris 1604; it is page 63 of the Edition of Roan, 1623.

(54) The common people are not acquainted with the philoſophical arguments for the immortality of the Soul.

(55) As they were explained in the time of Charron in the Catholic and Proteſtant Univerſities, they admitted the Categories of Ariſtotle; they thought therefore that Quantity was diſtinct from Matter, as the Accident is diſtinct from the Subſtance.

(56) The Proteſtant Peripatetics have indeed maintained actual Quantity to be inſeparable from Matter, but not to be the Eſſence of it.

It is remarkable, that in the year 1607 (g), there remained no male poſterity of Thibaud Charron (b), the father of him who is the ſubject of this Article, though he had five and twenty children; four by his firſt wife, and one and twenty by his (i) ſecond (k).

(g) Elogy of Charron, at the beginning.
(b) He was a Bookſeller of Paris.
(i) This was the mother of Peter Charron.
(k) Elogy of Peter Charron, at the beginning.

" the Mahometan, ſuch diviſions or partialities are " not found. For the diviſions in them are either " few in number, light, and of ſmall importance, as " in the Jewiſh and Mahometan Religions; or if they " have been numerous, as in the Gentile Religion, " and among the Philoſophers, at leaſt they have not " produced very great and ſignal effects or commotions " in the world, and are nothing in reſpect of the great " and pernicious diviſions, which have been among the " profeſſors of the Chriſtian Religion from the very " beginning, and have continued ever ſince. For if " we conſider the effects which the diviſions of Chri- " ſtians have produced, it is a terrible thing. Firſt " as to government and the State, they have frequent- " ly occaſioned changes and ſubverſions of Common- " wealths, Kingdoms, and families, the diviſions of " Empires, and even an univerſal diſturbance of the " world, with cruel, furious, and more than bloody " deeds, to the very great ſcandal, ſhame, and re- " proach of Chriſtendom; where, under the name of " zeal and affection for Religion, each party mortally " hates all the reſt, and deems it lawful to commit " all kinds of hoſtilities. A thing which is not ſeen " in other Religions. Chriſtians alone are allowed to " be murderers, perfidious, treacherous, and recipro- " cally to commit all ſorts of cruelty againſt the " living, and the dead, againſt men's honour, life, " memory, minds, ſepulchers, and aſhes, by fire, ſword, " abuſive libels, curſes, baniſhments from heaven and " earth, taking up dead bodies out of their graves, " burning of bones, and removing of altars: and this " without accepting any compoſition, and with ſuch " fury, that all conſideration of kindred, affinity, " friendſhip, merit, and obligation are caſt off: and " he who was yeſterday extolled to the ſkies, and de- " clared to be great, wiſe, virtuous, and prudent, if " he change ſides to day, is preached, written, and " cried down as an ignorant, wretched fellow. Here- " in are zeal and warmth for one's Religion ſhewn: " this excepted, in all other reſpects, there is nothing " in the practice of Religion but coldneſs. Thoſe " who behave themſelves with moderation and cau- " tion in this point, are noted and ſuſpected as luke- " warm, and wanting zeal: it is an abominable fault, " to look kindly on, or to treat friendly thoſe of the " contrary party. Some are ſcandalized at all this, " as if the Chriſtian Religion taught men to hate and " perſecute one another, and ſerved us for a Broker " to exerciſe and improve our paſſions of ambition, " avarice, revenge, hatred, malice, cruelty, rebellion, " and ſedition: which elſewhere keep holiday, and " are not ſo violent, as when excited by Religion (57)."

This great ſcandal might at this day be eaſily repreſented in more elegant terms; but I defy our beſt writers to expreſs it with more force, or to expoſe the ſhamefulneſs of it more effectually. Charron employs his utmoſt ſkill to remove it; and he ſpares no pains: a man would be as much in the wrong to charge him with any prevarication in this reſpect, as Gataſſe is to bring that charge againſt him with regard to another point. Let us cite that Jeſuit's words: they are exceedingly unjuſt (58). " In the ſame place (59) he " openly declares, tho', according to his uſual cuſtom, " with a treacherous and ſmooth train of words, " That Religion is a wiſe invention of men, to retain " the populace in their duty: and tho' he ſeems to put " it into the mouth of the Atheiſts, yet he acts like " Lucilio Vanini, or rather the latter acts like the for- " mer; he betrays his cauſe: for he ſets down the full " ſtrength of their reaſons, explains them, comments " upon them, puts them in order, and ſo leaves them. " A baſe prevarication, but common with thoſe two " Writers (60)." It is moſt falſe to ſay Charron does this; for after having faithfully propoſed the Objections of the Atheiſts, he refutes them with a great deal of application and ſolidity. But this is what diſpleaſes vulgar Authors who have more wit and learning than ſincerity. They would have the enemies of the good cauſe always ſhewn in a languid and ridiculous equipage, or at leaſt their ſtrong objections oppoſed by an anſwer yet ſtronger. Sincerity is againſt the firſt method; and the nature of the ſubject ſometimes renders the other impoſſible. I have long been ſurprized to ſee thoſe looked on as prevaricators who propoſe to themſelves great difficulties, and refute them weakly. What! do you expect to have the Anſwers of a Divine concerning myſteries which ſurpaſs reaſon, be as clear as the Objections of a Philoſopher? Nay from this very thing, that a doctrine is myſterious, and almoſt utterly incomprehenſible to the weakneſs of human underſtanding, it neceſſarily follows that our reaſon will oppoſe it with very ſtrong arguments, and can find out no other good ſolution than the Authority of God. However it be, Charron flattered not his own ſide: he had a penetrating wit, he diſcovered a long way off the ſhifts and doubles of an Adverſary who either attacks, or is attacked. He took his meaſures accordingly, he explained himſelf ingenuouſly, and uſed no cunning to get the better. But he ſuffered for it: for the world likes not ſuch candor.

I ſhall give elſewhere (61) another inſtance of his ſincerity in diſplaying difficulties.

(57) Charron, in the 1ſt Chapter of the 3d Book of the three Truths.
(58) Ibid.
(59) That is, in the firſt Book of the three Truths.
(60) Gataſſe, Apologie contre la Cenſure de la Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 266.
(61) In the Remark [G] of the Article SIMONIDES.

CHASTEL. (JOHN) the ſon of a Woollen-draper at Paris, attempted to kill Henry IV December the 27th 1594. This Prince having took a journey to the borders of the Province of Artois, was returned to Paris that very day; he was in the Chamber of his Miſtreſs (a), who lived then at the Hotel de Bouchage, and as he was going to embrace Montigni, he was ſtruck in his under lip with a knife which broke a tooth in his mouth (b). John Chaſtel, who gave him that blow, and deſigned to cut his throat (c), was then but eighteen or nineteen years old. He had no ſooner given the blow, but he dropt his knife and hid himſelf in the crowd. Every body ſtood amazed, being puzzled whom to charge with the villany; and the wicked young wolf was like to eſcape . . . . but ſome body happened to caſt an eye upon him, and he was taken at a venture (d); his wild look betrayed him (e). The King commanded the Captain of his Guards, who had ſeized him, . . . to let him go, ſaying, that he pardoned him. But hearing that he was a diſciple of the Jeſuits, he cried out, Muſt then the Jeſuits be convicted from my own mouth (f)? This parricide being carried to the priſon (g) called For-l'Eveque, was there examined by the great Provoſt or ordinary Judge of the King's Houſhold, and declared the reaſons which determined him to ſuch a deſperate attempt [A]. The next day he was brought to (a) Gabriella d'Eſtrée.

(b) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. edit. of Amſt. by Wolfgang in 1676, tom. 6. pag. 127.
(c) Cayet, Chronol. Novenaire, under the year 1594, folio 432 verſo.
(d) Paſquier, Catéchiſme des Jeſuites, liv. 3. chap. 8. pag. m. 375.
(e) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 6. pag. 127.
(f) Cayet, Chronol. Novenaire, under the year 1594, fol. 432 verſo.
(g) Ibid.

[A] He attempted to kill Henry IV . . . and declared the reaſons which determined him to ſuch a deſperate attempt.] I cannot quote any Author, whoſe authority ought to be leſs ſuſpected, than that of the Hiſtorian, whoſe words I ſhall tranſcribe. " This parricide, ſays " he (1), being conducted to the priſon of For-l'Evê- " que, confeſſed, that it was a long while ſince he was " deliberating with himſelf to attempt that murther, " and that having miſſed his aim, he would endeavour " it again if it were in his power, being perſuaded, " that it would be very much to the advantage of Re- " ligion. That within a week he had again begun to " think to the jail belonging to the Parliament, and repeated the ſame declaration he had made in his former examination (b), and was ſentenced to death by a decree of the Parliament December the 29th 1594 [B], which ſentence was executed upon him the ſame day by the light of Flambeaux. By the ſame Decree all the Jeſuits were baniſhed out of France (i). John Chaſtel's father, and the Jeſuit Gueret, under whom the murtherer was then ſtudying Philoſophy, were tried the 10th of January following (k). We ſhall relate below the ſentence that was paſſed upon them [C]; we ſhall alſo give a ſhort account

(1) Cayet, Chronol. Novenaire, under the year 1594, folio 432 verſo.

(b) Ibid. fol. 423 verſo.

(i) See the laſt Remark of the Article GUIGNARD.

(k) Thuanus, lib. 112. pag. m. 653.

" think of this undertaking, and that about eleven " of the clock that morning, he took the reſolution to " do what he had done, having provided himſelf with " a kniſe, which he took out of the ſide-board at his " father's houſe, and carried it into his cloſet, whence " he came down again to dine with his father and with " ſome other perſons. Being examined concerning his " qualifications, and aſked where he had ſtudied, he " anſwered, that he ſtudied chiefly under the Jeſuits, " with whom he had lived three years, and that he " made his laſt courſe under Father John Gueret a " Jeſuit; that he had ſeen the ſaid Father Gueret on " Friday or Saturday before he made his attempt, hav- " ing been conducted to that Jeſuit by his Father Peter " Chaſtel, to conſult him concerning a caſe of conſci- " ence, which was, that the great ſins he had committed " made him deſpair of God's mercy; that he had of- " ten had a mind to commit very heinous unnatural " crimes, which deſign he had ſeveral times confeſſed " to a Prieſt; that in order to atone for his crimes, he " thought he was obliged to perform ſome great acti- " on; that he often had a mind to murther the King, " and mentioned this fancy to his father, who an- " ſwered him, that it would be an evil action." This is what he anſwered, when he was examined before the Judge of the King's houſhold; here follows what he anſwered the next day before the Officers of the Parliament. " Being aſked " what that great action was, which he thought " he was obliged to perform, in order to atone " for the great crimes, which lay heavy upon his " conſcience, he ſaid, . . . That thinking he was for- " ſaken by God, and being perſuaded, that he ſhould " be damned like Antichriſt, he would of two evils " avoid the worſt, and that ſince he muſt be damned, " he choſe rather to be damned ut quatuor than ut octo: " (That is, to ſuffer but four degrees of pain, rather " than eight). Being aſked, whether in this deſpe- " rate condition he thought to loſe or to ſave his ſoul " by that wicked action? he anſwered, that this action " of his would leſſen his puniſhment, being perſuaded, " that he would be more ſeverely puniſhed, if he di- " ed without having attempted to murther the King, " and that he would be ſeverely puniſhed, if he en- " deavoured to put him to death; ſo that in his opi- " nion a leſſer puniſhment was a kind of ſalvation, if " compared with the moſt intolerable torments. To " the queſtion whence he had this new Theology, he " replied, from the ſtudy of Philoſophy. Being aſk- " ed, whether he ſtudied Philoſophy in the College of " the Jeſuits? he anſwered, yes, and that he ſtudied " two years and a half under Father Gueret. Being " aſked, whether he never was in the Meditation- " Chamber, in which are the pictures of ſeveral De- " vils, and a great many ſtrange figures, and in which " the Jeſuits introduce the greateſt ſinners, with a pre- " tence to reclaim them from their wicked lives, but in " reality to diſturb their minds, and to frighten them " by ſuch apparitions into a reſolution to commit ſome " bold action? He anſwered, that he had often been " in that Meditation-Chamber. Being aſked, who it " was, that perſuaded him to murther the King? his " anſwer was, That he heard in ſeveral places, it was " an unqueſtionable maxim, that it is lawful to kill " the King, and that they who ſaid it, called him a " Tyrant. Then they aſked him, whether it was not " cuſtomary with the Jeſuits to talk of killing the " King? To which he replied, that he had heard " them ſay, that it was lawful to kill the King, that " he was without the pale of the Church, and that " one ought not to obey him, nor to acknowledge him " for a King, till he had obtained the Pope's appro- " bation. Being again examined in the Grand-Cham- " bre, the Preſidents, Counſellors, and the Tournelle * " being met, he made the ſame anſwers, and particu- " larly aſſerted and maintained the following propoſi- " tion. It was lawful to kill Kings, even the King " now reigning, who was no member of the Church, as " he ſaid, becauſe he was not approved by the Pope (2).

(2) Cayet, Chronol. Novenaire, folio 433 verſo, &c.

* A Court for criminal Cauſes, belonging to the Parliament of Paris.

[B] He was ſentenced to death by a Decree of the Parliament, December the 29th, 1594.] They, who want to know a particular account of the ſufferings to which he was condemned, muſt read the following paſſage. The Court has condemned and does condemn the ſaid John Chaſtel to make honourable amends before the chief door of the Church of Paris, ſtripped to his ſhirt, holding in his hand a lighted wax-taper of two pound weight, and there to ſay and declare on his knees, that he had wickedly and treacherouſly attempted to commit this moſt inhuman and moſt abominable murther, and had wounded the King in the face with a kniſe; and that having been taught a falſe and damnable doctrine, he ſaid on his trial, that it was lawful to kill the King, and that King Henry the IVth now reigning, was not a member of the Church, till he had obtained the Pope's approbation; of which he (the ſaid John Chaſtel) repents, and for which he begs pardon of God, of the King, and of the Court. This done, he is to be carried in a tumbrel to the place of execution †, and there to have the fleſh of his arms and thighs torn off with red-hot pincers; and his right hand, in which he is to hold the knife, with which he endeavoured to commit the murther, cut off; afterwards his body to be drawn and quartered by four horſes pulling ſeveral ways, and his members and corps to be thrown into the fire, and burnt to aſhes, and the aſhes thrown up into the air. The Court alſo has declared and does declare all his goods and chattels forfeited to the King. Before this ſentence be executed upon him, he ſhall alſo be put to the rack and ſuffer the ordinary and extraordinary torture, to force him to declare his accomplices, and ſome other circumſtances relating to his ſaid trial (3).

† In French la Place de Greve, which anſwers to what we call Tyburn.

Let us obſerve, that this ſentence of the Parliament of Paris, was put at Rome in the Index expurgatory, or of prohibited Books. The Author of the Anticoton did not let this circumſtance paſs unobſerved; but here follows the anſwer, that was made him. " As for " what he adds, that the ſentence againſt Chaſtel was " cenſured at Rome, we anſwer, that it is falſe, if " taken thus abſolutely without any reſtriction; for " they anſwered from Rome to the late King, that " they anſwered only, what is de jure, and not what " is de facto, aſſuring him at the ſame time, that " they abhorred Chaſtel's abominable attempt as much " as France herſelf did. But that there was in that " ſentence a clauſe by which a certain propoſition was " declared to be heretical, which they thought fell " under the cognizance of the Church only, and that " this had been the ſubject of the cenſure (4)." One of thoſe, who wrote againſt the Myſtere d'Iniquité (5) (the Myſtery of Injuſtice) made uſe of the ſame diſtinction. Rivetus, who anſwered him, admitted it; but maintained that notwithſtanding this, the cenſure was to be blamed (6). Let us alſo obſerve, that the Jeſuits publiſhed in Flanders, both at Douay and in ſeveral other places an Advertiſement to the Catholicks concerning the Decree which had been made againſt their ſociety. This Advertiſement in Latin and in French was diſperſed through all the Kingdoms of Chriſtendom (7); and there was an Anſwer publiſhed againſt it. You will find in Cayet (8) the chief heads contained in theſe two pieces.

(3) Cayet, Chronol. Novenaire, under the year 1594, folio 434 verſo.

(4) Réponſe Apologétique à l'Anticoton, pag. 45. of the 2d edition in 1611. See alſo Richeome, Examen Catégorique de l'Anticoton, pag. 170.

(5) It is a book written by Mr. Du-Pleſſis-Mornai.

(6) Rivet, Défenſe des deux Epitres, & de la Préface du Myſtére d'iniquité contre les Cavillations & Calomnies de Pelletier & du Bray, pag. 23, 24.

(7) Cayet, Chronol. Novenaire, under the year 1594, folio 437 verſo.

(8) Ibid. folio 438, &c.

[C] John Chaſtel's father and the Jeſuit Gueret . . . were tried . . . we ſhall relate . . . the ſentence, that was paſſed upon them.] " The Court has baniſhed " and does hereby baniſh the ſaid Gueret and Peter " Chaſtel out of the Kingdom of France; namely, " the ſaid Gueret for ever, and the ſaid Chaſtel for " the time and term of nine years, and for ever " out of the city and ſuburbs of Paris; and they are " charged to keep their baniſhment upon pain of be- " ing hanged and ſtrangled, without any further trial. " The Court has alſo declared, and does hereby de- " clare all the goods and chattels of the ſaid Gueret " to account of a book that was publiſhed ſome time after, with this title, Apologie pour Jehan Chaſtel, i. e. "A Defence of John Chaſtel [D]." The Author of this Book relates, that they cauſed a Lay-man to diſguiſe himſelf in the habit of a Prieſt, and that they ſent

"to be forfeited to the King; and has fined, and "condemned and does hereby condemn the ſaid Peter "Chaſtel to pay a fine of two thouſand Crowns, to "be applied towards buying bread for the priſoners "in the Parliament's Jail; the ſaid Chaſtel is to be "kept in priſon till he has fully paid the ſaid ſum, "and the time of his baniſhment to begin only from "the day on which the payment ſhall have been com-"pleated. The Court alſo orders, that the houſe in "which the ſaid Peter Chaſtel lived, be entirely de-"moliſhed and laid even with the ground, and the "ſpot on which it ſtands applied to the uſe of the "public, and that no other houſe be ever built upon "it; but that a high Pillar of free ſtone be ſet up "there for a perpetual monument, for that moſt wick-"ed and abominable murder attempted on the King's "perſon; and that on the ſaid pillar be engraved an "inſcription containing the reaſons for which the "houſe was demoliſhed, and the pillar erected, the "charges of all this to be paid with the money ac-"cruing from the ſale of the materials of the ſaid "houſe (9)." The Hiſtorian from whom I have tranſcribed this, adds, This ſentence was executed, and the houſe demoliſhed, inſtead of which a pillar was put up, with a table of black marble on each ſide, with inſcriptions in golden letters; on one ſide was John Chaſtel's ſentence, and on the three others, there were verſes and other inſcriptions relating to the ſame ſubject. This pillar has been ſince taken down, and they have cauſed a ſpring to run there inſtead of it, as we ſhall obſerve in the following part of this Hiſtory of the Peace (10).

(9) Ibid. folio 437.

(10) Ibid. folio 437 verſo.

This Writer has omitted a circumſtance, which he ought to have mentioned, namely, that Gueret was put to the rack, and made no confeſſion.

[D] We ſhall give a ſhort account of a Book .... intitled a Defence of John Chaſtel.] The whole title is as follows. Apologie pour Jehan Chaſtel Pariſien, executé à mort, & pour les Péres & Eſcholiers de la Societé de Jeſus, bannis du Royaume de France, contre l'Arrêt du Parlement donné contre eux à Paris le 29 de Decembre, Anno 1594, Diviſée en cinq Parties. Par François de Veronne Conſtantin. i. e. "A Defence of John "Chaſtel of Paris, who was executed, and of the fa-"thers and ſcholars of the Society of Jeſus, againſt "the decree of the Parliament given againſt them at "Paris, December the 29th, 1594. Divided into "five parts; By Francis de Veronne Conſtantin."

The firſt part contains ſeven chapters, in which the Author deſigns to undeceive thoſe, who judge of things only by the outward reſemblance, which there is often between good and evil. If a man minds only the outward appearance of John Chaſtel's action, and conſiders only the perſons concerned, he will conclude that Chaſtel was guilty of the moſt abominable parricide; for he will think, that a private perſon attempted to murther his lawful Prince. But, adds this Author (11), a man who conſiders what things really are, rather than what is ſaid of them, and who has a regard for the judgment, not of paſſionate people, but of the Church, and of the State, who obſerves what the Laws are both human and divine, the fundamental laws of the Kingdom, which have always been received, publiſhed, revered, practiſed and admitted in France, namely, that an excommunicated perſon, an heretic, a relapſe, a profaner of ſacred things, a man declared to be a public enemy, a perſecutor, an oppreſſor of Religion, does as ſuch ipſo facto forfeit his right of ſucceeding to the Crown, and conſequently is a tyrant and not a King, an uſurper and not a natural Lord, a criminal and not a lawful ſovereign; a man, I ſay, who conſiders this, (unleſs he be mad, and loſt to all ſenſe of humanity, and of love towards God, towards the Church and toward his Country) will forbear ſaying otherwiſe, but that to endeavour to rid the world of ſuch a monſter, is a generous, virtuous, and heroical action, worthy to be compared with the greateſt and moſt commendable actions recorded in ancient Hiſtory either ſacred or profane. One thing only can be blamed in John Chaſtel, and that is, that he did not accompliſh his deſign, by ſending the wicked to his own place, like Judas whoſe followers he ſupports, and theſe are the Calviniſts. And as his deſign miſcarried, ſome will ſay, that it was evidently a bleſſing from heaven, and that they who doubt of it are atheiſts (as ſome ſcribler wrote it) whereas others will ſay with much more reaſon, that it is a proof, not of God's favour, but of his anger, not of his mercy, but of his indignation againſt his people, from whom he would not yet take off the rod of Aſſur (whom yet he has curſed) nor break the yoke of his burthen, nor the ſtaff of his ſhoulder, nor the rod of his oppreſſor, as in the day of Midian *. And as for the tyrant himſelf, it is not ſo much a preſervation of him, as a delay for a better time, till the hour, appointed by God, is come; then he ſhall be puniſhed more ſeverely in the next world, when his malice ſhall be completed, and the people ſhall have been ſufficiently puniſhed. Obſerve, that in the XIIth Chapter of the Vth Part, page 249, he gives his readers hopes, that another murderer will ſucceed better. If of late, ſays he, the firſt blow, which the Prince of the Beggars (he means William Prince of Orange) received, hit only his jaw-bone, the ſecond was more ſucceſsful. And as the former was an omen of the latter, ſo the ſame will happen to him, who has now been ſtruck only in his face. The Reader may underſtand by the paſſages, which I have quoted, that this writer grounds his vindication or apology upon the ſuppoſition, that Henry IV was not a King, but a Tyrant and an Uſurper.

(11) Apologie pour Jehan Chaſtel, 1 Part chap. 7. pag. m. 21.

* Iſaiah ix. 4.

He undertakes to prove in the ſecond part, that Chaſtel's action is lawful. He grants, that Kings are ſacred perſons (21), but then he aſſerts, that Chaſtel's intention was not to wound or to kill a King, but only one who called himſelf King, and who only reſembled a King, if not by his gravity or perſonal merit, at leaſt becauſe he is of the blood of the Kings of France, and is waited on as a King; tho' otherwiſe he be no more a King, than he is an heir to the faith, virtue and merit of the Kings of France. And having been for this reaſon, that is, for his impiety and hereſy, moſt juſtly excluded from the throne, he can only be a King de facto, and not de jure, which is downright tyranny, and tyranny with a witneſs (13). He ſays, that the pretended converſion of Henry IV cannot entitle him to the Crown (14), conſidering his Excommunication both de jure and de facto, ſtill keeps him bound and continues to have its natural effect, namely, to deprive him of the Kingdom (15). He even aſſerts (16), that the Pope's abſolution would not be ſufficient, to re-eſtabliſh a man, who had been condemned not only by the Church, but even by the States; for the Pope can indeed acquit a perſon from the ſpiritual puniſhments, but not from the temporal (17). He goes farther ſtill, and even brings his right to the Crown into queſtion (18); he quotes ſeveral inſtances to prove, that even in France they have often excluded the neareſt heir to the Crown, that they might have an opportunity to inſiſt upon their right of election in favour of a more remote inheritor. And as to the particular regulations concerning the right of ſucceſſion, continues he (19), ſince the learned agree, that a man can no longer claim a right of conſanguinity beyond the tenth degree, we may judge from thence how weak and ill-grounded his claim muſt be, who is in the twenty ſecond degree of conſanguinity. He reckons otherwiſe than Mr. de Perefixe, who ſuppoſes but ten or eleven degrees of kindred between Henry III and Henry IV (20), as I have obſerved in another place (21). He ſays in Chapter the XIth, that we ought to prefer the moſt important commandments before thoſe that are leſs important, and that according to this rule, if murther be unlawful generally ſpeaking, yet it is lawful to kill ſome ſort of perſons, and amongſt others theſe two ſorts, viz. Heretics and Tyrants (22), for which he quotes ſome paſſages from the Scriptures and from Canon-Law; and in the XIth Chapter he aſſerts, that heretics muſt be put to death by private perſons, if it cannot be done otherwiſe. He alledges (23) a decree of the Parliament of Paris made in the year 1560, and pronounced by the late Preſident le Maiſtre againſt heretics, and which made it lawful for any one to kill them. This decree was grounded on very weighty reaſons, ſince no beaſt is more dangerous than that, which devours the ſoul, no robber more dreadful than he who robs men of their Faith and Religion, no aſp more venomous

(12) Apologie pour Jehan Chaſtel, 2 Part. chap. 2.

(13) Ibid. chap. 3 pag. 31.

(14) Ibid. chap 4.

(15) Ibid. chap. 5. pag. 38.

(16) Ibid. chap. 8.

(17) Ibid. pag. 55.

(18) Ibid. chap. 9.

(19) Ibid. pag. 71.

(20) We find but ten or eleven degrees between Robert of France, the Stock of the Bourbons, who was the fixth ſon of St. Lewis (the common anceſtor of Henry III. and Henry IV) and this latter. Robert was born in 1256, and Henry IV in 1553: but the difference between Mr. De Perefixe's account and that of the Author of Chaſtel's Apology, comes from thence, that the degrees of kindred are reckoned otherwiſe in the Civil Law, than they are in the Common-Law.

(21) In the Remark [E] of the Article of HENRY IV.

(22) Apologie pour Jehan Chaſtel, Part 2. chap. 13. pag. 75.

(23) Ibid. chap. 12. pag. 81.

sent him as a Father Confeſſor to John Chaſtel, in order to diſcover by this artifice the whole myſtery of this affair; but that the pretended Confeſſor did not know how to act his nomous than that, which whilſt it fauns upon you, ſtings you thro' the heart; and no poiſoner more pernicious, than he who poiſons the waters of Jacob's wells * (which is the word of God or the Scripture) as the Philiſtines did formerly. In the XIIIth Chapter he tranſcribes what ſeveral Authors have ſaid, namely, that the killing of Tyrants is a lawful and commendable action. He ſays, that Lyranus †, Cajetanus, Soto, Sylveſter, Fumus, and others after St. Thomas, . . Fernandus Vaſquius, Covarruvias ‡, and others unanimouſly aſſert, even without ſpeaking of Religion, "That when a Tyrant by force of arms, or by other wicked means, uſurps an unlawful authority, to which he has no right, and no recourſe can be had to a ſuperior judge to bring the tyrant to juſtice, and his tyranny cannot otherwiſe be ſuppreſſed, in ſuch a caſe, it is lawful for every private perſon amongſt the people to kill the uſurper; even as Cajetanus adds, with poiſon, and in a treacherous manner. And St. Thomas vindicates Cicero's ſaying upon this ſubject, which we have quoted above from his Offices, and adds the following argument; as a Tyrant makes an unjuſt war againſt all the people in general, and againſt every private perſon, and on the contrary they all are juſtly at war with him, they may employ againſt him all that the laws of war allow againſt a real enemy; ſo that if he be killed it is by a public and not a private authority (24). Even the heretics, adds he (25), have filled their Books with theſe maxims, tho' they talk differently according as their affairs charge, or as they live under a Prince, who favours or oppoſes them. This appears from the Author of the queſtions under the name of Junius Brutus, from George Buchanan in his Book de jure Regni &c. in which he places tyrants amongſt the ſavage beaſts, and ſays they ought to be treated alike; from Bodin in his Republick, where he ſays that a tyrant who employs violent means, muſt undergo the penalty of the Lex Valeria (or Valerian Law) by which it is ordered, that ſuch men be put to death without any tryal. To this muſt be aſcribed the murthers of ſo many Noblemen in France, Scotland, England and Germany, whom they have ſlaughtered by their Miniſter's advice, under colour that they were Tyrants, becauſe they were Catholics. Hence alſo the murther of ſeveral Kings, as that of Charles IX; we may likewiſe quote Beza's Panegyric, in which he canonizes Poltrot and makes a Saint of him, becauſe he had killed the great Francis of Lorrain Duke of Guiſe, whom they above all ſtiled a Tyrant. In this reſpect the only difference there is between them (the heretics) and us, is this, viz. who muſt or muſt not be called a Tyrant." He finiſhes this ſecond part with a particular account of the ſeveral advantages which accrue from John Chaſtel's attempt, and on this occaſion he abuſes Henry IV in a moſt bitter and outragious manner.

In the third part he aſſerts, that John Chaſtel's action is heroical; he extols him above Ehud, Phineas, and Mattathias (26); nor does he forget to compare his courage with that of the Prince of Orange's two murtherers (27), and to that of James Clement. Nor does he omit the Godly Poet Cornelius Muſius (38), who ſuffered martyrdom in Holland as he calls it, adding, that De Lumay, who was his executioner, was afterwards rewarded as he deſerved, having been torn to pieces and devoured by his own dogs. Our apologiſt deſcribes at large Chaſtel's courage and reſolution at his confeſſion, at his examination, upon the rack, when he made honourable amends, and at his execution. When he made honourable amends he was earneſtly preſſed to declare, that he repented, and begged pardon of God; but tho' he was quite maimed by his ſufferings upon the rack, yet he ſaid, "that he begged God's mercy for the "ſins he had committed during the whole courſe of "his life, and eſpecially, that he had not accompliſhed "what he attempted to rid the world of the moſt "dangerous enemy the Church had upon the whole face "of the earth (29)." It is a deplorable thing, that a parricide like this ſhould ſhew as much reſolution as the moſt illuſtrious Martyrs of the primitive Church.

In the fourth part he criticizes upon the decree of the Parliament of Paris againſt John Chaſtel; he pretends to obſerve ſeveral notorious falſities in it; and even a downright hereſy and great abſurdities in the condemnation of Chaſtel's action, in that part of the ſentence which related to the honourable amends, and in their prohibiting ever to utter John Chaſtel's maxims, which he maintains, are neither ſcandalous, nor ſeditious, nor contrary to the word of God.

His deſign in the fifth part is to expoſe the defects and abſurdities with which the ſentence pronounced againſt the Jeſuits abounded, according to him. Here he inveighs moſt paſſionately againſt Achilles de Harlai the firſt Preſident, and againſt Servin Advocate General in the Parliament of Paris. He aſſerts that this ſentence contains ſeveral calumnies and aſperſions, and enlarges upon the praiſes of the Jeſuits; he alſo anſwers Anthony Arnauld's plea, and labours to juſtify the two Jeſuits, one of whom had been put to the rack (30) and the other hanged (31); he makes a Martyr of the latter, and in the cloſe of his Book he exhorts his Readers very earneſtly to exterminate the enemy of God and of the Church.

This apology for John Chaſtel was firſt printed in 1595; it was afterwards reprinted in 1610 after the tragical death of Henry IV; they added four ſmall pieces to it. I. The firſt had been printed at Paris in 1589 for Nicholas Nivelle, in St. James's ſtreet, at the two Pillars, and Rolin Thierry, in the Engliſh ſtreet (ruë des Anglois) near Maubert's Square (la Place Maubert,) Bookſeller and Printer to the Holy Union *; it is intitled, Effects épouvantables de l'excommunication de HENRY DE VALOIS et de HENRY DE NAVARRE, où eſt contenue au vray l'Hiſtoire de la mort de Henry de Valois, & que Henry de Navarre eſt incapable de la Couronne de France. i. e. "An account of the dreadful effects of the Excommunication of HENRY DE "VALOIS, and of HENRY DE NAVARRE, containing alſo the true Hiſtory of Henry of Valois's death, "and proving that Henry de Navarre cannot lawfully "inherit the Crown of France." II. The ſecond is "intitled; Lettre de l'illuſtriſſime Cardinal de Montalte écrite par le commandement de notre S. Pere le Pape au Conſeil general de la Sainte Union. i. e. "A letter "of the moſt illuſtrious Cardinal de Montalte written "by the Pope's command to the general Council of "the Holy Union." This letter has been printed at Paris with a licence in 1589 by the ſame Booksellers, who publiſhed the former piece. III. The third is intitled, Diſcours par lequel il eſt montré qu'il n'eſt loiſible au Subject de médire de ſon Roy, & encor moins d'attenter à ſa perſonne. i. e. "A diſcourſe, in which "it is proved, that it is not lawful for a ſubject to re"vile his King, much leſs to attempt upon his perſon." IV. The fourth is intitled, Les ſoupirs de la France ſur la mort de ſon Roy Henry IV, & la fidelité des François. i. e. "The ſighs of France upon the death of "her King Henry IV, and the loyalty of the French." The collection of all theſe pieces contains 323 pages in 8vo, whereof the apology for John Chaſtel takes up the firſt 256. Notwithſtanding this ſecond Edition the Book is become very ſcarce, ſo that I thought the Readers would not be diſpleaſed to find a ſhort account of it in this place.

The perſon, who cauſed it to be reprinted in 1610 owns, that the chief reaſon which induced him to republiſh it, was amongſt others, that the world might be convinced, it is from the Jeſuit's ſchool that ſuch parricides, as Ravaillac, are ſent abroad. He ſays, that this murtherer had been encouraged to aſſaſſinate his King, among other things, by the damnable doctrine which is taught in this apology for John Chaſtel, in which it is impudently aſſerted, that Henry IV could not be a King, tho' he had been abſolved, and in which it is expreſly declared, that heretics and their abettors, and eſpecially the relapſe, being ipſo facto ſentenced to death by all the laws both human and divine, may lawfully be killed by every private perſon, if it cannot be done otherwiſe, as the Reader may ſee in the ſecond part of that Apology, Chapter the 8th, &c. (32). He obſerves, that the Jeſuits thought fit to hide and ſuppreſs this Apology, not becauſe they were aſhamed and repented

* Gen. xxvi.

† Lyr. in xxxi Num.

‡ Covarruv. Diſp. de Matrim. num. 6. Fumus in Armil. Cajet. 2. 2. q. 64. Art. 3. Th. 2. Sent. Diſt ult. q. 2. Art. 2. ad ult.

(24) Apol. pour J. Chaſtel. Part 2. pag. 84, 85.

(25) Ibid. pag. 85, 86.

(26) Ibid. Part III. chap. 1. pag. 117.

(27) The firſt was John Jaureguy, a native of Biſcay, about 18 years old, who ſhot the Prince with a piſtol in the jaw-bone, March 18, 1582. The other was Balthazar Gerard a Gentleman of Burgundy, aged 34 years, who ſhot the Prince dead on the ſpot with a piſtol charged with three bullets at Delft in Holland, July 10, 1584. Apologie pour J. Chaſtel, pag. 119.

(28) Ibid. pag. 120.

(29) Ibid. pag. 143.

(30) John Guet.

(31) JOHN GUIGNARD. See his Article.

* That is to ſay the League.

(32) Apologie pour Jean Chaſtel, folio A 3 verſo.

his part [E]. It is a matter of ſurpriſe, that the ſeveral accounts of this horrid attempt ſhould of their wickedneſs, and of ſuch abominable murthers, but only becauſe they feared, leſt Kings and Princes, taking notice of that apology, ſhould entertain ſuch an averſion for them, as not to ſuffer them any longer at Court and in their Councils, there to perform the Pope's commands (33). The Author of the Anticoton aſſerted, that John Chaſtel's apology was a work of the Jeſuits (34); but they always maintained that this was an impoſture, and that no Jeſuit had ever a hand in it (35). All the world knows, ſays Richeome (36), that the Jeſuits are not the Authors of the Book intitled de Juſta Henrici tertii abdicatione, i. e. Of the lawful depoſition of Henry III, nor of Veron Conſtantin's apology for John Chaſtel; and the late King (37), who was entirely perſuaded of our innocence, diſcountenanced all theſe ſlanderers, who charged us with it before his Majeſty.

(33) Ibid. folio A 2 verſo.

(34) Anticoton, pag. 18.

(35) Réponſe Apologetique à l'Anticoton, pag. 45.

(36) Richeome's Examen categorique de l'Anticoton, pag. 185.

(37) He means Henry IV.

It is very probable, that theſe two Books were written by John Boucher, who as we have obſerved in his article (38) was the moſt ſeditious and the moſt unruly Preacher, that ever endeavoured to inſpire the minds of the people with a ſpirit of rebellion againſt their lawful Sovereign.

(38) See the Remark [B] in the Article BOUCHER.

[E] . . . . The Author of this Book relates, that they cauſed a Layman to diſguiſe himſelf in the habit of a Prieſt, and that they ſent him as a Father Confeſſor to John Chaſtel . . . .; but that the pretended Confeſſor did not know how to act his part.] Here follow the apologiſt's own words. " To mention now the artifices, Lieutenant Lugoly, who played his part ſo " well, knows in his conſcience how the affair went, " as well as they, who had a ſhare in the ſacrilege " he committed, when he diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a Prieſt, and perſonated a Father Confeſſor, " in order to pump ſomething out of Chaſtel by way " of a ſacramental confeſſion, or at leaſt, to feign " he had heard ſomething from him, whence they " might take an advantage againſt him, and againſt " thoſe, who were partakers of his martyrdom (39). " . . . How well did they towards this penitent in this " ſhameful impoſture? The hook was too weak to " catch ſo large a fiſh: it was a childiſh trick, and " too coarſe a device; ſuch a thin cobweb will not " hold ſo large a fly. Such hares are not catched at " the noiſe of this drum, nor ſuch birds at the ſight " of the net. To play ſuch a part well a man muſt " ſtudy it a little before hand; but the poor man did " not know what it was to hear one's confeſſion, for " he never partook of that Sacrament, but for form " ſake, once in three years (as the Engliſhman ſaid of " himſelf, after the betraying of Paris.) Since therefore " he was not ſo well ſkilled in this, as in the querks of " the law, and in the means to debauch girls and women, he was ſoon diſcovered, and tho' it was dark " and he diſſembled as much as he could, yet Chaſtell, who knew what it was to receive one's confeſſion, and was perfectly well acquainted with all " the circumſtances of this ceremony, found him " out immediately: for this Reverend Father in God, " newly made, forgot to recite the uſual Prayer and " Benediction, which the Confeſſor ſays, before he receives the penitent's confeſſion; thus Chaſtel diſcovered that he was not a Prieſt, as the rat is known " by the noiſe he makes, and the aſs by his braying; " for he was as proper for this buſineſs as a child is " to perſonate Hercules, or a fool to act the Philoſopher; he wanted a Prompter, like the Players at " the Hotel de Bourgogne. The Mine having thus taken " vent, before it was ſet on fire, the whole artifice " came to nothing, and the miſerable wretch was " loaded with ſhame and infamy, as his impious ignorance, and ignorant impiety deſerved. Except that " he had recourſe to another artifice, which was to " ſpread with the utmoſt impudence, ſuch reports and " calumnies, as we have related above, againſt him " from whoſe mouth he heard nothing but a very " ſevere reproof, and an abhorrence of his ſacrilege " (40)." The Apologiſt exclaims very bitterly againſt ſuch an abuſe of the Sacrament of Penitence; he calls it an impiety and ſacrilege, and pretends that it cannot be juſtified by the precedents that are alledged. " It is true, ſays he, that the like had been done be-

(39) Apologie pour J. Chaſtel, Part 3. chap. 3. pag. 127, 128.

" fore by two other perſons of the ſame faction, the " one an open enemy and an heretic, the other a " traitor and a hypocrite. The former was one Santour a native of Champagne, who impoſed upon " Mauclerc a Doctor and Preacher, whom he took on " the road as he was returning to Paris from Troyes, " where he had preached during Lent in the year 1589. " After he frightened him with preſent death to ſuch " a degree that he made him beg for a Confeſſor, he " impoſed a Layman inſtead of a Prieſt upon him. " The other was Marins, a Gaſcoon, nephew to the " Sieur de Belin, one of the contrivers of the treaſon " of Paris *, in which city he was left for that pur- " poſe; he impoſed upon a Surgeon, who was a ſer- " vant to the Sieur le Bailleur, in the year 1594, " not long before the treaſon; it was in order to " find a ring, which had been loſt in the houſe of " a wicked woman, who is but too much known, " and with whom he had a criminal converſation, as " he had with ſeveral other women, and even with " his neareſt relations: as he ſuſpected that the Surgeon, who was come to that houſe to dreſs him, " had taken the ring, he firſt had his thumbs ſqueezed " to pieces, in order to make him confeſs where the " ring was; and after ſeveral other outrages, he carried him hoodwinkt to the river, with a deſign to " throw him into it, finally, as the poor wretch prayed for a Confeſſor, he impoſed upon him, and perſonated the Prieſt himſelf. The next day the ring " was brought back to the Lady by one of her lovers, " who took it only in a joke (41). . . . But if this be- " comes a rambler, a robber, and an heretic, (as it is " really a device found out by heretics, in a bawdy- " houſe, in order to impoſe upon women, and to ridicule the Church) is it worthy of a Judge, a Deputy or Provoſt of the King's Houſhould, a man of " the long Robe, and who with his Caſſock and Chaplet perſonates a Jeſuit? If hereſy joined with arms, " and the boldneſs and fury of Mars with the lewdneſs of Venus have produced this ſacrilege, why " ſhould the wiſdom and diſcretion of thoſe, who " are ſtiled Gods, and who call themſelves Catholics, " ingage them to commit the ſame crime, and to " be guilty of ſo heinous an impiety? What reſemblance is there between war, which hearkens to " no laws, and the Majeſty of the State, and of thoſe " who mention the Laws? or between the cruelty " and licentiouſneſs of arms and the awfulneſs of juſtice? To ſuppoſe thus a ſacred perſon, &c. (42)." He alſo confutes thoſe, who might ſay, that they had followed the example of the heads of the Parliament, who at the general and extraordinary ſeſſion at Poitiers, appointed the Prieſts who were to hear confeſſions, forbidding expreſly to confeſs to any others but thoſe, from whom it was required upon pain of death, that they ſhould declare, what they heard in the people's confeſſion, which they have continued ſince; and it ſeems they intend to continue it ſtill, by their practice of naming the Confeſſors, alledging that it is for the public good, that juſtice might be adminiſtered impartially, that the guilty may not eſcape, and the innocent be not puniſhed; thus making this practice become by degrees cuſtomary, and aſſerting that it is lawful. Oh ridiculous hypocriſy and damnable impiety (43)! " He aſſerts, that the Prieſts ought never to declare what is confeſſed to them, on what occaſion ſoever it be, and notwithſtanding the moſt expreſs commands, and that they are bound rather to ſuffer death, which will juſtly intitle them to the honour of martyrdom (44); and on this occaſion he commends Anthony Antoninus Temermans a Dominican born at Dunkirk, who was hanged at Antwerp in the year 1582, becauſe he refuſed to reveal Jaureguy's confeſſion (45).

* Thus he calls the ſurrendring of the City to Henry IV.

(41) Apologie pour J. Chaſtel, Part 3. chap. 3. pag. 128, 129.

(42) Ibid. chap. 3. pag. 230.

(43) Ibid. chap. 4. pag. 131.

(44) Ibid. 133.

(45) Who murthered the Prince of Orange.

The fact is not related as it is above in the account, which I ſhall quote in the following remark; it ſuppoſes, that John Chaſtel having been apprehended, ſome of the chief perſons at Court employed all poſſible means to make him declare, at whoſe inſtigation he had attempted that parricide; that they threw him down upon the ground, put a dagger to his throat, and threatned to ſtab him, if he would not declare the truth; that he anſwered, that he had not

(40) Ibid. chap. 6. pag. 137, 138.

ſhould differ ſo widely [F], nor is this the leſs ſhocking circumſtance of this ſtory. Dupleix ought not to have ſaid, that John Chaſtel anſwered the Judges, that the Devil prompted him to this attempt (l).

(l) Dupleix, Hiſt. d'Henri IV, pag. m. 163.

not been induced by any perſon in the world to commit that action, and that he aſked for a Prieſt to whom he might confeſs; that they granted him this favour, but that they bribed a Layman, who diſguiſing himſelf in the habit of a Prieſt went to Chaſtel to hear his confeſſion; that Chaſtel repreſented to this falſe Prieſt, that he laboured under ſuch a perturbation of mind, that he could not remember his ſins, and deſired that a paper might be reſtored to him, in which he had wrote his general confeſſion ſome days before; that this paper was found at his father's houſe, but contained not the leaſt hint of any perſon's inſtigation. See the margin (46), where you will find an account very different from this, with regard to the paper, in which the murtherer had wrote his general confeſſion.

(46) Thuanus ſays (lib. 112. pag. m. 652), that they who were ſent to J. Chaſtel's father's houſe, by ſearching in every corner, found the paper, in which this wicked wretch had wrote his general Confeſſion; he did not diſown this writing, in which he owned himſelf guilty of Sodomy, and confeſſed, that he once would commit an inceſt with his own ſiſter.

I am very far from believing on the authority of the apologiſt, that they endeavoured to diſcover Chaſtel's ſecret by a pretended Confeſſor; but I don't know whether it muſt be abſolutely denied; for ſince in an ordinary trial, which is of very little importance, the Judges think it lawful to employ a thouſand lies in order to make either the accuſed perſon or the witneſſes own the truth, why ſhould we believe, that the Judges would have ſcrupled to make uſe of the confeſſion, when Henry the IVth's life, on which the public ſecurity then depended, was concerned? They knew that the ſame weakneſs of mind, which occaſions a man to be eaſily perſuaded to attempt ſuch a parricide, makes him at the ſame time capable of an extraordinary courage and intrepidity. They who under colour of procuring the good of the Church, inſpire him with a deſign to kill a Prince, fill him at the ſame time with a firm reſolution to ſuffer all kind of torments, in hope of obtaining the glory of Martyrdom; they perſuade him that if he declares his accomplices, he will loſe thereby the whole merit of his action; whereas if he has courage enough to keep his tongue, his conſtancy will procure him a thouſand bleſſings in this world, and a very high degree of glory in the next. The Judges therefore could not but believe, that John Chaſtel would not be induced to declare any thing by his ſufferings upon the rack; and that therefore the only means to diſcover whence thoſe fatal and pernicious counſels aroſe, which expoſed the King's life to ſo many wicked attempts, was by bribing a pretended Confeſſor. If the paper which was found at his father's houſe, had contained what they expected, they would certainly have conſidered it as one of thoſe convincing proofs, upon which a ſentence of condemnation may juſtly be grounded. The Judges of the Lady de Brinvilliers acted thus (47), without any regard to the arguments of her Council. See Mr. Nicolle's caſe in favour of this Lady (48),

(47) But obſerve, that they had ſeveral other proofs againſt her, beſides thoſe that were taken from the writing, in which ſhe had ſet down her ſins, in order to confeſs them.

(48) Printed at Paris in 1676.

[F] It is a matter of ſurprize, that the ſeveral accounts of this horrid attempt ſhould differ ſo widely.] The Reader has ſeen in the foregoing Remark an account which I borrowed from a Latin relation, which was printed at Straſburg in the year 1595, and of which James Gretzer gave an extract at the end of his Latin tranſlation (49) of Francis des Montagnes's (50) anſwer to Anthony Arnauld's plea. This extract differs very much, with regard to the pretended Confeſſor, from the account of John Chaſtel's apologiſt, nor does it any ways agree with what Thuanus ſays concerning this parricide's general confeſſion which was found written on paper. Here follows another difference. The perſon who publiſhed that extract did not omit any thing that could ſerve to clear the Jeſuits, but he concealed all the circumſtances which were againſt them. He does inſiſt continually upon this particular, that Chaſtel did not ſay that any perſon inſpired him with the deſign to kill Henry IV, nor does that Author ſay one word of thoſe circumſtances, which I have related in the Remark [A], and which were found very proper to raiſe ſuſpicions againſt the Jeſuits. Common honeſty does not allow of ſuch dealings, and there is in all this a very ſcandalous artifice. Richeome was obliged whether he would or not to enter into a ſtrict examination of John Chaſtel's anſwers to his Judges (51); this was a very hard taſk for the Jeſuit, tho' for the reſt he made the beſt advantage of every circumſtance in Chaſtel's trial, upon which he could put a conſtruction favourable to his ſociety (52). Let us obſerve, that he undertakes to prove that the account of Cayet's examination (53), which I have tranſcribed from Cayet (54), is falſe, and that he does it in a Book, in which he pretends to confute a Writer, who had expreſſed himſelf as follows. Theſe are the very words of Chaſtel's examination, of which your Majeſty may ſtill ſee the original, which will be certified to be true by "above thirty Gentlemen Preſidents or Counſellors in "the Parliament, who are a thouſand times more "credible, than all that the parties concerned can "aſſert in favour of their own cauſe." Being aſked where he learned this new theology, he anſwered, he had it from the ſtudy of Philoſophy, &c.

(49) Printed at Ingolſtadt in 1596, 8vo.

(50) It is a falſe name under which the Jeſuit Richeome diſguiſed himſelf. See Alegambe, pag. 302.

(51) See his Plainte Apologétique, num. 41. pag. m. 157, &c.

(52) See the ſame book, num. 38, &c. and his Anſwer under the name of René de la Fon, to the Sieur Marion's Plea, chap. 14.

(53) Richéome, Reponſe Apologet. à l'Anticoton, num. 38. pag. 149.

(54) In the remark [A]

CHASTELAIN (GEORGE) in Latin Caſtellanus, a Flemiſh Gentleman (a), underſtood the French tongue very well, and wrote ſome Treatiſes [A], which have not been ſo much eſteemed, as Olivier de la Marche foretold they would be [B]. Chaſtelain died

(a) Eques Gandenſis. Valerius Andreas, Bibliotheca Belgicæ, pag. 262.

[A] He wrote ſome Treatiſes. . . .] He wrote (1) in French verſe Recueil des choſes marveilleuſes advenues de ſon tems. i. e. "A collection of the wonderful things, "which happened in his time." Printed with the Works of John Moulinet, his diſciple (2). Le Temple de la ruine d'aucuns Nobles malheureux, tant de France, que d'autres nations éſtrangéres, à l'imitation de Bocace. i. e. "The temple of the downfal of ſome unhappy "Noblemen both French and Foreigners; in imita-"tion of Bocace;" Printed at Paris, for Caliot du Pré, in the year 1570. L'inſtruction du jeune Prince, contenant huit Chapitres. i. e. "The inſtruction of a "young Prince in eight Chapters." Printed with his other Works (3). Les Epitaphes d'Hector & d'Achilles, avec le jugement d'Alexandre le Grand. i. e. "The "Epitaphs of Hector and Achilles, with the judg-"ment of Alexander the Great." Printed at Paris in 1525, 8vo (4). L'Hiſtoire de Jaques de Lalain Chevalier de la Toiſon d'or. "The Hiſtory of James "de Lalain Knight of the Golden Fleece." Printed at Bruſſels in 4to, in the year 1634, and ſeveral other Works, which are kept in manuſcript in the Abbey of St. Vaſt at Arras (5). He wrote in French the Life of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy; but I do not think it was ever printed. Pontus Heuterus had read it, and borrowed ſome things from it (6).

(1) La Croix du Maine, pag. 118.

(2) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 263.

(3) La Croix du Maine, pag. 118.

(4) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 447.

(5) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 262.

(6) Pontus Heuterus, Rerum Burgund. lib. 4. pag. m. 151.

[B] . . . . Which have not been ſo much eſteemed, as Olivier de la Marche foretold they would be.] Here follow his own words. "I am extremely vexed, that "I cannot come up to the ſtyle and accuracy of the "late Meſſire George Chaſtlelain, a Knight of my ac-"quaintance, who tho' a Fleming by birth, uſed yet "to write in French, and has performed in my time "ſo many fine and uſeful things, that his works, his "actions, and his elaborate ſtile will gain him more "reputation and glory a hundred years hence, than "they do now (7)." This Prophecy proved falſe; The memory of this Writer became every day more and more obliterated, and few perſons knew him by his Works half a Century after his death. Olivier de la Marche ſtiles him the Pearl and the Star, that is the moſt eminent of all the Hiſtoriographers, who either in his time or before employed pen, ink and paper (8). John le Fevre Lord of St. Remi had alſo great hopes, that the Works of this Author would be immortal. He declares, that having digeſted and writ down ſome ſhort notes and memoires, he ſent them to that noble Orator George Chaſtelain, that he might make uſe of them according to his prudence and diſcretion, in his noble Hiſtories and Chronicles, tho' theſe Memoirs be but very inconſiderable if compared with his Works. . . . I ſhall mention the great and noble actions of the Duke and of the Knights of his Order; but not by far ſo much at length, as that celebrated Orator George le Chaſtelain has done (9).

(7) Olivier de la Marche in the Preface to his Memoirs, pag. m. 3.

(8) Ibid. in the Preface to the 1ſt book, pag. m. 74.

(9) Jean le Fevre Seigneur de St. Remi, au Prologue de l'Hiſtoire de Charles VI, publiſhed by Mr. Le Laboureur, at the end of the Hiſtory of the Monk of St. Denys.

died in the year 1475 (b). He had been educated in the family of the Dukes of Burgundy (c).

(b) Obiit eo ipso tempore, quo Carolus Audax Novesium obsidebat, i. e. "He died "when Charles "the Terrible "besieg'd Nuys." Valerius Andreas, Bibliothecæ Belgicæ, pag. 263.

(c) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoise, pag. 118.

CHASTELUX (CLAUDIUS Lord of) Viscount of Avalon, Baron of Quarré, Counsellor of State and Chamberlain to the Duke of Burgundy, was created a Marshal of France June the 2d 1418. He was sent into Guienne in the year 1419, and deprived of his post of Marshal January the 22d 1421. He stood out the siege of Crevant against the Constable of Scotland in the year 1423, which procured him a very extraordinary privilege in the City of Auxerre [A]. In 1431 the Duke of Burgundy sent him to the Assembly which was held in that same City, to negociate a treaty of peace with the Embassadors of the Kings of France and England: he died in the year 1453 (a). He was of a very ancient and noble family, which is not yet extinct [B].

(a) Taken from Father Anselme, Hist. des Grands Officiers, pag. 140, 141.

[A] He stood out the siege of Crevant, . . . which procured him a very extraordinary privilege in the City of Auxerre.] Let us quote Mr. de Vize's words. "You "cannot but know, says he (1), what privilege this "Family enjoys in the Cathedral Church of Auxerre. "Claudius Lord of Chastelux obtained it towards the "latter end of the 14th Century (2), as a reward for "his generosity, because at his own expence he stood "out the siege of the city of Crevant, which belongs "to the Chapter, against the Scots, whom he vanquished and expelled the country, having taken "himself their General the Earl of Doukan Constable "of Scotland, prisoner. And as he generously returned the church-lands to the Chapter of Auxerre, "they granted him in return, by a juridical Deed, . . "for himself and his heirs male who should possess "the Manour of Chastelux" the privilege we speak of; and which was, to have the first seat in the Choir, to sit there in a soldier's dress, with a surplice over it, a belt, an amuce on his arm, and a hawk on his fist; with the right to sit and to vote deliberatively in the Chapter, and to partake of the Distributions * (a), like a Canon.

(1) Mercure Galant, for Sept. 1701, pag. 364, &c.

(2) Or rather after the beginning of the 15th Century.

* (a) The Distributions in the Chapters are some small sums of money, left by the Founders, for those Canons only, who are present at some Obits and other offices of the Church. ADD. REM.]

[B] He was of an ancient and noble Family; his posterity is not yet extinct.] Father Anselme does not carry the Genealogy of this Family higher up, than to the Father of our Claude de Chastelux (3); but Mr. de Vizé asserts, that this is one of the most ancient Families in the Kingdom (of France), that it has no other name and no other origine but Chastelux, and that from the end of the tenth Century, from which time we begin to know the successions of that family in a direct line, to this time, the Count de Chastelux, who died in September 1701, is the twentieth in a direct line from father to son; and that *his Ancestors have enjoyed all the military employments in the State; you will find amongst them some Marshals of France, some Admirals, some Governors of Provinces, some Lieutenants-General, some Gentlemen of the King's Bedchamber, some Chamberlains to the Dukes of Burgundy, some pages * to the Kings, some Captains of Companies consisting of an hundred* Gendarmes (β), at a time when these Companies were very considerable (4).

(3) Anselme, Histoire de Grands Officiers, pag. 141.

* They are generally Noblemen's children.

(4) Mercure Galant, for September 1701, pag. 363.

Let us add, what the same Author relates concerning the present state of that Family. He says (5) that PHILIBERT PAUL Count of CHASTELUX, who was killed in the attack of Chiari in Italy, September the first 1701, in the thirty third year of his age, "had "three brothers and three sisters; the eldest of his "brothers served in the armies in Germany, where "he died; ANDREW DE CHASTELUX, who is now "the eldest, is Ensign of a Man of War. WILLIAM "ANTHONY, who is the youngest, is an Abbot. The "eldest sister is BONNE DE CHASTELUX, married to "Francis Count de Saint Chamans, and Marquis de "Mery. The second sister is JUDITH DE CHASTE-"LUX, Lady and Canoness of Pousnagy in Cham-"pagne. The youngest is ANN DE CHASTELUX "married to Charles de Vienne, Count de Comma-"rain in Burgundy, the head of the illustrious family "of the Viennes (6)." The father of these seven children was CÆSAR PHILIP DE CHASTELUX, Captain-Lieutenant of the Company of Gendarmes belonging to the Prince (of Condé) (7). His widow, who is still alive (8), is Judith de Barillon, daughter to John James de Barillon, President in the Parliament of Paris. This Cæsar Philip, the nineteenth Baron or Count of Chastelux, had three brothers, who all died in the King's service. The eldest was killed in the battle of Norlingen, where he was Marshal de Camp. The second had been killed some time before in Roussillon, by a cannon-ball, having been commanded to prevent the landing of the Spaniards. The third, who was Knight of Malta, died also in the King's service (9). Observe, that the other branches of this Family were extinct by the death of Philip de Chastelux, Baron of Coulanges, Marshal de Camp, who was killed in the battle of Sintzheim in Germany, in the year 1614 (10).

(5) Ibid. pag. 358.

(6) Ibid. pag. 362.

(7) Ibid. pag. 359, &c.

(8) That is to say in September 1701.

(9) Mercure Galant, for September 1701, pag. 161.

(10) Ibid.

* (β) Gendarmes.] We make use of that word, to express, what the French called formerly Hommes d'Armes. These companies consisted of fifty or of an hundred Gentlemen, or Noblemen compleatly armed, and who used to fight with a lance or spear. ADD. REM.]

* Furetiere's Dictionary under the word ORDONNANCES (COMPAGNIES D').

CHATEAU-BRIAND (the Countess of) spouse of the Count of that name, daughter of Phœbus of Foix, and sister of Lautrec, and of the Marshal of Foix, had been Francis the First's mistress, according to some Authors [A]. Monsieur de Varillas has related

[A] She had been Francis I.'s Mistress, according to some Authors.] Brantome relates very remarkable circumstances of this intrigue. "I have been told, says "he (1), and have it from very good hands, that when "Francis I had forsaken the Lady de Chateau-Briand, "his most beloved Mistress, for Madam d'Estampes . . "as one nail drives another, Madam d'Estampes de-"sired the King to take back from the Chateau-"Briand all the fine jewels of which he had made "her a present, not for the sake of their value, or "fineness, for jewels were not then so much in fashion, "as they have been since; but for the sake of the in-"genious posies, which were worked, engraved, and "stamped on them, and which were invented and "contrived by his sister the Queen of Navarre, who "had a great genius for these things." Brantome adds, that when the Gentleman, whom the King sent to the Countess of Chateau-Briand, asked her for these jewels, she pretended to be taken ill of a sudden, and put him off for three days, and in the mean time, she out of spite caused them all to be melted, and when the Gentleman came back, returned them to him in lumps, and desired him to tell the King, that she could not suffer, that another should have the pleasure to read these posies. The King returned her the lumps, (for he desired the jewels only for the sake of the posies) and said, she had shewed more constancy and greatness of soul, than I thought a woman was capable of. Brantome adds his own reflection to that of the King; The heart of a generous woman, says he, thus scorned and provoked, is capable of very great things. He asserts in another place of his Memoirs (2), that the Count of Chateau-Briand gave his fine house called Chateau-Briand to the Duke of Montmorenci High Constable of France, to be made a Knight of the Holy Ghost; upon which Mr. Le Laboureur observes (3), that it was, to obtain the Government of Britany, as also to put a stop to the persecution, which was carried on against him for the murther of his wife, with which he was charged.

(1) Brantome, Memoires des Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 394.

(2) In the Discours du Connétable de Montmorenci.

(3) Additions aux Mémoires de Castelnau, tom. 1. pag. 346.

The Author of the Galantaries des Rois de France (the related the History of this amorous intrigue more at length than any other writer, nor did he forget to observe, that the Count put his wife to death. Others pretend that this whole

(4) In the year 1664.

(5) Tom. I. pag. m. 192.

* From Spain, whither he had been conducted a prisoner after the battle of Pavia.

(α) Quotation (a).

(β) Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres; for January 1686, Art. 2. pag. 15, &c. of the second edition.

(γ) Written by Mr. Varillas.

(δ) Matth. xxiii. 29.

(the Amours of the Kings of France) printed of late (4) in several places, relates Francis I's intrigue with the Countess of Chateau-Briand, after the same manner as Monsieur de Varillas does, and concludes his account thus (5). "Some Critics pretend, that Mr. de Varil- " las, from whom I have extracted these Memoirs, " was ill informed, that the Countess of Chateau- " Briand was reconciled with her husband, and did " not die till ten years after the King's return *. " But Mr. de Varillas has confuted this so effectually, " that I thought the tragical death of the Countess " must be admitted as a matter of fact, wherefore I did " not in the least scruple to follow word for word that " celebrated Historian's account." Take this for an imposture: I desired a friend of mine to inquire about this answer of Mr. Varillas, and here follow the very words which he wrote to me in a Letter dated from Paris June the 10th, 1695,

" Notwithstanding all that the Author of the In- " trigues of the French Kings may say, we have not " seen here any thing published by Mr. Varillas in " answer to what the late Monsieur Hevin, Advocate " in the Parliament of Rennes, wrote against him, " concerning the Countess of Chateau-Briand; and " Mr. d'Hosier told me upon this, that Mr. de Cau- " martin, one of our six Intendants of the Finances, " has in his Library the Case, which the Constable " Ann de Montmorenci caused to be published against " the Count de Chateau-Briand's heirs, to vindicate " the Donation or Grant, which had been made to " him of that Manor, and that the Case begins with " these words. The misfortunes which attended the whole " life of Mr. de Chateau-Briand are so well known in " France, that it is needless to relate them here.

☞ The work to which Mr. Bayle refers us in the text of this article (α), being now very scarce, and written in a language, which is not understood by those, for whom this Translation is particularly designed, we think it would be acceptable to them, if they were to find here the account, to which Mr. Bayle refers us, we shall therefore give a translation of it.

" The more difficult and uncommon it is, says Mr. " Bayle (β), for a beautiful woman to walk constantly " in the paths of virtue, when she lives at a Court, " where wickedness prevails, the more reasonable is it, " to vindicate the reputation of such Ladies, who have " kept their chastity untainted amongst such great " dangers. It is therefore proper .... to insert here " an Apology for the Countess of Chateau-Briand, " whose reputation has been extremely branded in the " VIth Book of the History of Francis I (γ). Nay it " is so much the more necessary to vindicate her cha- " racter, as most persons will think it probable, that " a very beautiful Lady could move the' heart of this " Prince, and that having gained his love, she yielded " afterwards to his desires. Let us see therefore what " arguments are quoted for her character; but we must " relate first, what Mr. Varillas found in a Writing " taken from the Records of Chateau-Briand by the late " President Ferrand.

" This Countess, daughter of Phœbus de Grailly, " a younger son of the Family of Foix, had been mar- " ried very young to the Count de Chateau-Briand, " and lived retired in a corner of Britany, by her " spouse's command. But as she was the most beau- " tiful woman of her time, Francis I, who had in- " troduced all the Ladies at Court, where they did not " appear before but on solemn occasions, could not forget " our Countess. He entreated her spouse to bring her " to Court; but the Count desired to be excused, al- " ledging the odd temper of his Lady, and representing " her as a savage beauty, whom it was impossible to " tame. And as he foresaw that the King, who did " not give much credit to such a Discourse, would " continue his intreaties, he resolves to confine him- " self at home, the better to guard his treasure: But " an unexpected affair having obliged him to go to " Court, he was forced to employ all possible means " against the King's sollicitations; and indeed the " means he employed were very extraordinary, but " yet they proved ineffectual; he was obliged to yield " to the artifices that were made use of in order to en- " tice this young Lady to Paris. She was no sooner " arrived there, but her spouse, who was now persuad- " ed he was catched, set out immediately for Britany, " that he might not be a witness of his own shame. The " Countess did all that could be expected from a virtu- " ous woman, who had not yet been put to the trial, I " mean that she resisted for some time, and at last " yielded to the King's amorous addresses. She had for " a long while a great power over this Prince: She pro- " cured great employments for her three brothers, Lau- " trec, the Marshal de Foix, and the Lord d'Aspraut, " three of the bravest men of their time; she support- " ed them in their posts notwithstanding their misfortunes " and their ill conduct. Her husband would have been " raised to the highest dignities, had he been inclined " to prefer the advantages of ambition, before his own " reputation. But he refused them; nor would he hear " of his spouse on any account whatsoever. Notwith- " standing his inflexibility, his spouse begged now and " then his pardon for a crime, which she could no " longer forbear to commit. The King being taken " prisoner at Pavia, this Lady was exposed to the re- " sentment of the Queen Regent, and to the revenge of " her incensed husband. He received her indeed at " Chateau-Briand, where she was forced to take sanc- " tuary, but without the least reconciliation. He sent " her up into a room all furnished with black, and at " the end of six months, he went up to her with six " men armed, and two Surgeons, who opened the veins " of her arms and legs, and let her thus bleed to death. " The King designed at first to punish the murtherers in " an exemplary manner; but a new inclination made " him soon forget his former mistress. The Count went " into a voluntary exile, in order to avoid being pro- " secuted, till the House of Foix was no more in a " condition to prosecute him. After his return he pro- " posed to the Constable of Montmorenci to make him " over by deed the manor of Chateau-Briand, on condi- " tion, that the Constable should get him out of trouble. " The Constable, who chose rather to have that manor " this way, than by a confiscation, which would have " exposed him to everlasting disputes with the Family of " the Lavals, of which the Count was, procured him " a pardon from the King. The marks of the Countess's " blood were still to be seen in the room where she was " murthered, when Henry the third was killed at St. " Cloud."

" This is what is found in the writing quoted by " Mr. Varillas as taken from the Records of Chateau- " Briand. Yet the Apologist for the Countess says " this is a mere story, and grounds his assertions up- " on such arguments, as may serve at least to favour " historical Scepticism. He alledges the Tomb and " Epitaph, which the Count caused to be made for his " spouse; nor does he fear that this argument will be " confuted by that which Jesus Christ alledged; who to " convince the Jewish Nation, that they had put their " Prophets to death, said that they built them tombs " (δ). But let us quote the words of a Letter, which " has been written to us from Paris.

" An Extract from a Letter written from Paris to " the Author of the Nouvelles de la Republiques des " Lettres, December the 7th, 1685, to vindicate the " character of the Countess of Chateau-Briand accused " of having committed adultery with King Francis I.

" There is in Mr. Varillas's History of Francis I a fact " concerning the Countess of Chateau-Briand, which is " absolutely false, and calculated to disgrace two illu- " strious Families, that of Foix, of which the Countess " was, and that of Laval, of which the Count was. " All Britany exclaims against this story, and desires that " a confutation of it be inserted in your Nouvelles. " There is a Case published to this effect, whence I have " transcribed the following Epitaph, which confutes in " the most authentic manner the story of this Lady's in- " trigue with Francis I, and of the murther committed " on her person by her spouse in 1525. The Epitaph is " as follows:

whole Hiſtory is a mere fable, and have publiſhed an Apology for the Counteſs againſt Monſieur Varillas. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (a).

(a) For January 1686, Art. II.

PEU DE TELLES
Sous ce Tumbeau gît Françoiſe de Foix,
De qui tout bien chacun ſouloit en dire,
Et le diſant onc une ſeule voix
Ne s'avança d'y vouloir contredire.
De grand beauté, de grace qui attire,
De bon ſavoir, d'intelligence prompte,
De biens, d'honneurs, & mieux que ne raconte
Dieu Eternel richement l'étoffa.
O Viateur, pour t'abreger le conte,
Cy gît un rien là on' tout triomfa.
Décéda le 16 d'Oct. l'an 1537.
PROU DES MOINS — POINT DE PLUS

That is,

" In this Tomb lies Frances de Foix, of whom as all " the world ſpoke well, ſo not one perſon dared to ſay " the contrary. God had abundantly favoured her " with a great deal of beauty, attractive charms, ſound " learning, a quick underſtanding, riches, honours, " more than I can expreſs. She died Oct. 16, 1537."

The words about the Epitaph ſignifie, that a great many women had leſs merit than her, few had as much, and none had more.

" This Epitaph with her Monument in marble are " ſtill to be ſeen in the Church of the Mathurins at Cha- " teau-Briand; her huſband cauſed that monument to be " erected, which he moſt certainly would not have done, " if he had put her to death for adultery.

" When the Viſcount de Lautra the Counteſs's eldeſt " brother died, in 1528, he left his only daughter Claude " de Foix under the guardianſhip of the Count of Cha- " teau-Briand, which it a proof of the good underſtand- " ing there was between their two Families, which " would not have been, had the Count been the mur- " therer of the Viſcount's ſiſter, and had he fled his coun- " try for fear of being proſecuted.

" This Claude de Foix was married in 1531 to the " young Count de Laval, ſon to the Count de Laval Go- " vernor of Britany, and ſecond couſin to the Count de " Chateau-Briand; which is another proof of the friend- " ſhip there was between theſe two Families.

" Mr. Varillas ſays, that the Count de Chateau- " Briand made a Grant of that Manour to the Conſta- " ble of Montmorency, in order to obtain the King's par- " don, and that the Conſtable choſe rather to get the " County or Manour of Chateau-Briand by way of do- " nation, than by a confiſcation: But Mr. Varillas ought " to have known, that the confiſcation or forfeiting of " lands is not in uſe in Britany, and that if the Count " had been condemned for the murther of hit ſpouſe, his " lands could not have been forfeited but to his natural " heirs." ADD. REM.

CHATEL (PETER DU) Great Almoner of France under Henry II. See CASTELLANUS.

CHATEL (TANNAQUIL DU) a Nobleman of Britany, was one of the brave men in the fifteenth Century. He commanded in Italy the forces of Lewis of Anjou King of Sicily, and in 1409 he defeated the army of Ladiſlaus King of Naples. He was afterwards made Provoſt of Paris; and in 1419 and 1420 he ſtiled himſelf Marechal des Guerres (Marſhal of the Armies), of the Dauphin Regent of the Kingdom (a). He did this Prince (b) a great many ſervices [A], and rid him of his moſt formidable enemy, who was John Duke of Burgundy [B]; but this action was attended with a notorious perfidiouſneſs. I wonder that F. Anſelme did not mention it (c); his ſilence has occaſioned that of Moreri. Tanaquil du Chatel was not only guilty of the murther of the Duke of Burgundy, but he alſo killed the Dauphin of Auvergne [C] in the year 1424, even

(a) Anſelme, Hiſtoire des Grands Officiers, pag. 142.

(b) He was afterwards King Charles VII.

(c) Anſelme, Hiſt. des Grands Officiers, pag. 142.

[A] He did the Dauphin a great many ſervices.] The Faction of Burgundy ſeized upon the City of Paris May the 28th, 1418, in the night-time, and would have taken the Dauphin himſelf priſoner, had not Tannaquil du Chatel (1) run with all ſpeed to him, took him out of his bed, and wrapping him up in his night-gown, conducted him ſafe to the Baſtille, and from thence to Melun (2). We ſhall ſee in the following remark, with how much ſincerity he acted againſt this Prince's enemy upon the bridge of Montereau-faut-Yonne.

(1) He was at that time Provoſt of Paris.

(2) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 3. pag. 202.

[B] ... And rid him of his moſt formidable enemy.. John Duke of Burgundy.] If the French Monarchy was brought upon the brink of ruin under the reigns of Charles VI and Charles VII, it was owing to the Princes of the Blood, to the exceſſive ambition of the Houſe of Burgundy, a Branch of the Royal Family of France; and ſince that time, the Houſe of Burgundy had no more friendſhip for the Blood from whence it ſprung, than for the Ottoman Family. That Houſe has always been united with the greateſt enemies of the French till the male line of it was extinct, in the time of Princeſs Mary, the only heir of that Family, who tranſmitted this hatred to her deſcendants. John Duke of Burgundy not only cauſed the Duke of Orleans, Charles VIth's brother to be aſſaſſinated (3), he was alſo guilty of ſeveral other wicked attempts; but at laſt he periſhed himſelf in the year 1419. The Duke of Orleans's friends, and particularly our Tannaquil du Chatel and the Preſident Louvet negotiated an interview between the Duke of Burgundy and the Dauphin, with a deſign to murther the former, which they really did upon the bridge of Montereau-faut-Yonne, where theſe two Princes had agreed to confer together. " As the Duke John advanced, ſays Pa- " quier (4), Tannaquil du Chatel picked a quarrel " with him, ſaying, that he did not pay the Dauphin " all the honour he ought to have paid him, and gave " him ſuch a blow on the head with an axe, that he " died of it."

(3) In 1407.

(4) Paſquier, Recherch. de la France, liv. 6. chap. 3. pag. 452.

[C] He alſo killed the Dauphin of Auvergne.] I ſhall quote Paquier's words again (5). " The two " chief inſtruments of Charles VIIth's actions, and " perhaps the authors of his ruin, were Tannaquil du " Chatel and Louvet a Preſident in the Parliament " of Provence; for they were both the authors of " Duke John's death. They had for a long while a " great power over him (Charles VII) and eſpecially " Tannaquil du Chatel who governed him with an " exceſſive arrogance, and abuſing his maſter's eaſy " temper, dared to kill the Dauphin of Auvergne in " 1424, even in the King's preſence, and in a full " Council, at which the Princes and great Lords of " the Court were extremely exaſperated, ſo that they, " with the Queen of Sicily the King's mother-in-law, " the Conſtable of Richmond, and ſeveral other emi- " nent Lords, abandoned the King. For which reaſon " Tannaquil was obliged to reſign his place, ſo that " Louvet alone continued in his poſt. But even he, " ſeeing he was expoſed to the ſame hatred, and was " not able to make head againſt the great Lords, retired " to Avignon; and neither of them was ever ſeen " afterwards." Mezerai ſays, that Charles VIIth promiſed to baniſh from Court all thoſe, who had been concerned in the murther of the Duke of Burgundy; that he promiſed this, I ſay, when in 1424 he made the Earl of Richmond Conſtable, after this Lord had abandoned the party of the King of England; and that hereupon Tannaquil making a generous ſacrifice of his own intereſt to the King's ſervice, deſired no other reward for his paſt labours but leave to retire (6). Varillas pretends, that by the Treaty of Arras Charles VIIth was forced to abandon Chatel, who fled into his own country, and did not return to Court, till he found that none of

(5) Ibid. chap. 4. pag. 453.

(6) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. tom. 3. pag. 236.

even in the King's preſence, and in a full Council. This action alienated ſeveral perſons of the higheſt rank from King Charles VII, and Du Chatel was obliged to retire from Court, whither he did not return, according to ſome Authors. But others aſſert that he went to Court again [D], where he underwent a ſecond diſgrace, notwithſtanding which he took care of Charles VII's funeral [E], which the Courtiers had entirely neglected. He of this Prince's friends took care of his funerals (7). According to this account he did not leave the Court till the year 1435. We ſhall obſerve immediately, which is the moſt probable account, and we ſhall borrow what we have to relate, from an Hiſtorian (8), who having confined his inquiries to what regards Britany, deſerves more credit when he ſpeaks of Tannaquil du Chatel, an eminent man and a native of Britany, than thoſe who mention him only in general hiſtories. I except all that ſavours of Apology; for in this reſpect the Writers of a hiſtory of a particular Province are more to be ſuſpected than the others; ſo that I do not much mind what Bertrand d'Argentré ſays (9), concerning Tannaquil du Chatel's innocence with regard to the murther of the Duke of Burgundy; but let us hear what he relates concerning other facts.

(7) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, liv. 1. pag. 4.

(8) Bertrand d'Argentré, Hiſt. de Bretagne, liv. 10. chap. 30.

(9) Ibid. pag. m. 531.

He aſſerts, that the Earl of Richmond having been made Conſtable March the 7th, 1425, was ſent into Britany to raiſe ſoldiers. Du Chatel was ſent thither at the ſame time as Embaſſador from King Charles VII, to aſk the Duke of Britany's leave to raiſe ſoldiers in his Dominions. This was then the condition of the Kings of France; they were ſurrounded with ſeveral petty Sovereigns, who played them a thouſand tricks. It is therefore a great miſtake to pretend, that the Engliſh did formerly almoſt conquer France. We ſhould ſay, that with the aſſiſtance of the largeſt and moſt conſiderable Provinces of France, they were like to ſubdue the reſt. But this by the by. Du Chatel received no other anſwer, but that the King would be aſſiſted, when he ſhould have removed from Court thoſe perſons, whoſe baniſhment had been required of him. Du Chatel himſelf was one of thoſe, and he reſolved to go into a voluntary exile, without making an advantage of the inclination the King had to keep him at Court. "Sir, ſaid he to the King, I am a Gentle- "man, and I have ſerved your Majeſty; but it is not "reaſonable that you ſhould loſe the advantages, which "you may reap from ſo many great men, who can "ſerve you againſt your enemies, for the ſake of ſuch "inconſiderable perſons as we are, tho' their ſuſpicions "againſt us be very ill grounded. However it be, you "ought not to ſuffer for it, and ſince it is ſo, I "hope our Majeſty will make ſome proviſions for "my old age, which is come upon me in your ſervice, "and that you will furniſh me wherewithal to paſs "the remainder of my days without want. This "done, God forbid, that you ſhould be ſo unhappy, "as for my ſake to remove thoſe friends and relations, "for whom you have at preſent a preſſing occa- "ſion. The King was obliged to yield, tho' very "much againſt his will, and told him, My good fa- "ther and friend, I ſhall always conſider you as a fa- "ther. I know that you have been ſuch to me for "a long time, and I will for ever remember it, as well "the ſervices you have done to me in particular, as well "as to the whole Kingdom. It is againſt my will and "my heart's deſire, that I ſuffer you to part from me: "but ſince my affairs are come to this paſs, that I muſt "ſubmit to other people's will, I beg of you, to ſuffer "this misfortune patiently, to which I am forced to con- "ſent; this black cloud will be diſpelled, and I ſhall ſee, "whether they who would leave me on your account, "will act in ſuch a manner, as to make amends for "the friend they deprive me of. I have conſidered "all this; in the mean time, go you to Beaucaire; "I make you Senechal of that place: and you will "alſo keep your poſt of Provoſt of Paris, without any "detriment in the profits of it; and you will have "ſuch penſions and ſo well paid, that you need not "fear the leaſt want: and for the ſecurity of your "perſon, you will have a guard of fifteen Archers, "and I ſhall take care that they be well paid. If "you ſhould ſuffer any harm, give me notice of it, "and I ſhall do you juſtice, and alſo take hold of the "firſt opportunity which I can find, to ſee you again. "Thus Meſſire Tannaquil retired to Beaucaire; but "yet he made ſeveral journeys to Paris (10)."

(10) Bertrand d'Argentré, Hiſtoire de Bretagne, liv. 10. chap. 30. pag. 531, under the year 1425.

I think we may infer from this paſſage, that all thoſe Authors are miſtaken, who do not place Tannaquil du Chatel's removal from Court under the year 1425, or who ſay, he never returned to Court, or who make him go Embaſſador to the Pope, or pretend that he was made Maſter of the Horſe, or Marſhal of France, or who ſuppoſe that he had the generoſity to bury Charles the VIIth. They miſtake the nephew for the uncle; for they both bore the name of Tannaquil du Chatel. But if it were true, that the uncle was ſent Embaſſador beyond the Alps in 1446 and 1448, as Father Anſelme ſays in the paſſage we ſhall quote below, d'Argentré would have been guilty of an inexcuſable neglect, ſince he does not mention it here, and when he ſpeaks (11) of the Embaſſy ſent to Rome, he does not ſay, whether Tannaquil du Chatel, who was one of the Embaſſadors, was the ſame with him who retired from Court in 1425.

(11) Liv. 10. chap. 4. pag. m. 562, under the year 1448.

We read in the Hiſtory of Marſeilles (12), that in 1431 the latter was one of thoſe, who negotiated a Truce between the inhabitants of Marſeilles and thoſe of Catalonia. He was then Captain-General of the Militia of Provence.

(12) Ruffi, Hiſtoire de la Ville de Marſeille, liv. 6. chap. 9.

[D] He was obliged to retire from Court, whither he did not return according to ſome Authors. But others aſſert that he went to Court again.] Father Anſelme, having ſaid that Tannaquil retired from Court, in the year 1435, for the advantage of Charles VIIth's affairs (13), continues thus. Since that time he was made Senechal of Provence, and was ſent to Genoa in 1446, in order to negotiate the conditions under which that City was to ſubmit to the King, whom the Genoeſe deſired to have for their Lord; and in 1448 he was ſent Embaſſador to Rome, with the Archbiſhop of Rheims, the Biſhop of Alet, and others, to pay filial obedience to Pope Nicholas V, according to Berri Heraut (14). He died ſome time after, without leaving any children by his wife Iſabella le Vayer. Moreri tranſlated nothing of all this, becauſe he thought that Tannaquil du Chatel took care of Charles the VIIth's funeral. If Father Anſelme had been of the ſame opinion, he would not have ſaid, that Tannaquil du Chatel died ſoon after his Embaſſy in the year 1448. This circumſtance is inconſiſtent with what other Hiſtorians relate, viz. that he paid all the expences of his King's funeral, who died in 1461. They are therefore miſtaken.

(13) Anſelme, Hiſt. des Grands Officiers, pag. 142.

(14) Les Chroniques de France par Belleforet, tirées de Monſtrelet, de Nicole Gilles &c. ſay the ſame.

[E] Others pretend . . . that he took care of Charles the VIIth's funeral.] Some Authors ſay, that Tannaquil was out of favour when Charles the VIIth died; but others aſſert that he was then actually Maſter of the Horſe. Funus ſuis ſumptibus curavit Tanneguius Caſtellus, ſummus regiorum equorum Magiſter; nam cæteri Caroli domeſtici metu Ludovici filii ſe diverſi ſubduxerant (15). i. e. "Tannaquil du Chatel Maſter "of the Horſe had the (King's) funeral performed at "his own expence; for Charles's other ſervants were "retired to ſeveral places, out of fear of his ſon Lewis "XI." In the firſt caſe his action would have been more praiſe-worthy, but even in the ſecond it was very commendable. It is always a noble thing for a man to continue faithful, when all others neglect their duty and to advance his own money to perform the funeral of his King. It is ſaid, that Lewis XI was a great many years before he returned to Tannaquil the ſums he had advanced (16). This latter muſt have been very old when his Maſter died, if it be true that he was a General in Italy in the year 1409. The money he advanced amounted to thirty thouſand Crowns, according to Thuanus (17). He does not agree with Beaucaire concerning Tannaquil's poſt, for he ſuppoſes him to have been Great Chamberlain, and is one of thoſe, who think he was out of favour. Chaſtellus is: per illuſtri in Armorica prognatus gente cubiculariorum Nobilium Princeps ſub Carolo VII fuerat; & quamvis optime de Rege ac Regno meritus, domum relegatus eſſet, mortuo Hero ſtatim in Aulam accurrit, & in funus regium ab omnibus neglectum de ſua pecunia 30 millia aureorum

(15) Belcarius, lib. 1. num. 1.

(16) Quam quidem pecuniam non ſtatim repræſentavit Ludovicus, ſed multis poſt annis Caſtilioni, Paciacique fundi atque aliorum aliquot venditione diſſolvit. Ibid. Lib. 29. num. 10. he ſays that the money was paid ſoon after, non multo poſt.

(17) Mezerai, Hiſt. de François II, tom. 3. pag. 40. in folio ſays 300 thouſand Livres. Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, pag. 4. ſays 168 thouſand Livres. Argentre, Hiſt. de Bretagne, liv. 12. chap. 17. ſays above 50 thouſand Livres.

He had a nephew called TANAQUIL DU CHATEL [F], who made a great figure at the French Court under Lewis XI. Some Writers miſtook him for the perſon who killed the Duke of Burgundy [G], which is a very great blunder. An Italian Author has alſo been reorum egregio grati animi exemplo dependit (18). i. e. "This du Chatel, a man of a very noble family in "Britany, had been Great Chamberlan under Charles "VII; and tho' he had been baniſhed into his own "Provinces, notwithſtanding his great ſervices to the "King and the Kingdom, yet no ſooner was his "Maſter dead, but he returned immediately to Court, "and ſpent thirty thouſand Crowns in the King's fu-"neral, which was neglected by all the Courtiers. A "noble inſtance of a grateful heart!" We ſhall have recourſe below to the Sieur d'Argentré, the better to know the circumſtances of all this. See the Remark [G], towards the end.

(18) Thuanus, lib. 25. pag. 524.

[F] He had a Nephew called TANNAQUIL DU CHATEL.] This nephew had been educated in his uncle's houſe at the Court of France, and was a man of judgment. He attached himſelf to the Duke of Britany's ſervice, and was made High-Steward of his Houſhold. In the year 1464 he gave very good advice in a very dangerous circumſtance; for it was to avoid the ſnares laid before him by King Lewis XI (19). He was alſo a man of probity, who did not flatter his Maſter with regard to his amorous intrigues. The Duke of Britany, at the age of thirty, had not much eſteem for his conſort, who was the King of Scotland's daughter, and carried every where with him a Miſtreſs, with whom he was paſſionately in love. Her name was Antoinette de Maillezé, and ſhe was the Lord de Villequier's wife. Tannaquil often and freely repreſented to the Duke thoſe puniſhments, which the juſtice of God inflicts upon lewd and adulterous Princes; but this only drew his Maſter's hatred upon him; which as ſoon as he perceived, he would no longer expoſe himſelf to the Duke's reſentment, and retired to his own houſe. The Lady de Villequier ſent him word, that ſhe would reſtore him to his Maſter's favour, if he would promiſe not to admoniſh him any more. But he would not accept the propoſal, and tho' this Lady employed her credit rather to prefer men of merit, than to be revenged of the injuries ſhe received, yet he dreaded her (20). Lewis XI being acquainted with du Chatel's circumſtances, proffered him ſome high poſts, which he accepted, and thus our Tannaquil du Chatel entered into the ſervice of the French Court (21). He was made Governor of Cerdanna and Rouſſillon. We ſhall ſee very ſoon, that a Civilian who did not want learning, miſtook the County of Cerdanna for the Iſland of Sardinia. In 1475 Tannaquil du Chatel was employed to negotiate the nine year's truce (22). He was killed at the ſiege of Bouchain in 1478 (23). If we may credit Peter Matthieu (24), the perſon, who took care of Charles the VIIth's funeral, was the ſame Tannaquil du Chatel, who preached up chaſtity to the Duke of Britany with ſuch a Chriſtian zeal; he was nephew to Tannaquil, who killed the Duke of Burgundy; and out of ſpite, that his charges in the funeral of Charles the VIIth were not reimburſed, he went over to the Duke of Britany. This deſerves to be examined.

(19) See Beaucaire, lib. 1. num. 15. and Varillas, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 3. pag. 188.

(20) This does not agree with what we ſhall quote from d'Argentré in the following Remark.

(21) Beaucaire, lib. 2. num. 12. Varillas, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 4. pag. 289.

(22) Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 11. pag. m. 747.

(23) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. pag. 747.

(24) Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI, l. 2. pag. 87.

[G] Some Writers miſtook him for the perſon who killed the Duke of Burgundy.] I have found this blunder in Forcatulus, with ſome other facts concerning Tannaquil du Chatel the nephew, which deſerve to be related here. Forcatulus ſays (25), that Tannaquil was one of the thirty ſix Knights of the Order of St. Michael, when that order was firſt inſtituted by Lewis XI (26). He deſerved it, continues Forcatulus, ſince he had behaved himſelf with ſo much prudence and conduct in his Government of Paris under the Reign of Charles VI. Here lies the miſtake. Tannaquil du Chatel, Knight of the Order of St. Michael, and Governor of Rouſſillon in 1469, negotiated a truce in 1475; he is not therefore the ſame perſon, who was Provoſt of Paris under Charles the ſixth; for the latter commanded an army in Italy in 1409, which ſhews, that he was then at leaſt thirty years old; whence it follows that he was born about the year 1380. If he had been plenipotentiary at the age of fourſcore and fifteen, would no Hiſtorian have taken notice of a man, whoſe ſtrength of mind laſted ſo long; which is a thing much more uncommon than to ſee a perſon an hundred years old? We have obſerved above (27), that in 1425 Tannaquil looked upon himſelf as an old man; he was therefore above thirty, and at leaſt forty or forty five when he commanded in Italy. Forcatulus obſerves, that Tannaquil was one of Cardinal Balue's Judges, and that the King gave him the Cardinal's furniture, and fine hangings; he gave a very favourable account of the order, which Tannaquil eſtabliſhed in the Province of Rouſſillon (28); nor does he omit his journey to the Monaſtery of Ronceraux, nor his excellent exhortations to the Monks, nor the queſtion he aſked them, after he had ſeen their library, viz. whether they had a piece of Orpheus's harp or of his head. If I be aſked, why this Civilian ſpeaks at large of Tannaquil du Chatel's journey, I ſhall anſwer, it is becauſe his great grand-father was very much in favour with the Governor of Rouſſillon; but not ſo much as a Gentleman named Polerme, deſcended from the family of the Grammonts, and who was Tannaquil's Lieutenant in Cerdanna. On which occaſion Forcatulus tranſcribes ſome verſes from Claudian and Martial, which give an account of the bad air of the Iſland of Sardinia, and aſſerts, that Polerme being well acquainted with the diſturbances to which that Iſland was continually expoſed, accepted the government of it very much againſt his will (29). This is what I promiſed to obſerve in the preceding Remark.

(25) Forcatul. De Gallor. Imperio, & Philoſophia, lib. 7. pag. m. 1111, & ſeq.

(26) In the year 1469.

(27) Remark [C], Quotation (10).

(28) He did not accept that government but with ſome reluctancy. Dubitans ne non Hiſpanica gens imperium ſuum ferre poſſet, aut ipſe mores ejus aut licentiam. i. e. "He fear-"ed, that the "Spaniards "would not rea-"dily ſubmit to "his authority, "or that he "himſelf would "not be able to "bear with their "manners and "licentiouſneſs." Forcatul. de Gall. Imp. & Philoſ. pag. 1112. d'Argentré, Hiſt. de Bretagne, liv. 10. chap. 30. agrees in ſeveral things with Forcatulus.

* The different accounts, which I have laid before the Readers, may make them ſenſible how neglectful and inaccurate moſt Hiſtorians are in the circumſtances they relate. Their different accounts make it almoſt impoſſible for us to know exactly, at what time Tannaquil du Chatel retired from the Court of Charles VII; whether he returned thither after this Prince's death; whether he was Maſter of the Horſe, or Lord Chamberlain; what ſum of money he ſpent in the funeral of his Maſter; whether he, who killed the Duke of Burgundy was the ſame with him who buried Charles VII; whether he, who reproved the Duke of Britany for his unlawful amours, did really retire from the Court of France, becauſe they did not repay him the money he had ſpent for the funeral of that Prince. We meet with a thouſand differences of the ſame nature in the lives of all the eminent men; which is really ſurprizing, ſince it would be very eaſy to diſtinguiſh every fact and circumſtance in Hiſtory in ſuch a manner, that even the leaſt penetrating genius might not miſtake them.

* THE uncertainty, in which the Hiſtorians leave us.

Here follows another paſſage from d'Argentré (30), which will clear up this matter a little. The Officers ſeeing that King Charles drew near his end, and knowing, that they would ſoon live under a very diſtruſtful Prince, they all one after another left Charles before his death, ſo that he had ſcarce people enough about him, to wait upon him. Only one faithful and conſtant friend continued with him; who was Tannaquil du Chatel Maſter of the Horſe, who at all adventures attended him to the laſt, there being not one perſon in France, who would contribute any money or do the leaſt thing, to have the King decently buried. Du Chatel undertook it; he made at his own expence all the neceſſary preparations, to have his Maſter buried after the manner uſual to the Kings of France, tho' there was then no likelihood that he would ever be reimburſed; he ſpent in that funeral above fifty thouſand livres of his own money, and was not paid but ten years after; when it happened lucklily for him, that the Caſtles and Lordſhips of Chatillon upon the river Andely, Pacy, Oyſy and Nonancourt in Normandy were aſſigned him for his payments, and have been ſince taken from his heirs to be annexed to the Crown-Lands. After his Maſter's death he found no ſupport nor favour at his Succeſſor's Court, ſo that he retired into Britany, where he was very kindly received by the Duke, who made him Lord Steward of his Houſhold, and Captain of Nantes, and made a match between him and the ſecond daughter of the Count de Maletroit, the Marſhal de Rieux having married the eldeſt. But tho' he was very worthy of this favour, yet it did not laſt long, as we ſhall obſerve hereafter. Theſe laſt words relate to Tannaquil's diſgrace, which the Author mentions in pages 603 and 608, and ſeems to been guilty here of very groſs errors [H], as will appear by the laſt Remark.

(29) Audierat vero Polermus Inſulam crebra dominorum mutatione, impacatam, & turbis deditam. Forcatulus, de Imp. Gall. & Philoſ. pag. 1120.

(30) Hiſt. de Bretagne, liv. 12. chap. 3. pag. 592.

to contradict himſelf. In pag. 603 he ſays, that during the journey, which the Duke of Britany made to Normandy againſt Tannaquil's advice, this latter had leave to go and ſee his wife; that the Duke finding that the ſuſpicions, which Tannaquil endeavoured to raiſe in his mind, were but too well grounded, he thought Tannaquil was concerned in the plot, ſo that he would never ſee him again. But in page 608 he tells us, that Tannaquil bore with indignation the life which the Duke led with the Lady de Villequier, for which reaſon ſhe began to hate him mortally, and he to ſave his life fled into France. Lewis XI received him very well, and loaded him with honours, and made him Governor of Rouſſillon (31). Obſerve, that it was after the journey to Normandy in 1465, that the Duke debauched the Lady de Villequier (32); whence it follows, that Tannaquil appeared at Court after that journey, for if he had been then out of favour, what could he have done againſt the Lady de Villequier?

(31) Ibid. pag. 612.

(32) Ibid. pag. 603.

However it be, we may be certain from Bernard d'Argentré's account, I. That Tannaquil du Chatel, who buried Charles VII, is not the ſame who killed the Duke of Burgundy: II. That he is the ſame, who retired from Britany into France under the reign of Lewis XI, and who was Governor of Rouſſillon. III. That he did not return from his houſe to Court, in order to take care of the King's funeral, but that he was actually Maſter of the Horſe, and in favour with Charles VII, when that Prince died.

There are few Articles in this Dictionary, which in proportion to their length, are a rhapſody of more different pieces tacked together than this; and yet, I am perſuaded, it will furniſh the Reader with an eaſy method for diſtinguiſhing the two Tannaquil's DU CHATEL.

[H] An Italian Author has been guilty here of very groſs errors.] See a Book, printed at Rome in 1646, intitled Ritratti e Elogii di Capitani illuſtri. You will find there (33) that Tannaquil du Chatel Provoſt of Paris, and afterwards Lieutenant to the Dauphin was magnificently adorned with military rewards by Lewis XI and Charles VIII, and one of the firſt Knights of the Order of St. Michael, and that he died in 1468. The Iſt error is, not to diſtinguiſh the uncle from the nephew; for the Leiutenant of the Dauphin, and the Provoſt of Paris is not the ſame perſon with the Knight of St. Michael. II. The Knight of St. Michael did not die in 1468, ſince in 1475 he was employed in the negotiation of a truce for nine years (34), and was preſent at a ſiege (35) in 1478. III. If he had died in 1468, he could not have been preferred to any poſt, nor received any reward from King Charles VIII, who did not begin his reign till 1483.

(33) Pag. 144, 145.

(34) Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI, pag. m. 747.

(35) At that of Bouchain, at which he was killed.

☞ CHAUCER (GEOFFREY), an eminent Engliſh Poet in the fourteenth Century, is ſaid by ſome Writers to have been born in Berkſhire, by others in Oxfordſhire, but by others, with much greater probability, at London [A]. He was deſcended from a good family [B], and born in the ſecond year of the reign of King Edward III, A. D. 1328 (a). His firſt ſtudies were in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he was in the eighteenth year of his age (b), when he wrote his Court of Love (c), and was at thoſe early years no indifferent Poet, having before written ſeveral pieces (d). But of what College he was is uncertain, there being no footſteps of him in the Records of that Univerſity. It is not improbable that he was of that Hall, where he lays the ſtory of the Miller of Trompington [C], ſo exactly deſcribing the place, and humours, and northern dialect of his Fellow-Collegians (e). How long he continued there is not known; it is certain he removed from thence to compleat his ſtudies at Oxford;

(a) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Mr. John Urry's edition of his Works, London 1721 in fol. The pages in that Life are not numbered.

(b) Ibid.

(c) See the Court of Love, ver. 45 and 911, &c.

(d) Ibid. ver. 897, &c.

(e) Life of Chaucer, ubi ſupra.

[A] Said by ſome Writers to have been born in Berkſhire, by others in Oxfordſhire, but by others, with much greater probability, at London.] Leland (1) tells us, that he was induced by ſome reaſons to believe that Oxfordſhire or Berkſhire produced our Poet. Nam quibuſdam argumentis adducor ut credam Iſiacam vel Berochenſem provinciam illius natale ſolum fuiſſe. What thoſe reaſons were, Leland has not informed us; and there appears at preſent no other, but that the ſeats of his family were in thoſe counties. Pits (2) aſſerts that he was born at Woodſtock near Oxford. Dr. Fuller (3) obſerves, that tho' ſome affirm him to have been born in Berkſhire, others in Oxfordſhire, yet the moſt and trueſt in London; and before him Camden, tho' he mentions the claim of Woodſtock (4), evidently gives no credit to it; for ſpeaking of Spenſer, whom all allow to be born in London, he calls him fellow-citizen to Chaucer (5). In ſhort he himſelf ſeems to point out the place of his nativity to be the city of London in his TESTAMENT OF LOVE (6), where he writes as follows. Alſo in the cytye of London, that is to me ſo dere and ſwete, in which I was forth growen, and more kindely love have I to that place, than to any other in yerth, as every kindly creature hath full appetite to that place of his kindly Engendrure, and to wilne reſte and pece in that ſtede to abyde: tbilke pece ſhould thus there have been broken, and of al wiſe it is commanded and defired.

(1) Comment. de Scriptor. Britannic. tom. 2. cap. DV. pag. 419, 420. edit. Oxon. 1709 in 8vo.

(2) De illuſtribus Angliæ Scriptoribus, ad ann. 1400, pag. 572.

(3) Church Hiſtory of Britain, B. 4. pag. 151. edit. London 1656.

(4) In his Britannia, in Oxfordſhire.

(5) Camden, Elizabeth. ed. Hearne, p. 783. ad ann. 1598.

(6) Pag. 486. a. Urry's edit. of his Works at London 1721.

[B] Deſcended from a good family.] Leland (7) that he was nobili loco natus; and Pits (8) aſſerts, that he was born of a family of good quality, and that his father was a Knight. Claris parentibus natus, patrem habuit Equeſtris Ordinis virum. Mr. Thomas Speght (9) thinks that one Richard Chaucer, a Vintner of London, was his father, and Elizabeth Chaucer, a nun of St. Helen's, in the ſecond year of Richard the IId, might have been his ſiſter, or of his kindred. But the Author of the Life of our Poet prefixed to Mr. Urry's Edition of his Works (10), ſhews the improbability of that conjecture; and obſerves, that the name of Chaucer, or Chaucier, Chaucieris, Chauſſier, Chauſſir &c. is originally French, ſignifying a Shoemaker; but that the family, which he deſcended from, had long enjoyed an honourable name in England, the founder being a Chief attending the Duke of Normandy in his expedition to England, as appears by the Roll of Battle-Abbey. And as the original ſeems to have been a perſon of honour, ſo ſeveral of the name, who may reaſonably be ſuppoſed to be deſcended from him, are mentioned in Records; but the deſcent of our Author is no where particularly deſcribed. The ſame Writer tells us, that tho' he cannot implicitly believe with Pits, that his father was a Knight, yet it is likely his parents were ſomething ſuperior to a common employ; and that it is highly probable that John Chaucer, who attended upon Edward the IIId and Queen Philippa in their expedition to Flanders and Cologne, and who had the King's protection to go over ſea (11) in the twelfth year of his reign, was the father of our Geoffrey; which is the more probable, becauſe Chaucer's firſt application, after leaving the Univerſity and Inns of Law, was to the Court, where it is not unlikely the ſervices of his father ſhould recommend the ſon.

(7) Pag. 419.

(8) Pag. 572.

(9) In his Life of Chaucer, prefixed to his edition of that Poet's Works at London 1602. See likewiſe Fuller, ubi ſupra, pag. 152.

(10) London 1721 in fol.

(11) See Rymer's Fœdera, vol. 5. pag. 51.

[C] It is not improbable, that he was of that Hall, where he lays the ſtory of the Miller of Trompington.] This Hall in all the Editions of Chaucer before Mr. Speght's in 1602 is called Soler or Solere; and tho' that Editor retained Solere in the text of the Edition of 1598, yet in his notes he directs it to be read Scholar's-Hall, "that is, ſays he, the Univerſity-Hall "founded by the Chancellor and Maſters of the Uni- "verſity, ann. 1326, but ſince united to the founda- "tion of the Lady Elizabeth de Burgo, Counteſs of "Clare, and called Clare-Hall." The Author of his Gloſſary at the end of Mr. Urry's Edition of Chaucer obſerves (12), that if Scholars or Scholler's Hall be the true reading, it may perhaps mean a College founded by Edward III, by the name of Aula Scolarium Regis, now part of Trinity-College. See Rymer's Fœdera, Vol. VII. p. 239.

(12) Gloſſary, pag. 61.

ford; but in what College is as uncertain as the former. Mr. Thomas Speght (f) fixes upon Canterbury or Merton College. The former, now part of Chriſt-Church-College, is unlikely to be the place, ſince it was not founded till the year 1363, at which time Chaucer muſt be five and thirty years of age, and had been for ſome time launched into the world of buſineſs. Merton College is the more likely; for though his name does not appear among the celebrated members of it at that time, yet we find moſt of his Contemporaries, as Strode, Occleve, &c. were of that College, where one of his ſons was likewiſe educated (g). After a conſiderable ſtay here, and a ſtrict application to the public Lectures of the Univerſity, "he became, ſays Leland (h), an acute Logician, a "ſmooth Rhetorician, a pleaſant Poet, a grave Philoſopher, an ingenious Mathemati-"cian, and an holy Divine." That he was a great Maſter in Aſtronomy, (though he modeſtly pleads ignorance in it) (i) is plain from his Diſcourſes of the Aſtrolabe; that he was verſed in the Hermetic Philoſophy, (which prevailed much at that time) appears by his Tale of the Chanon's Yeoman: his knowledge in Divinity is evident from his Parſon's Tale; and his Philoſophy from the Teſtament of Love. After he had left the Univerſity he travelled into France, Holland, and other countries, where he ſpent part of his younger years (k). Upon his return he entered himſelf in the Inner Temple [D], where he ſtudied the Municipal Laws of England (l). But he had not long followed theſe ſtudies, before his ſingular accompliſhments were diſcovered by ſome perſons at Court, whither he next made his approaches; nor was the beauty of his perſon of ſmall ſervice in introducing him there. His firſt ſtation at Court was probably that of page to King Edward III, a place of honour and eſteem; but this was only his firſt ſtep to preferment, as the King himſelf intimates; and therefore by his Letters Patents dated in the forty firſt year of his reign he grants to him for his good ſervices, by the title of dilectus Valettus noſter [E], an annuity of twenty marks per ann. payable out of the Exchequer, till he could otherwiſe provide for him. Not long after we find him Gentleman of the King's Privy Chamber, and by that title the King granted to him by Letters Patents dated in the forty fifth year of his reign the further ſum of twenty marks per ann. during life. The next year he was made Shield-bearer to the King [F]. Being thus placed near the King, he found reſpect and encouragement from all the chief perſons of the Court, particularly Queen Philippa; John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, upon whoſe account he wrote the Book of the Ducheſs or the Dreme of Chaucer, the Complaint of the Black Knight, and the Dreame; Blanch, wife to the Duke; and the Lady Margaret, the King's daughter, and Counteſs of Pembroke (m). Thus beloved, eſteemed, and honoured, he ſpent his younger years in a conſtant attendance upon the Court, and for the moſt part living near it when reſiding at Woodſtock, in a ſquare ſtone houſe near the Park-Gate, ſtill called Chaucer's Houſe (n). Blanch Ducheſs of Lancaſter entertained in her ſervice one Katherine Rouet, daughter of Sir Payn or Pagan Rouet, a native of Hainault, and Guien King at Arms for that country, who was afterwards married to Sir Hugh Swynford a Knight of Lincoln. He dying not long after their marriage, the Duke of Lancaſter and his Ducheſs continued her as Guardian to their children. This Lady had a younger ſiſter, named Philippa, whom the Duke and Ducheſs recommended to our Poet for a wife, and he married her about the thirty ſecond year of his age. Being thus fixed by marriage, the King began to employ him in more public and advantageous places; for in the forty ſixth year of his reign we find him in commiſſion with others to treat with the Doge and Senate of Genoa; and now he began every day to riſe in greatneſs, having the Duke of Lancaſter for his Patron, who had ſeveral reaſons for eſpouſing his intereſt, particularly out of regard to the Lady Katherine Swynford, who was the Duke's miſtreſs, and becauſe his ambition required all the aſſiſtance of learned men to give it a plauſible appearance (o). About this time (perhaps for his ſervices at Genoa) the King granted him by Letters Patents dated at Windſor in the forty eighth year of his reign, by the title of Armiger noſter, one Pycher of Wine daily in the Port of London, and ſoon after made him Comptroller of the Cuſtoms in that Port of Wool, Woolfells, and Hides, with a particular Proviſo, that he ſhould perſonally execute that office, and write the accounts relating to it with his own hand (p). The King likewiſe granted him ſeveral other favours [G]; by which means he grew exceedingly rich, having at one time almoſt

(f) In his Life of Chaucer, publiſhed in his edition of that Poet's Works at London 1602.

(g) Life of Chaucer prefixed to his Works, edit. London 1721.

(h) Commentarius de Scriptoribus Britannicis, tom. 2. cap. DV. pag. 420. edit. Oxon. 1709, in 8vo.

(i) See The Houſe of Fame, lib. 1.

(k) Leland, ubi ſupra; Balæus, Scriptor. illuſtr. Majar. Brytanniæ Catal. Cent. 7. cap. 24. pag. 525. edit. Baſil. 1557; and Speght's Life of Chaucer, ubi ſupra.

(l) Leland, ubi ſupra.

(m) Speght's Life of Chaucer, ubi ſupra, and the Life of Chaucer, in the edition at London 1721.

(n) Life of Chaucer.

(o) Speght, ubi ſupra, and Life of Chaucer, ubi ſupra.

(p) Pat. 48. Ed. 3. pag. 1. m. 7.

[D] Upon his return, he entered himſelf in the Inner-Temple.] To prove this Mr. Speght mentions a record ſeen by Mr. Buckley in that houſe, where Geoffrey Chaucer was fined two ſhillings for beating a Franciſcan Fryar in Fleetſtreet. Leland (13) intimates, that he proſecuted his ſtudies in the Law towards the latter end of his Life, which the Author of Chaucer's Life in Mr. Urry's Edition ſhews to be improbable for ſeveral reaſons; and obſerves, that it is much more likely, that he acquired the knowledge of our Laws in his youth, in order to qualify him for public affairs, in which he was afterwards concerned.

(13) Pag. 420.

[E] By the title of dilectus Valettus noſter.] Mr. Selden (14) tells us, that this poſt of Valettus or Valectus was conferred upon young heirs deſigned to be Knighted, or young Gentlemen of great deſcent or quality. Mr. Camden takes Valectus Hoſpitii to ſignify a Gentleman of the Privy-Chamber; and by this name of Valectus the King before had entitled the Lord Abergavenny (15).

(14) Titles of Honour, Part 2. cap. 5. § 47.

(15) Speght, ubi ſupra.

[F] He was made Shield-bearer to the King.] This title of Scutifer Regis, tho' now extinct, was at that time of great honour, ſuch perſons being always next the King's perſon, and generally upon ſignal victories rewarded with military honours (16).

(16) Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Mr. Urry's edition.

[G] The King granted him ſeveral other favours.] In the forty ninth year of his reign, and the forty ſeventh of Chaucer's age, he granted to him the lands and almoſt a thouſand pounds per. ann. (q), a vaſt eſtate for thoſe times. But as he was thus advanced to higher places of truſt, ſo he became more entangled in the affairs of State, the conſequence of which proved of the utmoſt prejudice to him. The Duke of Lancaſter, who had been the chief inſtrument of his riſe, expected the fruits of thoſe favours in a ready compliance with him in all his deſigns. The Duke to promote his ambitious views eſpouſed the party of Wickliffe, and endeavoured to expoſe the Clergy, who were averſe to his deſigns, to the indignation of the people; in which Chaucer had no ſmall hand by his public intereſt and his writings [H]. But the King perceiving the aims of the Duke, declared Richard, ſon of Edward the Black Prince, heir to the Crown, which was a prodigious mortification to the Duke, who from that time was never eaſy, nor free from the jealouſies and ſuſpicions of the Prince upon the Throne, in which his friends bore a ſhare (r). However in the laſt year of King Edward IIId's reign our Poet was employed in a commiſſion to treat with the French [I]; and in the beginning of King Richard IId's reign he was in ſome degree of favour at Court, as appears from the grants made to him [K]. The Duke of Lancaſter at laſt finding his hopes of greatneſs checked and his life in perpetual danger from the King, began to abandon Wickliffe's party; upon which Chaucer likewiſe, how much ſoever he had eſpouſed that Divine's opinions, thought it prudent to conceal them more than he had done; though it doth not appear that at any time he had gone all the lengths of that party [L]. With the Duke's intereſt, that of Chaucer entirely ſunk; and the former paſſing over Sea, his friends felt all the malice of the oppoſite party; which put them upon calling in a number of the populace to their aſſiſtance; by which means ſeveral popular commotions enſued, and particularly one in the City of London. As in this affair our Poet was no unartful prompter behind the curtain [M], ſo he felt the conſequences of it in his ruin; being and body of Sir Edmond Staplegate, ſon of Sir Edmond Staplegate in the county of Kent, in Ward, who afterwards paid him one hundred and four pounds for the ſame (17); and the year following he granted to him, by the title of dilectus Armiger noſter, the ſum of ſeventy one pounds four ſhillings and ſix pence ariſing from a certain quantity of wool therein mentioned, which was forfeited by one John Kent of London for non-payment of Cuſtoms (18).

(q) Speght, ubi ſupra.

(r) Life of Chaucer.

(17) Speght, ubi ſupra.

(18) Pat. 50. Ed. III. p. 1. m. 5.

[H] Endeavoured to expoſe the Clergy, who were averſe to his deſigns, to the indignation of the people; in which Chaucer had no ſmall hand by his public intereſt and his Writings.] The Author of the Life of him printed in Mr. Urry's Edition of his Works informs us of this, but obſerves, that he cannot go ſo far as to ſuppoſe, that our Poet ſcurrilouſly reviled the eſtabliſhed Religion of thoſe times; and therefore cannot think, that either the Plow-man's tale or Jack Upland were written by him. However that Author tells us, that he was a favourer of the Lollards (as were likewiſe moſt of his friends, and particularly Occleve,) as is evident from ſeveral places of his Writings, wherein he bitterly inveighs againſt the Prieſts and Friars. Not that he diſliked all of that Order, for he mentions Friar John Some and Friar Nicholas Lenne or Lynne (19), with reſpect, ſtiling them reverent Clerkes (20), and expreſſes his regard for the ſecular Clergy, who lived up to their profeſſion, in his deſcription of the Parſon. Nor was he diſeſteemed by the Clergy of thoſe times; Lidgate, who was a Monk of St. Edmondſbury, and ſeveral others entertaining a great reverence for him, and ſpeaking of him with the utmoſt reſpect. Nor was he leſs eſteemed by Sir John Gower, tho' a violent Bigot to the Church of Rome, and a perpetual exclaimer againſt Wickliffe and his followers.

(19) Leland tells us, pag. 420. that Chaucer was inſtructed in the Mathematics by thoſe two Fryars.

(20) Aſtrolabe, pag. 440.

[I] Employed in a Commiſſion to treat with the French.] The French, notwithſtanding a truce, which had been made with them, having diſturbed our coaſt, the King endeavoured to prolong the truce; for which purpoſe he ſent Chaucer and other Commiſſioners to treat with thoſe appointed by the French King, before the Pope's Legates; but nothing being concluded, the Legates propoſed a match between the Lady Mary, daughter to the King of France, and Richard Prince of Wales. Whereupon the King ſent Sir Guiſcard Dangle, Knight of the Garter and afterwards Earl of Huntington, Sir Richard Sturry a noted Wickliffiſt, and our Chaucer, Embaſſadors to Monſtreuil; but this Embaſſy had no other effect, than the prolonging of the truce with France till the firſt of May following (21).

(21) Life of Chaucer, ubi ſupra.

[K] The grants made to him.] In the firſt year of the King's reign, by Letters Patents under the Great Seal, bearing date March the 23d the King confirmed to him, by the title of Dilectus Armiger noſter, the grant made by the late King of twenty marks per ann. and by other Letters Patents bearing date the 18th of April in the ſame year he confirmed the other grant of the late King for a Pycher of wine to be delivered him daily in the port of London. In the ſecond year of his reign King Richard took Chaucer and all his lands into his protection; which Mr. Speght (22) believes was occaſioned by ſome trouble, into which he was fallen by ſiding with the common people. But he does not ſeem to have been involved in that trouble till ſome time after, and therefore it is more likely, that this protection was to ſecure him from his creditors, as was likewiſe another protection granted by the ſame Prince. It does not appear by what means he was reduced to ſuch low circumſtances, unleſs it was by the loſs of his intereſt at Court and of advantages, which he enjoyed under his Maſter and Patron the late King. Mr. Speght ſuppoſes, that he ſpent moſt of his wealth in foreign embaſſies; but it ſhould ſeem, that they were the means whereby he acquired it, he being generally well rewarded. This King in the fourth year of his reign confirmed the grants made to Chaucer and Philippa his wife of the ſeveral annuities granted to them (22).

(22) Ubi ſupra.

[L] It doth not appear, that at any time he had gone all the lengths of that party.] His reſentments were chiefly againſt the perſonal vices of the Clergy, not their doctrines; for the Pilgrimage of Canterbury is ſpoken of with reverence, and he calls Becket the holy bliſsful Martyr (24). And the Parſon, though he would not ren to St. Powles (25) to procure livings, makes one in the expedition to Canterbury. This I ſay, continues the Author of the Life of Chaucer, not as if that journey was real; but Chaucer would never have been guilty of ſo great an impropriety as to make perſons act contrary to their opinions. Nor did even the leaders of that party ſcruple the ceremonies then uſed. They oppoſed them in opinion, but ſeldom differed from them in practice. Even Wickliffe himſelf always conformed, and held his living of Lutterworth without interruption, and died in a fit of the palſy, which ſeized him while he was ſaying Maſs. But Chaucer differed much from them even in opinion; for in his Teſtament of Love (q) he confeſſes the Real Preſence (r). . . . . In the Houſe of Fame (s) we find him again going on pilgrimage. We may gather his opinion of the Invocation of Saints from his Priere de Nôtre Dame, his Ballad in commendation of our Lady, and ſeveral other pieces. But however Chaucer might deſpiſe ſome extravagancies of the Church of Rome, yet that he died a Member of it, ſeems plainly by his Retractation. We ſhall conſider the authority of that Retractation in Note [Y].

(23) Life of Chaucer, ubi ſupra.

(24) Prol. ver. 17.

(25) Ibid. ver. 511.

(q) Pag. 492. b.

(r) Mr. Fox ſeems to be of a contrary opinion, Acts and Mon. vol. 2. pag. 42. edit. 1684.

(s) In the beginning of the firſt book.

[M] In this affair our Poet was no unartful Prompter behind the curtain.] This we are informed of by the being obliged to fly to Hainault, whence his neceſſities forced him to return to England [N], where he was arreſted by order from the King, and impriſoned, as it is probable, in the Tower of London. At laſt he made a frank confeſſion of the whole affair [O], which though it expoſed him to the reſentments of the people, procured him the King's pardon. Theſe misfortunes occaſioned his writing that excellent Treatiſe called The Teſtament of Love [P]. He did not for ſome time recover the ſhock which this gave him, and his circumſtances being reduced to the loweſt degree of poverty, and his intereſt at Court ruined, he retired to Woodſtock, to enjoy the calm pleaſures of a ſtudious ſafety, which produced his admirable Treatiſe of the Aſtrolabe [Q]. The Duke of Lancaſter at laſt ſurmounting his troubles, his party gathered new life; and about the 20th year of the King he married the Lady Katherine Swynford, ſiſter to Chaucer's wife, and procured his children by her [R] to be legitimated; ſo that Thomas Chaucer, our Poet's ſon, became allied to moſt of the Nobility, and to ſeveral of the Kings of England. And now the Sun began again to ſhine upon Chaucer with an Evening-ray; for he had ſome grants conferred upon him by the King [S]; by means of which and the influence which he the Author of his Life in Mr. Urry's edition of his works, who obſerves, that John of Northampton, a creature of the Duke of Lancaſter, was at the head of the diſturbances in London, who having been Lord Mayor the year before, made ſtrong intereſt to be again choſen, and therefore oppoſed the following election, ſecuring to his party moſt of the Citizens, and crying out upon the miſmanagement of the City, ſuggeſting that there was no poſſible way of ſecuring them from ruin but by re-electing him. This occaſioned inſurrections; and our Poet being then Comptroller of the Cuſtoms in that Port, and joined in party with Northampton, as being both in the Duke's intereſt, encouraged them. But this diſorder did not continue long; for upon Sir Robert Knolles's beheading one of the rioters, it was ſuppreſſed, and Northampton taken into cuſtody. Strict ſearch was made for Chaucer, but he made his eſcape into Hainault, and afterwards into France, and finding the King reſolved to get him if poſſible into his hands, as the fitteſt perſon to diſcover the abettors of thoſe commotions, he fled thence into Hainault, with this intent chiefly, as he ſays (26) their privitie to concele. The Author above quoted tells us, that the Records are ſilent as to the reaſon of Chaucer's falling under the diſpleaſure of the Government; but his ſhare in the commotions of the City is frequently alluded to in his Teſtament of Lere, where he ſays (27), that he was drawe to be aſſentaunt, and in his mightes helping to certain conjuracions, and other grete matters of rulynge of Citezins.

(26) Teſtament of Love, pag. 488, a.

(27) Pag. 485, b.

[N] Whence his neceſſities forced him to return to England.] Several of his accomplices had been ſupported by him in their exile, while the chief ringleaders (except Northampton, who was condemned at Reading upon the evidence of his Clerk) had at London made their peace, by acknowledging their crime, and making ſubmiſſion, and had now forgot the honour and integrity of Chaucer, who ſuffered exile to ſecure their ſecrets. Nay they proved ſo ungrateful, that they wiſhed his death, and endeavoured it by keeping all ſupplies of money from him. And while he ſpent his fortune in removing from place to place, and in aſſiſting his fellow-exiles, he was ſo far from receiving any aſſiſtance at home, that his apartments were let, and the money received for rent was never accounted for to him; nor could he recover any from thoſe, who owed it him, they being fully perſuaded it was impoſſible for him ever to return to England. The Government ſtill purſuing their reſentment againſt him and his friends, they were conſtrained to leave Zealand; and Chaucer having no poſſible means left of ſtruggling longer with the difficulties of exile and poverty, and finding no ſecurity wherever he fled, choſe to ſubmit his life to the Laws of his Country, rather than loſe it thro' hunger and want in foreign parts, and returned into England (28).

(28) Life of Chaucer.

[O] At laſt he made a frank confeſſion of the whole affair.] The Government thinking, that by his means they might make a full diſcovery of the late Rebellion, ſent for him, and told him, that the only way to obtain mercy would be to confeſs the ſecrets of his treaſon, and diſcover the confederates in it; deſiring him to propoſe in what manner thoſe differences might be compoſed (29). But he for a long time refuſed, being unwilling to bring the malice of ſo powerful a party upon him by betraying their ſecrets, which he ſays (30) he concealed longer than he ought. But the King and his Princes (to uſe his words) having obliged him upon oath to declare what he knew, and with huge words and grete (31) urged him to confeſs, and watching his words ſtrictly and narrowly to catch him, if they could, varying in his confeſſion, he very freely diſcloſed all he knew, and impeached the perſons concerned with him; and not only ſo, but, according to the cuſtom of trials at that time, offered to prove the truth of his confeſſion by combat (32).

(29) Teſtament of Love, pag. 486, a.

(30) Ibid. pag. 488, a.

(31) Ibid. pag. 495, b.

(32) Ibid. pag. 487, a. See the Life of Chaucer, in Mr. Urry's edition of his Works.

[P] Theſe misfortunes occaſioned his writing that excellent Treatiſe, called, The Teſtament of Love.] This Book is an imitation of Boethius de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ. In the beginning of it he thus reflects upon his former glory and his preſent miſery (33). Alas! Fortune! alas! I that ſome tyme in delicious houres was wont to enjoy bliſsful ſtoundes, am nowe dryve by unhappy hevineſſe to bewaile my ſondrie yvels in tene. . . Mirth is chaunged into tene. . Thus witleſſe, thoughtfull, ſightleſſe lokynge, I endure my penaunce in this darke priſonne, caitifned fro frendſhippe and acquaintaunce, and forſaken of al that any worde dare ſpeke. And a little further (34); O! where art thou nowe Frendſhip, that ſometyme with laugh ande chere madeſt bothe face and countenance to me wardes? And in another place (35); How am I now caſt out of al ſwetenes of Bliſſe, and miſchevouſly ſtongen by paſſed joye? Sorrowfully muſt I bewaile, and live as a wretche. Every of tho joyes is turned into his contrary. For richeſſe now have I povertie; for dignitie now am I enpriſoned; in ſtede of power wretchedneſſe I ſuffre; and for glory of renome I am now diſpiſed and fouliche hated. Thus hath farne fortune, that ſodainly am I overthrowen, and out of all welth diſpoiled.

(33) Pag. 479.

(34) Pag. 480, a.

(35) Pag. 502, a.

[Q] His admirable Treatiſe of the Aſtrolabe.] This was written in the year 1391 (36). It is calculated for the latitude of Woodſtock, being a ſmall matter different, as he ſays (37), from that of Oxford. It is ſo exact, that the learned are of opinion it cannot be corrected.

(36) See pag. 442, b. and pag. 443, a. of Urry's edition of his Works.

[R] The Duke's children by her.] I. John Beaufort, Earl of Somerſet. II. Henry Beaufort, Cardinal of St. Euſebius, at firſt Biſhop of Lincoln, and afterwards of Wincheſter, and ſeveral times Chancellor of England. III. Thomas Beaufort, Duke of Exeter and Earl of Dorſet. IV. Joan, Counteſs of Weſtmorland.

(37) Pag. 447, a.

[S] He had now ſeveral Grants conferred upon him by the King.] In the ſixty fourth or ſixty fifth year of his age, the King granted to him, by the title of Dilectus Armiger noſter, an annuity of twenty marks per ann. during life, as a compenſation for his former penſion granted to him by Edward III, which by his miſconduct he had been obliged to part with. But that, how ſufficient ſoever it might be for a preſent ſupport, could not diſcharge the many debts, in which he was engaged; and the King willing to ſkreen him till he ſhould recover himſelf, granted him his Protection dated at Weſtminſter May 14th in the 21ſt year of his reign, ſetting forth that the King had occaſion to employ him in ſeveral affairs of moment. The year following he granted him by the title of Armiger noſter, by Letters Patents dated at Weſtminſter Octob. 13th, in compenſation of the Pycher of wine daily, one pipe of wine annually in the port of London, to be delivered to him by his chief Butler, which office was that year granted to his ſon Thomas. In the 22d year of his reign the King confirmed again to him the Grant of the pipe of wine annually (38).

(38) Life of Chaucer.

he recovered by the Duke of Lancaſter's marriage, he again grew to a conſiderable ſhare of wealth. But being now near ſeventy years of age, he thought proper to retire to Dunnington Caſtle near Newbury, where he ſpent the two laſt years of his life. He had not long enjoyed this retirement before he loſt his patron and brother-in-law, the Duke of Lancaſter, who died in 1399; ſoon after which that revolution happened in England, wherein Richard II was depoſed, and Henry IV, ſon of the Duke of Lancaſter, aſſumed the Crown; and in the firſt year of his reign gave our Poet ſome marks of his favour [T]. But how pleaſing ſoever the change of Government might be to him at firſt, he afterwards found no ſmall inconveniences attending it. The meaſures and grants of the late King were annulled, and the Acts of Parliament for a whole year, (i. e. the twenty firſt of his reign) totally repealed; upon which Chaucer, in order to procure freſh grants of his penſions, left his retirement, and applied to Court; where though he gained a confirmation of ſome grants (s), yet the fatigue of attendance and his great age prevented him by death from enjoying them; not that he had any view of further honour or deſire of public employments, for, as Leland ſays (t), he found age burthenſome, and while he followed his cauſes at London fell ſick, and with a truly Roman courage, and at the ſame time with a calm and Chriſtian reſignation, ended his days in the ſeventy ſecond year of his age, and left the world as though he deſpiſed it, as appears from his Song of Flie from the Preſe &c. which he wrote in his laſt hours [V]. He died October the 25th 1400, and was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey [W]. By his wife Philippa he had two ſons, Thomas and Lewis [X]. With regard to his temper, he had a mixture of the gay, the modeſt and the grave. The ſprightlineſs of his humour was more diſtinguiſhed by his writings than appearance, which gave occaſion to Margaret Counteſs of Pembroke often to rally him upon his ſilent modeſty in company, telling him, that his

(s) See Note [T].

(t) Pag. 425.

[T] Gave our Poet ſome marks of his favour.] He confirmed to him the Grants of the pipe of wine and of the annuity, (which had been accidentally loſt,) by an exemplification of the former Patents of Richard II. Nor did he think this ſufficient to ſhew his eſteem for his father's friend and brother, but in the ſame year granted to him an annuity of forty marks per ann. during life (39).

(39) Ibid.

[V] His Song of the Flie fro the Preſe, which he wrote in his laſt hours.] In a manuſcript in the Cotton Library (40) theſe words are inſerted before that ſong: A Balade made by Geffrey Chaucyer upon his dethe bedde lying in his grete Anguyſſe. The Song is as follows:

(40) Otho. A. xviii.

Flie fro the Preſe, and dwell with ſothfaſtneſſe,
Suffiſe unto thy gode though it be ſmall,
For horde hath hate, and climbyng tikilneſſe,
Prece hath envy, and wele it brent o'er all.
Savour no more then the behovin ſhall.
Rede well thy ſelf, that other folke canſt rede,
And Trouthe The ſhall delivir, it is no drede,

Paine The not eche crokid to redreſſe,
In truſt of her that tournith as a Balle;
Grete Reſt ſtandith in litil Buſineſſe.
Beware alſo to ſpurne again a nalle:
Strive not as doith a Crocke with a Walle.
Demith thy ſelf, that demiſt othir's dede,
And Trouthe The ſhal delivir, it is no drede.

That The is ſent, receve in buxomneſſe;
The wraſtling of this World aſkith a Fall,
Here is no Home, here is but Wildirneſſe.
Forthe, Pilgrim, forthe, beſt out of thy ſtall.
Look up on high, and thanke thy God of all.
Weivith thy luſte, and let thy Ghoſt The lede,
And Trouthe the ſhall delivir, it is no drede.

[W] Was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey.] Leland (41) tells us, that theſe two verſes,

(41) Pag. 425.

Galfridus Chaucer, vates, & fama Poeſis
Maternæ, hac ſacrâ ſum tumulatus humo, were put upon his tomb by Caxton the Printer, at whoſe requeſt Stephen Surigonus of Milan made a copy of verſes upon Chaucer's Death, out of which theſe two verſes are taken. But about the year 1555 (42) or 1556 (43), Mr. Nicholas Brigham, a Gentleman of Oxford, at his own charge erected a handſome monument for him in that Abbey; upon which he cauſed Chaucer's picture to be painted, with the following Inſcription which ſtill remains:

(42) Weaver's Funeral Monuments, pag. 489.

(43) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 130. 2d edit. London 1721.

M. S.
Qui fuit Anglorum vates ter maximus olim
Galfridus Chaucer conditur hoc tumulo.
Annum ſi quæras Domini, ſi tempora Vitæ,
Ecce notæ ſubſunt, quæ tibi cuncta notant.
25 Octobris 1400.
Ærumnarum requies mors.
N. Brigham hoc fecit Muſarum nomine ſumptus.
1556.

About the ledge of the tomb were theſe verſes now quite worn out (44):

(44) Speght, ubi ſupra, and Weaver, ubi ſupra.

Si rogites quis eram, forſan te fama docebit;
Quod ſi fama negat, mundi quia gloria tranſit,
Hæc monumenta lege.

[X] He had two ſons, Thomas and Lewis.] Speght (45) tells us, that ſome perſons, (he knew not upon what grounds) were of opinion, that Thomas Chaucer was not the ſon of our Poet, but rather ſome Kinſman of his, whom he brought up; but he rejects this opinion upon the authority of Mr. Glover, Somerſet Herald, who in the Pedigree makes him his ſon. This Thomas was born about the 38th or 39th year of Edward III (46); and married one of the greateſt Fortunes in England, Maud, daughter and heir of Sir John Burgſherſhe, brother of Sir Bartholomew Burgſherſhe Knight of the Garter, and Dr. Henry Burgſherſhe Biſhop of Lincoln, Chancellor and Treaſurer of England. He had the office of Chief Butler granted him by King Richard II, which was afterwards given him for life by Letters Patents from King Henry IV, and confirmed by Henry VI. In the reign of Henry IV he was Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, Sheriff of Oxfordſhire and Berkſhire, Conſtable of Wallingford Caſtle and Knareſborough Caſtle during life; Embaſſador to France, and Burgundy, and paſſed thro' ſeveral other public ſtations, as appears by the Records. The chief place of his reſidence was at Ewelm in Oxfordſhire, where he died Novemb. 18th 1434 and lies buried in the Pariſh-Church there. By his wife Maud, who died April 28th, 1436, he had one daughter, named Alice, who was thrice married, firſt to Sir John Philips Knt.; and afterwards to Thomas Montacute, E. of Saliſbury, who dying left her very rich. Her third huſband was the famous William de la Pole, Earl and afterwards Duke of Suffolk, by whom ſhe had one ſon, John Duke of Suffolk. The Ducheſs ſurvived him ſeveral years, and after an honourable life died at Ewelm May 20th 1475, and lies interred there. Leland, Bale, and Pits erroneouſly aſſert, that it was our Poet's ſiſter, who married the Duke of Suffolk. His ſecond ſon Lewis was born in 1381, for he was ten years old †, when his father wrote his Aſtrolabe, which was in 1391 *. He was then Student in Merton-College, and pupil to the famous Nicholas Strode. But we have no further account of him.

(45) Ubi ſupra.

(46) Idem, ibid.

† Aſtrol. pag. 439, a.

* Ibid. pag. 442, b. 433, a.

his abſence was more agreeable to her than his converſation. In his early years his inclination was ſomewhat too gay and looſe; nor did even marriage confine his amorous humours (u), and he himſelf ſpeaks in his Retractation [Y] with a penitent concern of the many wanton ſongs which he had written in his younger years. Towards the latter part of his Life the gay Gentleman gave way to the grave Philoſopher and pious Divine (w). He was intimate with the moſt celebrated ſcholars of his age [Z]. We ſhall give his character in the Note [AA]. His works are (u) Life of Chaucer.

(w) Ibid.

[Y] His Retractation.] This is printed in Mr. Urry's edition of Chaucer's Works (47), and in the Appendix (48) to Mr. Thomas Hearne's edition of Robert of Glouceſter's Chronicle, publiſhed at Oxford 1724 in 8vo in two volumes, who obſerves (49), that beſides the Tracts ſaid in this Revocation to have been written by Chaucer, and the difference of the three copies mentioned by Mr. Hearne, the Scribe has intitled himſelf to a ſhare in the Petition; whence Mr. Hearne thinks, that the Revocation is not genuine, but that it was made by the Monks. "For not only the Regular, "but Secular Clergy were exaſperated againſt Chaucer, "for the freedom he had taken to expoſe their lewd- "neſs and debauchery; but nothing gave them ſo "much offence, as the Plowman's Tale, in which he "has in lively colours deſcribed their pride, covetouſ- "neſs, and abominable luſts, and ſhewed that the Pope "is Anti-Chriſt, and they his Miniſters. Such a Sa- "tire made by a perſon of his note and diſtinction, "and ſo much celebrated for his wonderful fine parts "and exquiſite learning and judgment; could not but "work mightily upon them, eſpecially when many "of them had arrived at ſo high a pitch of wicked- "neſs, and were, as it were, drowned in ſloth and "luxury, being much worſe now than their predeceſ- "ſors above three hundred years before, when moſt of "even the Biſhops themſelves were illiterate, though "adored and flattered upon account of their dignity "and unbounded wealth, and attended upon by an "amazing number of ſervants and ſycophants: circa "ea tempora plerique Epiſcopi erant illiterati, pecuniis "& blanditiis potentes, veſtium apparatu, ſatellitum "ſtrepitu muniti, as in the manuſcript Hiſtory of the "Church of Lichfield in the Bodleian Library (1). "They could not endure to think of a Reformation, "eſpecially ſince they were indulged to keep concu- "bines, now celibacy had ſo generally prevailed; &c." Mr. Hearne afterwards remarks (50), that if notwithſtanding what has been alledged, it be ſuppoſed, that this Revocation is authentic, and was written by Chaucer himſelf, we may then conjecture, that it was done by him towards the end of the reign of Richard II, when having loſt the favour of his Prince, and moſt of his noble friends here, and being withal grown old, he retired himſelf from the pleaſures of the world, and reflected ſeriouſly upon the changes and infirmities, to which human nature is ſubject. This conſideration with the thoughts of a future ſtate could not but make him renounce the vanities of this life, and retract thoſe paſſages, which he perceived, either had or might do miſchief to Religion and Morality. After which he became quite weary of this life, and ſeemed to have no reliſh for any thing in it; tho' that may be attributed chiefly perhaps to the misfortunes, which happened to him, and he and his lands being taken into the King's Protection in the ſecond year of his reign, becauſe of ſome danger, that ſeemed to threaten him from his favouring and ſtriking in with the raſh attempts of the common people. Whatever this attempt was, whether rebellion, or ſomething bordering upon it, 'tis certain he forfeited the love of his Prince and moſt of his friends, and he was forced to lead afterwards a melancholy life, which often extorted from him grievous complaints, particularly of his own raſhneſs in following the multitude, and ſometimes would wiſh to exchange life for death (1); which miſery however was fortunate in this, that it prepared him the better for Eternity, and influenced him to retract all the looſe things in his writings. Mr. Hearne (51) then obſerves, that the Plowman's Tale having given more offence than all the reſt of his writings, perhaps that is the reaſon why it appears in ſo few manuſcripts; and that this has made ſome think it is not Chaucer's, which they believe confirmed from the ſtyle, which is different from his other Poems.

(47) Pag. 214.

(48) Num. 4. § 4. pag. 602. vol. 2.

(49) Ibid. § 5. pag. 603.

(1) Muſ. 65.

(50) Ibid. § 6. pag. 604.

(1) This may be ſeen, in the Complaint he made to his Empty Purſe, which Mr. Speght found ten times larger in Mr. Stowe's MS. than in the Print.

(51) § 7. pag. 605.

[Z] He was intimate with the moſt celebrated Scholars of his age.] Among his particular friends were Sir John Gower, and Sir Thomas Occleve or Hockliffe, of the office of the Privy Seal, and perhaps John Lidgate Monk of Bury, who was thirty years old at Chaucer's death. In the former part of his life he had been acquainted with Francis Petrarch; and our Poet in the Prologue to the Clerk of Oxenford's Tale ſeems to hint at himſelf in that character (as he does very often on the like occaſions) where the Clerk ſays, that he learned the ſtory of Griſild at Padua from Petrarch. Mr. Dryden in the Preface to his Tales ſays, it was the Invention of Petrarch by him ſent to Boccace, from whom it came to Chaucer; but Petrarch only tranſlated it from Boccace into Latin, and dedicated it to him. Nor is there any reaſon to doubt of our Poet's acquaintance, at leaſt friendſhip with Boccace, (from whom he borrowed many things), who at that time beſtowed a great deal of pains in refining the Italian tongue, as Chaucer did the Engliſh.

[AA] We ſhall give his character in the Note.] Roger Aſcham (52) ſtiles him the Engliſh Homer, and tells us, that he ever thoughte his ſayinges to have as much Authoritye as eyther Sophocles or Euripides in Greke. Sir Philip Sidney (53) obſerves, that our Poet "un- "doubtedly did excellently well in his Troilus and Cre- "ſeid; of whom truly, ſays he, I know not whether "to marvell more, either that he in that myſtie time "could ſee ſo clearly, or that we in this clear age go "ſo ſtumblingly after him; yet has he great wants fit "to be forgotten in ſo reverent an Antiquitie." Mr. Francis Beaumont in his Letter to Mr. Speght (54), dated from Leiceſter the 30th of June 1597 comparing him with other Poets tells us, that his "Canter- "bury Tales contain in them almoſt the ſame argument, "that is handled in Comedies. His ſtile therein for "the moſt part is low and open, and like unto theirs; "but herein they differ. The Comedy-Writers do "all follow and borrow one of another, as Terence "from Plautus and Menander; Plautus from Me- "nander and Demophilus; Statius and Cæcilius "from Diphilus, Apollodorus and Philemon; and "almoſt all the laſt Comedians from that, which was "called Antiqua Comœdia. . . . Chaucer's Device of his "Canterbury Pilgrimage is merely his own; his drift "is to touch all ſorts of men, and to diſcover all "vices of that Age; which he doth ſo feelingly and "with ſo true an aim, as he never fails to hit what- "ſoever mark he levels at." He afterwards obſerves, that our Poet "may rightly be called, the Pith and "Sinews of Eloquence, and the very Life itſelf of all "Mirth and pleaſant writing; beſides one gift he "hath above other Authors, and that is, by excel- "lency of his deſcriptions, to poſſeſs his readers with "a more forcible imagination of ſeeing that (as it "were) done before their eyes, which they read, than "any other that ever hath written in any tongue." Sir Henry Savil (55) ſtiles him the Chief of our Engliſh Poets, and ſays, that he had a ſharp judgment and a pleaſant wit, and was well ſkilled both in Philoſophy and Divinity. Milton in his Poem intitled Il Penſeroſo (56) ranks him with the greateſt of Poets in theſe lines, alluding to the Squier's Tale in Chaucer,

But, O ſad virgin, that thy power
Might raiſe Muſæus from his bower,
Or bid the ſoul of Orpheus ſing,
. . . . .
Or call upon him, that left half-told
The ſtory of Cambuſcan bold,
Of Camball and of Algarſife
And who had Canace to wife,
That own'd the virtuous ring and glaſs,
And of the wondrous horſe of braſs,
On which the Tartar King did ride.

Mr. Thomas Rymer (57) tell us that "they who at- "tempted verſe in Engliſh down till Chaucer's time, "made

(52) Toxophilus, fol. 13, b. edit. 1571.

(53) Defence of Poeſie, pag. 513. edit. 1598.

(54) Printed in Mr. Speght's edition 1602.

(55) Preface to his edition of Archbiſhop Bradwardine de Cauſâ Dei. London 1617.

(56) Poems upon ſeveral Occaſions, pag. 45, 46. edit. London 1673.

(57) Short View of Tragedy, cap. 7. pag. 78, 79. edit. London 1693.

are very numerous [BB], and have had many editions.

CHEDERLES

" made an heavy pudder, and are always miſerably " put to it for a word to clink, which commonly fall " ſo aukward and unexpectedly as dropping from the " clouds by ſome machine or miracle. Chaucer found " an Herculean labour on his hands, and did perform " to admiration. He ſeizes all Provencal, French or " Latin that came in his way; gives them a new garb " and livery; and mingles them amongſt our Engliſh; " turns out Engliſh, gouty, or ſuperannuated, to place " in their room the Foreigners fit for ſervice, trained " and accuſtomed to poetical diſcipline. . . . Chaucer " threw in Latin, French, Provencal, and other lan- " guages, like new ſtum to raiſe a fermentation. In " Queen Elizabeth's time it grew fine, but came not " to an head and ſpirit, did not ſhine and ſparkle till " Mr. Waller ſet it a running." Mr. Dryden (58) obſerves, that as our Author is the father of Poetry, ſo he holds him in the ſame degree of veneration as the Grecians held Homer, or the Romans Virgil; that he is a perpetual fountain of good ſenſe, learned in all ſciences, and therefore ſpeaks properly on all ſubjects; and that as he knew what to ſay, ſo he knows alſo when to leave off. That he followed nature every where, but was never ſo bold to go beyond her. That his verſe indeed is not harmonious, but that it is like the eloquence of one whom Tacitus commends, auribus iſtius temporis accommodata. " They who lived with " him, and ſome time after him, thought it muſical: " and it continues ſo even in our judgment, if com- " pared with the numbers of Lidgate and Gower his " contemporaries. There is the rude ſweetneſs of a " Scotch tune in it, which is natural and pleaſing, " tho' not perfect." Mr. Dryden further remarks, that he muſt have been a man of a moſt wonderful comprehenſive nature, becauſe it has been truly obſerved of him, he has taken into the compaſs of his Canterbury Tales the various manners and humours (as we now call them) of the Engliſh nation in his age. Not a ſingle character has eſcaped him. All his pilgrims are ſeverally diſtinguiſhed from each other; and not only in their inclinations, but in their very phyſiognomies and perſons. Baptiſta Porta could not have deſcribed their natures better than by the marks, which the Poet gives them. The matter and manner of their tales, and of their telling are ſo ſuited to their different educations, humours, and callings, that each of them would be improper in any other mouth. Even the grave and ſerious characters are diſtinguiſhed by their ſeveral ſorts of gravity. Their diſcourſes are ſuch as belong to their age, their calling, and their breeding; ſuch as are becoming of them, and of them only. Some of his perſons are vicious, and ſome virtuous; ſome are unlearned, or (as Chaucer calls them) lewd, and ſome are learned. Even the ribaldry of the low characters is different. The Reeve, the Miller, and the Cook, are ſeveral men, and diſtinguiſhed from each other, as much as the mincing Lady Prioreſs, and the broad-ſpeaking, gap-toothed Wife of Bathe.

(58) Preface to his Fables.

(59) Theatrum Poetarum, Part 2. pag. 51.

[BB] His works are very numerous.] Bale and Pits give (after their manner) a very long catalogue of his Works, by repeating the ſame pieces under different titles. Mr. Edward Philips (59) ſuppoſes a great part of his Works to be loſt, above what we have extant of him. And of that number may be manye a ſong and many a letcherous lay (60), which might perhaps have been written by him while he was a ſtudent at Cambridge. The Court of Love was written while he reſided in that Univerſity, in the eighteenth year of his age (61). The Craft of Lovers was written in 1348, which was the twentieth of his age (62); and it is probable the Remedy of Love was written about that time, or not long after (63). The Lamentation of Mary Magdalen, taken from Origen, was written in his early years (64); and perhaps Boethius de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ was tranſlated by him about the ſame time (65). The Romaunt of the Roſe is a tranſlation from the French, and ſeems to be done by him while he was at Court, and about the time of the riſe of Wickliffe's opinions, it conſiſting of violent invectives againſt Religious Orders. It is left imperfect at the end, and there are ſome chaſms in other places of it. The Complaint of the Black Knight, was written, according to ſome, during John of Gaunt's courtſhip of Blanche; and Chaucer's Dreme is ſuppoſed to be written upon account of the Duke's marriage. The Poem of Troilus and Creſeide was written in the former part of his life, and tranſlated as he ſays from Lollius (66), an Hiſtoriographer of Urbane in Italy. It is called Trophe in the Lombard tongue. Chaucer has not contented himſelf with a bare tranſlation, but added ſeveral things of his own. From his Houſe of Fame Mr. Pope took part of the deſign of his Temple of Fame. The Book of Blaunch the Ducheſs, commonly called the Dreme of Chaucer, was written upon the death of that Lady. The Aſſembly of Fowls was written before the death of Queen Philippa. The Life of St. Cecilia ſeems to have been at firſt a ſingle Poem (67), afterwards made of his Canterbury Tales. And ſo perhaps was that of the Wife of Bath, which he adviſes John of Gaunt to read (68), and was afterwards inſerted in the Canterbury Tales. The Canterbury Tales were written about the year 1382. It is certain, that the tale of the Nonnes Prieſt was written after the inſurrection of Jack Straw and Wat Tyler, which was in 1381, it being mentioned in that tale (69). It is probable moſt of the tales were written as ſo many diſtinct Poems, and afterwards collected into one body in imitation of Boccace's Decameron, whence the arguments of ſome of them are taken. The Flower and the Leaf was written by him as appears from his own words in the prologue to the Legende of gode Women. This is thought by Mr. Dryden (70) to be of our Author's own invention after the manner of the Provencals, and he was ſo particularly pleaſed with it, both for the invention and moral, that he has given it in a modern dreſs. His A. B. C. called La Priere de noſtre Dame was written for the uſe of the Ducheſs Blanch. The Book of the Lion is mentioned in his Retractation, and by Lidgate in the Prologue to the Fall of Princes, but it is now loſt; as is that De Vulcani Veru. i. e. Of the Broche of Vulcan, mentioned by Lidgate in the ſame Prologue. La Belle Dame ſans Mercy was tranſlated from the French of Alain Chartier, whom the Author of the Life of Chaucer prefixed to Mr. Urry's Edition, erroneouſly aſſerts to have been Secretary to Lewis the eleventh, King of France, who ſucceeded his Father Charles VII, July 22d 1462, whereas Chartier died about the year 1458 (71), and was born in 1386 (72), and was Secretary to Charles VII, who came to the Crown October the 20th 1422. Since Chaucer therefore died October the 25th 1400, when Chartier was but ſixteen years of age, and the Author of the tranſlation of this Poem in the Introduction to it mentions Maiſtre Aleine, as he calls him, under the title of Chief Secretarye with the King of Fraunce (73), it is impoſſible, that this tranſlation could be done by our Poet. The Complaint of Mars and Venus was tranſlated from the French of Sir Otes de Grantſon, a French Poet. The Complaint of Annelida to falſe Arcite was written by him. The Legende of Gode Women (called The Aſſembly of Ladies, and by ſome The Ninetene Ladies) was written to oblige the Queen at the requeſt of Margaret Counteſs of Pembroke. The Treatiſe of the Concluſions of the Aſtrolabe was written in 1391. The Cuckow and Nightingale ſeems by the deſcription to have been written at Woodſtock. The Ballad beginning In Feverere, &c. was a compliment to the Lady Margaret Counteſs of Pembroke. Several Ballads are aſcribed to him, ſome of which are juſtly ſuſpected not to have been written by him. The Comedies aſcribed to him ſeem to be nothing elſe but his Canterbury Tales; and the Tragedies were thoſe which his Monk tells in his Tale; and they are ſo called in the title of that Tale in ſome MSS. The Teſtament of Love was written in his troubles in the latter part of his life. The Song beginning Fly fro the preſe, was written on his death-bed (74). The Teſtament and Complaint of Creſeide are by Bale and Pits after Leland aſcribed to Chaucer; but the real Author of them is ſaid to be Mr. Robert Henderſon, chief Schoolmaſter of Dumferlin in Scotland, who wrote them a little before Chaucer was firſt printed and dedicated to King Henry by Mr. Thynne (75). Leland ſays (76), that by the conſent of the learned in his time the Plowman's Tale was attributed to our Poet, but ſuppreſſed in the Edition there extant, becauſe of the vices of the Clergy therein expoſed. Fox is

(60) See his Retractation, pag. 214, b. and the Legend of Gode Women, ver. 422, 423.

(61) Court of Love, ver. 43, 911, &c.

(62) Urry's edit. of Chaucer, pag. 552, 553.

(63) See the Prologue to the Remedy of Love, pag. 526.

(64) See the Legend of Gode Women, ver. 427, 428.

(65) Ibid. ver. 425.

(66) Troil. lib. 1 ver. 395.

(67) See the Legend of Gode Women, ver. 426.

(68) See the Envoy to the Duke of Lancaſter after the Loſs of Blanch, ver. 29. pag. 413. Urry's edit.

(69) Ver. 1509. pag. 173. Urry's edit.

(70) Preface to his Fables.

(71) See Baillet Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. pag. 10. edit. Amſterd. 1725, in 4to.

(72) See the Article of ALAIN CHARTIER, vol. 1. pag. 407.

(73) Urry's edition of Chaucer, pag. 422.

(74) See above note (4).

(75) See the note prefixed to them in Mr. Urry's edition, pag. 333.

(76) Pag. 423.

CHEDERLES, among the Turks, is the ſame with S. George among the Chriſtians. The Derviſes told Buſbequius, when he was going to Amaſia in Cappadocia, that Chederles was a great Hero, who ſlew a furious dragon, and delivered a maid who was expoſed to that cruel creature. They added, that after having wandred a long time in unknown countries, he at length arrived at the banks of a river, the water whereof rendred thoſe who drank of it immortal; that this river is perpetually covered with thick darkneſs, and that it has been ſeen by no body ſince Chederles. The Hero being become immortal, and mounted on a fine horſe to whom the waters of that river had procured the ſame advantage, ranges through the world, loves battels, and aſſiſts the warriors who have the juſteſt cauſe, or who invoke him, whatever Religion they be of. He was, ſay they, one of Alexander's Captains [A], and yet they will not allow him to be a different perſon from the S. George of the Chriſtians; ſo ignorant are they in Chronology. They have in their Moſque a marble fountain, the water of which is very clear, and they ſay it owes its original to the piſs of Chederles's horſe. The Hippocrene of the Poets was not ſo groſly imagined. They ſhew very near it the tombs of his groom and of his nephew (a), where they ſay miracles are continually wrought in favour of thoſe who invoke them (b). They believe that drinking an infuſion of the ſcrapings of the ſtones, and of the earth where Chederles ſtopped when he waited for the dragon, is a remedy againſt the fever, the head-ach, and ſore eyes. The Turks cannot forbear laughing when they ſee the picture of S. George, their pretended Chederles, in the Chriſtian Churches; for the Greeks paint him with a little child riding behind him, who fills him out wine (c). This is a piece of parallel for him who would enlarge the Books which have already appeared concerning the conformity of Religions.

(a) His ſiſter's ſon.

(b) Ubi multa quotidie opem illorum invocantibus divinitus beneficia conferri perſuadere nobis conabantur. Busbeq. Epiſt. I, pag. m. 93, & ſeq.

(c) Ex Busbequii Epiſtolâ I, pag. m. 93, & ſeq.

The paſſage which I ſhall quote from Poſtel, a Coſmopolite, twice returned thence, and truly informed (d), will ſerve for a Supplement to what I have ſaid above [B].

(d) Theſe are the qualifications he gives himſelf in the Title of his Book.

is of the ſame opinion (77); who alſo aſcribes the little piece of Jack Upland to him, as do ſome that Poem called Piers Plowman's Viſions, confounding it with the Plowman's Tale. Mr. Speght in his life of Chaucer mentions a Tale in Mr. Thynne's firſt printed Book of Chaucer's Works more odious to the Clergy than the ſpeech of the Plowman, which began thus:

In Lincolneſhire faſt by a Fenne
Standeth a religious houſe, who doth it kenne &c.

(77) Acts and Mon. vol. 2. pag. 342, &c. edit. 1684.

The argument of which Tale, as alſo the occaſion thereof, and the cauſe why it was left out of Chaucer's Works, and the Tale itſelf, if it could be found, he promiſed ſhould be ſhewed in Mr. Francis Thynne's Comment upon Chaucer (78), but neither the one nor the other have been ſince publiſhed. In 1635 Sir Francis Kynaſton of Otely in Shropſhire publiſhed the firſt and ſecond Books of Troilus and Creſſida, with an elegant Latin verſion of them in rhime. Mr. Dryden in his Fables printed in 1700 has turned into modern language the Knight's Tale, the Wife of Bath's Tale, and the Nonne's Prieſt's Tale, and alſo the Poem of the Floure and the Leafe. He wrote likewiſe the Character of a good Parſon, in imitation of Chaucer's deſcription of a Parſon in his Prologues, with ſome enlargements. Mr. Pope alſo modernized two of the Canterbury Tales, viz. the Merchaunt's Tale of January and May, and the Wife of Bath her Prologue. And ſome other of our Author's Poems have been attempted by other ingenious perſons in the ſame manner.

(78) See Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 376. 2d edit. London 1721.

T.

[A] He was .... one of Alexander's Captains.] This is not agreed to in the Supplement to Monſ. d' Herbelot's Bibliotheque Orientale: for we are there aſſured that, according to the traditions of the Orientals, Kheder was the Companion or Counſellor and General of Dhoulcarnein, who is not Alexander of Macedon, but a Monarch of the whole world more ancient than he, who firſt bore the name of Iskender Dhoulcarnein, Alexander the Great having born the ſame name in imitation only of him, and by reaſon of his great conqueſts (1). Several Muſulmans confound Kheder with the Prophet Elias; but the Author of the Tarikh Montekheb diſtinguiſhes them very well, and adds that Kheder lived in the time of Caikobad, an ancient King of Perſia; and that having found the fountain of life, and drank of its water, he will not die till the ſound of the trumpet, that is, till the day of judgment (2).

(1) Bibliot. Orientale, pag. 992, 993.

(2) Ibid. pag. 993, col. 1.

[The Mahometans ſuppoſe Kheder to have been the ſame, not only with Elias and St. George, but alſo with Phineas the ſon of Eleazar, ſaying that the ſame ſoul tranſmigrated ſucceſſively thro' all three: for they are not ſo ignorant but that they know they lived at different times. The Jews alſo fancy Elias was Phineas (†). ADD. REM].

(†) See Mr. Sale's Notes on the Koran, pag. 245. and the Authors there quoted.

[B] A paſſage .... of Poſtel will ſerve for a ſupplement to what I have ſaid above.] This Author relates that there are numberleſs Saints in Turky who work miracles, and have each his peculiar office. There is one who comforts the afflicted .... another aſſiſts travellers who invoke him. Another on the confines of Syria, not very far from Adena, who is called Sedi cadi, or Lord Judge: where they ſay all ſorts of wiſhes are obtained; and there the Soldiery recommend themſelves very earneſtly, being perſuaded that whoever has viſited him will not die in war. Others diſcover loſt goods (3): there is alſo a great one in Natolia, near Cariaſar, named Guzel mirſſin, or Gotuelmirſs, the good bringer back, who finds all loſt cattle. Another who is called Baſſa ſſic, the God or Prince of love, to whom they go to become lucky in marriage, to have children, and to be reconciled. There is one more who is Captain General of them all; for he performs the offices of all the others, and they ſay one never aſks any thing of him, without receiving ſome comfort; and this Saint has no place dedicated to him, but rides about on a grey mare thro' the whole country of Natolia only, and appears any where to all who invoke him: they call him Chederelles, and ſuppoſe him to be S. George, for they give S. George the name of Chederelles; and there are great numbers of people who pretend to belong to him; and alſo know at what time the Chriſtians celebrate his feaſt, and come before, or on that day, to move them to beſtow alms for his ſake: for when they aſk any thing of thoſe Saints, they promiſe, according to their ability, to eat for their ſakes a hot loaf, or a capon, or a ſheep, or an ox, with the poor and the pilgrims; which they diligently perform. They eat with the poor for the ſake of their Saints (4).

(3) Poſtel, des Hiſtoires Orient. Part II. pag. 231.

(4) Compare with this the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 31.

☞CHEKE (Sir JOHN), a very learned and polite Writer in the ſixteenth Century, was deſcended of a good family originally (a) of the Iſle of Wight, and was ſon of Peter Cheke by Agnes, daughter of Mr. Dufford (b) of the County of Cambridge. He was born at Cambridge June the 16th in the year 1514 (c). After having paſſed thro' the Grammar School, he was admitted into St. John's College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, at about ſeventeen years of age (d), where he made a great progreſs in polite Learning, and eſpecially the Greek Language, which was at that time almoſt univerſally neglected.

(a) Sir John Hayward in his Life of K. Edward VI, pag. 8. having ſtiled him a man of mean birth, is confuted by Fuller in his Church Hiſtory, B. 8. § 3. p. 37.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 100. 2d edit. London 1721, calls him Duffield.

(c) Life of Sir John Cheke by John Stryne, M. A. c. 1. Sect. 1. p. 2--5. edit. London 1705, in 8vo.

(d) Wood, ubi ſupra.

neglected. This diſtinguiſhed him to ſuch advantage, that he by means of Dr. William Butts, Phyſician to Henry VIII, was made the King's Scholar (e), and in 1540 appointed Profeſſor of the Greek Language, which place he held till he left the Univerſity in October 1551 (f). Here he began to reform the pronunciation of the Greek Tongue, but met with great oppoſition from Dr. Stephen Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Chancellor of the Univerſity [A], who expreſly prohibited any alteration in the pronunciation of Greek in a ſolemn decree dated June the 1ſt 1542. However Cheke's manner of pronouncing Greek prevailed, and there paſſed ſeven elegant Epiſtles between the Chancellor and him, which were afterwards publiſhed [B]. In 1543 he was choſen Univerſity Orator (g), and publiſhed a Latin Verſion of two Homilies of St. Chryſoſtom [C] dedicated to the King. July the 10th 1544 he was ſent for to Court, in order to be Tutor to Prince Edward (h), and about the ſame time (i) was incorporated into the Univerſity of Oxford, where he ſtudied ſome time, and took the degree of Maſter of Arts (k), and was made Canon of King Henry's College there [D]. In 1547 he publiſhed a Latin Tranſlation of St. Chryſoſtom's ſix Orations concerning Providence [E]. After Prince Edward's acceſſion to the Crown, he granted our Author a hundred marks yearly for twenty one years, and appointed him Provoſt of King's College in Cambridge (l), and beſtowed upon him ſeveral lands to a conſiderable value (m). In May 1549 he went to Cambridge, and was one of the King's Commiſſioners for viſiting that Univerſity (n), and (e) Ibid. Sect. 2. pag. 6, 7.

(f) Ibid. Sect. 3. pag. 16, 17.

(g) Ibid. Sect. 6. pag. 27.

(b) Ibid. cap. 6. Sect. 1. pag. 28.

(i) Wood, ubi ſupra, ſays in 1542.

(k) Ibid. pag. 31.

(l) Wood, ubi ſupra, erroneouſly aſſerts, that he was made Provoſt in 1543.

(m) Ibid. cap. 6. Sect. 5. pag. 41, 42, 43, 44.

[A] He began to reform the pronunciation of the Greek Tongue, but met with great oppoſition from Dr. Stephen Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Chancellor of the Univerſity.] It was the cuſtom at that time to confound the ſound of the vowels and dipthongs in ſuch a manner that there was ſcarce any difference between them. For inſtance, αι was pronounced as ε; οι and υι as ι; η, ι, υ were expreſſed in one and the ſame ſound, that is, as ι. Some of the conſonants were pronounced differently, according as they were placed in the word; thus, when τ was placed after μ, it was pronounced as our d; and when π was put after ν, it was founded as our b. The letter κ was pronounced as we do ch, and β as we do the v conſonant (1). Our Author and Mr. Smith, afterwards Sir Thomas Smith, and Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth, began to obſerve the inconveniencies in this ſort of pronunciation, and ſaw that not only the beauty of the Greek language was loſt in this way, but likewiſe its very ſpirit and life were gone, by the loſs of ſo many vowels and dipththongs, and the language become jejune and languid. In this way of ſpeaking it, nothing of numeroſity appeared in the antient Orators and Rhetoricians, nor thoſe periods, for which they had been renowned in old Greece; neither could they themſelves ſhew their eloquence in their orations and lectures, for want of the beauty and variety of ſounds. This put them upon thinking of a reformation; and they conſulted moſt of the antient Rhetoricians and other Greek Authors, who had treated of ſounds, and found ſufficient grounds from thence for an alteration (2). Mr. Cheke therefore in his lectures plainly diſcovered thoſe errors; and the more ingenious ſort of Students rreadily forſook their old way of pronouncing Greek. But there was a party in the Univerſity who diſliking any thing which was new, and dreading alterations, would by no means allow of the new pronunciation, but oppoſed it to the utmoſt of their power, by diſputing againſt it, and at laſt by complaining to Biſhop Gardiner, the Chancellor, againſt our Author and his Adherents for this great miſdemeanour. The Biſhop being of the ſame mind with the complainants, and apprehenſive of innovations, made a ſolemn decree, dated the Calends of June 1542, confirming the old manner of pronouncing Greek, and enjoining the Students to make no variation, under this penalty, that he ſhould be expelled the Senate, if a Regent; if he ſtood for a degree, not to be admitted to it; if a Scholar, to loſe his Scholarſhip; and that the younger ſort ſhould be chaſtiſed. In ſhort, the decree declared, that no perſon ſhould philoſophize at all in ſounds, but all ſhould uſe the preſent; and that if any thing were to be corrected in them, it ſhould be left to authority (3). We ſhall mention two or three heads of the decree, ſince they are very remarkable. Quiſquis noſtram poteſtatem agnoſcis, ſones literis ſive Græcis ſive Latinis ab uſu publico præſentis ſeculi alienos, privato judicio affingere ne audeto. Diphthongos Græcas nedum Latinas, niſi id diæreſis exigat, ſonis diducito. . . . . Αι ab ε, & ει ab ι, ſono ne diſtinguito, tantum in Orthographia diſcrimen ſervato; η, ι, υ, uno eodemque ſono exprimito. . . . Ne multa; in ſonis omnino ne philoſophator, ſed utitor præſentibus. In his ſiquid emendandum ſit, id omne autoritati permittito. After ſuch a public declaration, there was no further room for private judgment; an obedience was paid, and Gardiner's way prevailed, till a reformation in Religion made way for a reformation in language, which has obtained ever ſince. However the controverſy was then managed with much warmth and learning; Gardiner inſiſted principally upon cuſtom and the authority of the preſent Greeks. On the other ſide they pleaded antiquity, and that drawn down from the moſt ancient Authors; ſeveral of the Greek Rhetoricians was brought into the controverſy, and other Authors, who had dropt any expreſſion, which looked that way; and a man would wonder to ſee ſo much learning ſhewn on ſo dry a ſubject. Where the victory lay, ſays Mr. Thomas Baker in his Reflections upon learning (4), is pretty viſible; and ſo great a man (r) as Du Freſne could not have been at a loſs how to determine the matter, had he not been poſſeſſed with partiality for a party, which he ſhews too plainly by blaming Biſhop Godwin (tho' very unjuſtly) for leaving Gardiner out of his Catalogue of Biſhops.

(1) Life of Sir John Cheke by John Strype, M. A. cap. 1. Sect. 3. pag. 18. edit. London 1705, in 8vo.

(2) Reflections upon Learning, chap. 3. pag. 35, 36. 4th edit. London 1708.

(3) Strype, ubi ſupra, pag. 19.

(4) Ubi ſupra, pag. 38.

(r) Gloſſ. Græc. Prefat. § 12.

[B] There paſſed ſeven elegant Epiſtles between the Chancellor and him, which were afterwards publiſhed.] The originals of theſe letters being left in the hands of Cœlius Secundus Curio, a learned man of Baſil, by our Author, as he paſſed through that city in his journey to Italy in the beginning of Queen Mary's reign. Curio publiſhed an edition of them in 1555 in 8vo, under the following title; Joannis Cheki Angli de pronunciatione Græcæ potiſſimum Linguæ diſputationes cum Stephano Wintonienſi Epiſcopo, ſeptem contrariis Epiſtolis comprehenſæ; and dedicated them to Sir Anthony Cook, our Author's friend, and Fellow-Inſtructor of King Edward VI (5). Mr. Strype tells us (6), that "in theſe "elegant, copious, and learned Epiſtles both the Biſhop "and Cheke ſhewed ſo great learning, parts, and read-"ing, that they ſeemed not Epiſtles, but rather the "antagoniſtical Orations of the beſt Orators, as the "Publiſher wrote."

(5) Strype, pag. 24, 127, and 203, & ſeq.

(6) Pag. 127.

[C] A Latin Verſion of two Homilies of St. Chryſoſtom.] It was printed at London 1543 in 4to under the following title; D. Joannis Chryſoſtomi Homiliæ duæ, nunc primum in lucem editæ Græce & Latine, Interprete Joanne Cheke Cantabrigienſi.

[D] Made Canon of King Henry's College there.] The King having lately new founded the College of St. Frideſwide in Oxford, which had firſt been founded by Cardinal Wolſey, granted our Author one of the Canonries there. But the rents of the Canons decaying, the King in 1545 gave particular penſions to ſome of them, and among the reſt to Mr. Cheke; which penſions were 26 l. 13 s. 4 d. each. By this preferment we may conclude that he was now in holy Orders (7).

(7) Strype, pag. 31. and Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 68. 2d edit. London 1721.

[E] Publiſhed a Latin Tranſlation of St. Chryſoſtom's ſix Orations concerning Providence.] His friend Dr. Walter Haddon wrote theſe verſes upon it:

Divus Joannes Chryſoſtomus aurea Græca,
Fundere quod poſſet, nomen ſuſcepit ab auro.
Noſter Joannes ſit nomine Checus eodem,
Aurea qui Græcis verbis dat verba Latina (8).

(8) See Strype, pag. 39, 40.

and ſoon after publiſhed his book, intitled, The Hurt of Sedition [F]. The ſame year he was likewiſe one of the thirty two Commiſſioners for examining the old Eccleſiaſtical Law-Books, and compiling thence a Body of Laws for the government of the Church, and the deciſion of civil matters; and again three years after, upon a new Commiſſion to the ſame purpoſe, he was again nominated for the execution of it (o). Upon his return to Court from Cambridge he met with ſome uneaſineſs on account of ſome offence, which his wife, whom he had married in 1547 (p), had given to the Ducheſs of Somerſet (q), and of his being charged with having ſuggeſted ill counſels to the Duke of Somerſet, and afterwards proving falſe to him (r). But having got over this ſhock at Court, he ſtood the firmer afterwards, and his intereſt and authority daily encreaſed there, ſo that he became the great Patron of Learning and Religion. In 1550 he was made chief Gentleman of the Privy-Chamber (s); and about the ſame time tranſlated the Communion-Book into Latin, in order that Peter Martyr, who did not underſtand Engliſh, might paſs his judgment upon it (t). The King made a great progreſs in his ſtudies under our Author, who read over Cicero's Philoſophical Writings and Ariſtotle's Ethics to him, and inſtructed him in the Hiſtory, State and Intereſt, Laws and Cuſtoms of his Kingdom (u), and directed him to keep a Diary of all the Tranſactions of any importance during his reign [G]. In October 1551 he received the honour of Knighthood from his Majeſty (*), and ſoon after held two Conferences with ſome other perſons upon the ſubject of the Sacrament [H]. In 1552 he diſputed at the Commencement in the Univerſity of Cambridge againſt our Saviour's local deſcent into Hell (w); and Auguſt the 25th following he was made Chamberlain of the Exchequer (x), and afterwards Clerk of the Council; whence he was advanced to the poſt of Secretary of State and Privy Counſellor (y). He was attached to the intereſt of the Lady Jane Grey [I], and upon the King's

(o) Ibid. cap. 6. Sect. 2. pag. 55, 56.

(p) Ibid. pag. 43.

(q) Ibid. pag. 56, 57.

(r) Ibid. pag. 58.

(s) Ibid. Sect. 4. pag. 59.

(t) Ibid. pag. 68.

(u) Ibid. pag. 72, 73.

(*) Ibid. cap. 4. pag. 85. Wood, Col. 101. ſays it was in 1549.

(w) Ibid. pag. 116.

(x) Ibid. pag. 117, 118.

(y) Ibid. pag. 119.

[F] The Book intitled, The hurt of Sedition.] The whole title is as follows; The Hurt of Sedition: How grievous it is to a Commonwealth. The running title is, The true Subject to the Rebel. It is written by way of expoſtulation with the rebels, who in the ſummer of the year 1549 broke out into an open and formidable inſurrection in moſt Counties of England, and eſpecially in Devonſhire in the Weſt, and Norfolk in the North. Our Author ſuited his diſcourſe to the different pretences of the rebels; thoſe in the Weſt complaining of the alterations made in Religion; and thoſe in Norfolk and Suffolk inſiſting upon ſome reformation in the State; that Gentlemen ſhould not be put into places of truſt and honour, while the poor Commons were excluded theſe advantages, but that all the ranks of people ſhould be placed upon an equal foot. The former of theſe he addreſſes in this manner: Ye riſe for Religion. What Religion taught you that? If ye were offered perſecution for Religion, ye ought to flee; ſo Chriſt teacheth you, and yet you intend to fight. If ye would ſtand in the truth, ye ought to ſuffer like martyrs; and ye would ſlay like tyrants. Thus for Religion, ye keep no Religion, and neither will follow the counſel of Chriſt, nor the conſtancy of martyrs. Why riſe ye for Religion? Have ye any thing contrary to God's Book? Yea have ye not all things agreeable to God's Word. But the new [Religion] is different from the old; and therefore ye will have the old. If you meaſure the old by truth, ye have the oldeſt. If ye meaſure the old by fancy, then it is hard, becauſe men's fancies change, to give that is old. Ye will have the old ſtyl. Will ye have any older than that as Chriſt left, and his Apoſtles taught, and the firſt Church did uſe? Ye will have that the Canons do eſtabliſh. Why, that is a great deal younger than that ye have of later time, and newlier invented; yet that is it that ye deſire. " And do you prefer the Biſhops of " Rome before Chriſt? Men's inventions before God's " Law? The newer form of worſhip before the " older? Ye ſeek no Religion; ye be deceived; " ye ſeek tradition. They that teach you, blind you; " that ſo inſtruct you deceive you. If ye ſeek what " the old Doctors ſay, yet look what Chriſt the oldeſt " of all ſaith; for he ſaith, Before Abraham was " made, I am. If ye ſeek the trueſt way, he is the " very Truth. If ye ſeek the readieſt way, he is the " very Way. If ye ſeek everlaſting life, he is the " very Life. What Religion would you have other " now than his Religion? You would have the Bibles " in again. It is no mervail, your blind Guides " would lead you blind ſtill." This Book was reprinted in the year 1576 as a ſeaſonable Diſcourſe upon the apprehenſion of Tumults from malecontents at home, or renegado's abroad. And Hollingſhed thought proper to inſert it in his Chronicle, where he treats of this Rebellion. Dr. Gerard Langbain at Oxford about the year 1641 reprinted it likewiſe, intending it, ſays Mr. Strype (9), for the uſe and conſideration of the Rebels againſt King Charles I in the time of the civil wars.

(9) Pag. 55.

[G] Directed him to keep a Diary of all the tranſactions of any importance during his reign.] He adviſed him to write down briefly under each day of every month debates in Council, diſpatch of Embaſſadors, honours conferred, and other remarks, as he thought proper. And this we may conclude produced that excellent Journal of the King preſerved in the Cotton Library, and printed thence by Biſhop Burnet in his Hiſtory of the Reformation. To ſhew the advantage of ſuch a Diary, Cheke is ſaid to make uſe of this aphoriſm, " That a dark and imperfect reflection upon " affairs floating in the memory, was like words diſ- " perſed and inſignificant; whereas a few of them in " a book was like the ſame words digeſted and diſpoſ- " ed in good order, and ſo made ſignificant (10)."

(10) Idem, pag. 73, 74. and David Lloyd's State Worthies, pag. 194. 2d edit. London 1670, in 8vo.

[H] Held ſome Conferences with ſome other perſons upon the ſubject of the Sacrament.] The firſt Conference was held at Secretary Cecil's houſe, and the latter at Sir Richard Moriſon's. The Auditors were but ſix, viz. the Lord Ruſſel, Sir Thomas Wroth of the Bed-chamber, Sir Anthony Cook, one of the King's Tutors, Mr. Throgmorton, Chamberlain of the Exchequer, Mr. Knolles, and Mr. Harington; with whom were joined the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Rutland at the ſecond Conference. The Diſputants were Sir John Cheke, Sir William Cecil, Secretary of State, Horn Dean of Durham, Whitehead and Grindal, who were againſt the Real Preſence; Feckenham, who was afterwards Dean of St. Paul's and Abbot of Weſtminſter, and at the ſecond Conference Mr. Yong, who were for it. An account of theſe diſputations is ſtill extant in Latin in the Library of Manuſcripts in Bennet College in Cambridge; which Mr. Strype has publiſhed in Engliſh (11). The firſt Conference was held November 25th 1551; and the ſecond December 3d the ſame year.

(11) Pag. 91, & ſeqq.

[I] He was attached to the intereſt of the Lady Jane Grey.] He was ſworn into the office of Secretary at the ſame time that there were two other Secretaries; but Mr. Strype is of opinion (12), that at this juncture one of the other Secretaries was intended to be laid aſide, and he perhaps was Cecil, who was unwilling to go along with the ambitious deſigns of the Duke of Northumberland to advance the Lady Jane, married to his ſon Guilford Dudley, to the Crown. Cecil was then abſent from the Court, ſick in mind as well as in body. But Sir John Cheke's zeal for Religion made him willing to eſpouſe the Duke's party, who induced the King to ſettle the Kingdom upon the Lady Jane, excluding the next legal heirs to his two ſiſters, Mary and Elizabeth. David Lloyd in his State-Worthies (13) tells us indeed, that

(12) Pag. 119.

(13) Pag. 196.

King's death, acted as Secretary to her and her Council; but upon Queen Mary's acceſſion to the Crown he was committed to the Tower July the 28th (z), and an indictment was drawn up againſt him; but the year following he obtained the Queen's pardon (aa), and diſliking the eſtabliſhment of Popery, procured a licence to travel abroad; upon which he went to Baſil, and from thence to Italy, and read a Greek Lecture at Padua. He afterwards ſettled at Straſburg, where the Engliſh Service was kept up, which gave ſuch great offence to the Zealots for the Roman Catholic Religion in England, that his eſtate was confiſcated (bb). Being thus reduced to very low circumſtances at Straſburg, he read a Greek Lecture there, which was the means of ſupporting him (cc). His wife being at Bruſſels in the ſpring of the year 1556, he reſolved to go thither to fetch her; but firſt conſulted Aſtrology, of which he was very credulous [K], whether he might undertake that journey with ſafety; and being deceived by it he was ſeized May the 15th by the Provoſt Marſhal between Bruſſels and Antwerp [L], and brought to England, where he was commited to the Tower (dd). As Religion was the cauſe of his impriſonment, two of the Queen's Chaplains were ſent to diſcourſe with him, but without ſucceſs; upon which her Majeſty ſent Dr. Feckenham, Dean of St. Paul's, in order to reduce him to a compliance with the Romiſh Religion. His arguments were ſo ſtrongly inforced by this

(z) Wood, col. 101. ſays the 27th.

(aa) Wood, ibid. ſays that he was ſet at liberty September 3d.

(bb) Ibid. pag. 122-126.

(cc) Ibid. pag. 134. Wood, ubi ſupra, ſays that he was choſen public Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue there.

(dd) Ibid. pag. 136. Wood, col. 101.

(ee) Ibid. 166.

(ff) Ibid. 166, 167

(gg) Ibid. Fox in hi and Mom 3. pag. 7 us, that Bonner go fit in the where the tyrs were demned.

(hh) Ibid 170. Wo 102.

that he was againſt this Will of King Edward, and that he ſaid, that he would never diſtruſt God ſo far in the preſervation of his true Religion, as to diſinherit orphans, to keep up Proteſtantiſm. But Mr. Strype obſerves (14), that this muſt be placed among the ſlips of the looſe pen of that Writer; and that Sir John Cheke was induced to agree to it by foreſeeing what a perſecution was like to enſue, and what an overthrow of that Reformed Religion which had been ſo carefully planted by King Edward. "For tho' ſome ſecular and ambitious "ends drove on the Duke in theſe lofty and dangerous "projects; yet the fears of the return of Popery and "miſerable times conſequent thereupon both to the "Nation and to the State of true Religion, were the "arguments, that prevailed with Cheke to countenance that intereſt; and his inclination perhaps to "this party made the way for him to be Secretary; "to which office he was ſworn and admitted June the "2d, and the two other Secretaries were yet continued, and all three Secretaries appeared in Council "together. And this appears from the Council-Book." David Lloyd above quoted is extremely miſtaken in aſſerting (15), that our Author enjoyed this place three years, ſince he held it but a little above four weeks; to which we may add the nine days of the Lady Jane Grey's reign, who being proclaim'd Queen, the State-Letters were written by Sir John Cheke as Secretary. And he check'd his brother-in-law Cecil, who would not be engaged in this affair, and endeavoured to be abſent; and to the very laſt day of Queen Jane's reign, viz. to July 19th he acted as Secretary to her and her Council. On that day, upon information from the Lord Rich, Lord Lieutenant of the County of Eſſex, that the Earl of Oxford (who lived in that County) had gone over to the Lady Mary, a Letter ſigned by the Lords of Queen Jane's Council ſitting in the Tower, to excite that Lord to continue firm, was drawn up by Cheke, and ſigned by him with the reſt; which Letter required the Lord Rich "like a Nobleman to re-"main in that promiſe and ſtedfaſtneſs to our ſove-"reign Lady Queen Jane, as ye ſhall find us ready "and firm with all our force to maintain the ſame; "which neither with honour, nor with ſafety, nor "yet with duty we may now forſake (16)."

(14) Pag. 119, 120.

(15) Ubi ſupra, pag. 194.

(16) Strype, pag. 122.

[K] But firſt conſulted Aſtrology, of which he was very credulous.] David Lloyd (17) and Mr. Strype inform us of this, and the latter tells us (18), that he was not unſkilful in that art, and being doubtful of his own ſafety, in his intended journey to Bruſſels conſulted it, in order to know whether he might go without danger. The ſame Writer likewiſe obſerves (19), that this art was about theſe times exceedingly ſtudied by the Nobility and Gentry, ſo that Dr. Laurence Humfrey, who lived then, and was afterwards Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford, in his Book de Nobilitate (20), which he wrote for the uſe and inſtruction of the Gentry, exhorting them to the ſtudy of divers ſciences, obſerved how this ſcience above the reſt was ſo zealouſly ſtudied by moſt perſons of rank and quality, ſic rapi, ſic adamari, & devorari a pleriſque nobilibus, that they needed no inticement to this, but rather a bridle to reſtrain them. And he tells us, that many had placed ſuch confidence in it, that they almoſt diſtruſted God, and partook of ſuch events as proved unhappy, not in truth foretold by the ſtars, nor expected by them.

(17) Pag. 195.

(18) Pag. 135.

(19) Pag. 138.

(20) Lib. 3. pag. 347. See Strype, pag. 138, 139.

[L] He was ſeized May 15th by the Provoſt Marſhal between Bruſſels and Antwerp.] Mr. Strype (21) tells us, that he was induced to go to Bruſſels by the invitation given him by the Lord Paget and Sir John Maſon, two of his former learned friends, but who had complied with Queen Mary's Religion, and were come into thoſe parts, the former in a more private capacity to uſe the baths, the latter as Embaſſador to the Court of Bruſſels. They had deſired Sir John Cheke to take that opportunity to viſit them; and for his better ſecurity Maſon had aſſured him of ſafe-conduct thither in King Philip's and his own name. He went with Sir Peter Carew in his company, and enjoyed the converſation of Paget and Maſon, whom after he had attended towards the ſea, as he was upon his return he fell into a fatal ſnare between Bruſſels and Antwerp. For an order being ſent from King Philip, he was ſeized May 15th by the Provoſt Marſhal, with his fellow-traveller, unhorſed, blindfolded, bound, thrown into a waggon, and ſo conveyed on board a ſhip, and brought to London; being taken as it were with a whirlwind, as he expreſſes it in his Recantation, from the place he was in, and brought over ſea, and never knew whither he went till he found himſelf in the Tower of London. Upon his firſt ſeizure he was apprehended by his friends to be in great danger. And Bale in his Scriptorum Illuſtrium Majoris Brytanniæ Catalogus (22), printed at Baſil 1557 in fol. obſerves, that he was fallen into the hands of thoſe, who always hated him, and ſubjoins this prayer, "that the Lord would direct "his heart into the love of God and the patience of "Chriſt, and let him be delivered from outragious and "wicked men." Nunc autem reverſus denuò in manus eorum, qui illum ſemper oderunt, incidit. Dominus dirigat cor ejus in charitate Dei & patientiâ Chriſti, defendaturque ab importunis & malis hominibus. There was a perſon then living, and one of conſiderable knowledge in the intrigues of thoſe times, who repreſents this as a plot of the Lord Paget and Sir John Maſon. The Writer is Dr. Ponet, who in his Treatiſe of Politick Power has the following paſſage: By Maſon's working, and Paget's deviſing, Sir Peter Carew went into Flanders, (who was before in France) Maſon pledging for his ſafe-guard King Philip's fidelity and his own honeſty. Afterwards he and Sir John Cheke being inticed both to come to Bruſſels to ſee the Queen's Embaſſadors, and having brought Paget on the way toward England, both in their return were taken by the Provoſt Marſhal, ſpoiled of their horſes, and clapt into a cart, their legs, arms, and bodies tyed with halters to the body of the cart, and ſo carried to the ſea-ſide, and from thence into the Tower of London. And before Paget came to Calais, Sir Peter's man coming out of England meeteth him, and aſketh for his Maſter; Paget ſmileth and ſaid nothing, but that his Maſter was in health. But how cometh this to paſs? Mark well, the Queen thought Paget a meet man for her in all things, ſeeing that without cauſe ſhe ſuſpected his Religion. And at his coming over, ſhe like a woman uttereth to him what ſhe thought of him, and promiſeth, if ſhe may perceive his

(21) Pag. 135.

(22) Centur. 8. cap. 97. pag. 700.

(23) 143.

(24) 146.

(25) 151.

this alternative either of ſubmiſſion or death, that Sir John Cheke deſired to ſpeak with Cardinal Pole, who adviſed him to depart from the variety of Doctors to the unity of the Church. At laſt he entirely ſubmitted, and wrote a paper, in which he declared his aſſent to the corporal preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament, and to all other articles of the Church of Rome [M]. He made a ſubmiſſion likewiſe to the Cardinal, who abſolved him, and admitted him a member of that Church; and he wrote a Letter to the Queen dated July the 15th 1556, and made a ſolemn Recantation before her Majeſty [N] October the 4th following, and ſubmitted to all the penances which ſhould be enjoined him by the Cardinal (ee). His lands were afterwards reſtored to him upon condition of an exchange with the Queen for others (ff). He was obliged likewiſe to keep company with the moſt zealous Papiſts, and to be preſent at the Examination of Heretics (gg). But his Recantation had ſo ſevere an effect upon his mind, that the ſhame and regret ruined his health, and he died September the 13th 1557, aged forty three years, at the houſe of his friend Mr. Peter Oſborn in Woodſtreet London, and was interred in St. Alban's Church there (hh). His friend Dr. Walter Haddon wrote his Epitaph [O]. Beſides his Works abovementioned he wrote ſeveral others [P]. By his widow the Lady Mary Cheke,

(ee) Ibid. pag. 166.

(ff) Ibid. pag. 166, 167.

(gg) Ibid. p. 169. Fox in his Acts and Monum. tom. 3. pag. 701. tells us, that Biſhop Bonner got him to ſit in the place where the Martyrs were condemned.

(hh) Ibid. pag. 170. Wood, col. 102.

his heart and mouth to agree together, ſhe would ſet him aloft. He aſſureth her, that whatſoever ſhe ſhould will him ſhould be done; yea he would do more than ſhe ſhould require him. . . . " Coming over he bruited that " he liked not the State in England, (for he is one of " them, that hangeth now on Propheſies, but of a " wrong thing) and therefore would be out of the way " in the height of the mad month of May [when inſurrections frequently uſed to be in the City of London] and pretendeth to come to the Bains at Acon; " but indeed the intent was to ſee if he could practiſe " with ſome of the Duke of Cleves men to betray the " poor Ducheſs of Suffolk (who was fled abroad for " her Religion) and ſome of the Engliſh Congregation at Weſel; that he to perform his promiſe might " ſend them to the Queen. But when he ſaw his " purpoſe failed, (God had better provided for the " Ducheſs to keep her from Traitors hands) he com- " eth not to the Bains, he needeth them not at that " time. But he then cauſed Carew and Cheke, whom " Maſon had prepared ready to ſerve his turn, to be " taken and carried away, as before ye have heard. " And at his return had great thanks, and the Queen's " favours encreaſed towards him."

[M] Wrote a paper, in which he declared his aſſent to the corporal Preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament, and to all other articles of the Church of Rome.] The paper conſiſted of ſeveral quotations from St. Hilary, Chryſoſtom, Cyril, and Auguſtin, which ſeemed to favour the doctrine of the Corporal Preſence; and he concluded it with theſe words, In hac cauſa & in reliquis omnibus idem me profiteor dicere & ſentire, quod ſancta Chriſti & Catholica tenet Eccleſia. This paper written and ſubſcribed by himſelf he ſent by the Dean of St. Paul's to the Cardinal, with a Letter from the Tower dated July 15th deſiring him, that this might put an end to any further queſtion concerning him, and that he would grant ſome requeſts, which were then put into his hand by the Dean; the chief of which ſeems to be, that he would have ſo much compaſſion of his frailty, as to diſpenſe with his making an open Recantation. But this was refuſed him (23).

(23) Strype, pag. 143, 144.

[N] Made a ſolemn Recantation before her Majeſty.] It was uſhered in by an Oration of Dr. Feckenham, addreſſed to the Queen in favour of Sir John Cheke, who ſtood by him (24). But beſides this Recantation, Mr. Strype tells us (25), that he met with another fram'd for Sir John's mouth by Cardinal Pole's pen or direction; the former Recantation ſpoken before the Queen being in the Cardinal's judgment not ſufficient. But ſince he had lived long in the Court, and had been inſtrumental to ſow the doctrine of the Goſpel in the hearts of many there, it was thought convenient that he ſhould recant likewiſe in the face and hearing alſo of the Court. And this alſo he was obliged to ſubmit to. In this Recantation he confeſſed, " that he had blaſ- " phemed the name of God, and perſecuted the name " of Chriſt; and that the ignorance of the Jews, " who killed Chriſt, was more excuſable than his. " That he had done what he could to bring the whole " Realm into blindneſs. That ſince he came into the " Tower he never came into a place, where he had " more cauſe to thank God. And that for an aſſured " token to the auditors, that what he ſaid with his " mouth, he thought with his heart he made uſe of " the very words of Berengarius's Recantation." Mr. Strype obſerves (26) that from a clauſe of the Recantation it appears upon what reaſon their reſentments againſt Cheke were chiefly grounded; that is, becauſe he had been the great inſtrument of inducing King Edward VI, and other noble youth of the Court to embrace the Proteſtant Religion; whereas his office, as he ſays in his Recantation, was not to teach him matters of Religion, which was committed to others.

(24) Idem, pag. 146.

(25) Pag. 150, 151.

(26) Pag. 166.

[O] His friend Dr. Walter Haddon wrote his Epitaph.] It is as follows (27):

(27) Idem, pag. 171.

Doctrinæ Lumen, Checus, Vitæque magiſter †,
Aurea naturæ Fabrica morte jacet,
Non erat è multis unus, ſed præſtitit unus
Omnibus, & Patriæ flos erat ille ſuæ.
Gemma Britanna fuit, tam magnum nulla tulerunt
Tempora theſaurum, tempora nulla ferent.

† Mr. Wood, col. 102. reads this line as follows; Doctrinæ, Checus, Linguæq; utriuſq; magiſter.

[P] Beſides his works abovementioned he wrote ſeveral others.] We ſhall give a Catalogue of them from Bale's Scriptorum Illuſtrium Majoris Brytanniæ Catalogus (28), Mr. Wood (29), and Mr. Strype (30). I. In quoſdam Pſalmos. II. In Pſalmum, Domine probaſti. Theſe Mr. Strype ſuppoſes to be only ſome pious Meditations. III. De Fide juſtificante. IV. De Euchariſtiæ Sacramento. It is uncertain whether this contains his diſputations with Dr. Feckenham againſt Tranſubſtantation, or ſome other Tract. V. In Obitum D. Anthonii Dennei; London 1555 in 4to. It begins Cum claras hominum vitas. This Sir Anthony Denny was educated at St. John's College, and was a man of ſuch great merit and learning, that he was made Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber to Henry VIII, and one of his Privy-Council. VI. Super Mortem Buceri. This perhaps is his conſolatory Epiſtle to Peter Martyr concerning the Death of Bucer, printed in Bucer's Scripta Anglicana, and elſewhere; unleſs it ſhould rather mean the Epicedium, which Cheke wrote upon that Divine. VII. Epitaphiorum Lib. I. " This one Book of Epitaphs or Inſcripti- " ons and Verſes, ſays Mr. Strype (31), upon perſons " deceaſed, means no more, but, according to Bale's " way, that theſe Epitaphs, if they were all collected, " might be ſufficient to make one Book." Of this ſort, beſides his Verſes upon Denny and Bucer, were probably the monumental Inſcriptions upon his Patron Dr. Butts in Fulham Church, and Richard Hill, his wife's father, in the Church of St. Michael Queen-Hith, London. We may likewiſe refer to this head an Engliſh Elegy, wherein the ſickneſs of King Edward VI, together with the circumſtances of his death, are deſcribed, which was printed in 1610 by H. Holland in his Heroologia. VIII. De Nativitate Principis; i. e. " Of the Nativity of the Prince." This the Author of the Heroologia repreſents as a Panegyric upon the Prince's Birth; but Mr. Strype (32) conjectures, that it was ſome private calculation of Prince Edward's Nativity, as Cheke was very fond of that Art. IX. An liceat nubere poſt Divortium; i. e. " Whether a wo- " man may marry after a Divorce." This ſeems to have been a caſe put to him in behalf of a great Lady, whoſe huſband being a Nobleman had obtained

(28) Ubi ſupra.

(29) Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 101.

(30) Pag. 216, & ſeqq.

(31) Pag. 217.

(32) Pag. 221.

Cheke, daughter and heireſs of Richard Hill, a Wine-Merchant of London (ii), he had three ſons, Henry, John, and Edward [2], and his poſterity by the eldeſt is ſtill ſubſiſting. Mr. Aſcham in his Schoolmaſter, and other eminent men of that time, give him a very great character. He was a prodigious admirer of the Greek Writers, and particularly of Xenophon and Demoſthenes (kk), and highly recommended thoſe two Authors together with Plato, Ariſtotle, Iſocrates, and Cicero (ll). He was very careful about tained a divorce from her (33). X. Introductio Grammaticæ; i. e. "An Introduction to Grammar." XI. De Ludimagiſtrorum Officio:" i. e. "Of the Duty of "Schoolmaſters." Both theſe ſeem firſt to have been written for the uſe of the Prince, to whom he was Preceptor. XII. De Superſtitione ad Regem Henricum; i. e. "Of Superſtition to King Henry." This Diſcourſe was drawn up for the uſe of the King, in order to the Reformation of Religion, which in his reign was overwhelmed with ſuperſtitions. It was prefixed by way of Dedication to his Tranſlation of Plutarch's Book upon that ſubject, and is written in a very elegant Latin ſtyle. The manuſcript is extant in the Library of Univerſity-College in Oxford, in a beautiful character, and bound in cloth of ſilver, which makes it probable that it might be the very Book, which he preſented to the King. Mr. William Elſtob, Rector of St. Swithen's in London tranſlated it into Engliſh; and his Tranſlation is publiſhed at the end of Mr. Strype's Life of our Author. XIII. De Cineribus & Palmis ad Vintonienſem. Dr. Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, was very importunate with the Lord Protector for the retaining of the old uſages in the Church, and particularly ſprinkling aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, and carrying palms on Palm-Sunday. There is a Letter of his written to the Lord Protector upon that ſubject. Perhaps, the latter engaged Cheke to write an Anſwer to that Letter. XIV. De Eccleſiâ, an poteſt errare: i. e. "Of the Church, whether it "can err." It is written in Latin, and ſtill extant among the manuſcripts of Mr. John Fox. It is an argument managed by him with great learning againſt the Papiſts; wherein he proceeds upon theſe queſtions, Whether there be a Church? What the Church is? and Whether it can err? XV. His Epiſtles; whereof ſeveral are extant; as his Epiſtle to Peter Martyr at Oxford concerning the Death of Martin Bucer; and a conſolatory Letter to Dr. Walter Haddon upon his ſickneſs; with ſeveral others. XVI. His two Recantations: but as Mr. Strype obſerves (34), they were no farther his, than as he uttered them with his mouth, but did not compoſe them. XVII. His Tranſlations; ſome of which were from the Greek into Latin; as 1, Divers pieces of St. Chryſoſtom, viz. De Fato Homiliæ tres; De Providentiâ Homiliæ tres; Contra Obſervatores Novilunii Homil. I; together with other pieces of that ancient Father. 2. Joſephus's Antiquities, five Books. 3. Leo de Apparatu Bellico. Baſil, 1554 in 8vo. 4. Aſceticum maximi Monachi, Lib. 1. 5. Plutarchus de Superſtitione, Lib. 1. 6. Several pieces of Demoſthenes, as his Philippus, Lib. 3. His Olynthiacs, Lib. 3. Adverſus Leptinem, Lib. 1. Demoſthenes & Æſchines, their adverſe Orations. 7. Sophocles tranſlated ad literam. 8. Euripides likewiſe. 9. Ariſtotle de Anima. Others of his Tranſlations were out of Engliſh into Latin, as Archbiſhop Cranmer's Book of the Lord's Supper. This book was printed abroad. The Communion Book. This was done for the uſe of Bucer, that he might underſtand it, and give his judgment of it. It is extant in his Opuſcula Anglicana. And laſtly out of Greek into Engliſh he tranſlated the Goſpel of St. Matthew, of which we ſhall give an extract in the note [S]. We may add to the reſt of his writings and learned labours, that he collected the arguments and reaſons of both ſides upon the buſineſs of the Euchariſt in Parliament, where that point was learnedly and largely debated, when the Communion-Book was appointed. He alſo made ſome corrections of Herodotus, Thucydides, Plato, Demoſthenes, Xenophon, and other Greek Authors. This, ſays Mr. Strype (35), is all we know of the fruits of his learned head; tho' no queſtion this Catalogue is very imperfect, and that he did write much more than we at this diſtance know. But this is ſufficient to inform us what a Scholar he was.

(ii) Ibid. pag. 43.

(kk) Ibid. pag. 199.

(ll) Ibid. pag. 200.

(33) Idem, ibid.

(34) Pag. 223.

(35) Pag. 224.

[2] He had three ſons, Henry, John, and Edward.] John and Edward died without iſſue. John was killed in 1579 or 1580 in Ireland in an engagement againſt ſome Italians and Spaniards, who had invaded that country for King Philip II. of Spain (36). Edward is likewiſe ſuppoſed to have died young (37). Henry the eldeſt, who was nine years old at his father's death, was educated to learning by the care of Mr. Oſborn, his father's friend, and afterwards ſent to King's College in Cambridge, under the tuition of Dr. Bartholomew Clerke. The Univerſity gave him his Grace for Maſter of Arts, and adopted him into the rank of their Senators in the year 1568, he being then ſcarce twenty years old. In 1569 or 1570 he married Frances, daughter of the Lady Ratcliff, who was wife to Sir Humphrey Ratcliff of Elſtow, Knt. whoſe ſon Edward was Earl of Suſſex. In 1576 he travelled into Italy; and in 1581 he was made Secretary to the Council in the North, and received the honour of Knighthood from her Majeſty (38). He is ſuppoſed to have died about the year 1586 (39). His iſſue by his Lady was Thomas his eldeſt ſon; Hatton, who followed the wars in Flanders, and was killed in a duel by Sir Thomas Dutton, Knt. near Calais; and Henry, who died without iſſue, and was buried at Dover near his brother Hatton. Thomas being left a minor, was educated in a ſchool at York. He was Knighted by King James I, and then ſtiled Sir Thomas Cheke of the county of Lincolne, in reſpect perhaps of his eſtate at Spalding in that county. He was afterwards ſtiled Sir Thomas Cheke of Pyrgo in the liberty of Havering in Eſſex, being an eſtate which he purchaſed of the Greys, and where he lived in 1634. He married firſt a daughter of Peter Oſborn Eſq; with whom he lived near twenty years, but had no iſſue by her. His ſecond wife was Eſſex, daughter of Robert Lord Rich, Earl of Warwick, by whom he had three ſons, Robert, Thomas, Charles; and five daughters, Frances, Eſſex, Anne, Iſabel, and Elizabeth. He lived to a great age, and was interred March the 25th 1659 in St. Alban's Church in Woodſtreet. Robert Cheke was born in 1625. He was crooked, but a man of exquiſite parts, and was ſome time Governor of one of King Charles the IId's natural children. Thomas, who inherited the eſtate, called Colonel Cheke, was Lieutenant of the forces under Charles II and James II. He married firſt Dorothy, daughter of Philip Sidney, Lord Viſcount Liſle, afterwards Earl of Leiceſter, by whom he had no iſſue. His ſecond wife was Lætitia, daughter of Edward Ruſſel, ſecond ſon of Francis Earl of Bedford; by whom he had iſſue Henry, who died at eight or nine years of age, and was buried in the Chapel at Pyrgo, beſides other children dying young. He had likewiſe a ſon, named Edward, who enjoyed the eſtate at Pyrgo, to whom Mr. Strype dedicated the life of Sir John Cheke, his great great grandfather in 1705. He married a daughter of Sir William Ellis of Nocton, in the county of Lincoln Bart. The daughters of Colonel Cheke by his wife Lætitia, were Eſſex and Anne, wife of Sir Thomas Tipping of Oxfordſhire, Bart. This is the poſterity male of Sir Thomas Cheke, Grandſon to Sir John Cheke. The daughters of Sir Thomas were five, all honourably married. 1. Frances, the eldeſt, was married to Sir Lancelot Lake of Canons in the county of Middleſex, Knt. 2. Eſſex, the ſecond daughter, was married to Sir Robert Bevyl of Cheſterton in the county of Huntington, Knt. of the Bath; and afterwards to Edward Earl of Manchеſter, Lord Chamberlain of the Houſhold to King Charles II, by whom he had ſix ſons and two daughters. 3. Anne, the third daughter, was married to Richard Rogers of the county of Dorſet Eſq; and afterwards to Robert Lord Rich, Earl of Warwick. 4. Iſabel, the fourth daughter, married to Sir Francis Gerard of Harrow on the Hill in Middleſex, Bart. 5. Elizabeth, married to Sir Richard Franklin of More-Park in the county of Hertford, Bart. (40).

(36) Idem, pag. 180.

(37) Idem, pag. 182.

(38) Idem, pag. 182-189.

(39) Idem, pag. 189.

(40) Idem, pag. 189-192.

about the Orthography of the Latin and Engliſh Language [R], which latter Tongue he endeavoured to improve [S]. He was extremely charitable, eſpecially to foreigners, and very communicative of his knowledge (mm). His widow married Henry Mac Williams Eſq; a Gentleman of conſiderable fortune and quality, and died November the 30th 1616 (nn). The Author of the Hiſtory of Socinianiſm has treated Sir John Cheke as a Libertine by profeſſion; but Mr. de la Roche in his Memoires Litteraires de la Grande Bretagne (oo) has ſhewn that this imputation has been caſt upon him without the leaſt foundation imaginable.

(mm) Ibid. pag. 228, 229.

(nn) Ibid. pag. 173-179.

(oo) Tom. 15. pag. 277.

[R] He was very careful about the orthography of the Latin and Engliſh Languages.] With regard to the Latin, that it might be ſpoken truly, and the ſyllables in reading pronounced long or ſhort, according to their nature, he deviſed a way to write the vowels according to their quantity; as the long vowel o after this manner ω, like a Greek Omega, as in uxωrem, liberωs; and the long I with two tittles over it, as in Divinitus. And as for the long E, eſpecially the diphthong, which before was commonly written as the ordinary E, he put a tail to it, as in Le,tor. Thus Mr. Strype found he wrote ſome of his letters; but he obſerved in his writings afterwards, that he did not ſo much regard it, except the E diphthong. And whereas the writing and ſpelling of the Engliſh tongue was in thoſe times very erroneous, even Scholars themſelves taking little care how they ſpelt, as appears both from manuſcripts and books then printed, he endeavoured to correct and regulate it in theſe reſpects following. 1. He would not have the letter E put to the end of words, becauſe he thought it unneceſſary and unexpreſſive of any ſounds; as in theſe words, Excuſ, giv, deceiv, praiſ, commun; unleſs where it is pronounced, and then to be written with a double E, as in Neceſſitee. 2. Where the letter A was pronounced long, he would have it written with a double A, in diſtinction from A ſhort, as in Maad, ſtraat, daar. Where the letter I was pronounced long, he would have it written with a double I, as in deſijr, Lijf. 4. He entirely threw the letter Y out of the alphabet, as uſeleſs, and ſupplied it with I, as mi, ſai, awai. U long he wrote with a long ſtroke over it, as in Preſūm. 6. The reſt of the long vowels he would have to be written with double letters, as weer, theer (and ſometimes thear) noo, noon, adoo, thoof, loov, to avoid an E at the end. 7. Letters without ſound he threw out, as in theſe words, Frutes, wold, faut, dout, again for againſt, hole, meen for mean. 8. He changed the ſpelling in ſome words to make them the better expreſſive of the ſounds; as in gud, britil, praiſabil, ſufferabil (41).

(41) Idem, pag. 211, 212.

[S] Which latter tongue he endeavoured to improve.] Dr. Thomas Wilſon, afterwards Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth, tells us (42), that our Author had better ſkill in the Engliſh language, to judge of the phraſes and properties of words, and to divide ſentences, than any perſon elſe that he knew, and that he was thought by ſome judicious men greatly to have improved the language by a practice, which he had when he read his Greek lectures, to take the book, and only looking upon the Greek to read it into Engliſh. What he did further for our language was, that he brought it into a ſhort and expreſſive way of writing without long and intricate periods. He would not allow any words but ſuch as were true Engliſh or of Saxon original; ſuffering no adoption of any foreign word into the Engliſh language, which he thought was copious enough of itſelf, without borrowing words from other countries. Thus in his own tranſlations into Engliſh he would not uſe any but pure Engliſh phraſes and expreſſions; which indeed made his ſtyle ſometimes a little affected and harſh, and obliged him to uſe ſeveral odd and uncouth words, as deſiirful ungreevous, Tollers for Publicans, &c. (43). This perhaps might occaſion that ſevere character of him by Sir John Hayward in his Life of King Edward VI, who allows his eloquence in the Latin and Greek tongues, but tells us, that for other ſufficiences, ſo far as appears by his Books, it was pedantic enough. Mr. Strype (44) obſerves, that this "cenſure was too raſh "upon a man of ſuch fame and learning, and indeed "beſpoke Hayward to be but little acquainted with "him or his books, being far otherwiſe thought on "by thoſe learned men his contemporaries, that well "knew him, and wanted not for ſkill to judge of "men." Our Author ſeemed to diſlike the Engliſh tranſlation of the Bible, becauſe there were ſo many foreign words in it. This induced him once to attempt a new verſion of the New Teſtament, and he completed that of the goſpel of St. Matthew, and began that of St. Mark; throughout which tranſlation he endeavoured to uſe only true Engliſh Saxon words. The original under his own hand ſtill remains in the Manuſcript-Library at Bennet College in Cambridge. We ſhall give the reader a ſpecimen from the Goſpel of St. Matthew, Chap. I. Ver. 17. Therefor from Abraham unto David there wer fourteen degrees; and from David unto the out-peopling to Babylon fourteen degrees; and from the out-peopling to Babylon unto Chriſt fourteen degrees. 18. And Jeſus Chriſt's birth was after this manner. After his mother Mari was enſured to Joſeph, before thei weer cupled together, ſhe was preived to be with child; and it was indeed by the Holi Ghooſt. 19. But Joſeph her huſband being a juſt man, and loth to uſe extremitee toward her, entended privili to divorſe himſelf from her. 20. And being in this mind, lo the Angel of the Lord appeired bi dream &c. Chap. II. V. 16. Then Herod ſeeing that he was plaid withal by the wiſe-heards, &c. T.

(42) Ap. Strype, pag. 212.

(43) Idem, pag. 212, 213.

(44) Pag. 213.

CHELIDONIS, a woman of a diſſolute life, whom I mention only that I may have an opportunity to relate a circumſtance which I have promiſed above (a), and which we read in Cicero. This woman loved Verres, and had a very great power over him. All they who had any law-ſuit depending, applied to her whilſt he was Prætor; and as this was the only means to ſucceed, ſome perſons of honour, whoſe claim was well-grounded, were obliged to pay their attendance to Chelidonis. The baſeneſs of this proceeding was very elegantly expoſed by Cicero [A]. He obſerves that a young man of Quality was (a) Towards the end of the Remark [C] of the Article CETHEGUS.

[A] The baſeneſs of this proceeding was very eloquently expoſed by Cicero.] The father-in-law, the uncle, and one of the guardians of a pupil, who was threatened with a dangerous proſecution at law, had recourſe to Marcus Marcellus another of the youth's guardians. Marcellus went to Verres and deſired him to protect the pupil's innocence, but could not prevail with him to promiſe any thing; whereupon all other means failing, he was obliged to apply himſelf to Chelidonis. Quum ſibi omnes ad iſtum allegationes difficiles, omnes aditus arduos, aut potius intercluſos viderunt, apud quem non jus, non æquitas, non miſericordia, non propinqui oratio, non amici voluntas, non cujuſquam auctoritas pro pretio, non gratia valeret, ſtatuunt id ſibi optimum eſſe factu, quod cuivis veniſſet in mentem, petere auxilium a Chelidone, quæ iſto Prætore, non modo in jure civili, privatorumque omnium controverſiis populo Romano præfuit, verum etiam in his ſartis tectis dominata eſt. Venit ad Chelidonem C. Muſtius eques Romanus publicanus, homo cum primis honeſtus; venit M. Junius patruus pueri, frugaliſſimus homo & caſtiſſimus; venit homo ſummo honore, pudore, & ſummo officio, ſpectatiſſimus ordinis ſui, P. Potitius tutor. O multis acerbam, ô miſeram, atque indignam Præturam tuam! ut mittam cætera, quo tandem pudore tales viros, quo dolore meretricis domum veniſſe arbitramini? qui nulla conditione iſtam turpitudinem was ashamed to name this creature [B]. She left her estate to Verres by her last will (b).

(b) Cicero, in Verr. II. chap. 47.

dinem subissent, nisi officii necessitudinisque ratio coegisset (1). i. e. "As they found it was difficult to convey "him any thing; that it was hard or rather impossi- "ble to have the least access to him; that neither "justice, nor equity, nor compassion, nor the entrea- "ties of his relations, nor the desires of his friends, "nor any person's authority, but money alone could "prevail upon him to grant a favour, they thought, "that the best thing for them to do was, what every "body else did, which was to beg Chelidonis's assi- "stance, who during his Prætorship, not only govern- "ed at Rome in civil affairs, and in all the law-suits "between private persons, but also in what related "to the keeping those public buildings in repair *. "C. Mustius a Roman Knight and a tax-gatherer, "a very worthy man, went to Chelidonis, with M. "Junius the child's uncle, a very sober and modest "man, and with P. Potitius the child's Guardian, a "man who by his reputation, his modesty, and his "great employment was the most eminent of his rank. "Oh, how cruel, how miserable, how shameful was "thy Prætorship! And not to mention other things at "present, what a shame, what a grief was it, think "you, for such men to go to the house of a prosti- "tute? nor would they have done this shameful action "on any account whatsoever, had not their duty and "friendship forced them to it." They met Chelidonis surrounded with a vast number of Clients; and were obliged to wait till she had dispatched a great many of them. Their turn came at last; they propo- sed their business to her, desired her to serve them, and offered her money. She answered like a true Courtezan; I will serve you with all my heart, said she; I shall speak to him about it effectually; but the next day she declared, that she could not prevail upon him, and that he expected a large sum of money from that affair. Veniunt, ut dico, ad Chelidonem. Domus erat plena; nova jura, nova decreta, nova judicia pete- bantur. Mihi det possessionem, mihi ne adimat, in me judicium ne det, mihi bona addicat. Alii nummos nume- rabant, alii tabulas obsignabant. Domus erat non me- retricio conventu, sed prætoriâ turbâ referta. Simul ac potestas primum data est, adeunt hi quos dixi, loquitur Mustius, rem demonstrat, petit auxilium, pecuniam pol- licetur. Respondit illa, ut meretrix, non inhumanè, li- benter ait se esse facturam, & cum isto diligenter ser- mocinaturam, reverti jubet; tum discedunt; postridie revertuntur. Negat illa posse hominem exorari, permag- nam eum dicere ex illa re pecuniam confici posse (2). i. e. "They went, as I said, to Chelidonis; her house "was full of people, who asked for new laws, new "decrees, new sentences: let him grant me that es- "tate, says one; let him not deprive me of it, says "another; do not let him give sentence against me, "says a third; let this estate be forfeited to me, "says a fourth: some give money, others sign bonds. "The house was filled, not with such people as use "to visit a Courtezan, but with such as use to attend "a Prætor. The persons, whom I have mentioned, "approached the Lady, as soon as they could: Mus- "tius spoke, explained the whole affair, begged her "assistance, and promised her money: she, like a true "Courtezan, answered very kindly, and said, she "would with all her heart, comply with their request, "and recommend the affair effectually to Verres; and "desired them to come again. The next day they "returned; but her answer was, that he could not "be prevailed upon, and said he could make a very "good penny of that affair." The Chamber-Coun- sellors had no longer any business; men did no more resort to them, but only to Chelidonis; it was she, who regulated all Sentences and Decrees; the Prætor reversed his own Decrees, and pronounced quite oppo- site sentences, according to this woman's suggestions. Cicero expresses this exceedingly well. Quæso redite in memoriam, Judices, quæ libido istius in jure dicendo fuerit, quæ varietas decretorum, quæ nundinatio, quam inanes domus eorum omnium, qui de jure civili consuli solent, quam plena atque referta Chelidonis, à qua mu- liere quum erat ad eum ventum, & in aures ejus insusur- ratum, aliàs revocabat inter eos quos jam decreverat, de- cretumque mutabat, aliàs inter alios contrarium sine ulla Religione decernebat, ac proximis paulo ante decreverat (3). i. e. "Pray call to mind, ye Judges, how in- "constant he was in his judgments, how various and "corrupt in his Decrees; how empty the houses of "those were, who used to be consulted concerning the "Civil Law, and how full Chelidonis's house was; "if a person was but recommended by her, Verres "used to alter by her insinuations his former Decrees, "nor did he scruple to give such sentences as were in- "consistent with one another."

(1) Cicero, Orat. in Verrem I. cap. 51, & seq.

* This did properly belong to the Censor. But as there was no Censor at Rome under Verres's Prætorship, he had the inspection of the public buildings. Freigius, Not. in Verrinam Primam, pag. m. 301.

(2) Cicero, Orat. in Verr. ibid.

(3) Cicero, Orat. in Verrem I. cap. 46. See also Orat. 5. in Verrem, cap. 13.

[B] A young man . . . . was ashamed to name this creature.] What a shame is it, cries Cicero, that a Prætor should have discharged his office according to the will and pleasure of a woman, whom Domitius did not think he could name, without offending against the rules of modesty. L. Domitius . . . de Chelidone reti- cuit, quoad potuit, alio responsionem derivavit. Tantus in adolescente clarissimo ac Principe juventutis pudor fuit, ut aliquamdiu, quum a me premeretur, omnia potius re- sponderet, quam Chelidonem nominaret. Primo neces- sarios istius ad eum allegatos esse dicebat, deinde aliquando coactus, Chelidonem nominavit. Non te pudet, Verres, ejus mulieris arbitratu gessisse præturam, quam L. Domi- tius ab se nominari vix sibi honestum esse arbitraba- tur (4). i. e. "Domitius avoided to name Chelidonis "as much as he could, and made but indirect answers. "Such was the modesty of this noble young man, the "chief of our youth, that tho' I pressed him, yet he "chose to answer any thing, rather than to name "Chelidonis. First he said, her friends had been "sent to him; and as I insisted, at last he named Che- "lidonis. And are you not ashamed, Verres, to have "followed, during your Prætorship, the dictates of a "woman, whose name Domitius thought it almost in- "decent for him to pronounce?"

(4) Cicero, Orat in Verrem I. cap. 53.

CHELONIS, daughter of Leonidas King of Lacedæmon, and wife of Cleombro- tus also King of Lacedæmon, extricated herself out of a very great perplexity, not in- deed like a politic woman, but like a romantic heroine. The case was this. There arose at Lacedæmon such a formidable faction against Leonidas in behalf of Cleombro- tus, that the former was obliged to take sanctuary in a Temple, and the latter was raised to the Throne. Chelonis was so far from taking a share in her husband's good fortune, that she retired into the same Temple with her father, and they both appeared there in that mortified posture, which was usual to those who fled to such sanctuaries; the best notion we can give of them is by comparing them to those penitents who appear in sackcloth and ashes. Leonidas was some time after permitted to retire to Tegea, whither Chelonis, his inseparable companion in his misfortunes, followed him. Cleombrotus was in his turn forced to take sanctuary in a Temple, and Leonidas was restored to the Throne; but Chelonis left her father then, and went to meet her husband. It was a thing worthy of admiration, to see her intercede with her father in favour of her hus- band, being fully determined to share his misfortune with him, though she had had no share in his prosperity, and not to share her father's happiness with him, though she had shared his misfortunes. Leonidas went with an armed force to the sanctuary where his son-in-law had sheltered himself, and in the most passionate manner upbraided him with the injuries he had received from him, as the loſs of his Crown, his baniſhment, and ſo forth. Cleombrotus had nothing to anſwer; but his ſpouſe did it for him; ſhe ſpoke in ſuch a ſtrong and moving manner, proteſting at the ſame time, ſhe would die before her huſband, if her prayers and tears proved unſucceſsful, that ſhe ſaved his life, and obtained leave for him to retire to ſuch place as he ſhould chooſe. Amongſt other things, ſhe repreſented to her father that he himſelf made his ſon-in-law's Apology, and that her paſt conduct was a Manifeſto againſt her huſband [A]. When Leonidas had granted her the life and liberty of Cleombrotus, he deſired her moſt affectionately to continue with him; but ſhe begged to be excuſed, and putting one of her children into her huſband's arms, whilſt ſhe held the other, ſhe went to pray by the altar, and immediately after went with her huſband to the place of his baniſhment (a). The paſſage in which Montagne commends her, deſerves to be read (b).

(a) From Plutarch, in the Life of Agis and Cleomenes.

(b) Montagne, Eſſays, liv. 3. chap. 13. pag. m. 578.

[A] She repreſented to her father, that he himſelf made his ſon-in-law's Apology, and that her paſt conduct was a Manifeſto againſt her huſband.] If my huſband, ſaid ſhe (1), had ſome plauſible reaſons to deprive you of the Crown, I myſelf confuted them: I bore witneſs againſt him, by leaving him to follow you: but if you ſhould put him to death, will you not prove by this very action, that he was excuſable? Will you not ſhew to the whole world, that a Kingdom is ſomething ſo valuable, ſo worthy to be coveted, that in order to keep it, a man may freely ſpill the blood of a ſon-in-law, and have not the leaſt regard for the life of his own children?

(1) Plutarch. in Vita Agid. & Cleom. pag. 802.

CHESNE (JOSEPH DU) in Latin Quercetanus, Sieur de la Violette, Counſellor and Phyſician to the King, was of the county of Armagnac in Gaſcony, and died at Paris in the year 1609. Some Authors give him the title of Baron (a). He became famous by his ſkill in Chymiſtry [A], and he publiſhed ſome books, which were very well received, and have been often reprinted [B]. I believe he was of the Proteſtant Religion,

(a) See the Remark [B].

[A] He became famous by his ſkill in Chymiſtry.] The paſſage of Gaffarel, which proves this aſſertion, contains ſomething very remarkable, for which reaſon I ſhall not confine myſelf to thoſe words only, which relate to our Du Cheſne's ſkill in Chymiſtry, being perſuaded, that the reader will ſee the whole paſſage with pleaſure. Mr. Du Cheſne Sieur de la Violette one of the beſt Chymiſts of this age relates, that he had ſeen a very learned Pole a Phyſician at Cracow, who kept in vials the aſhes of almoſt every plant that is known; and when any perſon was curious to ſee in theſe vials a roſe, for inſtance, he took the vial in which the aſhes of the roſe-tree were kept, and put it over a lighted candle; when it had felt the heat a little, the aſhes began to move, afterwards they roſe and diſperſed themſelves thro' the vial, in which one could perceive a ſmall dark cloud, which dividing itſelf into little parcels, came at laſt to repreſent a roſe ſo fine, ſo freſh, and ſo perfect, that one would have thought it could be handled, and muſt ſmell like one that is pluckt from the roſe-tree. This learned man ſays, that he often tried to make that experiment, but could not ſucceed with all his ſkill, till at laſt he ſaw this wonder by chance. For as he was amuſing himſelf with Mr. de Luynes, ſurnamed de Formentieres, Counſellor in the Parliament, by making ſome curious experiments, and had drawn the ſalt from the aſhes of ſome burnt nettles, and expoſed the lye to the dew in winter, he found it frozen in the morning, but with this wonderful circumſtance, that the ſpecies of the nettles, their form and figure were ſo naturally and perfectly delineated upon the ice, that they ſeemed to be true nettles. This man (Du Cheſne) being overjoyed at this, called the ſaid Counſellor to be a witneſs of this ſecret, the excellency of which made him cry out in theſe words:

" Secret dont on comprend que, quoyque le corps
" meure,
" Les formes ſont pourtant aux cendres leur démeure.
That is,
" This is a ſecret, which ſhews, that tho' the bodies
" die, yet their forms ſtill continue in their aſhes."

This ſecret is more common at this time, for Mr. de Claves, one of the moſt eminent Chymiſts of this age, ſhews it every day (1).

(1) Gaffarel, Curioſit. Inouyes. chap. 5. num. 9. pag. m. 100.

[B] He publiſhed ſome Books, which were very well received, and have been often reprinted.] We want no other proof of this but the great number of editions, which his works went through, as may be ſeen in the Lindenius renovatus (2), to which I refer the reader for this particular as well as for the titles of his works. I ſhall only obſerve I, That as much as I could find by my inquiries, the firſt book he publiſhed was his Apologia pro Chymicis (An Apology for the Chymiſts): Thus Du Verdier gives the title of it (3), and he ſays, it was printed at Lyons in the year 1575, 8vo. It is no doubt the ſame book with that, which is intitled, Ad Jacobi Auberti, Vindonis, de ortu & cauſis Metallorum contra Chymicos explicationem, brevis Reſponſio. Et de exquiſita Mineralium, Animalium, & vegetabilium Medicamentorum ſpagyrica præparatione & uſu perſpicua Tractatio. i. e. " A ſhort Anſwer to James Au-" bert's Treatiſe concerning the Origin and Cauſes of " Metals, againſt the Chymiſts. With a plain account " of the excellent chymical preparation and uſe of me-" dicines compoſed of minerals, animals, and vegeta-" bles." Printed at Lyons in 1575, 8vo. Du Verdier aſcribed to him Traité de St. Auguſtin de la Vie Chréſtienne, avec les Traitez de charité & de la vanité de ce ſiecle, & monde inferieur d'obedience & d'humilité. Et l'Echelle de Paradis. i. e. " St. Auguſtin's Treatiſe " concerning a Chriſtian Life; with the Treatiſes of " Charity, and of the Vanity of this lower World, " which is a place of obedience and humility. And " the ladder of Paradiſe." Printed at Paris in 1542. But I cannot think he was the Author of this work, if the date of 1542 be right. I believe that the cut prefixed to his Diæteticon, printed in 1606, was made that ſame year. Now it is there ſet down that he was then ſixty years old; ſo that he was born after this Treatiſe of St. Auguſtin was printed. II. I ſhall obſerve in the ſecond place, that Du Verdier in his Bibliotheque ſtiles him only, Sieur de la Violette, Conſeiller & Medecin ordinaire de Monſeigneur Frere unique du Roi, Lord de la Violette, Counſellor and Phyſician in ordinary to the King's only brother; and in La Croix du Maine he is only called, Baron & Seigneur de Morencé & Lyſerable; i. e. " Baron and Lord of Morencé and " Lyſerable." It is certain that theſe two Authors ſpeak of the ſame Writer; for they both aſcribe to the Joſeph du Cheſne, they mention, the Book intitled, Traite de la cure generale & particuliere des Arquebuſades. i. e. " A Treatiſe concerning the general and " particular manner of healing wounds made by an " Arquebus;" printed at Lyons in the year 1576. It was alſo printed the ſame year in Latin and in French. Baillet mentions the Baron de Morencé, whoſe name was Joſeph du Cheſne (4); but he mentions him only as a Poet, and it is certain that this Phyſician made ſome Verſes. Du Verdier aſcribes to him, La Morocoſmie; ou de la Folie, Vanité, & Inconſtance du Monde, en 100 Octonaires. Avec deux Chants Doriques de l'Amour celeſte & du Souverain bien; i. e. " Moro-" coſmia, or a Poem concerning the Folly, Vanity, " and Inconſtancy of this World, in an hundred Stan-" zas of eight verſes each. With two Canto's upon " the Love of God, and the Summum Bonum." Printed at Lyons in 1583, 4to. I believe, this is not the firſt edition of that work; for the Author, who quotes it in his Diæteticon (5), printed in 1606, obſerves, that it was then twenty ſix years ſince he had publiſh'd it.

(2) Pag. 710 and 711.

(3) Du Verdier, Bibl. Françoiſe, pag. 773.

(4) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poetes, tom. 3. num. 1332, pag. 363.

(5) Folio 17.

Religion, as it is aſſerted in the Index Librorum prohibitorum (b). He married Margaret du Trie (c), whoſe mother was the daughter of the learned William Budæus; he had a daughter by her, whom I ſhall mention in another place (d). Patin has abuſed him very much [C]; and indeed, how could he have ſpared him, conſidering the hatred he entertained againſt all the Chymiſts, and his averſion for antimony? It is true, the Sieur de la Violette did not preſcribe this medicine, but he had in a manner declared himſelf the Protector of it (e). This with ſome other circumſtances in his way of practice raiſed him a great many enemies. He was obliged to anſwer ſome books of Riolan, which were not without ſome abuſive expreſſions. But he could eaſily comfort himſelf under thoſe little perſecutions; for he was favoured by the Great. Mr. de Silleri, who has been Chancellor of France, was one of his patrons; he took him along with him into Switzerland, when he went Embaſſador thither in the year 1601, to renew the alliance with France; and as there was then a report that a certain girl had lived a long while without eating, he ſent du Cheſne to Bern, to enquire into the truth of the matter; the account he brought back was, that the ſtory was true (f). I ſhall obſerve a ſmall miſtake which crept into the Catalogue of Oxford [D].

(b) Pag. 660. of the Geneva Edition 1667.

(c) See the Remark [C] in the Article SPANHEIM.

(d) Ibid.

(e) See his Diæteticon, folio m. 458, &c.

(f) Taken from Joſeph Du Cheſne's Diætetica, fol. 31.

[C] Patin has abuſed him very much.] "That ſame year (1609) died here a great rogue and quack, who "in his life-time killed a great many perſons, and "ſtill continues to do ſo, by the wretched Books he "left us under his name, and which he cauſed to be "written by other Chymiſt-Phyſicians, whom he "pick'd up here and there. I mean, Joſephus Quercetanus, who at Paris ſtiled himſelf the Sieur de la "Violette. By his firſt trade he was only a Surgeon's journeyman in the County of Armagnac, "which is a poor wretched and curſed Country; "being come to Paris, he paſſed there, and eſpecially "at Court, for a great Phyſician, becauſe he had learned in Germany ſomething of Chymiſtry. The beſt "Chymiſt, that is to ſay the leaſt bad, has done but "little good in the world, and this man has done a "great deal of harm (6)." Patin betrays a very great paſſion in theſe words.

(6) Patin, Let. 31. pag. 142. of the 1ſt vol. edition of Geneva in 1691.

[D] I ſhall obſerve a ſmall miſtake, which crept into the Catalogue of Oxford.] The Authors of this Catalogue mention (7) one John du Cheſne, to whom they aſcribe the Treatiſe concerning the manner of healing wounds made by an Arquebuſs, printed at Lyons in the year 1576, 8vo, and the Grand Miroir du Monde, Great Mirror of the World, printed in the ſame city in the year 1587, 4to; tho' both theſe works certainly belong to our Joſeph du Cheſne. Merclinus does not mention the latter (8); but the Author himſelf quotes it in his Diæteticon Polyhiſtoricon, folio 398.

(7) Part 1. pag. 158.

(8) In Lindenio renovato.

I muſt alſo obſerve, that in the Catalogue of Oxford they give us (9) a long liſt of the Latin Works of Joſephus Quercetanus, without telling us, that he is the ſame, who had already been mentioned under the name of Du Cheſne.

(9) Part 2. pag. 88.

CHEVREAU (URBAN) born at Loudon, and Author of ſeveral books, and amongſt others an Univerſal Hiſtory (a), which has been often reprinted, died in his native-place February the 15th 1701, at the age of fourſcore and ſeven years and ſome months. See his Elogium in the Journal of Trevoux (b); they have not given there an exact catalogue of all the books he publiſhed, for they have not mentioned his Romance of Hermiogene, printed at Paris in the year 1648, in 8vo, nor the volume of Letters which he publiſhed in the ſame City in the year 1642, in 8vo.

(a) See the Article BABYLAS, Remark [F].

(b) For the months of March and April 1701, pag. 241. of the Amſterdam edition.

CHIGI (a), a noble family of Sienna, the members of which had been a long time conſiderable in their own country, when they began to be raiſed to ſome dignities at the Court of Rome under Pope Julius II (b). It is true they were not preferred to Prelacies, but they enjoyed great employments in the Apoſtolic Chamber. Julius II made Auguſtine Chigi Intendant of the Finances, and had reaſons to be very well pleaſed with his choice. All the world knows this Pope's warlike and reſtleſs genius, which could not but engage him in very great expences. Auguſtino Chigi was obliged to employ all his ſkill and induſtry in order to find the neceſſary funds to provide for ſuch great charges; and did it with all the activity, contrivance and honeſty, that were requiſite [A]; ſo that (a) The true name is Chigi.

(b) See hereunder the Remark [F].

[A] AUGUSTINO CHIGI Intendant of the Finances under Julius II, ... had all the honeſty, that was requiſite.] I have followed my Author exactly, who ſays, there never was the leaſt ground to ſuſpect the honeſty of this Financer. Non hebbe mai Giulio che ombrarſi dell' Integrita di che l'eſſercitava (1). But yet I know, that they have publiſhed very ſtrange things concerning Auguſtino Chigi's profuſeneſs. He once entertained the Pope and all the Cardinals with ſuch a ſumptuouſneſs, that one would have thought that he deſigned to exceed the extravagance of Vitellius himſelf. The plenty, delicacy, and choice of the meats would have been ſufficient to raiſe one's admiration; but it was not this way that Auguſtino Chigi deſigned to diſtinguiſh himſelf; at every courſe, all that was upon the table was thrown into the Tyber, tho' all the diſhes and plates were ſilver. The laſt courſe conſiſted of a vaſt quantity of parrot's tongues, dreſſed an hundred different ways. It can hardly be believed that a Financer, who is guilty of ſuch a profuſeneſs, gained his riches by lawful means. I wiſh the Author, who acquaints us with this particular, had been pleaſed to let us know whence he had it, which was but juſt. If he would have us believe him upon his bare word, I can't help it; however here follows his own account. Privatum hominem ad prodigioſi luxus enormem licitationem, non macelli unius, ſed peregrini quoque orbis conturbatricem aſpiraſſe, quis non merito maximo demiretur. Is fuit Auguſtinus quidam Chieſius, Romanus Trapezites, qui Leoni X Pontifici Maximo totique purpurei Senatus cœtui, exterorumque Regum Legatis, ob filium ab illo Baptiſmi lavacro tinctum ſplendidiſſima, ut ita dicam, repotia conſtituit, in quibus non ſatis fuit eduliorum omnis generis miſſumque exquiſitiſſimorum apparatui modum omnem adimiſſe, niſi etiam lances, pinaces, cæteraque cum eſcaria vaſa, tum potûs inſtrumenta affabre facta omnia in Tiberis præterlabentis alveum inani luxus oſtento præcipitarentur, idque non unâ modo, ſed pluribus quoque vicibus, quotieſcunque ſcenicum illud ferculorum & menſarum choragium mutandum foret. Atque iſta parvo conſtitiſſe æſtimandum erat, niſi & alieno ex orbe petitarum immani precio avium, (quos Pſittacos nominamus) ſolæ linguæ variis in patinis conditæ, ultimo ferculo omnem luxus oſtentationem ſuperaſſent (2). i. e. "Who would not wonder, that a private man "would carry his profuſeneſs to ſuch an exceſs, as "to exhauſt not only one market, but even all the "markets of the whole world? Yet there was ſuch a "man; I mean one Auguſtino Chigi, a Banker at "Rome, who invited Pope Leo X, all the Cardinals, "and

(1) Relatione della Corte Romana, fatta dal Signor Angelo Corraro, pag. 9. The Journal of Trevoux for July 1702, pag. 48. tells us, that Mr. Du Tot Counſellor in the Parliament of Roan, is the Author of the Relation de la Cour de Rome. See alſo il Sindicato di Aleſſandro VII. pag. 29. edition of 1668.

THE prodigious ſumptuouſneſs of a feaſt.

(2) Hadrianus Junius, Animadverſ. lib. 4. cap. 8.

that Julius II, who was very well pleaſed with his Finances, honoured him with a kind of adoption; he ordered, that Auguſtino Chigi and his deſcendants ſhould be conſidered as belonging to the family of the Rovere's. Under Pope Paul III the family of the Chigi's underwent an unhappy revolution, which obliged them to retire from Rome, and to return to Sienna. They had a fine garden upon the Tyber near the palace of the Farneſe's; but this neighbourhood proved fatal to them; for it was neceſſary, in order to beautify that ſeat, to add this fine portion of the Chigi's inheritance to it, and thus to expel the true owners out of it. From this time the Chigi's led a retired life at Sienna till the time of Pope Urban VIII, when Fabio Chigi went to ſeek his fortune at Rome, and ſucceeded ſo well, that he was choſen Pope in the year 1655, upon which he took the name of Alexander VII; he is the ſubject of the following Article. This Pope loaded his relations with riches and honours. MARIO CHIGI, his eldeſt brother, who was made Governor of Rome, did not meddle much with Politics and State-Affairs; but on the other

" and the foreign Miniſters to a Chriſtening entertain" ment, which was excedingly ſumptuous. For it
" not only abounded with all ſorts of the moſt choice
" and delicate meats, even to exceſs; but as tho' this
" had not been ſufficient, the plates, diſhes, tankards,
" all of ſilver curiouſly wrought muſt be thrown into the " Tyber, and that not for once but ſeveral times, and
" at every courſe. And yet, as if this was thought " to be but a triſle, the tongues only of coſtly birds,
" (we call them Parrots) brought from foreign Coun" tries at an exorbitant price, and dreſſed ſeveral ways
" were preſented at the laſt courſe, which thus exceed" ed all the former thro' exceſſive ſumptuouſneſs." This Writer makes uſe of the word Trapezites a Banker, to expreſs the employment of our Chigi; this is not much better than Mezerai's expreſſion (3).

(3) Auguſtin Ghiſi, Fermier des Salines du Pape (Jules II) s'en étant plaint à ſa Saintité. i. e. " Auguſtine " Ghiſi, Farmer " of the Pope's " (Julius II) " Salt-pits, hav- " ing complain- " ed of it to his " Holineſs, &c." Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. m. 45. under the year 1510.

They who underſtand Latin will be here entertained with a ſtory, which I met with in Paolo Jovio, and which confirms what we have ſaid of our Chigi's ſumptuouſneſs. It will alſo acquaint the reader, that he had a miſtreſs, to whom he made a preſent of a fiſh's head, which the Cardinal of St. Severino, who owed him a great ſum of money, ſent him. A famous Paraſite of thoſe times traced that head to the houſe of the Courtezan, and ſatisfied at laſt his gluttony, after he had ſoundly tired himſelf with running after this delicate bit. This is very elegantly related in the original; I ſhall tranſcribe the whole paſſage (4). Eam (Umbram) hodie Romani Umbrinam vocant. Capita Umbrarum, ſicuti & Silurorum Trium-viris rei Romanæ conſervatoribus dona dantur, qui piſcatores inveterata quadam conſuetudine eorum Capitum tributi nomine vectigales fecerunt. . . . Extat adhuc in ore quorundam facetorum ridenda fabula de T. Tamiſio, qui Romanis auliciſque ſalibus erat inſignis; ſed gulæ adeò proſtitutæ, ut infamis haberetur. Is quum per ſervum, qui in foro piſcario in eam curam intentus eſſe ſolebat, ingentis Umbræ caput Triumviris delatum eſſe cognoviſſet, in Capitolium protinus aſcendit, ut ſimulato apud Magiſtratum negotio, ſermoneque de induſtriâ protracto, prandium captaret. Verum illud Triumviri jam Riario Cardinali donandam decreverant: ita Tamiſius cum limine curiæ efferri ingenti coronataque patina caput illud nobile conſpexiſſet, primo deceptus conſilio, illud ſubſecutus eſt præmiſſo ſervo, qui veſtigiis deferentium miniſtrorum inſiſteret. Nec multo poſt, cum Riarianis ædibus inferretur, bene habet, ſalva res eſt, inquit Tamiſius, opiparè excipiemur: erat enim imprimis menſæ Riarianæ, quæ longe omnium ſemper lautiſſima fuit, familiaris. At Riarius, ut erat naturæ munificus, maximum, inquit, hoc Triumvirale caput maximo debetur Cardinali, ſtatimque Federico Sanſeverino proceritatis admirandæ Cardinali tranſmittitur. Colligit ex templo togam Tamiſius, Riarium intempeſtivæ munificentiæ incuſans, in mulamque reſilit, & munus ad Sanſeverianam domum conſequitur. Idem pari liberalitate facit Federicus, caputque ipſum ſplendidis exornatum verbis (5), auurataque illatum patina Ghiſio publicano ditiſſimo deferri jubet, quod ei multo ære alieno, gravibuſque uſuris obſtrictus erat. Volitat tertia jam ſpe avidam fruſtratus gulam Tamiſius, feſtinabunduſque incaleſcente jam die in Tranſtyberinos hortos, quos ipſe Ghiſius magnificentiſſimos extruebat, contendit: ibique feſſus admodum, & multo ſudore madidus, quod gravis ſit abdominit, quarto a Fortuna decipitur: quippe qui Ghiſium caput illud recentibus floribus redimitum adamato Scorto, cui ob forma, eruditiſque illecebris Imperiæ cognomen fuit, ut extemplo deferretur, curantem reperit. Flectit itaque indignabundus habenas retro, nec tamen ſubiratus gulæ, quæ Herculeos labores attulerat, & ad Imperiam jam multo ſole Sextini pontis ſemitam exurente adequitat. Ad extremum anhelantis gulæ ea vis atque libido fuit, ut qui per totam urbem fuerat ruptatus, idem & togatus & ſenex cum ſcorto admirante novi hominis adventum, nullo pudore diſcubuerit. i. e. " The Romans call that fiſh now Ombrina. It " is an ancient cuſtom to make a preſent of the heads
" of theſe fiſhes, as well as of the Siluri, to the three
" Magiſtrates, who are ſtiled Conſervators of Rome;
" they require this as a kind of a tribute from the " Fiſhermen. . . . There is a merry ſtory, which ſome " facetious people uſe to tell about T. Tamiſius, a " man eminent for his witty ſayings againſt the Ro-
" mans, and the Courtiers, but infamous for his ex-
" ceſſive gluttony. It happened once, that his ſer-
" vant, who uſed to lurk about the market, told him
" that they had carried the head of a prodigious large
" Ombrina to the Magiſtrates. Up goes Tamiſius to " the Capitol, feigning ſome buſineſs with the " Magiſtrates, ſpeaks to them, and ſpins out his " diſcourſe on purpoſe as long as he can, in " hopes of being invited to dinner, and to have his " ſhare of that delicate bit. But the Magiſtrates had " already deſigned to make a preſent of it to Cardi" nal Riario. Tamiſius ſeeing they carried away that " noble head in a large diſh, and being diſappointed
" in his firſt deſign, ſent his ſervant after the perſons
" that carried it, and followed them himſelf at ſome
" diſtance. He ſoon found that it was brought to " Cardinal Riario's houſe; whereupon he cried out, all
" is well, we are ſafe, we ſhall have a delicate dinner;
" for he uſed to go and dine familiarly with Riario,
" who kept always the beſt table in Rome. But as " he was very generous, he ſaid, this great head,
" which the Magiſtrates ſend me, muſt be given to
" the greateſt of the Cardinals, and ſent it immedi" ately to Cardinal Frederic St. Severino, a man who " was exceedingly tall. Tamiſius takes up his cloak,
" railing againſt Riario's untimely generoſity, jumps
" upon his mule, and away he rides after the head to " St. Severino's houſe. But this Cardinal, who was " no leſs generous than Riario, ordered the head to be " adorned with the choiceſt greens, and put in a gilt
" diſh, and ſo carried to Chigi a very rich tax-ga-
" therer, to whom he owed a great ſum of money
" at a very high intereſt. Tamiſius, whoſe gluttony
" was now diſappointed for the third time flies away,
" and makes all the haſte he can, the day beginning
" now to grow very hot, to Chigi's fine gardens be" yond the Tiber; he arrived there very much fa-
" tigued and all in a ſweat, for he was a fat and luſty
" man; but fortune again fruſtrated him for the fourth
" time; for he met Chigi giving orders to have the " head adorned with freſh flowers, and thus to be ſent
" to his miſtreſs, who for her beauty and alluring
" charms was ſurnamed Imperia. Tamiſius went back
" with ſome indignation, tho' not angry with his own
" gluttony, which made him undergo Herculean la-
" bours, and rode to Imperia in the middle of the " day, when the heat of the ſun rendered the bridge
" Sextinus, over which he was to paſs, burning hot.
" Finally, ſuch was his eager gluttony, that he who " had run all day thro' the whole city, and was a " grave and old man, was not aſhamed to dine with
" a proſtitute, who wondered to ſee a ſtranger come
" to her."

(4) Paulus Jovius, de Piſcibus Romanis, cap. 5. pag. 49, & ſeq. edit. Frobeniana 1531.

(5) It is thus printed in the Baſil edition, which I quote, and in that of Baſil 1561, 8vo, apud Henricum Petri, and in that of Baſil in folio, 1577, apud Petrum Pernam, but it is certainly an error of the Preſs, inſtead of Herbis.

other hand, he was very eager after gain (c), and found out some very effectual means to get money, which made the people exclaim loudly against him. Donna Berenice his wife (d), who when she came to Rome was entirely unacquainted with the manners of the Court, became in a short time so well skilled in them, that she could have taught them to others. She had very seldom audience of the Pope, and was put at first upon such a footing, as not to meddle with any affairs but her own; this was owing to the complaints and clamours which still subsisted against Donna Olympia, Innocent X's sister-in-law. FLAVIO CHIGI Don Mario's son was made Cardinal Patron; but he loved his pleasures too much [B], and was still too young to gain any reputation by such a conduct as becomes a Statesman [C]. He did not care to hoard up riches, either because he loved to live nobly, or did not think it worth his while to get his riches for another branch of his family; for he had no brothers. We shall give a more particular account of him in the Remarks. AUGUSTUS CHIGI, Don Mario's brother, left two sons, of whom Pope Alexander VII took a particular care. AUGUSTINO CHIGI who was the eldest, and was designed to be the head of the family, married (e) one of the greatest fortunes at Rome; she was niece to Prince Marc Anthony Borghese; had a hundred and

(c) Ne di altro si compiace, che di trovar modi de accumular denari. Angelo Corraro, Relazione di Roma, pag. 15.

(d) She was of Sienna, of the Family della Ciaia.

(e) In the year 1658.

[B] FLAVIO CHIGI . . . loved his pleasures too much.] It is not a difficult matter to understand Angelo Corraro's meaning, who with an affected simplicity says, that this Cardinal kept his bed oftener than his youth seemed to require, and that he desired his Physicians not to acquaint the Pope with the reasons of it, lest his Holiness should think, he loved wine and women too much. Goderebbe assai migliore sanità, se fosse piu temperato nel mangiare, nel che eccede ogni precetto di viver sano con largo e saccoso pasto. Vogliono anco che non sia sobrio quanto dovrebbe ne' piaceri del senso, onde e che piu di quello che dovrebbe aspettarsi dalla sua gioventu, viene obligato al letto. I medici però non reportano al Papa le vere ragioni della sua decumbenza, così avertiti dal Cardinale, acciò sua santità non concepisca sinistra opinione di lui, come di crapulone e incontinente (6). i. e. "He might have enjoyed a "better health, had he been more temperate in his "eating, not breaking through those rules, which are "necessary to preserve one's health, by too much and "too strong victuals. And tho' he was not as sober "as he ought to have been, yet he would enjoy sen-"sual pleasures; whence it happened, that he was "obliged to keep his bed oftener than might have "been expected from a young man as he was. His "Physicians did not give the Pope the true reason of his "lying a bed, because he had desired them not to do it, "lest his Holiness should conceive an ill opinion of "him, and think him a drunkard and a dissolute "man." Some have asserted that affront, which the Duke de Crequi, French Embassador at Rome, received there (7), was owing originally to some love-intrigue, in which the Cardinal Patron was engaged: Bussi Rabutin has taken this for granted (8), as may be seen in his satyrs. However it be, Cardinal Chigi was in a very ill repute, with regard to venereal pleasures, when he was in France in 1564 (9), and there was an infinite number of ballads made against him, and sung thro' the whole Kingdom. The long sicknesses under which he laboured towards the latter end of his life, and which have been so often mentioned in the news-papers, are but doubtful proofs of the dissolute life he led in his youth. See the Remark [C] of the following article.

(6) Corraro, Relaz. della Corte Romana, pag. 16.

(7) In the year 1662.

(8) If he be the Author of the Amours du Palais Royal, which he does not own. See at the end of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary, the Dissertation concerning Libels, Remark [D].

(9) He went thither Legate a Latere to make satisfaction for the affront which the Duke de Crequi had received.

[C] . . . And he was too young to gain any reputation by such a conduct, as becomes a Statesman.] Angelo Corraro speaks of him with some contempt in this respect. One could draw nothing from him but mere compliments and promises which proved ineffectual; for which reason Corraro would not apply himself any longer to him, but went directly to the Pope. De quel che vaglia, says he (10), nel negotio non mi dà l'animo d'affermare cosa certa, perche s'egli non sa fare piu di quello che fà, bisogna dire che vaglia poco, già che esso non riportana se non complimenti, gentilezze di concetti, e speranze di voler far assai, che in fine si resolvono in nulla; terminando le risposte in repugnanze trovate in S. S.ta e in qualche motivo delle cause, ò della negativa, à della prolatione. Onde io ho retrovato meglio ne' negozi importanti, andarmene di primo tratto al Papa medesimo, che valermi dell' interpositione del Cardinale. i. e. "As to his skill in business, I do not design to assert "any thing for certain: but if he cannot do more "than he does, we must needs say that his ability is "not very great; for all that can be got from him is "nothing but compliments, civility attended with witty "sayings and fair promises, which at last came to no-"thing; his excuse being then, that his Holiness "would not give his consent; or find in the na-"ture of the affair in question some reasons either to "refuse it or to put it off for another time. For "which reason I thought it better to go directly to "the Pope himself, in all important affairs, than to "make use of the Cardinal's mediation." He observes that this Cardinal laboured under three or four defects, which rendered him incapable of business. 1. He loved his pleasures too much. 2. He forgot those material circumstances, which were the most proper to make an affair succeed. 3. He was too easily discouraged as soon as he found that any affair did in the least perplex the Pope's mind (11). These are certainly very great obstacles, which will almost constantly prevent the success of any negotiation, with which a person can be intrusted. This Cardinal grew wiser in time, for he supported his credit, and knew how to use it in the Conclaves at the head of those Cardinals, whom his uncle had raised to the purple. But he had been very well provided with money during his uncle's life; and when once a man has plenty of cash, he may intrude himself any where, and speak with authority, and he will never want a party ready to support him. Here follows what has been said of this Cardinal in a Book printed at Amsterdam (12). "There "are in Chigi's faction several Cardinals, who are "proper persons to be raised to the Papal Dignity; "they have at their head Flavio Chigi, a powerful "man who behaved himself with so much policy and "address since the death of his uncle Alexander VII, "that there has been already one Pope chosen, who "was devoted to him, because in the two last Con-"claves he did not insist with too much obstinacy, "to have one of his dependants chosen, but contented "himself with favouring the other factions, as much "as suited with his own interest: but Cardinal Bar-"berini, who did not act with the same policy, could "never get a Pope, who was indebted to him for "his exaltation." The History of the same Conclave, in which Clement IX was chosen, acquaints us, that Cardinal Chigi had no mind that Cardinal Rospiglioni should be chosen Pope; nor could the latter be chosen, till the former had been prevailed upon to give his consent. We read in the History of the Conclave of Clement X (13), that Cardinal Chigi had almost as much power under Clement IX, as he had under Alexander VII. This Cardinal had so much influence in the Conclave, in which Clement X was chosen, that Cardinal d'Este told him one day, Well, Cardinal Chigi, what business have we here? Why do not you give us a Pope (14)? And indeed Altieri would never have been chosen, had it not been for Cardinal Chigi's interest. Let us observe by the by, that in the Conclave, in which Clement IX was chosen, Cardinal d'Arach, the head of the Spanish faction, told Cardinal Chigi; That he was not very well versed in the present affairs; that this was the first Conclave, in which he happened to be, so that he could not have a great experience; and that before he undertook to manage such an important affair, he ought to render himself capable of it (15).

(10) Angelo Corraro, Relaz. della Corte Romana, pag. 17.

(11) E bene spesso divertito da suoi passo tempi, ò si scorda delle circostanza essentiali dell' affiare, che possono facilitare l'intento, ò cagliia alle prime perplessita che scuopre nel Papa. Ibid.

(12) Idée du Conclave present. (1676) pag. 74.

(13) By Amelot de la Houssaye, pag. 14.

(14) Mémoires des Intrigues de la Cour de Rome, printed at Paris in 1677, pag. 19.

(15) Conclave de Clement XI. printed at Paris in 1699, pag. 58.

and eighty thouſand crowns for her portion; was beautiful, and had been educated by a Lady of an eminent virtue (f). This match would perhaps have never been concluded, had not her uncle died; for though he had received with great civility the firſt propoſals that were offered to him, yet he aſked, what eſtate and dignities would be conferred upon Don Auguſtino. This was wavering, as though he had thought the Pope's alliance alone was not a ſufficient equivalent for the Lady. His Holineſs was not pleaſed with this proceeding; and beſides, the ſon of the Conſtable Colonna courted the young Lady, and ſhe liked him better than ſhe did Don Auguſtino. But Prince Marc Anthony Borgheſe dying, the match was immediately concluded by the interpoſition of the Princeſs of Roſſano [D], the Lady's mother. A marriage ſo advantageous on many accounts did not ſettle Don Auguſtino's affections [E]. The Pope bought for him the Principality of Farneſe, which is a Fief of the Empire, ſituated in St. Peter's Patrimony, and which coſt him a hundred and ſeventy thouſand crowns. SIGISMOND CHIGI Don Auguſtino's brother received ſeveral large penſions from Pope Alexander VII (g), and was made a Cardinal by Pope Clement IX, in the year 1667 (b).

(f) By her grand-mother.

(g) Taken from the Relation de la Cour de Rome, written by Angelo Corraro, Embaſſador of Venice, printed at Leyden in 1663. See alſo the Nepotiſme, Part 1. lib. 3.

(b) L'Idée du Conclave preſent, printed at Amſterdam in 1676.

We find in Angelo Corraro's account, which I have quoted, that this family began to raiſe itſelf at the Court of Rome under Pope Julius II; but this is a miſtake; for that family already made a conſiderable figure at Rome under Alexander VI [F].

[D] The Princeſs of Roſſano.] Her name was Donna Olympia Aldobrandina. She was the daughter of one of Clement VIII's nephews, and had married to her firſt huſband Prince Borgheſe. This Lady's ambition had been known a great while. She was very young when ſhe was left a widow, and being very beautiful, of a noble family, witty and rich, ſhe was courted by ſeveral Princes; but ſhe preferred Don Camillo Pamphilio before them all, and the reaſon of her choice was, that ſhe might have a ſhare in the government, he being Pope Innocent X's nephew. The ſame reaſon made her chooſe for her daughter the nephew of a Pope rather than the Conſtable Colonna (16). She did it only per guadegnar l'affetto della caſa pontificia, e per haver parte al Vaticano, che è tutto quello che ſempre hà cercato queſta Signora, i. e, "to "gain the love of the Pope's family, and to have "ſome credit in the Vatican, which was all that this "Lady ever aimed at." She was very much diſappointed under Pope Innocent X, for inſtead of enjoying a great credit at Court, as ſhe expected from her marriage with Don Camillo, ſhe was obliged to follow him into baniſhment. The inſtruction for the French Embaſſadors at Rome, which is aſcribed to the Bailli de Valençay, gives a very bad character of this Lady. "As God reſiſts proud and haughty perſons, thus this "Princeſs Roſſana finds herſelf depreſſed, humbled, "mortified and ſunk from that ſovereign grandeur "and high degree of glory, in which ſhe diſplayed "ſuch a pomp and oſtentation on the Theatre of that "noble and glorious City of Rome. And now, that "ſhe is far removed from that ſtage, ſhe mourns, and "takes no delight but in a ſad and fantaſtic humour, "being never pleaſed with the preſent ſtate of things, "ſhe calls imprudently to mind thoſe that are paſſed "and vaniſhed away long ago, and thoſe which may "happen hereafter. For my part . . . I cannot ima-"gine that this is capable of giving any real and con-"ſiderable trouble . . . , though this Lady ſhould now "confine her ambition within the narrow bounds of "her doors and chambers, inſtead of making it ap-"pear by a ridiculous and ſuperfluous oſtentation, in "every corner, and in all the public places and walks "of the city (17)." The Author of the Queen of Poland's Voyage (18), having mentioned the famous garden of the Aldobrandini's at Freſcati, which is very juſtly called Belvedere, continues thus (19). This place is now in the poſſeſſion of Prince Pamphilio the Pope's nephew, lately a Cardinal; as alſo of the Princeſs, heir to the houſe of Aldobrandini, whoſe firſt huſband, Prince Roſſano, the preſumptive heir and only hope of the family of the Borgheſes, died at that ſame place a few days before we arrived (20), being not yet twenty two years old, as well as ſhe; he left her with two ſons and two daughters. It is a great happineſs for that Cardinal, that he met ſo ſoon with ſuch an advantageous match, both with regard to riches and beauty; for ſhe is the moſt beautiful Princeſs and one of the moſt witty in the whole country.

(16) See the book intitled, Il Nepotiſmo, Part 1. lib. 3. pag. 143, 193.

(17) See the Recueil de diverſes Relations des Cours de l'Europe, Printed at Cologne 1681, pag. 332.

(18) Le Laboureur, Voyage de la Reine de Pologne, Part 3. pag. 222.

(19) Ibid. pag. 225.

(20) They arrived July the 18th 1646, and the Author publiſhed his Relation the following year.

[E] Marriage . . . did not ſettle Don Auguſtino's affections.] His wife had brought him immenſe riches; ſhe was beautiful, had had a very good education, and ſoon gave him children, and yet he muſt go and gratify his deſires abroad; what a ſhame! Eſſendo la ſpoſa di non ordinarie bellezze, e allevata ſotto la diſciplina dell' Ava, Signora di ſantiſſimi coſtumi, non reſtava che deſiderar piu in queſto genere di contentezze, e gia s'è cominciato à goderne i frutti, havendo la Principeſſa gia dato ſegno di fecundita co'l porto di una figliuola. Non reſta però che il Sig. D. Agoſtino non vada vagando in altri amori, come lo luſinga la ſua natura proclive al guſto del ſenſo, e la facilità di paſcerla quando gliene poſſa mai venir voglia (21). i. e. "His ſpouſe "was exceedingly beautiful, and had been educated "by her grandmother, a Lady of eminent virtue; ſo "that he ſeemed to have nothing more to wiſh for in "that reſpect to be perfectly ſatisfied; nay he had al-"ready begun to taſte the fruits of his marriage, for "the Lady had given him proofs that ſhe was not "barren, having been delivered of a daughter. And "yet Signor Auguſtino engaged in other amorous in-"trigues, being by his own temper inclined to ſenſual "pleaſures, and having eaſy opportunities to ſatisfy "his deſires whenever he pleaſed." He never was very nice with regard to the love he owed his ſpouſe; for ſoon after his wedding, he could not forbear ſaying, that he was more pleaſed with his marriage, on account of the victory he gained over his rival, than on account of the Princeſs her ſelf, whom he had married. When the Conſtable Colonna heard this, he anſwered, that his ſon courted this Lady, becauſe he deſerved to obtain her, but that Don Auguſtino obtained her by the credit and authority of his uncle the Pope. The Conſtable's ſon married ſome years after a niece of Cardinal Mazarin (22); it was a much better match for him, conſidering the Lady's portion, but it proved an unhappy match; the hiſtory of it has been publiſhed.

(21) Corraro, Relatione della Corte Romana, pag. 21.

(22) Taken from a book intitled Il Nepotiſmo, Part 1. lib. 3. pag. 194.

[F] This family made a conſiderable figure at Rome under Alexander VI.] Tomaſo Tomaſi obſerves in the Life of the Duke of Valentinois, that LORENZO CHIGI, a Nobleman of Sienna, was cruſhed under the ruins of a chimney in one of the rooms of the Vatican, which was blown down by a ſtorm on St. Peter's day (23). This ſtorm was like to prove fatal to Pope Alexander VI. The ſame Author adds (24) that when the Duke of Valentinois was making preparations for his expedition into Romagna in the year 1500, Auguſtino Chigi, Lorenzo's brother, one of the moſt wealthy and ſtately Gentlemen, that were then at Court (25), did not only lend him ſome thouſands of crowns, but even went ſo far as to cauſe all his plate, which was very conſiderable, to be melted, and coined into current money.

(23) Tomaſi, Life of the D. of Valentinois, pag. 302.

(24) Ibid. pag. 319.

(25) See the Remark [A].

CHIGI (FABIO) born at Sienna February the 16th 1599 (a), was Pope under the name of Alexander VII. His family ſeeing he was a hopeful youth ſent him young to Rome, where he ſoon engaged in a friendſhip with the Marqueſs Pallavicini (b), which proved very advantageous to him. For the Marqueſs recommended him ſo effectually

(a) Angelo Corraro, Relatione della Corte Romana.

(b) He has been ſince a Jeſuit and a Cardinal.

fectually to Pope Urban VIII, that he ſoon procured him the poſt of Inquiſitor at Malta. Chigi acquitted himſelf of that employment in ſuch a manner as ſhewed that he was capable of greater things; ſo that he was ſent Vice-Legate to Ferrara, and afterwards Nuncio into Germany (c). He met with the moſt favourable opportunity that a man in his character can wiſh for, to diſplay his intriguing genius; for he was a Mediator at Munſter in the long conferences which were held in that city in order to conclude a peace with Spain, and acted his part very well [A]. Before he went to Munſter he had been Nuncio at Cologne, and was ſent thither again in the ſame quality, when the peace was concluded. He was ſtill in the ſame poſt in 1651, when Cardinal Mazarine retired to the Court of the Elector of Cologne; our Chigi had even orders to complain in the name of Pope Innocent X, a great enemy of Cardinal Mazarin, that the Elector ſuffered his Eminence to raiſe troops (d). Cardinal Mazarin had ſome reſentment againſt Fabio Chigi, who ſoon after was made a Cardinal, and Secretary of State by Pope Innocent X; but this reſentment was ſacrificed to political views in 1655, when a Pope was to be choſen. Cardinal Saccheti, Mazarin's good friend, finding it was impoſſible for him to be raiſed into St. Peter's Chair, becauſe of the powerful oppoſition made by the Spaniſh faction, deſired Cardinal Mazarin to conſent to Fabio Chigi's exaltation; his requeſt was granted; and as ſoon as they knew in the Conclave how France was diſpoſed, all the friends of that Court united their votes in favour of Chigi. The flying ſquadron, who looked upon him as their chief man, could not but ſupport his intereſt: the faction of the Medicis, and that of Spain had particular reaſons to give him their votes; ſo that he was elected Pope (e) by the votes of all the ſixty four Cardinals, who were in the Conclave (f). There are but few inſtances of ſuch an unanimity in the Elections of Popes. Cardinal Chigi merited that day and the following years the encomium which the Duke de Guiſe paſſed on Innocent X. [B]. As it was known the day before the election, with what choice the Holy Ghoſt would inſpire the electors the next day, the Cardinals went to wiſh Chigi joy, but he anſwered them only with ſighs and tears (g), and begged of them, that they would chooſe better (b); afterwards he reſumed his courage, and thanked them for their good will. After the election he was carried, according to cuſtom, to St. Peter's Church, there to receive the Cardinals adoration upon the great altar; he would not be placed in the middle altar, but only on a corner of it, becauſe, he ſaid, he did not judge himſelf worthy to ſit in the place which his predeceſſors had filled. During the whole ceremony of the adoration, he continued proſtrate on the ground, a crucifix in his arms, with very great humility. When he was arrived at his apartment in the Vatican, he ordered, that they ſhould, firſt of all, make the coffin in which he was to be laid after his death, and put it under his bed, that the continual thoughts of death might more and more encourage him to lead a holy life. When they dreſſed him in his pontifical habits, they found a hair-cloth under his ſhirt. Being Pope he continued to faſt twice a week, as he uſed to do when he was but a Cardinal. The next day after his election he rebuked very ſeverely Signora Olympia, who was come to wiſh him joy, and told her, it was not decent for a woman to enter the palace of the Head of the Church. He forbid all his relations to come to Rome without his leave (i), but the following part of his Pontificate has ſhewed that all this was nothing but diſſimulation and artifice; and ſeveral Roman Catholics have not ſcrupled to complain of his deceitful proceedings. He became in time more favourable to his nephews [C], and loaded

(c) Angelo Corraro Relatione della Corte Romana.

(d) Conclave d'Aleſſandro VII. See alſo the Hiſtoire de la Paix des Pyrenées, by Gualdo Priorato.

(e) April the 8th 1655.

(f) See the Conclave of Alexander VII in Latin by JohnSchwarzkopfius, apud Heidegerum, Hiſtoriæ Papatus, pag. 404, &c.

(g) Egli da principio pianſe tenendo agl' occhi la mano, e doppo fattoſi animo ringratiava tutti del loro buon affetto. Conclave de Aleſſandro VII.

(b) Gratulationes excepit Chiſius profuſis lacrymis, ſubinde orans, ut digniorem alium eligerent. Heidegger, Hiſt. Papatus, pag. 406.

(i) Ex Conclavi Alexandri VII, apud Heidegerum, Hiſt. Papatus, pag. 406.

[A] He was a mediator at Munſter . . . and acted his part very well.] A modern Author obſerves, that the mediation of Denmark, which was at firſt accepted, for the peace of Munſter, having been afterwards rejected by the Swedes, "the whole mediation remained "in the hands of the Pope, and in ſome meaſure in "thoſe of the Republic of Venice: they made uſe of "the ability of Fabio Chiſi and Aloyſio Contarini to "compleat this glorious work. The former had a"mongſt other great talents, that of knowing per"fectly well how to hide his bad qualities, which he "did with ſuch admirable artifice, that the whole "College of the Cardinals did not know them till "they had choſen him Pope. The other was a man "of honour, who had acquitted himſelf in a great "many embaſſies with ſo much glory, that he gained "the reputation of one of the moſt able negotiators of "his time (1)." The Chevalier Angelo Corraro obſerves, that though Fabio Chigi could not ſupport effectually the intereſt of the Catholic Religion, becauſe the Proteſtants had a greater authority than the Catholics in the Aſſembly of Weſtphalia, yet he acquitted himſelf of his duty perfectly well (2), and had even the art not to loſe the regard and eſteem, which the Spaniards and the Imperialiſts had for him, though he had cenſured them very bitterly, for conſenting to a peace, which was ſo detrimental to the Catholic Church.

(1) Wicquefort, Traité de l'Ambaſſadeur, tom. 2. pag. 308, 309.

(2) Fece almeno le parti ſue egregeamente. Corraro, pag. 11.

[B] He merited the encomium which the Duke de Guiſe paſſed upon Innocent X.] "The things which "Cardinal Grimaldi told him, and Monſieur de "Fontenai's and the Abbot of St. Nicholas's manner "of negotiating with him, lay very heavy upon his "heart, and grieved him exceedingly; for they pub"liſhed every where, as he ſaid, that he was a de"ceitful knave, who neither could nor ought to be "truſted; this vexed and exaſperated him to ſuch a "degree, that the tears came into his eyes. Yet this "did not move me very much, for I knew perfectly "well, that he had his tears at command, and was a "very great hypocrite (3)."

(3) Mémoires du Duc de Guiſe, pag. 6. of the Paris edition, 1681, 12mo.

[C] He became in time more favourable to his nephews.] There never was a Pope, who better deſerved the Paſquil, Et homo factus eſt, i. e. "And was "made man," and who made a better advantage of what is called Nepotiſm. It is ſaid, I don't know how truly, that he had ſworn never to receive his relations at Rome, and that finding himſelf bound by his oath, he was perplexed how he ſhould teſtify his friendſhip for his family; but that Cardinal Palavicini removed his ſcruples, by adviſing him to go and receive his relations at ſome leagues diſtance from Rome, and that he gave him to underſtand, that his oath was not, that he would not receive his friends upon the road from Sienna to Rome, but only that he would not receive them at Rome; that the Pope admitting loaded them with favours, which proved a very great diſappointment to Father Paul's famous adverſary [D]. Moreri's aſſertion, that Alexander VII endeavoured with a truly paternal care to conclude a peace between France and Spain by the marriage of Lewis XIV with the Infanta, ought to be corrected [E]. He was alſo in the wrong to commend him on account of the pyramid, which was ſet up at Rome, after the injury which the Duke de Crequi received from the Corſes *. The Pope does not deſerve any praiſe for the ſatisfaction he made the French on this occaſion; for he did it againſt his will, and only in order to prevent a war, which would ſoon have obliged him to retire from Rome. France was never well convinced of his impartiality with regard to her; nor were the Spaniards this witty diſtinction, went to meet his relations, and received them juſt in the middle of the road. Since that time he poured down upon them in full ſhowers all kinds of dignities and benefices. Don Mario his brother was made Governor of the State of the Church; Flavio Chigi Don Mario's ſon was made Cardinal Patron. Sigiſmond Chigi, an orphan, and ſon to another brother of the Pope was loaded with penſions, till he was old enough to be made a Cardinal with ſome decency (4). Auguſtino Chigi (5), who was to be the ſupport of the family, was married to a niece of Prince Borgheſe, a very rich Lady. Auguſtinum futurum Chiſianæ familiæ columen, cui principis Borgheſii opulentiſſimam conjugem dote centum millium ducatorum, & viginti inſuper millibus duplionum loco margeritarum expenſis, denique ſexaginta millibus duplionum in manus ipſius ſponſi reſignatis impetravit (6). i. e. "He obtained for Auguſtino, who was to be the ſupport of the family of the Chigi's, a very rich ſpouſe, the niece of Prince Borgheſe: ſhe had a hundred thouſand ducats dowry, beſides twenty thouſand double ducats or piſtoles † in jewels, and threeſcore thouſand depoſited into the bridegroom's hand." A ſon of the Pope's ſiſter (7) was made a Cardinal, and the other, who was a Knight of Malta, was made General of the Gallies. Donna Berenice, Don Mario's wife, and her daughters received alſo very rich preſents (8). Flavio Chigi, who was Cardinal Patron, and had been ſent Legate a Latere into France, to make ſatisfaction for the affairs of the Corſes, expoſed his character very much in the world. He died (9) loaded with riches and titles, being Vice-Dean of the Sacred College, Biſhop of Porto, Arch-prieſt of St. John Lateran, Preſect of a Court for diſpatching of the Pope's Bulls, &c. He made Don Livio Chigi his nephew, his chief heir, and left ſix thouſand crowns, with the eſtate he had at Sienna to the Marquiſs Zandedari his brother-in-law, on condition that he ſhould take the name and coat-of-arms of the family of Chigi (10). See the Remark [B] of the preceding article.

* The Pope's Life-guard.

(4) Heideggerus, pag. 432. aſſerts, that he obtained the Cardinal's Cap from Alexander VII, at the age of 17, but I find it was not till the year 1667, by Clement IX, Alexander VII's ſucceſſor.

(5) Sigiſmond's brother.

(6) Heidegger, Hiſt. Pap. p. 432.

† This, I think, is the meaning of the Latin word Duplio.

(7) She had been married at Sienna to Mr. Bichi.

(8) Heidegger, Hiſt. Pap. pag. 432.

(9) September the 13th 1693, at the age of 63.

(10) Mercure Hiſt. for October 1693, pag. 364.

[D] . . . Which proved a very great diſappointment to Father Paul's famous adverſary.] I mean Sforza Pallavicini, the Author of an Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, deſigned to confute that of Father Paul, and for which Pallavicini was rewarded with a Cardinal's Hat. He had prefixed to his Hiſtory a very pompous elogium of Alexander VII, in which he did not ſpare his incenſe with regard to the reſolution, in which the Pope ſtill continued, not to ſuffer that his relation ſhould come to Rome. It is eaſy to gueſs, how many fine things could be ſaid upon ſuch a ſubject, which will abundantly furniſh a good Orator with reflexions for a moſt eloquent panegyrick. But it happened unluckily for father Pallavicini, that the Pope altered his mind, and deſired to raiſe his relations, according to the conſtant practice of Nepotiſm. It is even ſaid that this Father was obliged to remove the doubts and ſcruples of conſcience, which hindered the Pope from following his inclination. After all it was much more advantageous to oblige the Pope and his whole family, than to preſerve a Preface tho' already printed off, how fine ſoever the panegyrick it contained might be. This indeed, could not much pleaſe the Author, yet he was obliged to ſtoop to it, and to ſuppreſs all that had already appeared, and to alter his panegyrick as well as he could. If all this be not true, I am not to anſwer for it, but they from whom the Author I quote, borrowed it. Here follow his own words. Jamque Cardinalis Pallavicinus in ejus laudes effuſiſſimus Hiſtoriæ Concilii Tridentini galeatum prologum præfixerat, quo Alexandri ceu Angeli ἀκροσωπολήπτου heroicum iſthoc neglecti Nepotiſmi facinus tertium uſque in Cœlum tulit: quem tamen cum res aliùm longè eventum ſortita eſſet, non ſine pudore & impenſarum jactura (plurima enim folia jam impreſſa, laudes has fictitias ebuccinantia, ſupprimi debuerant) ceu abortivum fœtum tollere, & cum neſcio quo Epilogo operis (qui ipſe tamen poſt mortem Alexandri, ſaltem in Latina Editione Baptiſtæ Glattini, omiſſus etiam fuit) commutare neceſſe habuit (11). We have given the ſenſe of this paſſage, except only the laſt ſentence, in which we are told, "That Pallavi-"cini, inſtead of his fine panegyrick, was obliged to "add a kind of Epilogue or concluſion at the end of "his Book, which Epilogue has yet been left out after "the death of Alexander VII, at leaſt in the Latin E-"dition of Baptiſt Giattinus." This Author alſo aſſerts, that Pallavicini was Confeſſor to Alexander VII, and that he was a Cardinal before the Pope's relations came to Rome: but it is certain, that he was not promoted to the Cardinalſhip, but after his hiſtory was publiſhed; whence it appears from that Author's own account, that the Hiſtorian was made a Cardinal after the Pope had received his family at Rome. I do not believe, that any Pope ever had a Cardinal for his Confeſſor in ordinary, nor that Father Pallavicini ever was Confeſſor to Alexander VII (12), and yet the Author of the Nepotiſmo aſſerts it (13); perhaps it is only the better to ſet off the ſtory he intended to relate concerning this Jeſuit's Book. He does not ſay, that the Panegyrick was prefixed to the Hiſtory, but only that the Author had inſerted in ſeveral places ſome hints in praiſe of the Pope, relating to his reſolution, not to give his relations the liberty to come to Rome. There were above twenty ſheets, which contained ſomething of this nature, and which for that reaſon muſt be reprinted. This ſtory ſeems to me more probable than the other.

(11) Heidegger, Hiſt. Pap. pag. 431.

(12) In order to be better informed of this, I have conſulted a perſon, who could know it perfectly well, and who anſwered me, that F. Pallavicini never was Confeſſor to Pope Alexander VII.

(13) Il Nepotiſmo, Part 1. lib. 3. pag. m. 19 & 176. See alſo Il Sindicato d'Aleſſandro VII, pag. 83, &c.

[E] Moreri's aſſertion . . . . ought to be corrected.] Nothing in the Pyrenean peace drew the public's attention ſo much, as this circumſtance, namely, that it was concluded without the Pope's mediation. There were ſome Cardinals, who gave their vote to Fabio Chigi, only becauſe they hoped he would do his beſt endeavours to procure a peace between the two Kingdoms (of France and Spain), and that he would ſucceed better in it than any other perſon. And yet things took ſuch a different turn (I quote the words of Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato (14)) that ſeveral perſons ſaid, this peace was a diſgrace to the Holy See, and that it was cenſured even at Rome. And indeed it was looked upon as an effect of the great care and diligence of the two Prime Miniſters alone, who concluded it at a time when the Pope did no longer labour to procure it, and perhaps did not think any more of it. I own, that Priorato adds (15), that Alexander VII, in the very beginning of his Pontificate, acquitted himſelf with a great zeal, of the duties of a common Father, in order to prevail upon the two Kings to come to an agreement, and even to make them conſent that the conferences be held at Rome in his preſence. But Priorato alſo ſays, that when Father Donnelli a Jeſuit, was negotiating the peace with the Pope, by Cardinal Mazarin's order, his Holineſs ſhewed ſuch a diſtruſt and ſuch a coldneſs as was ſufficient to excuſe France, if ſhe did not admit him in the treaty of peace (16). He was not named in the preamble of the articles of the treaty, which vexed him very much; and it has even been known, that Cardinal Mazarin was inclined not to mention the Pope at all in the whole treaty. The miſunderſtanding, which had for ſome time ſubſiſted between them, was encreaſed becauſe the peace had been concluded, without the mediation of the Court of Rome, and this is the reaſon why the Pope was ſorry for this peace: "So that the Cardinal uſed to ſay "ſometimes

(14) Priorato, Hiſtoire de la Paix, pag. 119. of the edition of Cologne, 1667.

(15) Ibid. pag. 120.

(16) Ibid. pag. 125.

Spaniards always pleaſed with his conduct [F]. I muſt obſerve, as a very ſingular thing, that it is aſſerted in ſome printed books, that he had once a mind to forſake his Religion, and to turn Proteſtant [G]. The news-papers printed in Holland beſtowed great

" ſometimes in his private converſations, that not-
" withſtanding the comfort he found in the general
" peace, yet he was ſorry to ſee that his Holineſs did " not rejoice at it; and the Pope in his turn might " have made uſe of the Spaniſh Proverb, If the mira-
" cle be but done, no matter whether God or the Devil
" does it (17)." Let us conclude from all this, that Moreri did not much reflect upon what he related. If he had read Angelo Corraro's account, he would not have ſo much extolled the aſſiſtance, which the Pope gave to the Venetians for the war of Candia: For the Author of that account complains of two things; 1. That the Pope refuſed all the favours, that might be of ſome uſe in the war againſt the Turks; 2. That he was not in the leaſt zealous to procure a peace between the two Kingdoms. Chi haverebbe mai penſato, che un Cardinale, che prima anche d'eſſere Cardinale, ſpirava tutto zelo, e monſtrava di languire ſu la conſideratione dello ſtato miſerabile, in che ſi andava reducendo il mondo Chriſtiano con una guerra coſi obſtinata tra le maggiori corone di eſſo, non doveſſe aſſunto al pontificato infervorarſi per la pace univerſale (18), i. e. " Who " would have thought, that a Cardinal, who be" fore he was a Cardinal was all zeal, and ſeemed to
" ſigh, when he conſidered the wretched condition,
" to which the whole Chriſtian World was likely to
" be reduced, by ſuch an obſtinate war between the " two moſt powerful Kingdoms, would not have been " more zealous ſtill to procure a general peace when " he was Pope?"

(17) Ibid. pag. 124.

(18) Corraro, pag. 13.

[F] The Spaniards were not always pleaſed with his conduct.] Mr. de Wicquefort will furniſh me with a proof of this, in the following words: " Don Pedro
" d'Arragon, the Spaniſh Embaſſador at Rome in the " year 1665, having dropt ſome angry expreſſions a-
" gainſt the Court, which favoured the King of Por-
" tugal with regard to the Churches of that Kingdom,
" Pope Alexander VII, who had been acquainted with
" it, told him that he was a wicked man, and a Mi-
" niſter uncapable to ſerve his Maſter. The Embaſ-
" ſador replied, that the Pope was in the right, to " accuſe him of negligence and incapacity, ſince he " condeſcended not to obey the King's orders, when " they treated, to his prejudice, with the Miniſter of " Portugal. That the Pope by his reproach upbraid-
" ed him alſo at the ſame time with his good-nature;
" but that he was in the wrong to call him a wicked
" man, ſince he on the contrary could with more ju-
" ſtice ſay, that Fabio Chigi was a wicked man, ſince
" he forced him to execute the orders of the King his " Maſter, and to deſire the College of the Cardinals to " conſider, whether it was better for the Holy See to " do ſomething for four Biſhopricks of Portugal, than
" to hazard an hundred and thirty Biſhoprics and ſixty
" Abbeys in Spain. The Pope told him alſo, that the " Aſſemblies he held at his houſe, were very danger" ous, and might expoſe the City to be plundered.
" The Embaſſador anſwered, that if that were his de" ſign, he had only to retire from Rome, with all
" the ſubjects of the King his Maſter, and that they,
" who would remain in the city, not finding where-
" withal to ſubſiſt, would ſoon raiſe the diſturbance,
" which was not to be dreaded from him (19)."

(19) De l'Ambaſſadeur, tom. 2. pag. 168.

[G] It is aſſerted in ſome printed Books, that he had once a mind . . . to turn Proteſtant.] The Book which acquaints me with this particular is a journey into Switzerland printed in the year 1686 at Geneva, tho' it be ſaid in the title-page, at the Hague by Peter du Glaſſon. The Author of this Journey is Mr. Labrune, a French Miniſter, who fled into Holland for his Religion. I ſhall quote what he relates concerning the Religion of Alexander VII; this cannot but belong to this Dictionary; if it be true it belongs to this work in as much as it is an hiſtorical work; if it be falſe, it belongs to it as a critical Dictionary. " Fabio
" Chigi was ſent Inquiſitor to Malta, Vice-Legate to " Ferrara, and laſtly Nuncio to Cologne, when the " Peace of Munſter was negotiating. The affairs of " the Princes of Europe were happily brought to a
" concluſion, after a negociation which laſted two " years, at Munſter and at Oſnabrug. Chigi, who " had been ſent thither Nuncio from the Pope, and " who was obliged to converſe every day with the Pro-
" teſtant Princes or with their Miniſters (20), got ſome
" notion of their Religion, and tho' he had publiſhed
" about the ſame time under the fictitious name of one
" Erneſtus de Euſebiis that famous Judicium Theologi-
" cum, in which the Proteſtants are very much abuſed,
" yet he remained convinced, that there is nothing
" heretical in their doctrine. But he did not go far" ther. Count Pompey, one of his neareſt relations
" in Italy, opened his eyes entirely. This Count
" lived in Germany upon an eſtate which fell to " him by his mother's ſide . . . . Chigi . . . . .
" would not return to Rome before he had ſeen
" this relation. . . . He went therefore to him with " his two nephews, whom he brought with him to
" Cologne, and ſpent the whole winter with his rela" tion. . . . They talked of Religion, and after ſeve-
" ral converſations upon that ſubject, they reſolved to " read the Bible with Mr. Diodati's Notes. The " Count had already read thoſe learned Notes, and
" even knew by heart the moſt remarkable of them.
" They both made ſeveral reflections, and were ſur-
" prized to find themſelves convinced at every turn.
" They were puzzled what courſe to take, and after a " mature conſideration . . . they agreed, that the Pro-
" teſtant Religion was true, and Chigi promiſed im" mediately to his friend, that he would forſake
" his errors as ſoon as he had given an account of " his proceedings as Nuncio, and would go and meet
" him again at his houſe, entreating him to abjure
" the Roman Religion immediately, ſince by the grace
" of God he knew the truth and was free. Chigi
" went away with his nephews, firmly determined to " quit the Court of Rome, and never wrote to the " Count, but he exhorted him to perform his deſign.
" His journey was longer than he expected, becauſe
" one of his nephews fell ſick, and at laſt died. In " the mean time Count Pompey made the neceſſary
" preparation to perform his deſign. . . . He went to " Orange, and there openly profeſſed our Religion.
" He was even ſome time at Nimes, where he made " himſelf known. This converſion made a great noiſe
" in the world, and even too much; for as he was " on his return into Germany, he was poiſoned at " Lyons, where he died. This news vexed Chigi to " the heart; the Count's death . . . diſappointed all
" his deſigns: he thought that he might have the ſame
" fate; he had no place now where to retire; but
" whilſt he was thus wavering . . . he was made Car-
" dinal and firſt Secretary to the Apoſtolic Chamber.
" This was ſufficient to ſmother in Chigi's heart all
" the principles of truth, which were not yet deeply " rooted. The ſplendor of the purple dazzled his " eyes. . . . he was choſen Pope by thoſe artifices
" which all the world has heard of. As ſoon as he " had been made a Cardinal, he affected to be always
" ſick, he ordered his apartment to be furniſhed all
" in black, and had a coffin, and the head of a dead
" corpſe (21). . . He was a Calviniſt in his heart: in " vain did he endeavour to hide it in the affair of the " Janſeniſts, it was eaſily diſcovered notwithſtanding
" all his artifices. During his Pontificate they print" ed ſeveral Books in Flanders, in which he was " charged with hereſy: All the world has ſeen theſe
" Books. Mr. Amiraut had once a converſation with " the Duke of Longueville at his Grace's ſeat called
" Du Pleſſis-Belleau (22), which agrees perfectly well
" with what I have been ſaying. Mr. Amiraut was " a ſincere man. He related that the Duke, whom " he had the honour to ſee very often, told him, that " when he was Plenipotentiary at Munſter on the part " of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, he had been perfectly " well acquainted with the Pope, (who was in St. Pe" ter's Chair when that converſation was held) and
" that he was very much inclined to a Reformation;
" ſo that if the Huguenots would but yield ſomething,
" there never was a fairer opportunity to reunite the " two parties in the ſame Religion, ſince they might " be ſure that the Head of the Church would not be
" againſt them."

(20) Mr. de Wicquefort in the 1ſt vol. of his Ambaſſadeur, pag. 648. ſays, that this Nuncio declared, he would not in the leaſt converſe with Heretics, and that he was Mediator only of the Roman Catholic Princes. Mr. De Wicquefort calls this a ſtrange and fantaſtical caprice in Fabio Chigi, and in thoſe who employ'd him. He oppoſes this conduct to that of Berilaqua, Nuntio at the Conferences of Nimeguen, who was ſo far from diſliking to confer with the Miniſters of the Proteſtant Princes and States, that he even offered to make the firſt ſteps in point of civility, if they would but promiſe to anſwer them. Angelo Corraro alſo ſays, that Chigi did not in the leaſt converſe with the Proteſtant Embaſſadors. Con i quali riſpetti egli eſſere Miniſtro di chi era, non potera havere communicatione. But the Author del' Sindicato d'Aleſſandro VII, pag. 36. ſays the contrary.

(21) Heidegger, Hiſt. Pap. pag. 411. does not mention the Coffin, but with regard to the time, after Chigi's exaltation; and as to the time before that, he only ſays, that Chigi uſed to lye upon the ground, and to faſt twice a week.

(22) Compare this with the Remark [D] of the Article AMYRAUT; and ſee, whether different facts are not blended together in theſe accounts.

I am great encomiums upon him [H], and acquainted the public, that he did not approve the cruel perſecutons of the Waldenſes in the Principality of Piedmont. People have talked very much of what he ſaid to ſome Proteſtant Gentlemen who would kiſs his toe [I]. Some Authors have aſſerted, not without finding ſome myſtery in it, that he was related to the Grand Signior Mahomet IV [K]. This particular is much more extraordinary than

I am perſuaded that the Author of this Account will not take it amiſs, if I acquaint my readers with what Mr. Amyraut's ſon told me to clear up this matter. He has aſſured me, that he had not the leaſt knowledge of any converſation, which his father is ſaid to have had with the Duke of Longueville concerning the Nuncio Chigi or Pope Alexander VII. That it is true indeed the Duke had a ſeat three leagues diſtant from Saumur, but that this ſeat was not called le Pleſſis-Belleau, but Monſtrepil-Bellai (23). When he went to that ſeat he never failed to ſend his compliments to Mr. Amyraut, who on his part went very punctually to pay his reſpects to the Duke, and was always very well received: ſo that his Highneſs muſt be added to the great Lords, who had a great eſteem for this Miniſter (24). Now ſince Mr. Amyraut the ſon never heard any thing of the Duke of Longueville's diſcourſe concerning Pope Alexander VII, we may infer from thence, without the leaſt heſitation, that Mr. Amyraut the father did not learn any ſuch thing in his converſations with the Duke. We have then here an inſtance, which ſhows, how much we ought to miſtruſt thoſe ſtories, which are grounded only upon hear-ſays. I am perſuaded, that by this time the Author of the Journey into Switzerland is fully convinced, that a man ought to be carefully upon his guard againſt ſuch ſorts of traditions.

(23) He ſold it to Marſhal de la Meilleraye.

(24) See the Text of the Article AMYRAUT.

[H] The News-Papers printed in Holland beſtowed great encomiums upon him.] I find this in a Letter which Courcelles (Curcellæus), Profeſſor of the Remonſtrance at Amſterdam, wrote to Sorbiere December the 24th, 1655 (25). I will not deny, ſays he, but Alexander VII deſerved a great part of the commendations, which the public beſtows upon him. The News-Writers at Amſterdam, who are not ſo much uſed to ſing the praiſes of the Popes, as the Gazetteers of Paris often do, have told us ſo many good things of this Pope, that there muſt be ſome truth in them. They have even teſtified, that he diſapproved the cruel manner in which the poor Vaudois have lately been treated in the Valleys of Piedmont, ſaying, that this was not a proper method to bring back thoſe, that go aſtray into the Pale of the Church. If it be true, that this Pope diſapproved the Duke of Savoy's conduct, the Vaudois have much more reaſon to boaſt of it, than the Reformed in France had to boaſt of the judgment, which Innocent X is ſaid to have paſſed upon the perſecution, which they ſuffered; for this Pope's reſentment againſt the Court of France might alone have made him ſay, that he did not like that method of converting heretics.

(25) It was firſt printed by itſelf in 8vo; and you will find it in the Præſtantium ac eruditorum Virorum Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ, pag. 876. of the folio edition 1684.

[I] People have talked very much of what he ſaid to ſome Proteſtant Gentlemen who would kiſs his toe.] Sorbiere (26) in his Anſwer to a Letter, in which it had been written to him, that his journey to Rome would make him return to the Proteſtant Church, declared, that he did not meet with any thing at Rome, but what proved very much to his edification, and that notwithſtanding the pomp of that Court, they are all very civil and modeſt. For my part, continues he, I can aſſure you, Sir, that I did not obſerve in any of the Prelates, with whom I had the honour to converſe, ſo much pride and haughtineſs, as is obſervable in ſome Miniſters of our acquaintance, and that in every audience I had of our holy Father, I ſpoke to him with the ſame freedom, as I do to you, ſuch being his goodneſs, that he requires this freedom from all thoſe who approach him. And here I muſt acquaint you with a very remarkable circumſtance, which you will not be ſorry to know. Some time before I left Rome, there were in that city ſome Engliſh Gentlemen, who were deſirous to know by their own experience what I tell you of his Holineſs's affability; they mixed with thoſe, who went to pay their reſpects to the Pope on their knees. The Pope aſked them who they were, and afterwards whether they were not Proteſtants, which they owned. Whereupon his Holineſs told them with a ſmiling countenance, " Get up then, I will not ſuffer you " to commit, what in your opinion is an act of ido- " latry. I ſhall not give you my bleſſing, ſince you " do not believe me to be, what I am; but I will pray " to God, that he will pleaſe to render you capable of " receiving it."

(26) His Letter is printed with that of Courcelles in 8vo.

A famous Proteſtant Controverſiſt does not relate this ſtory well. Here follow his own words; I take them from page 158 of his Anſwer (27) to a Book of Mr. Brueys. " I muſt refer Monſieur Brueys to a new " convert like himſelf: I mean Sorbiere, who obſerves " ſome where, that ſome Engliſh Gentlemen being at " Rome, had a mind to ſee Pope Alexander VII, to ſa- " lute him and to kiſs his toe. The Pope having been " acquainted that they were Engliſh, be (28) aſked them " of what Religion they were. They were afraid, " and ſcrupled to own that they were Proteſtants. But " Alexander VII having removed their fear, they " owned what they were. Whereupon he told them; " conſidering the Religion you are of, your conſcience " will not ſuffer you to do me homage by kiſſing my " toe. I do not receive it as a Temporal Prince of " Rome, which is the only title you acknowldge in " me: I receive it as Jeſus Chriſt's Vicar, and you " do not think me ſuch. I ſhall pray God to convert " you, and I give you my bleſſing; but till you be " enlightened from above, I do not require you to do " any thing out of complaiſance, againſt your Religi- " on and your inclination. I do not know whether " Sorbiere invented this ſtory, to extol Alexander VII's " glory; however that be, theſe are ſentiments which " become an honeſt man, and this is the rule, by " which we ought to conduct our ſelves in matters " relating to Religion." It is eaſily obſerved, by comparing theſe two accounts together, that our Controverſiſt never read Sorbiere's Letter, or at leaſt, that he did not look into it, when he was writing his Anſwer to Mr. Brueys. He had heard the ſtory mentioned, and took upon him to embelliſh it. But this is not prudently done; we ought to miſtruſt our memory. When a ſtory is thus falſified in two circumſtances, firſt that the Engliſh Gentlemen were afraid, ſecondly that the Pope gave them his bleſſing, it may alſo be eaſily falſified in other circumſtances; and it is great odds, if it be not altered in ſome material point. I could make here a great many reflections upon the fate of controverſial Writers, but they would not be in their proper place. When the Author of the Preſervative commended the maxims of Alexander VII, he did not foreſee, that he ſhould ſome time be engaged to write upon the ſubject of an erroneous conſcience, and lay down ſuch principles, according to which the Pope would have been very much in the wrong to prevent the adoration of the Engliſh Gentlemen.

(27) It is intitled, Suite du Preſervatifs contre le Changement de Religion, at the Hague 1683. It was written by Monſieur Jurieu.

(28) This be is a Barbariſm ſays Mr. Bayle; and it is ſo in Engliſh as well as in French; but Mr. Bayle would, no doubt, have paſſed it unobſerved in any other writer, but Mr. Jurieu.

[K] Some Authors have aſſerted, . . . that he was related to the Grand Seignior Mahomet IV.] As I have not the Book in which this is proved, I can only preſent the reader with the following words of Mr. Heidegger. Mahometem eo ipſo tempore Imperatorem Turcicum quinto gradu conſanguinitatis ex Alano Moruglio, communi ſtirpe & atavo utriuſque parentis Pontifici & Turcici, peſſimo utique omine contigit, uti quidem Paſtorius in Henninge redivivo, pag. 157, demonſtravit (29). i. e. " Mahomet, who was then Emperor of the " Turcs, was related to him (Alexander VII) in the " fifth degree of conſanguinity; they being deſcended " from Allen Morugli (Nani Marſili, I ſuppoſe is " meant here) the common ſtock of the two families, " and great grandfather both to the Pope and to the " Grand Seignior, which was a very ill omen, as Pa- " ſtorius ſhews in his Henning revived, page 157."

(29) Heidegg. Hiſt. Papatus, pag. 413.

I met lately with a Book, in which the relation between Alexander VII and the Grand Seignior is repreſented in a genealogical Table. It is there pretended, that Margaret Marſili, daughter to Nani Marſili, a Nobleman of Sienna, was wife of Soliman, and mother of Selim II, whoſe ſon Amurath III was the father of Mahomet IV. This laſt was the father of Achmet I, who was the father of Amurath IV, whoſe ſon Ibrahim was Mahomet IVth's father. On the other hand Leonardo Marſili, Margaret's brother, had a ſon named than that which I shall now mention, namely, that Alexander VII was an Author [L]: there is a volume of his Poems extant. He loved the Belles-Lettres, and to talk with learned men upon Poetry, History, and Politics. He was very fond of stately buildings; it was not his fault that the City of Rome was not rendered equally beautiful and regular, with regard to the streets, public places, and houses: the misfortune was, that these expences intirely exhausted the Apostolic Chamber, and that the pulling down of several houses, which rendred the streets irregular, ruined the Proprietors of them (k). There is something very grand in the plan of the College della Sapienza which he finished, and which he adorned with a very fine Library. The Consistorial Advocates drew up a very pompous inscription for him on this occasion (l). He died May the 22d 1667, much more regretted by the Jesuits than by the Jansenists.

(k) Angelo Corraro, Relatione di Corte Romana.

(l) Spizelius has given it in his Dissert. Prælim. Speciminis Bibliothecæ Universalis. See F. Mabillon's Musæum Italicum, tom. 1. pag. 150.

ed Cæsar Marsili, who was the father of Alexander Marsili, and of Laura Marsili the mother of Fabio Chisi, who has been Pope under the name of Alexander VII. The Author to whom I refer (30), quotes Francis Niger's account of the taking of a certain castle in the territory of Sienna; the Corsairs, who plundered that castle about the year 1525, found Margaret Marsili there, and because she was very beautiful, they kept her for Soliman.

(30) Joh. Ulricus Wallichius in Tractatu de Religione Turcica, Mahometis Vita, & Orientalis cum Occidentali Antichristo comparatione, pag. 329, & seq.

[L] Alexander VII was an Author.] The most beautiful edition of his Latin Poems is that which was printed at the Louvre in the year 1656, in folio; it contains epic, elegiac and lyric Poems; these last are in greater number than the former. It also contains a Tragedy intitled Pompey; the Author composed it towards the end of the Campain in 1621. He took Seneca for his model, as well with regard to the whole order and disposition of the Drama, as to the measure of the verse. There is a letter prefixed to this collection, which acquaints us, that the Author could hardly be prevailed upon to print his Poems, and would not suffer that they should be published under his name, or with any other title, but such an one as might hint they were the production of his younger years (31). And yet he did not make them all in his youth; for there are a great many pieces, which he wrote when he was grown a man, and in great employments. It is worth the while to read the pages 65 and 66 of Mr. Kortholt's (32) Treatise de Poetis Episcopis, (of Poets who were Bishops). Printed at Kiel in 1699. Borrichius observes, that Pope Urban VIII had more talents for Poetry, both natural and acquired by study, than Alexander VII, but that the latter laboured his Poems more carefully than the former (33). He finds something harsh and rough in the epic verses, in which he describes his journey from Rome to Ferrara, from Ferrara to Cologne, and from Malta to Rome. This is but a part of his description of his journeys; for he also describes that from Cologne to Munster, from Munster to Aix-la-Chapelle, from Aix-la-Chapelle to Treves, &c. If all the praises, which the Authors of poetical Elogiums (34) bestowed upon this Pope's Poems, were well grounded, we should be forced to acknowledge, that he was the most accomplish'd Poet that ever was. But as they were in the number of those Poets, who lived at Rome under this Pope, we ought not to lay too much stress upon their encomiums (35). I dare not assert, that he was the Author of a work, which was published in 1646, with this title, Judicium Theologicum super quæstione, an pax, qualem desiderant Protestantes, sit secundum se illicita. . . . Opera ac studio Erneſti de Eusebiis, i. e. "The opinion of "a Divine upon this question, whether a peace, such "as the Protestants desire, be in its own nature unlawful. By Ernest Eusebius." I only think, that it was printed by his orders and directions. He endeavoured to prove in this piece, that such a peace, as the Protestants insisted upon, was so detrimental to the Catholic Church, that the Emperor could not with a safe conscience consent to it. But all these Remonstrances proved unsuccessful. They were obliged to grant to the Protestants a thousand things, which vexed the Court of Rome exceedingly, and against which the Nuncio Chigi protested with a terrible passion, shaking off the dust of his feet. The Pope thundered out a Bull in the same style against the Peace of Munster; but all this was only time and paper lost. I must observe in this place, that there are in the Library of Cardinal Chigi several manuscripts adorned with Notes in Alexander VII's own hand, and a very large collection of authentic Acts and Records drawn up and compiled by this Pope; which shews how much he applied himself to study (36). The Book, in which I have read this (37) acquaints me with another particular, which shews this Pope's inclination for learning. He had invited to Rome three Dutch Booksellers, who imposed upon him in a very base manner, with regard to the Polyglot Bible of Paris; for they made him believe it was a new edition, which they undertook under his protection and in honour to him; they printed a new title to it, with a Dedication as full of flattery, as tho' true Roman Catholics had wrote it. But they could not hide their artifice a long time. Ab ultimis Belgarum Urbem Dominam, sedem vestram Romanam divinarum literarum sarcina instructi magis quam onusti, multiplici sanctitatis vestræ ILLICIO, ceu potentiore quodam magnete fortiter suaviterque PROTRACTI, anhelis non tam fatigatione, quam exultatione animis passibusque subintramus desideratissime terris & nobis, Pontifex maxime (38). The new title was, BIBLIA ALEXANDRINA HEPTAGLOTTA, Auspiciis S. D. Alexandri VII anno sessionis ejus XII feliciter inchoato.

(31) The title is Philomathi Musæ juveniles.

(32) Sebastian.

(33) Borrich. de Poet. Lat. pag. 108.

(34) They are printed at the end of the edition of Philomathi Musæ Juveniles.

(35) See Baillet, Jugem. sur les Poetes, tom. 5. num. 1506, and 1527.

(36) See Mabillon, Musæum, Ital. tom. 1. pag. 94.

(37) Mabillon, ibid. pag. 99.

(38) Idem, ibid.

CHILLINGWORTH (WILLIAM) (a), an eminent Divine of the Church of England, was son of William Chillingworth Citizen, and afterwards Mayor of Oxford, and was born in St. Martin's parish there in October 1602, and on the last of that month received baptism there (b). William Laud, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, and then Fellow of St. John's College, and Master of Arts (c), was his godfather (d). He became a Scholar of Trinity College under the tuition of Mr. Robert Skinner June 2d 1618, being then about two years standing in the University; and going thro' with ease the classes of Logic and Philosophy was admitted Master of Arts in the latter end of 1623, and Fellow of his College the 10th of June 1628 (e). "He was then, says "Mr. Wood (f), observed to be no drudge at his study, but being a man of great parts "would do much in a little time, when he settled to it." He did not confine his studies to Divinity, but applied himself with great success to Mathematics; and what shews the extent of his genius, he was esteemed likewise a good Poet (g) [A]. His intimate friends were Sir Lucius Cary, afterwards Viscount Falkland; Mr. John Hales of Eton, &c. but more particularly Mr. Gilbert Sheldon, who succeeded Dr. Juxon in the See of Canterbury

(a) We have a very accurate account of this great man by Mr. Des Maizeaux in his Historical and Critical Account of the Life and Writings of William Chillingworth, Chancellor of the Church of Sarum, printed at London 1725, in 8vo.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 40. 2d edit. Lond. 1721.

(c) Diary of the Life of Archbishop Laud, published by Mr. Wharton, pag. 1, 2.

(d) Wood, col. 42.

(e) Idem, col. 40.

(f) Ibid.

(g) Des Maizeaux, ubi supra, pag. 2.

[A] He was esteemed likewise a good Poet.] Sir John Suckling mentions him in his Sessions of the Poets (1).

There Selden, and he sate hard by the chair;
Weniman not far off, which was very fair;
Sands with Townsend, for they kept no order;
Digby and Shillingsworth a little further.

(1) Fragmenta aurea. A Collection of all the incomparable pieces written by Sir John Suckling, &c. Lond. 1646, pag. 7.

Canterbury in 1663 (b). The ſtudy and converſation of the Univerſity Scholars at that time turned chiefly upon the controverſies between the Church of England and that of Rome; and the great liberty, which had been allowed the Popiſh Miſſionaries in the latter end of the reign of King James I, being continued under King Charles I, upon the account of his marriage with Henrietta, daughter (i) to Henry IV of France, there was among them a famous Jeſuit, who went under the name of John Fiſher (k), and was very buſy in making converts, particularly at Oxford; and attacking Mr. Chillingworth upon the neceſſity of an infallible living judge in matters of faith [B], the latter forſook the Communion of the Church of England, and with an incredible ſatisfaction of mind embraced the Romiſh Religion, and ſoon after wrote a letter to his friend Mr. Gilbert Sheldon [C], wherein he recommended to his conſideration the chief arguments which had prevailed with himſelf, and invited him to follow his example. Mr. Fiſher, in order to ſecure his conqueſt, perſuaded Mr. Chillingworth to go over to the College of the Jeſuits at Doway; and the latter was deſired to ſet down in writing the motives or reaſons, which had engaged him to embrace the Romiſh Religion. But Dr. Laud, then Biſhop of London, hearing of this affair, and being extremely concerned at it, wrote to him, and Mr. Chillingworth's anſwer expreſſing a great deal of moderation, candour, and impartiality, that Prelate continued to correſpond with him [D], preſſing him with ſeveral arguments againſt the doctrine and practice of the Romaniſts. This ſet Mr. Chillingworth upon a new enquiry, which had the deſired effect. But the place where he was not being ſuitable to the ſtate of a free impartial inquiry, he reſolved to come back to England, and left Doway in 1631, after a ſhort ſtay there (l). Upon his return to England he was received with great kindneſs and affection by Biſhop Laud, who approved his deſign of retiring to Oxford, (of which that Prelate was then Chancellor,) in order to complete the important work, in which he was engaged, a free inquiry into Religion (m). At laſt after a thorough examination, the Proteſtant principles appearing to him the moſt agreeable to the Holy Scripture and Reaſon, he declared for them (n); and about the year 1634 wrote a confutation of the motives which had induced him to go over to the Church of Rome [E]. As in his forſaking the Church of England, as well as in his return to it, he was ſolely influenced by a ſincere love of truth, ſo he conſtantly perſevered in that divine temper of mind; and even after his return to Proteſtantiſm, he made no ſcruple to examine the grounds of it, as appears by a letter of his to Dr. Sheldon containing ſome ſcruples he had about leaving the Church of Rome, and returning to (b) Idem, pag. 3.

(i) There is an error of the preſs in Mr. Des Maizeaux's Life of Mr. Chillingworth, pag. 3. where ſhe is called ſiſter to Henry IV.

(k) His true name was John Perſe or Percey. See Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jeſu. Opus.. recognitum & productum ad annum Jubilæi 1675 à Nathanaele Sotvello ejuſdem Societatis Presbytero, pag. 487, 488. edit. Romæ 1676.

(l) Des Maizeaux, pag. 9.

(m) Idem, pag. 13.

(n) Idem, pag. 14, 15, 16.

[B] Attacking Mr. Chillingworth upon the neceſſity of an infallible living Judge in matters of Faith.] Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves (2), that "this hath always "been the darling topic of the Romaniſts, and is "perhaps the ſtrongeſt battery they can raiſe againſt "the Proteſtants (3)." Mr. Chillingworth found himſelf unable to anſwer the arguments of the Jeſuit, nor could he be ſatisfied with the ſolutions which were given him by thoſe of our learned Divines, to whom he propoſed the ſaid arguments. And being among other things convinced of the neceſſity of an infallible living judge of controverſies, he was eaſily brought to believe, that this infallible judge was in the Church of Rome, and that therefore the Church of Rome muſt be the true Church, and the only Church, in which men could be ſaved (14).

(2) Hiſtorical and Critical Account of the Life and Writings of William Chillingworth, Chancellor of the Church of Sarum, pag. 6, 7.

(3) Mr. Armand de la Chapelle, in his Biblioth. Angloiſe, tom. 13. Part 2. pag. 445. had made ſome Reflections upon this paſſage of Mr. Des Maizeaux.

(4) Des Maizeaux, pag. 7.

[C] Wrote a Letter to his friend Mr. Gilbert Sheldon.] It was as follows (5): "Good Mr. Sheldon. "Partly mine own neceſſities and fears, and partly "charity to ſome others, have drawn me out of London into the countrey. One particular cauſe, and "not the leaſt, was the news of your ſickneſs, which "had I found it had continued with you with any "danger, no danger of my own ſhould have kept me "from you. I am very glad to hear of your recovery, but ſorry that your occaſions do draw you ſo "ſuddenly to London. But, I pray, leave a direction "with Charles Green, where you may be ſpoken "with, and how I may ſend to you, and you ſhall "very ſhortly hear further from me. Mean while "let me intreat you to conſider moſt ſeriouſly of theſe "two quæries: I. Whether it be not evident from Scripture, and Fathers, and Reaſon, from the goodneſs of God, and the neceſſity of mankind, that there muſt be ſome one Church infallible in matters of Faith? "II. Whether there be any other ſociety of men in the world, beſides the Church of Rome, that either can upon good warrant, or indeed at all challenge to itſelf the privilege of infallibility in matter of Faith? "When you have applied your moſt attentive conſideration upon theſe queſtions, I do aſſure myſelf "your reſolution will be affirmative in the firſt, and "negative in the ſecond. And then the concluſion "will be, that you will approve and follow the way, "wherein I have had the happineſs to enter before "you, and ſhould think it infinitely increaſed, if it "would pleaſe God to draw you after. I reſt your "aſſured friend, &c."

(5) Idem, pag. 7, 8.

[D] That Prelate continued to correſpond with him.] The Archbiſhop in his ſpeech before the Lords on the firſt day of his tryal, March the 12th 1643, appealed to the letters, which paſſed between him and Mr. Chillingworth, in order to vindicate himſelf from the charge of Popery. Mr. Chillingworth's learning and abilities, ſays he (6), are ſufficiently known to all your Lordſhips. He was gone and ſettled at Dowaye. My letters brought him back, and he lived and died a Defender of the Church of England. And that this is ſo, your Lordſhips cannot but know; for Mr. Pryn took away my letters, and all the papers which concerned him, and they were examined at the Committee. Theſe letters are ſuppoſed to be loſt. For the Archbiſhop's papers being taken from him by Mr. Prynne purſuant to an Order of the Houſe of Commons, Mr. Prynne kept them till after the Reſtoration, when, by Order of the King in Council, they were delivered to Dr. Sheldon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. But * very few of thoſe papers, which Prynne had publiſhed in ſeveral pamphlets and Books, came to Archbiſhop Sheldon's hands. And not a few, even of thoſe which had not been publiſhed, were found wanting. Particularly the Papers of Archbiſhop Laud concerning the converſion of his godſon, Mr. William Chillingworth, which the Archbiſhop ſays were taken away from him by Mr. Prynne, and being by him produced at the Committee for drawing up his charge, were there examined.

(6) Hiſtory of the Troubles and Tryal of William Laud, &c. pag. 227.

* Mr. Wharton in his Preface to the Hiſtory of the Troubles and Tryal of William Laud, &c.

[E] About the year 1634 wrote a confutation of the motives, which had induced him to go over to the Church of Rome.] He did not think proper to publiſh it for ſome particular reaſons (7). This paper is now loſt. It is true we have a paper of his on the ſame ſubject; but it ſeems to be written upon ſome other occaſion, probably at the deſire of his friends. In this paper he demonſtrates the fallacy of the arguments, which had moſt prevailed with him to change his Religion. It was firſt publiſhed in 1687 in 4to. in the Additional Diſcourſes of Mr. Chillingworth.

(7) Des Maizeaux, pag. 17.

to the Church of England. Theſe ſcruples, which he freely declared to his friends, ſeem to be the occaſion of a groundleſs report, that he had turned Papiſt a ſecond time, and then Proteſtant again (o). His return to the Proteſtant Religion making a great deal of noiſe, he was engaged in ſeveral diſputes with thoſe of the Romiſh Religion [F], and particularly with Mr. John Lewgar, Mr. John Floyd a Jeſuit, who went under the name of Daniel, or Dan. a Jeſu, and Mr. White. But in 1635 he was engaged in a work, which gave him a far greater opportunity to confute the principles of the Church of Rome, and to vindicate the Proteſtant Religion, and which was printed in 1637 under the title of, The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe Way to Salvation; Or an Anſwer to a Book intitled, Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholics [G]. While he was about this work, he wrote a Letter to one of his friends, who had deſired to know what judgment might be made of Arianiſm from the

(o) Idem, pag. 18. and Remark [F].

[F] Engaged in ſeveral diſputes with thoſe of the Romiſh Religion, &c.] Mr. Lewgar, a great zealot for the Church of Rome, and one who had been an intimate friend of our Author, as ſoon as he heard of his return to the Church of England, ſent him a very angry and abuſive letter, to which Mr. Chillingworth returned an anſwer full of love and charity, which for its excellency hath been often printed. Mr. Lewgar could not help being touched with the letter, and deſired to ſee his old friend again; and Mr. Chillingworth had a diſcourſe with him about Religion before Mr. Skinner and Dr. Sheldon (8). He had likewiſe a diſpute with Mr. Daniel, a Jeſuit, wherein he diſproves the infallibility of the Church of Rome by an argument taken from the contradictions which are contained in the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation (9). He had another with a Gentleman, whom he does not name, in which he confutes the ſame infallibility, by proving, that either the preſent Church of Rome errs in offering tapers and incenſe to the Virgin Mary, or that the antient Church of Rome did err, in condemning as Heretics the Collyridians, for offering a cake to her (10). He wrote likewiſe a paper to demonſtrate, that the doctrine of infallibility, the main point of the Romiſh Votaries, is neither evident of itſelf, nor grounded upon certain and infallible reaſons, nor warranted by any paſſage of the Scripture (11). And in two other papers he ſhews that the Church of Rome hath formerly erred; firſt, by admitting of infants to the Euchariſt, and holding that without it they could not be ſaved (12); and ſecondly, by teaching the doctrines of the Millenaries, viz. that before the world's end Chriſt ſhould reign upon earth for a thouſand years, and that the Saints ſhould live under him in all holineſs and happineſs (13); both which doctrines are condemned as falſe and heretical by the preſent Church of Rome. He wrote alſo a ſhort letter, in anſwer to ſome objections put to him by one of his friends; wherein he ſhews, that neither the Fathers, nor the Councils are infallible witneſſes of tradition; and that the infallibility of the Church of Rome muſt firſt of all be proved from the Scripture (14). He wrote likewiſe an Anſwer to ſome Paſſages in the Dialogues, publiſhed under the name of Ruſhworth. The occaſion was this. The Lord Digby, afterwards Earl of Briſtol, deſired Mr. Chillingworth to meet Mr. White, the true Author of theſe Dialogues, at the lodgings of Sir Kenelm Digby, a late convert to the Church of Rome. The Lord Digby was there himſelf. Their conference turned upon Tradition; and as Mr. White had treated the ſame matter in his Dialogues, which were not yet publiſh'd, Mr. Chillingworth, probably at the requeſt of the Lord Digby, ſelected out of them ſome paſſages, relating to that ſubject, and confuted them (15).

(8) See the Conference between Mr. Chillingworth and Mr. Lewgar, in the Additional Diſcourſes of Mr. Chillingworth never before printed. London 1687, in 4to, pag. 1, &c.

(9) Ibid. pag. 41.

(10) Ibid. pag. 41.

(11) Ibid. pag. 26.

(12) Ibid. pag. 68.

(13) Ibid. pag. 80.

(14) Ibid. pag. 90, &c.

(15) Ibid. pag. 103. See Des Maizeaux, pag. 40, 42, 43.

[G] In 1635 he was engaged in a Work... printed in 1637 under the title of, The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way of Salvation &c.] A Jeſuit, who went by the name of Edward Knott, tho' his true name was Matthias Wilſon (16), had publiſhed in 1630 in 8vo. a little Book, called, Charity miſtaken, with the want whereof Catholics are unjuſtly charged: for affirming, as they do with grief, that Proteſtancy unrepented deſtroies ſalvation. This was anſwered by Dr. Potter, Provoſt of Queen's College in Oxford; and his Anſwer came out in 1633 with this title; Want of charitie juſtly charged on all ſuch Romaniſts, as dare (without truth or modeſty) affirme, that Proteſtancie deſtroyeth ſalvation. In anſwer to a late Popiſh Pamphlet intitled, Charity miſtaken &c. The Jeſuit replied in 1634 this title: Mercy and Truth. Or Charity maintayned by Catholiques. By way of Reply upon an anſwere lately framed by D. Potter to a Treatiſe, which had formerly proved, that Charity was miſtaken by Proteſtants: with the want whereof Catholiques are unjuſtly charged for affirming, that Proteſtancy unrepented deſtroyes Salvation. Deuided into two parts. Mr. Chillingworth undertaking to anſwer that Reply, and Mr. Knott being informed of his deſign, reſolved to prejudice the public both againſt our Author and his Book, in a Libel, intitled, A Direction to be obſerved by N. N. if hee meane to proceede in anſwering the Booke, intitled, Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholicks &c. printed in 1636 in 8vo. pagg. 42. permiſſu Superiorum. In this Piece he repreſents Mr. Chillingworth as a Socinian. Mr. Chillingworth's Anſwer was very near finiſhed in the beginning of the year 1637 (17), and having been examined at Archbiſhop Laud's requeſt by Dr. Prideaux, afterwards Biſhop of Worceſter, Dr. Baylie, Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, and Dr. Fell, Lady Margaret's Profeſſor in Divinity, it was publiſhed with their approbation in the latter end of that year with this title: The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to Salvation: Or an Anſwer to a Booke entitled, Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholiques, Which pretends to prove the contrary. By William Chillingworth Maſter of Arts of the Univerſity of Oxford. This Book was received with a general applauſe; and what perhaps never happened to any other controverſial Work of that bulk, two Editions were publiſhed within leſs than five months (18); and it hath been reprinted many times ſince the Reſtoration (19). On the other hand Mr. Knott ſeeing that he had not been able to deter our Author from publiſhing his anſwer, tried once more to prejudice the public againſt it, wherein he was ſeconded by ſome Jeſuits. For in 1638 Mr. Knott publiſhed a Pamphlet, intitled, Chriſtianity maintained. Or a Diſcovery of ſundry Doctrines tending to the overthrowe of the Chriſtian Religion: contayned in the anſwere to a Book, entitled, Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintayned by Catholiques (20). In this Piece (21) he promiſes a larger volume in anſwer to Mr. Chillingworth. To this Pamphlet is ſubjoyned a little Piece, printed the ſame year and at the ſame place, under the title of, Motives maintained. Or a Reply unto M. Chillingworth's Anſwere to his own Motives of his Converſion to the Catholicke Religion (22). The next Pamphlet againſt our Author was alſo printed at St. Omer in 1638, with this title; The Church Conquerant over human wit. Or the Churche's authority demonſtrated by M. William Chillingworth (the Proctour for wit againſt her) his perpetual contradictions, in his Booke entituled, The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to Salvation (23). The Author was a Jeſuit called John Floyd (24), who in 1639 publiſhed likewiſe another piece, intitled; The totall Summe: or no danger of Damnation unto Roman Catholiques for any errours in Faith: Nor any hope of Salvation for any Sectary whatſoever that doth knowingly oppoſe the Doctrine of the Roman Church. This is proved by the confeſſions and ſaying of M. Chillingworth his Book (25). The third and laſt Pamphlet, which appeared againſt Mr. Chillingworth, was printed in 1639 at St. Omer, as Mr. Des Maizeaux ſuppoſes (26), and intitled: The Judgment of an Univerſity-Man concerning M. William Chillingworth his late Pamphlet, in Anſwere to Charity maintayned (27). It was written by Mr. William Lacy, a Jeſuit (28). To this piece is ſubjoined another, intitled, Heautomachia. Mr. Chillingworth againſt himſelf (29). It hath no title-page nor preface, being the ſequel of the other, and printed at the ſame time. The ſtyle is alſo the ſame. In 1652 nine years after our Author's death Mr. Knott publiſhed a large (16) Bibliotheca Patrum Societatis Jeſu, pag. 185.

(17) Des Maizeaux, pag. 136.

(18) Idem, pag. 220.

(19) Idem, Remark [II]. pag. 220-228.

(20) Printed at St. Omer's in 4to, pag. 86.

(21) Preface, pag. 11.

(22) Pagg. 24.

(23) In 4°, pagg. 193.

(24) Des Maizeaux, Remark [LL], pag. 233, & ſeqq.

(25) In 4to pagg. 104.

(26) Pag. 240.

(27) In 4to, pagg. 158.

(28) Des Maizeaux, Remark [MM] pag. 241, & ſeqq.

(29) Pagg. 46.

the ſenſe of Antiquity [H]. In the year 1635 Sir Thomas Coventry, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, offering him preferment, Mr. Chillingworth refuſed to accept it on account of his ſcruples with regard to the ſubſcription to the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England (p), and wrote a Letter upon this ſubject to Dr. Sheldon [I]. However at laſt large Anſwer to him intitled, Infidelity unmaſked. Or the Confutation of a Booke publiſhed by Mr. William Chillingworth, under this title, The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to Saluation (29).

(p) Idem, pag. 57, 58, 59, 60.

(29) Printed in Gant 1652 in 4to, pagg. 949. beſides the Preface and the Index.

[H] Wrote a letter to one of his friends, who had deſired to know what judgment might be made of Arianiſm from the ſenſe of antiquity.] The original letter is at preſent in the Library of the Royal Society, and is as follows: " Deare Harry (30), I am very " ſorry it was my ill fortune not to ſee the day that " I went out of Oxford: otherwiſe I ſhould haue " thanked thee very heartily for the favour thou didſt " the night before, eſpecially for Mr. Coventryes com- " pany and diſcourſe, whoſe excellent wit I doe very " much admire, and had I ſo much intereſt in him " as you have, I ſhould deſire him often (though I " hope I need not) to remember what our Saviour " ſayes, To whom much is given, of them much ſhall " be required. Mr. Taylor did much confirme my " opinion of this ſufficience; but let mee tell you in " your eare—meethinks he wants much of the ethicall " part of a diſcourſe, and ſlights too much many times " the arguments of thoſe he diſcourſes with. But " this is a fault he would quickly leaue, if he had a " friend that would diſcreetly tell him of it. If you " or Mr. Couentry would tell him, that you heard " one, that knowes him, magnifye him exceedingly " for other thinges, but cenſure him for this, you " might doe him a very friendly office; and my writ- " ing to you thus much giues you grownd enough to " ſay ſo truely; but you muſt not giue the leaſt ſuſpi- " cion that I am the man, and therfore not doe it yet " a good while. When Dr. Sheldon comes to Oxford, " I will be there again, and then will be very ready " to doe any ſeruice in the buſineſſe you imparted to " mee. I was miſtaken in my directing you to Euſe- " bius for the matter you wott of. You ſhall find it in " a witneſſe much farther from exception herein than " Euſebius, euen Athanaſius himſelfe, the greateſt ad- " uerſary of that doctrine, and Hilary who was his " ſecond. See the firſt in Ep. de Synodis Arim. & Se- " leuc. p. 917. D. Tom. I. Edit. Paris 1627. See the " ſecond, de Synodis, fol. 97. In the firſt, you ſhall " find that the eighty Fathers, which condemned Sa- " moſatenus, affirmed expreſſely,—That the Sonne is " not of the ſame eſſence of the Father: which is to " contradict formally the Councell of Nice, which " decreed the Sonne coeſſentiall to the Father. In the " ſecond you ſhall find theſe wordes to the ſame pur- " poſe, — Octoginta Epiſcopi olim reſpuerunt τὸ Ho- " mouſion. See alſo if you pleaſe, Juſtin, cont. Tryphon. " p. 283, 356, 357. Tertull. againſt Praxeas, c. 9. " Novatian de Trin. in fine, who is joined with Ter- " tullian. Athanaſ. Ep. de Fide Dion. Alex. Tom. I. " p. 551. Baſil. T. 2. p. 802, 803. edit. Paris " 1618. See St. Hieron, Apol. 2. contr. Ruffinum, T. " 2. p. 329. Paris 1579. See Petavius upon Epiph. " his Panar. ad Hær. 69. quæ eſt Arij. p. 285; and " conſider how well he cleares Lucian the Martyr " from Arianiſme, and what he there confeſſes of all the " ancient Fathers. If you could underſtand French, I " would referre to Perron, p. 633 of his reply to King " James; where you ſhould find theſe wordes: If a man " ſhould demand of any Arrian, if he would ſubmitt to " the judgment of the ages præcedent to that of Conſtan- " tine and Marcian, he would make no difficulty of it, " but would preſſe himſelf that the controverſye might be " decided by that little which remaines to us of the Au- " thors of that time. For an Arrian would find in Ire- " næus, Tertullian, and others, which remaine of thoſe " ages,—That the Sonne is the Inſtrument of the Father; " That the Father commanded the Sonne in the works of " Creation; That the Father and the Sonne are aliud " & aliud: which thinges he that ſhould now hold, " now when the language of the Church is more exa- " mined, would be eſteemed a very Arrian. If you read " Bellarmine touching this matter, you ſhould find " that he is troubled exceedingly to find any tolerable " Gloſſes for the Speeches of the Fathers before the " Councell of Nice which are againſt him; and yet " he conceals the ſtrongeſt of them; and to counter- " poyſe them, cites Authors that have indeed ancient " names, but ſuch whom he himſelfe has ſtigmatized " for ſpurious or doubtfull in his Booke de Script. Ec- " cleſ. Were I at leyſure, and had a little longer time, " I could referre you to ſome that acknowledge Ori- " gen's judgment to be alſo againſt them in this mat- " ter. And Fiſher in his Anſweare to Dr. Whites " Nine Queſtions has a place almoſt parallel to that a- " bove cited out of Perron. In a word, whoſoeuer " ſhall freely and impartially conſider of this thing, " and how on the other ſide the ancient Fathers wea- " pons againſt the Arrians are in a manner onely " places of Scripture, (and thoſe now for the moſt " part diſcarded as impertinent and unconcluding,) " and how in the argument drawne from the authority " of the ancient Fathers, they are almoſt alwayes de- " fendants, and ſcarſe ever opponents; he ſhall not " chooſe but confeſſe, or at leaſt be very inclinable to " beleeve, that the Doctrine of Arrius is eyther a " truth, or at leaſt no damnable hereſy. But the Carrier " ſtayes for my Letter, and I haue now no more time " than to adde that I am, Thy very true and louing " Friend &c." The Poſcript to this Letter is as follows: See Facundus Hermianenſis, Lib 10. c. 15. Remember alwayes the Wordes of our Saviour: If you will doe the Will of my Father, you ſhall know of the Doctrine, whether it be of God. If you can, ſend mee Mr. Diggſes Speech. I prythee goe to Dr. Littleton, and deſire him to ſend mee all that he has of Vorſtius. For in the Epiſtles of his which I borrowed of him he referrs me to ſome other books of his, which I ſhall have eſpecially occaſion to uſe, eſpecially his booke againſt Piſtorius the Jeſuit.

[I] Wrote a Letter upon this ſubject to Dr. Sheldon.] Mr. Des Maizeaux (31) tells us, that he had two tranſcripts of it, one of which, (that hath a Poſtſcript) was communicated to him by Dr. White Kennet Lord Biſhop of Peterborough, to which and the copy of another Letter of Mr. Chillingworth, which has been given the Reader above (32), his Lordſhip had ſubjoined the following memorandum: To the copies of theſe two Letters to Mr. Gilbert Sheldon and Dr. Sheldon, Mr. Wharton, who procured the Tranſcripts, gave this atteſtation under his own hand. " Ex autographis Literis penes " Danielem Sheldon Armigerum, Archiepiſcopi Ne- " potem." It is dated from Tew, September 21. 1635. It is as follows, with the various readings of the other tranſcript communicated to Mr. Des Maizeaux, noted in the margin. " Good Dr. Sheldon. I do here ſend " you news, as unto my beſt friend, of a great and " happy victory, which at length with extream diffi- " cultye I have ſcarcely obtained over the onely ene- " mie that can hurt me, that is, my ſelfe. Sir, ſo it " is, that though I am in debt to your ſelfe and others " of my friends above twenty pounds more than I " know how to pay; though I am in want of many " conveniences; though in great danger of falling " into a chronicall infirmitie of my body; though in " another thing, which you perhaps gueſſe at what it " is, but I will not tell you, which would make me " more joyfull of preferment then all theſe (if I could " come honeſtly by * it;) though money comes to me " from my father's purſe like blood from his veins, " or from his heart; though I am very ſenſible that I " have been too long already an unprofitable burden " to my Lord, and muſt not ſtill continue ſo; though " my refuſing preferment may perhaps (which fear, " I aſſure you, does much afflict me) be injurious to " my friends and intimate acquaintance, and prejudi- " cial to them in the way of theirs; though con- " ſcience of my own good intention and deſire * ſug- " geſts unto me many flattering hopes of great poſſi- " bilitie † of doing God and his Church ſervice, if " I had that preferment which I may fairly hope for; " though I may juſtly fear, that by refuſing thoſe pre- " ferments which I ſought for, I ſhall gain the repu- " tation of weakneſſe and levity, and incur their diſ- " pleaſure, whoſe good opinion of me, next to God's " favour, and my own good opinion of myſelfe, I do " eſteem

(31) Pag. 86, 99.

(32) Note [G].

* to.

* intentions and deſires.

† poſſibilities.

laſt he ſurmounted theſe ſcruples, and being promoted to the Chancellorſhip of the Church of Sarum July the 20th 1638, with the Prebend of Brixworth in Northampton-ſhire annexed to it (q), he complied with the uſual ſubſcription [K]. About the ſame time he was appointed Maſter of Wigſtan's Hoſpital in Leiceſter; "both which, "ſays Mr. Wood (r), and perhaps other preferments, he kept to his dying day." In 1640 he was deputed by the Chapter of Saliſbury as their Proctor in Convocation (s). In 1642 he was put into the Roll with ſome others by his Majeſty to be created Doctor of Divinity, but he came not to take that Degree, nor was he diplomated (t). At the ſiege of Glouceſter, begun Auguſt the 10th 1643, he was in the King's army before that city, and obſerving that they wanted materials to carry on the ſiege, he ſuggeſted the making of ſome Engines after the manner of the Roman Teſtudines cum pluteis, in order to ſtorm the place (u). That ſiege being raiſed by the Earl of Eſſex, and the war continuing with great vigour on each ſide, the King appointed the Lord Hopon General of his troops in the Weſt, who forced Arundel-Caſtle in Suſſex to ſurrender; but that Caſtle (q) Idem, pag. 265.

(r) Col. 42.

(s) Des Maizeaux, pag. 267, 268.

(t) Wood, Faſti Ox. vol. 2. col. 30.

(u) Ruſhworth, Hiſtor. Collect. vol. 2. Part 3. ad ann. 1643. tom. 4. pag. m. 288, 289.

"eſteem and deſire above all things; though all theſe "and many other terribiles viſu formæ have repreſent-"ed themſelves to my imagination in the moſt hideous "manner that may be; yet I am at length firmly "and unmoveably reſolved, if I can have no preſer-"ment without Subſcription, that I neither can, nor "will have any. For this reſolution I have but one "reaſon againſt a thouſand temptations to the con-"trary; but it is ὁ μέγας, againſt which if all the "little reaſons in the world were put in the ballance, "they would be lighter than vanity. In brief this it "is; as long as I keep that modeſt and humble aſſu-"rance of God's love and favour, which I now enjoy, "and wherein I hope I ſhall be daily more and more "confirmed; ſo long in deſpite of all the world, I "may and ſhall and will be happy. But if I once "loſe this; though all the world ſhould conſpire to "make me happy, I ſhall and muſt be extremely "miſerable. Now this ineſtimable jewel, if I ſub-"ſcribe (without ſuch a declaration as will make * "the ſubſcription no ſubſcription,) I ſhall wittingly "and willingly and deliberately throw away. For "though I am very well perſuaded of you and my "other friends, who do ſo with a full perſuaſion that "you may do it lawfully; yet the caſe ſtands ſo with "me, and I can ſee no remedy but for ever it will "do ſo, that if I ſubſcribe, I ſubſcribe my own dam-"nation. For though I do verily believe the Church "of England a true member of the Church; that ſhe "wants nothing neceſſery to ſalvation, and holds no-"thing repugnant to it; and had thought that to think "ſo, had ſufficiently qualified me for a ſubſcription: "yet now I plainly ſee, if I will not juggle with my "conſcience, and play with God Almighty, I muſt "forbear. For, to ſay nothing of other things, which "I have ſo well conſidered as not to be in a ſtate to "ſign them, and yet not ſo well as to declare myſelf "againſt them, two points there are, wherein I am "fully reſolved, and therefore care not who knows "my mind. One is, that to ſay the fourth Com-"mandment is a Law of God appertaining to Chri-"ſtians, is falſe and unlawfull: the other, that the "damning ſentences in St. Athanaſius's Creed (as we "are made to ſubſcribe it) are moſt falſe, and alſo in "a high degree preſumptuous and ſchiſmatical. And "therefore I can neither ſubſcribe that thoſe things "are agreeable † to the Word of God, ſeeing I believe "they are certainly repugnant to it: nor that the "whole Common-Prayer is lawful to be uſed, ſeeing I "believe thoſe parts of it certainly unlawful; nor pro-"miſe that I my ſelf will uſe it, ſeeing I never in-"tend either to read theſe things, which I have now * "excepted againſt, or to ſay Amen to them. I ſhall "not need to intreat you, not to be offended with me "for this my moſt honeſt, and (as I verily believe) "moſt wiſe reſolution: hopeing rather you will do "your endeavour, that I may neither be honeſt at ſo "dear a rate, as the loſſe of preferment, nor buy pre-"ferment at ſo much dearer a rate, the loſſe of ho-"neſty. I think my ſelfe happy that it pleaſed God, "when I was reſolved to venture upon a ſubſcription "without full aſſurance of the lawfulneſſe of it, to caſt "in my way two unexpected impediments to divert "me from accompliſhing my reſolution. For I pro-"feſs unto you, ſince I entertained it, I have never "enjoyed quiet day nor night, till now that I have "rid my ſelf of it again; and I plainly perceive, "that if I had ſwallowed this pill, howſoever guilded "over with gloſſes and reſervations, and wrapt up in "conſerves of good intentions and purpoſes, yet it "would never have agreed or ſtay'd with me, but I "would have caſt it up again, and with it whatſoever "preferment I ſhould have gained with it as the wages "of unrighteouſneſs, which would have been a great "injury to you and to my Lord Keeper: whereas now, "res eſt integra; and he will not loſe the gift of any "preferment by beſtowing it on mee, nor have any "engagement to Mr. Andrewes for me. But howe-"ver * this would have ſucceeded in caſe I had then "ſubſcribed, I thank God, I am now reſolved, that "I will never do that while I am living and in health, "which I would not do if I were dying; and this I am "ſure I would not do. I would never do any thing for "preferment, which I would not do but for preferment; "and this, I am ſure, I ſhould not do. I will never † un-"dervalue the happineſs which God's Love brings to "mee with it, as to put it to the leaſt adventure in the "world, for the gaining of any worldly happineſſe. "I remember very well, quærito primum regnum Dei, "cætera omnia adjicientur tibi: and therefore when-"ever § I make ſuch a prepoſterous choice, I will "give you leave to think I am out of my wits, or do "not believe in God, or at leaſt am ſo unreaſonable, "as to do a thing in hope I ſhall be ſorry for it "afterwards, and wiſh it undone. It cannot be a-"voided but my Lord of Canterbury muſt come to "know this my reſolution, and, I think, the ſooner "the better. Let me entreat you to acquaint him with "it, (if you think it expedient) and let me hear from "you as ſoon as poſſibly you can. But when you "write, I pray remember, that my foregoing preſer-"ment (in this * ſtate wherein I am) is grief enough to "me; and do not you add to it by being angry with "mee for doing that, which I muſt do or be miſera-"ble. I am your moſt loveing and true ſervant, &c."

* as makes.

† to theſe things as agreeable.

* I now howe.

* howſoever.

† never ſo.

§ whenſoever.

* being in this.

To this Letter Mr. Chillingworth added a Poſtſcript, which was as follows: So much of my Defence of Dr. Potter as I have done, I intend to review and perfect before I proceed, and if it ſhall be thought fit, to publiſh it, annexing a diſcourſe to this effect, that if this be anſwered, all the reſt is ſo; which by the ſtrict dependance of that which follows on that which goes before I ſhall be able very eaſily to demonſtrate. Direct your Letters to me at my Father's houſe in Oxford, and it will be ſufficient. I am ſorry to hear that Mr. Craven continues ill ſtill. I fear he is in more danger than he imagines. Pray if you can ſee him, ſend me word how he does. Dr. Sheldon's Anſwer to this Letter of Mr. Chillingworth has not yet been diſcovered; but by a paper containing the heads or hints of another anſwer of his to our Author (33), it appears, that there paſſed ſeveral Letters between them on that ſubject; ſome, for greater ſecrecy, written in a third perſon. For Mr. Chillingworth being intent upon a full inquiry into the ſenſe of the Articles, every new Examination afforded him ſome ſcruples (34).

(33) Des Maizeaux, Remark [K], pag. 103, 104.

(34) Idem, pag. 100.

[K] Complied with the uſual Subſcription.] The Jeſuit Knott having objected to him his having refuſed to ſubſcribe the Articles of the Church of England, our Author anſwers him in theſe words (35). Now though I hold not the Doctrine of all Proteſtants abſolutely true, (which with reaſon cannot be required of me while they hold contradictions,) yet I hold it free from all impiety and from all error deſtructive of ſalvation, or in itſelf damnable. And this I think in reaſon may ſufficiently qualifie me for a maintainer of this aſſertion, that

(35) Religion of Proteſtants, &c. Preface § 39, 40.

Caſtle was retaken by Sir William, and Mr. Chillingworth among the reſt made priſoner of war, who out of reſpect to the Lord Hopton "had accompanied him in that "march, and being indiſpoſed by the terrible coldneſs of the ſeaſon, choſe to repoſe "himſelf in that garriſon till the weather ſhould mend (w)." Mr. Chillingworth's illneſs increaſed to ſuch a degree, that not being able to go to London with the garriſon, he was conveyed to Chicheſter; which favour he obtained at the requeſt of his great adverſary Mr. Francis Cheynell, who accidentally met him in Arundel-Caſtle, and frequently viſited him at Chicheſter till he died. He hath given an account of our Author's ſickneſs, and of his own behaviour towards him [L], wherein he ſhewed himſelf as charitable and compaſſionate as his rigid Orthodoxy would permit him to be (x). Mr. Chillingworth died about January the 30th 164$\frac{3}{4}$ (y), and was interred in the Cathedral of Chicheſter. Beſides his nine Sermons and his ſmall Tract to ſhew that Epiſcopacy is not repugnant to the government ſettled in the Church for perpetuity by the Apoſtles, and intitled, The Apoſtolical Inſtitution of Epiſcopacy, deduced out of the premiſes by W. C., he wrote ſeveral pieces not yet publiſhed [M]. There have been a great many editions of his works; and to the eighth were ſubjoined the two Letters inſerted in the Notes [H] and [I]; but the Editor of the ninth edition at London in 1727 omitted them both, which omiſſion was animadverted upon in one of the public papers by a very learned Divine of the Church of England [N].

(w) Clarendon, Hiſtory of the Rebellion, B. 8. tom. 4. pag. 472, 473.

(x) Des Maizeaux, pag. 314.

(y) Des Maizeaux, Remark [DDD] pag. 346.

CHOCQUET

Proteſtancy deſtroys not ſalvation. For the Church of England, I am perſuaded, that the conſtant doctrine of it is ſo pure and orthodoxe, that whoſoever beleeves it, and lives accordinq to it, undoubtedly he ſhall be ſaved; and that there is no error in it which may neceſſitate or warrant any man to diſturb the Peace, or renounce the Communion of it. This in my opinion is all intended by Subſcription; and thus much if you conceive me not ready to ſubſcribe, your charity I aſſure you is much miſtaken. Mr. Chillingworth not only expreſſes here his readineſs to ſubſcribe, but declares what he conceives to be the ſenſe and intent of ſuch a ſubſcription; which he takes now to be a Subſcription of Peace or Union, and not of Belief or Aſſent, as he thought it formerly was, as appears from his Letter to Dr. Sheldon in the preceding Note. And as he did within a few months actually ſubſcribe, we have reaſon to believe, that he did it in the ſame ſenſe (36).

(36) See Des Maizeaux, Rem. [DD], pag. 157, & ſeqq.

[L] He hath given an account of our Author's ſickneſs, and of his own behaviour towards him.] It is intitled, Chillingworthi Noviſſima; Or the Sickneſſe, Hereſy, Death, and Buriall of William Chillingworth, (in his own phraſe) Clerk of Oxford, and in the conceit of his fellow-ſouldiers, the Queen's Arch-Engineer, and Grand-Intelligencer. Set forth in a Letter to his eminent and learned Friends, a Relation of his Apprehenſion at Arundell, a Diſcovery of his Errours in a brief Catechiſme, and a ſhort Oration at the Buriall of his Heretical Book. By Francis Cheynell, late Fellow of Merton College. Publiſhed by Authority (37).

(37) Printed at London 1644, in 4to.

[M] He wrote ſeveral pieces not yet publiſhed.] In the manuſcripts of Mr. Henry Wharton, bought by Dr. Teniſon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and preſented to the Library at Lambeth, were ſeveral pieces of our Author not yet printed. We have mentioned ſome already, and ſhall give an account of them all from the Catalogue of thoſe manuſcripts, drawn up by Mr. Wharton himſelf. He obſerves (38), that the volume marked M, is Volumen Chartaceum in fol. containing, A Collection of Papers formerly belonging to Archbiſhop Laud, many of them wrote with his own hand, but moſt of them endorſed with his hand; together with ſome papers of the Archbiſhops Sheldon and Sancroft, and many of Mr. Chillingworth. And after having ſet down part of the contents of that volume, he adds, "Several papers of Mr. William Chillingworth, viz.

(38) Catalogus MSS. Hen. Wharton, in Bibl. Lambeth. 2d Vol. M.

"Mr. Peake's five Queſtions propoſed to Mr. Chillingworth, about the Nature of Faith, and the Reſolution and Conſequences of the Faith of Proteſtants.

"Mr. Chillingworth's Anſwer to Mr. Peake's Queſtions: firſt draught imperfect.

"Mr. Chillingworth's Anſwer to the ſame: being compleat and perfect.

"The Beginning of a Treatiſe againſt the Scots; by Mr. Chillingworth.

"Paſſages extracted out of the Declaration of the Scots; by Mr. Chillingworth.

"Obſervations upon the Scottiſh Declaration; by Mr. Chillingworth.

"A Treatiſe of the Unlawfulneſs of reſiſting the lawfull Prince, although moſt impious, tyrannical, and idolatrous; by Mr. Chillingworth.

"A Letter of Mr. Chillingworth excuſing his writing againſt the rebels (39).

"Notes of Mr. Chillingworth concerning God's univerſal mercy in calling men to repentance.

"A Problematical Tentamen of Mr. Chillingworth againſt puniſhing crimes with death in Chriſtian Societies (40): Cancelled.

"A Letter of Mr. J. to Mr. Chillingworth, of the Imperfection of naturall Religion and Reaſon, without the aſſiſtance of Revelation: wrote 1637.

"A ſhort Diſcourſe of the Nature of Faith; by Mr. Chillingworth.

"A larger Diſcourſe of the Nature of Faith; by Mr. Chillingworth.

"Of the Abſurdity of departing from the Church of England for want of Succeſſion of viſible Profeſſors in all ages; by Mr. Chillingworth.

"A briefe Anſwere to ſeveral Texts of Scripture, alledged to prove the Church to be one, viſible, univerſal, perpetual, and infallible; by Mr. Chillingworth.

"A Letter of Dr. Sheldon to Mr. Chillingworth, to ſatisfy his ſcruples about ſubſcribing (41).

"Letter of Mr. Chillingworth to Dr. Sheldon, containing ſome ſcruples about leaving the Church of Rome, and returning to the Church of England.

"(42) Letter of Mr. Chillingworth to Dr. Sheldon, containing his Scruples about Subſcription, and the reaſon of them (43)."

(39) Mr. Des Maizeaux has publiſhed this Letter, pag. 300, & ſeqq.

(40) This Paragraph is razed out in the Catalogue.

(41) See Des Maizeaux, Rem. [X], pag. 103, 104.

(42) This Paragraph is razed out in the Catalogue.

(43) This Letter hath been inſerted in note [I].

[N] The Editor of the ninth Edition at London in 1727 omitted them both; which omiſſion was animadverted upon in one of the public papers by a very learned Divine of the Church of England.] The Author in a Letter ſigned Philoleutherus, and inſerted in the London Journal (44) having among other reflections obſerved, that "in new editions of the works of one, who is "dead, no Editor is at liberty to take away what he "thinks fit; but is obliged in juſtice and honour to "give the world what his title promiſes, his Author's, "not his own works; and not under a pretence of "new publiſhing the works of any one, give us what "parts or portions he judges to be right;" tells us, that when the eighth impreſſion of Mr. Chillingworth's works was publiſhed, the two Letters abovementioned were printed, and with moſt of the Books bound up. "'Tis natural, ſays he, to expect that theſe ſhould have been added to this ninth edition, or ſome very good reaſon given why they are left out. The Editor would inſinuate, that theſe Letters are ſuppoſititious, when he ſays, that they are "ſaid to be written by Mr. Chilling-"worth:" whereas the one is publiſhed immediately from Mr. Chillingworth's original manuſcript at preſent in the Royal-Society Library; the other Mr. Wharton tranſcribed, as he himſelf ſays, Ex autographis Litteris penes Danielem Sheldon Armigerum, Archiepiſcopi Nepotem. Vid. Chillingworth's Life, p. 99. The Editor goes on: "The truth is, if we look upon theſe "Letters in the moſt advantageous light imaginable, "they

(44) Num. 397. Saturday March 11, 1726-7.

CHOCQUET (LEWIS) a famous French Poet, lived towards the middle of the fifteenth Century, and was the Author of a very ſcarce but very extraordinary work, of which we ſhall give ſome extracts below [A]. La Croix du Maine was not acquainted with him, but du Verdier was, and gave him a place in his Bibliotheque (a), as the Author (a) Pag. 796.

" they appear only to be pieces, which the Writer " never intended for the preſs, and perhaps would not " have taken it kindly, that they ſhould have been " made publick." Whether Mr. Chillingworth would have taken it kindly, that theſe Letters ſhould have been made publick, ſeventy five years after his death, is more than the Editor can know. And whoever ſees the great volumes of Letters of learned men publiſhed after their deaths, and which every man values at a more than ordinary rate, becauſe they contain their undiſguiſed ſentiments, will wonder to hear our Editor ſay in juſtification of himſelf, " The Way of expoſing a man's " private Letters after his death is by many thought " not agreeable to the ſtrict rules of honour, and too " near a-kin to the ungentleman-like practice of over- " looking private papers in a man's ſtudy without the " leave of the owner." However ſuppoſing this to be true, yet what is this to the preſent Editor? Mr. Chillingworth's Letters were already publick; and how have we his Works without theſe? Or how would the preſent Editor be concerned in the ungentleman-like Practice, that he complains of? But " they were never in- " tended for the preſs." This argument is an excellent one from an Editor of Chillingworth, when he can't but know, that every one of his Sermons were publiſhed after his death, and eight out of nine no leſs than twenty years after it; and the Editor of them expreſly tells us, that they were intended only for the benefit of hearers, not of Readers. The Additional Diſcourſes of Mr. Chillingworth were not publiſhed till above twenty years after the Sermons, and were no more intended for the preſs from any thing that appears, than the Sermons were; and yet our new Editor makes no ſcruple to publiſh theſe. What can be the meaning of ſuch excuſes, ſuch ſelf-contradiction as this, to juſtify the omiſſion of theſe Letters, that have been already publiſhed? He proceeds; " Theſe Letters were ſo far from being countenanc- " ed by any name of reputation, that they were then pub- " liſhed by an anonymous perſon." Admitting this, does this make Mr. Chillingworth's own hand-writing not his own? The Writer of his Life has publiſhed to the World a full account of both of them; and he has told us how he came by them. That which was not in Mr. Chillingworth's own hand, is a copy in the hands of a conſiderable perſon, taken from the original. But whether this be enough to countenance the Letters or not, was it not an anonymous perſon, that publiſhed our Author's Sermons, which yet his edition makes no ſcruple to republiſh? Was it not an anonymous one that publiſhed his Letter to Mr. Lewgar eighteen years after his death? Or is it not an anonymous perſon, that now leaves out theſe Letters, as well as an anonymous one, that firſt publiſhed them? Whatever therefore be the real motives of this Editor for theſe omiſſions, the reaſons by which he juſtifies himſelf are ſuch, as would have juſtified him in rejecting one third, or very near a third of what he has in fact publiſhed. Had a Papiſt treated any Greek or Latin Father of the Church in the ſame manner, would not every Proteſtant have loudly complained? And the ſevereſt reflections would not have been thought too heavy on thoſe, who not only perſecute the living, but will not let their Tyranny ceaſe to rage over men, even when they are dead. This paper was followed by another of the ſame Writer relating to the ſeveral methods uſed by the Church of Rome for the caſtration and ſuppreſſion of heretical Books (45). H.

(45) London Journal, Num. 399. Saturday March 25, 1727.

[A] He was the Author of . . . a very extraordinary Work, of which we ſhall give ſome Extracts below.] The Copy, that has been lent me (1), contains three parts: The firſt is intitled, Le premier volumes des Catholiques œuvres & Actes des Apotres, redigez en eſcript par Saint Luc Evangeliſte & Hiſtoriographe, depute par le Saint Eſperit. Icelui Saint Luc eſcripuant à Theophile. Avecques pluſieurs hiſtoires en icelui inſerez des geſtes des Ceſars. Et les demonſtrances des figures de Lapocalypſe veues par Sainct Jehan Zebedée en l'iſſe de Pathmos ſoubz Domitian Ceſar. Le tout veu & corrige bien & duement ſelon la vraye verite & joue par perſonnages à Paris en l'hoſtel de Flanders l'un mil cinq cent xli. Avec privilege du Roy. On les vend en la grand ſalle du Palais par Arnoul & Charles les Angellers freres tenant leurs Bouticques au premier & deuxieſme pilliers devant la Chappelle de Meſſeigneurs les Preſidens. i. e. " The " firſt volume of the Catholic Works and Acts of the " Apoſtles, ſet down in writing by Saint Luc, Evan- " geliſt and Hiſtoriographer, choſen by the Holy " Ghoſt. The ſaid Saint Luc writing to Theophilus. " Together with ſeveral Hiſtories of the Emperors. " And explications of the figures of the Apocalyps ſeen " by St. John Zebedee in the Iſle of Patmos, under " the Emperor Domitian. The whole reviſed, and " well and duly corrected according to the certain " truth, and acted upon the Stage at the Hotel of " Flanders, in the year 1541. With the King's Li- " cence. Sold in the great Hall of the Court, by Ar- " nold and Charles l'Angelier, brothers, who keep " their Stall at the firſt and ſecond Pillar, over againſt " the Preſident's Chapel." The firſt volume contains the Acts of the Apoſtles in five Books, which take up 210 leaves. The ſecond part is entitled: Le ſecond Volume du Magnifique Myſtere des Actes des Apoſtres continuant la narration de leurs faicts & geſtes ſelon l'eſcripture ſainte, avec ques pluſieurs hiſtoires en icelui inſerées des geſtes des Ceſars. Veu & corrige bien & duement ſelon la vraye verite, & ainſi que le Myſtere eſt la joue à Paris, cette preſente annee mil cinq cent quarante & ung. Avec privilege. i. e. " The ſecond volume of the " wonderful Myſtery of the Acts of the Apoſtles, con- " taining the continuation of the Hiſtory of their Acts " and Deeds, according to the Holy Scripture; in " which are inſerted ſeveral Hiſtories of the Emperor's " actions. Well and duly reviſed and corrected, ac- " cording to the certain truth, and as the Myſtery is " acted at Paris this preſent year 1541. With Li- " cence." This ſecond volume contains 165 leaves, and concludes with the ninth book of the Acts of the Apoſtles. The third part is, L'Apocalyſe de Sainct Jehan Zebedee, ou ſont comprinſes les viſions & revelations que icelui Sainct Jehan eut en l'Iſle de Pathmos, le tout ordonne par figures convenables ſelon le texte de la ſaincte eſcripture. Enſemble les cruaultez de Domicien Ceſar. Avec Privilege, MDXLI. i. e. " The Apocalypſe of St. " John Zebedee, containing the Viſions and Revela- " tions, which St. John had in the Iſle of Patmos: " the whole explained by proper cuts, according to the " text of the holy Scripture. Together with the Cru- " elties of the Emperor Domitian. With Licenſe. " 1541." This part contains forty ſix leaves, and was printed off May 27, 1541. The work is in folio.

(1) Dr. Sloane, a famous Phyſician at London, who has ſeveral ſcarce books in his large Library, did me the favour to lend me this, and Mr. Silveſter took the trouble to ſend it me over.

Lewis Chocquet put his name only to the third part of his work; and did it two ways; firſt by prefixing it to a Latin Epigram, which is printed on the ſecond page of the firſt leaf (2), ſecondly by printing it on the top of the ſecond leaf; " Cy enſuit le Myſtére de " l'Apocalypſe de Sain Jehan, avec les crualtez de " Domician Emperour de Romme, compoſe par mai- " ſtre Loys Chocquet. i. e. " Here follows the Apo- " calypſe of St. John, with the cruelties of the Em- " peror Domitian, compoſed by Lewis Chocquet." He is not in the leaſt mentioned in any of the Licenſes for printing his work. It was one William Alabat, a Merchant living at Bourges, who obtained a Licenſe from King Francis I, at Lyons, July the 24th, 1536, for ſix years following. He ſet forth, in his petition, " that for the honour and glory of God, of our mother " the holy Church, and of the holy Catholick Faith, " and for the edification and comfort of all good Chri- " ſtians, he deſired to procure the printing of the Acts " of the Apoſtles in five or more Volumes, which he " had by him, and which had been compoſed in " French Verſe, and corrected with pains and coſt." He and his Bookſellers (3) went to Law before the Parliament of Paris in the year 1540, with Francis Hamelin, Francis Poutrain, John Louvet, and Leonard Chovelet Maſter-Undertakers of the Myſtery of the Acts of the Apoſtles, that ſame year at Paris. The Court ordered, that theſe four undertakers ſhould not cauſe the Myſtery of the ſaid Acts of the Apoſtles to be printed, but

(2) Ludovici Choquet, ad Magiſtrum Antonium le Coq, Doctorem medicum perdoctum Epigramma. This Epigram conſiſts of ſixteen lines, Hexameters and Pentameters.

(3) Arnold and Charles Langelier.

Author of a book in folio, which was printed at Paris in 1541. He only obſerves, that it is a book, in which the Acts of the Apoſtles, and Revelation of St. John are put into French but by thoſe who had the licence to print them, notwithſtanding any new addition that might be made to the work. We find the names and titles of theſe four undertakers in a Ballad, which is printed at the beginning of the ſecond Volume. The paſſage in which they are mentioned, is as follows.

Au Plaſmateur rendant grace le quatre
De bon vouloir entre Pariſiens
Leſquels ont fait appairoir le Theatre
Bien en ſuivant les Rommains anciens.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
François de nom les deux, n'en faut debattre,
L'ung Hamelin, l'autre Poutrain, ſeients
L'ungen practique, & l'autre pour ſembattre
Tixtre tapis ſoubs rethoriciens
Sçait aſſez bien, puis pour l'exploict parfaire
Leonard Chevelet boucher voulut bien faire
Et Jehan Louvet operateur aux fleurs
Bien congnoiſſant des bons grains les meilleurs.
A iceulx quatre honneur royal deſire,
Donner faveur abollir les erreurs,
Qui ſons humains a vertu contre dire.

The ſenſe is: "The four undertakers give thanks to "the Creator. They are the beſt natured men amongſt "the inhabitants of Paris, and have raiſed the reputation of the ſtage by following the example of the "ancient Romans. . . . . Two of them are named "Francis without diſpute: the one Hemelin, the other "Poutrain. The former is learned in the Law; the "latter is a pretty good Weaver, who makes carpets "for Lawyers to ſtamp upon as they plead. The third "is Leonard Chovelet a Butcher, and the fourth is "John Louvet, a Gardener, who knows how to diſtinguiſh the beſt ſeeds from the worſt. I wiſh them "all four a Royal Glory, and God's favour, that they "may forſake the errors, which make men act againſt "the maxims of virtue."

I relate all theſe minute circumſtances, becauſe they may ſerve to give ſome notions of the comedy in thoſe times. Some of theſe circumſtances are not in Moreri (4): as for inſtance, we do not find there, that the Hotel of Flanders ever was the place, where theſe dramatic Poems containing the Hiſtories related in the Holy Scripture, were acted at Paris. But to give the reader a diſtinct notion of the State, in which the French Theatre was at that time, I ſhall tranſcribe ſome paſſages from our Chocquet's Works. It will appear from them, that whilſt the people were not ſuffered to read the Sacred Hiſtory, in the Books in which they are faithfully related, they were permitted to ſee them acted upon the ſtage, mixed with a thouſand groſs and ridiculous fables expreſſed for the moſt part, in a very low and burleſque ſtile.

The firſt Hiſtory, which is deſcribed in this volume, is the choice of an Apoſtle in the room of Judas. It is there ridiculouſly ſuppoſed, that they made the two candidates play at ſhort and long, for thus I think we may expreſs the device which is there related (5).

Baillez les feſtus preparez
Ainſi que l'avons aſſigne.
Lung en y a qui a ung ſigne
Comme il appert, ſigne lauons
Pour lamour de nos compaignons;
Le ſecond de ſigne n'a point,
Donc pour achever notre poinct,
Pierre, tenez les on vos mains,
Et eulx deux, qui ſont incertains
Ou le ſigne eſt, n'on quelle eſpece,
Viendront tirer chaſcun ſa piece
Et celluy auquel eſcherra
Le ſigne, ſubrogue ſera
Au lieu, qui eſt ja deviſé.

That is,

"Give us here the two bits of ſtraw, prepared as we "have ordered it: one of them has a mark to it, as "it appears; we have marked it for the ſake of our "companions; the other is not marked. Now, "Peter, to finiſh this buſineſs, take the two bits of "ſtraw in your hands; and they two, who do not "know which bit is marked, nor how it is marked, "ſhall take each of them a bit, and he, who happens "to have that which is marked, will be admitted "into the vacant place as we have agreed."

When the cuts were drawn, the Apoſtles examined who had that which was marked, and cried out all together.

C'eſt Mathias. i. e. "'Tis Matthias."

Upon which Peter expreſſed himſelf thus

——— Loue ſoit Dieu
Ca Mathias, entre nous autres
Faictes nombre des douze Apotres.
Joyeulx en ſuis, proficiat,
Conferme ſoyez en Veſtat (6).

(6) Ibid.

That is,

"God be praiſed. Now Matthias, you ſhall be one "of us to make up the number of the twelve Apoſtles. "I am heartily glad on't: Huzza! Be confirmed in "your ſtation."

The devils are often introduced, and it is on theſe occaſions, that the Poet raiſes all the ſtrength of his imagination, and exerts all his ſkill: but their characters are not conſiſtently drawn, and inſtead of ſtriking his readers with horror and indignation, he is more proper to raiſe their laughter. He writes entirely in a burleſque ſtyle, ſuch was the bad taſte that prevailed then. He introduces Lucifer who ſummons all the Devils, and he makes him ſpeak thus.

Dyables meſchants deſtinez en terre eſtre,
Clos a jamais dans le centre terreſtre,
Viendrez vous point a mes cris & abois,
Sortez an feu de notre infernal être
Par mes haulx cris vous pouez bien congnoiſtre
Que c'eſt a droict que complaindre me doibs:
Haro, haro, nul de vous je ne veoys,
Si ne venez deſeſperer m'en voys,
Dyables mauldicts, Dyableſſes, Dyabletons,
Courez en l'air, traverſez champs & boys,
Fouldre gectez, accordante a ma voix
Approchez toſt Diabolicques Lucytons: &c. (7).

(7) Ibid. folio 3 verſo.

That is,

"Ye wicked Devils doomed to be in the ground "ſhut up for ever in the center of the earth, will not "my cries and barking make you come? Get out of "the fire of our infernal habitation; you may eaſily "know by my loud cries, that I have a right to complain. Come up, come up! What! I ſee none of "you yet. I ſhall grow ſtark mad, if you will not "come. Ye curſed He-Devils, She-Devils, and little Devils, fly into the air, croſs the fields and the "woods, caſt your thunderbolts about, that their noiſe "may agree with that of my voice. Draw near "quickly, ye deviliſh ſpirits."

Here follows Satan's anſwer.

Prince d'enfer, tes cris a faict eſtendre
Si treſavant, qu'ils ſont venus deſcendre
Juſques au fons des noires regions
Nos viles manoirs tu a preſque faict fendre,
Que te fault-il? Es tu preſt de te pendre,
Dyables ſont hors par grandes legions (8).

(8) Ibid. folio 4.

That is,

"Prince of hell, you have bawled ſo loudly, that "your cries have been heard even in the deepeſt "place of this dark region, and have almoſt cracked "the walls of our wretched habitation. What do "you want? Are you going to hang yourſelf. Whole "legions of devils are gone out."

Here follows another diſcourſe of Lucifer.

"Haro, haro, approche toy grand Dyable,
"Approche toy notaye mal fiable,
"Fier Belyal procureur des Enfers,
"Si tu ne fais ung faulx traict deſuoyable

"Nous

(4) In the Paris edition of 1699, under the word Comedie. Obſerve by the by, that they have corrected in that edition, a very groſs error, which had crept into the former editions; but they have overlooked an error of the Preſs. There was in the former editions, ſur quoy l'on peut voir Boccalini & Ragusglio. And they have put in the edition of 1699, ſur quoy on peut voir Boccalini dans ſon Fagualio di Parnaſſo, They ſhould have put dans ſon Ragguagli di Parnaſſo.

(5) Premier Livre des Actes des Apoſtres, folio 3.

French Verſe, in a dramatic way, but he gives no extracts of it, and yet he is uſed to do it when a book contains ſomething remarkable. Nay he has often tranſcribed long paſſages,

" Nous perdons tout le genre humain ſaluable
" Et demeurans ſeuls enchaynez en fers,
" . . . . . .
" Sur terre auons des ennemis pervers,
" Encontre nous maſchinans preſcherie
" Ce ſont villains yſſus de peſcherie
" Voulans noncer de Dieu la paix cherie.
" Mais ſi voſtre art a mort ne les ruyne
" Ravis ſerez tous a la boucherie
" Si gay n'aura de qui la bouche rie
" S'il le convient laiſſer mettre en ruyne.

Satan's anſwer.

" Prince dampne de tenebre & bruyne
" Loup raviſſant, ton harlement ne fine
" Que te fault-il, aſſu la rage au coeur?
" Prends plomb fondu, chaulx, ſoufre, & poix re-
" ſine
" Metuil bouillant, qui ſeront drogue fine
" Pour deſtouper ta mauldicte rancueur.

That is,

" Come, come, draw near you great Devil, you rogue
" of a Scrivener, you proud Belial, Attorney of Hell.
" If you do not play now ſome knaviſh trick or an" other, all mankind will be ſaved, we loſe them,
" and ſhall be alone chained and fettered for ever. . .
" We have wicked enemies upon earth, who by " their preaching lay their plot againſt us. They are
" ſome countrey fellows, formerly Fiſhermen, who " now pretend to proclaim God's beloved peace.
" If by your art you do not find ſome means to diſ-
" appoint their deſign, and put them to death, you
" will all be carried to the ſlaughterhouſe; nor will
" the moſt merry of you be able to ſmile. Judge
" whether it be proper to let us be thus entirely
" ruined."

Satan anſwers;

" You, damned Prince of darkneſs, devouring wolf,
" can't you ceaſe your howling? What do you want?
" Are you raving mad? Take melted lead, lime,
" brimſtone, roſin, and boiling metal; theſe will be " fine drugs to ſatisfy your curſed ſpite."

Another ſpeech of Lucifer.

" Apres que Chriſt fut au tombeau rendu
" Trois jours après de mort reſuſcita,
" Et qui plus eſt, tout vif ſe preſenta
" A ſes amis, qui ne ſont pas des noſtres
" Douze coquins, qui ſe nomment Apoſtres.
" Grands ſeducteurs de la Loy Judaique.
" Auquels il dit, le texte evangelicque
" Soit ſouſtenu et preſche de par vous:
" Apres es cieulx il monta devant tous
" En les laiſſant tous douze ſur la terre,
" Leſquels preſens nous meinent dure guerre
" En la cite Hieruſalem nommee
" Et tout autour du pays de Judee
" Qui eſt pour nous grande perplexite.
" Dyables obſcurs chaſcun ſoit incite
" Pour ces maraulx a la mort faire rendre
" Si deſſus nous les laiſſez entreprendre
" Dieu pis yra pour nous deſſus les rens.
" Pour ce Sathan vers eulx le chemin prens
" Penſe ſouldain de leur livrer bataille
" Pour mettre a fin la mauldicte canaille
" Tranſporte toy aux preſtres de la loy
" Leſquels toujours ayent lor & aloy
" En recordant leur mauldicte avarice
" De ces coquins donne bien la notice; &c. (9).

(9) Premier Livre des Actes des Apoſtres, folio 5.

That is,

" When Chriſt had been laid in his tomb, the third
" day he roſe again from the dead, and ſhewed him-
" ſelf alive to his friends, who are none of ours; they " are twelve raſcals, who ſtile themſelves Apoſtles,
" great corrupters of the Jewiſh Law. He told them,
" let the Goſpel be ſupported and preached by you.
" Afterwards he aſcended into Heaven in preſence of " them all, and left them all twelve upon earth; and
" now they wage a very heavy war againſt us, in the " city, called Jeruſalem, and all about the country of " Judæa; which puts us in a great perplexity. Ye
" black Devils, let every one of you be active to ſee
" theſe raſcals put to death: If you ſuffer them to pre" vail in the leaſt over us, God will treat us much
" worſe for it. Therefore, you Satan make haſte to " them, and reſolve to give them battle immediately,
" and thus deſtroy at once that damned rabble. Go " to the Prieſts of the Law, (to whom I with conti" nual authority and riches) and remembring their
" curſed covetouſneſs, give them a perfect knowledge
" of theſe villains."

Satan anſwers.

" De tous les droicts aſſez entends l'affaire
" Pour exploicter ſans long temps pretendu
" Au fonds d'enfer je puiſſe eſtre pendu
" Si en brief temps je ne fais des merveilles
" Puiſqu'il convient que je ſouffle es oreilles
" Bien toſt mourrent les coquins de Jeſus.

That is,

" I underſtand the whole buſineſs ſo well, that I
" will go upon it immediately, without arguing any " longer. Let me be hanged in the bottom of hell,
" if I do not perform wonders in a very little time:
" and ſince it is proper, that I ſhould ſtir up the " Prieſt, theſe raſcally followers of Jeſus will ſoon
" die."

Lucifer having given every one of the Devils his particular commiſſion, Satan ſpeaks to him thus.

" Voy Lucifer tous Dyables ſont enclins
" Par tout ſouldains movemens & declins
" Deſſus le champs leur devoir tres bien faire,
" Mais au depart pour mieulx nous ſatisfaire
" Ta patte eſtends ſur nos groings dyabolicques
" Pour confirmer nos eſprits drachoniques
" Que recevons pour benediction (10).

(10) Ibid. folio 5 verſo.

That is,

" See Lucifer, all the Devils are diſpoſed by a ſudden
" motion and inclination, immediately to go and do
" their duty very well. But the better to incourage
" us at our departure, ſtretch thy paw over our dia-
" bolical ſnouts, to confirm our damned ſpirits; we ſhall
" take it as a bleſſing."

To this Lucifer anſwers,

" Dyables damnez en malediction
" Deſſus vous tous par puiſſance interdicte
" Mu patte eſtends qui eſt de Dieu mauldicte
" Pour de tous maulx et malfaies vous abſouldre
" Couverts ſoyez de fulminante fouldre.

That is,

" Devils, damned in malediction, by my power which " is interdicted, I ſtretch over you all my paw which " is curſed of God in order to abſolve you of all " evil and wicked actions; be covered with fulminat-
" ing lightning."

Was not this a very ſilly manner of writing? And was it not turning indirectly into ridicule that holy and apoſtolic ceremony, the laying on of hands?

After theſe dialogues between the Devils, we meet with others, which are ſtill worſe in their kind: for the diſcourſes, which the Author makes God and Jeſus Chriſt hold ſpeaking to one another, are intirely below the dignity of the ſubject. The officers, who impriſoned the two Apoſtles, who had cured a lame man, ſpeak in ſuch a burleſque manner, that it is downright farce.

AGRIPPART.

Prends moy ce galland par le poing
Et me le lye d'une corde.

GRIFFON.

Si je lui fais miſericorde
Beau Sire, je veuil qu'on me tonde.

AGRIPPART.

Eſt il lye.

GRIFFON.

Le mieux du monde
Allans les cacher pour la pluye.
Vous ſerez enfans de la lye
Gallans, car vous ſerez en cage (11).

(11) Ibid. folio 6.

ſages, which had nothing very extraordinary in them. We may therefore wonder that he quoted nothing from Lewis Chocquet's Poems, for they meet in them with ſome very ſtrange

That is,

" AGRIPPART. Take this ſpark by the wriſt, and " tie him with a rope.

" GRIFFON. If I have the leaſt pity on him, my " pretty fellow, let me be whipped.

" AGRIP. Is he tied?

" GRIFF. As well as can be wiſhed. Let's go, and " put 'em a ſtone doublet on, for fear they ſhould " catch cold. Come, my ſparks, you will be like " young birds, for you ſhall be put in a cage."

Trottemenu, Annas the High-Prieſt's Meſſenger, ſpeaks in a ſtill more burleſque manner.

" C'eſt rage comme je chopine
" De chanter ne me puis tenir,
" Toutes les fois que je chemine,
" Il n'eſt choſe qui ne ſe mine,
" J'ai huy ſi bien tiré laureille
" Puis le matin a ma bouteille,
" Que tout eſt pieca mis en vente
" Je n'ay garde quelle ſefuente
" Car plus ny a raiſin ne mouſt (12).

(12) Ibid. folio 7.

That is,

" I have toped ſo plentifully, that I can't forbear " ſinging. When I walk, it ſeems that every thing " turns topſy-turvy. I have been drinking to day " ever ſince the morning, that all I had is now pawn- " ed or ſold. I don't fear that my wine ſhould deaden, " for I have neither grapes nor muſt left."

Let us tranſcribe ſome paſſages from the Dialogue between Annas and Caiphas.

ANNE.

" Je les ai veus tres bonnes gens (13).
" Loyaulx & de bonne faſſon
" Et mont apporte du poiſſon
" Cent fois a vendre en mon hoſtel.

(13) He means the two Apoſtles Peter and John, who had been impriſoned.

CAYPHAS.

" Eſt il vray.

ANNE.

" Par Dieu il eſt tel
" Mes gens en ont bien ſouvenance:
" Mais pour mieulx vivre a leur plaiſance
" Ils ont delaiſſe leur meſtier,
" Dont ils n'auoient pas meſtier,
" Car tres bien ils en pouoient viure
" Et depuis ont voulu enſuyure
" Jeſus le mauvais Sciſmaticque
" Qui leur a apprins la magicque
" Et nygromance on le ſcait bien,
" Car il eſtoit magicien
" Le plus grand qui fuſt juſqu'a Romme (14).

14) Prémier Livre des Actes des Apoſtres, folio 8 verſo.

That is,

" ANNAS. I have ſeen them when they were very " good men, and very loyal: for they have brought " me an hundred times fiſh to ſell at my houſe.

" CAIPHAS. Is it true?

" ANN. By God, it is: My ſervants remember it " very well. But in order to live in plenty, they " have left their trade, which they had no occaſion to " do, for it could ſufficiently maintain them: and " they would follow Jeſus, that wicked ſchiſmatick, " who taught them Magick and Necromancy, as is " very well known; for he was the greateſt magician " that could be met with all the way from hence to " Rome."

The juridical examination of the lame man ought, I think, to be here tranſcribed.

ANNE.

" . . . mais je te vueil demander
" S'il eſt vray ce qu'on a compte
" On nous a icy recite
" Que pour trouuer moyen de viure
" Toy qui eſtoys fort & deliure
" Faignoys d'eſtre tout contrefaict.
" D'y hardiment ſi tu las faict
" Je le te feray pardonner
" Avecques ce te feray donner
" De l'argent pour toy bien pourvoir
" Plus qu'ils nont: On peut bien ſcavoir
" Qu'ils ten ont donne & promis
" Affin que dies qu'ils tont mis
" En bon eſtat & en ſante
" Pour avoir bruyt par la cité
" De faire miracles patens (15).

(15) Ibid. folio 8 verſo.

That is,

" ANNAS. .... but I muſt aſk you, whether it be " true, as we have been told here that in order to get " a livelihood, you, that were a ſtrong and luſty man " feigned to be lame. Own it roundly; I ſhall pro- " cure you a pardon, and even money to provide for " yourſelf, more than they have. We may be ſure, " that they gave and promiſed you ſome, to make " you ſay that they reſtored you to your health and " the uſe of your limbs, in order to raiſe them through " the whole city the reputation of working unqueſ- " tionable miracles."

It is eaſy to form a judgment of the whole work by theſe inſtances taken from the firſt volume: but it muſt be obſerved, that there are numberleſs paſſages much more ridiculous and burleſque, than thoſe I have quoted.

It muſt alſo be obſerved, that the Author admits without the leaſt ſcruple all the popular traditions. He has inſerted (16) a long epiſode concerning Dionyſius the Areopagite, and his being ordained a Biſhop. He has (17) another and much longer Epiſode concerning the death, reſurrection and aſſumption of the Holy Virgin. Such dramatical performances were admired in thoſe times, but now they are looked upon with ſcorn. I muſt tranſcribe in this place the following verſes of Mr. Boileau Des Preaux;

(16) In the 5th book.

(17) Ibid.

Chez nos devots Ayeux le Théatre abhorré
Fut long-tems dans la France un plaiſir ignoré.
De Pelerins, dit-on, une troupe groſſiére
En public à Paris y monta la prémiere,
Et ſotement zélée en ſa ſimplicité
Joüa les Saints, la Vierge, & Dieu, par pieté.
Le Savoir à la fin diſſipant l'Ignorance
Fit voir de ce projet la dévote imprudence.
On chaſſa ces Docteurs préchant ſans miſſion,
On vit renaître Hector, Andromaque, Ilion (18).

(18) Des Preaux, Art. Poëtique, Chant 3. ver. 81, &c.

That is,

" Our pious fathers in their prieſt-rid age,
" As impious and profane, abhorr'd the ſtage:
" A troop of ſilly pilgrims, as 'tis ſaid,
" Fooliſhly zealous, ſcandalouſly playd
" The Angels, God, the Virgin, and the Saints,
" (Inſtead of Heroes and of Love's complaints.)
" At laſt right reaſon did her laws reveal,
" And ſhewed the folly of their ill-plac'd zeal,
" Silenc'd thoſe Nonconformiſts of the Age,
" And rais'd the lawful Heroes of the ſtage."

If you deſire to ſee a Commentary upon this, read the following paſſage (19). " It is certain, that theſe " pious ſhews were firſt introduced by the Pilgrims. " They who returned from Jeruſalem and the Holy " Land, from St. James's of Compoſtella, from Sainte- " Baume of Provence, from Sainte Reine, from Mount " St. Michael, from Our Lady du Puy, and from " ſome other holy places, uſed to compoſe hymns con- " cerning their journeys, in which they inſerted ſome " accounts of the Life and Death of our Saviour, or " a deſcription of the Day of Judgment, but in a " very coarſe manner, which Muſic, and the ſimpli- " city of thoſe times rendered however ſufferable. " They alſo ſung the Miracles of the Saints, their " Martyrdom, and ſome Stories, which the credulous " vulgar called Viſions and Apparitions. Several of " theſe Pilgrims uſed to travel together; and ſtopped " in the ſtreets and public places, where with the ſtaff " in hand, and their ſhort mantle covered with ſhells, " and images of different colours, they acted a kind " of ſhew which pleaſed the people, and engaged ſome " devout

THE origin of this ſort of dramatic pieces.

(19) Meneſtrier, Repreſentations en Muſique anciennes & modernes, pag. 153, 154.

ſtrange and ſurpriſing ſcenes. We ſhall ſupply that defect, and make this work a little better known, than it is by Du Verdier's account of it.

" devout Citizens at Paris to raiſe a ſum of money, " and to buy a piece of ground on which they built " a Theatre, where theſe myſteries were acted on " Holy-days, both for the inſtruction and diverſion of " the people. There were ſuch public Theatres in " Italy; I have ſeen one at Veletri on the road from " Rome to Naples, in a public place; and it is not " forty years ſince they have left off acting there the " Myſteries of our Saviour's life. Theſe devout ſhews " were thought to be ſomething ſo beautiful in thoſe " ignorant times, that they were the chief ornaments " of the ſhew, with which Princes were entertained at " their arrival in cities. And as they uſed to cry, " Noel, Noel, inſtead of Long live the King, ſo they " acted in the ſtreets the Story of the Samaritan Wo- " man, that of Dives and Lazarus, the Paſſion of Jeſus " Chriſt, and ſeveral other Myſteries, at the public " entries of our Kings. The Pſalms and other parts " of the Church Liturgy in proſe, were the Operas of " thoſe days. Men went to meet the Princes with " the Banners of the Church, ſinging all the while ſome " Hymns compoſed to their honour, from ſeveral paſ- " ſages of Scripture, alluding to ſome of their moſt " remarkable actions, or to ſome circumſtances of " their reign."

[* As Mr. Bayle has inadvertently committed a ſmall miſtake in this article, we think it proper to correct it in this place, and at the ſame time we ſhall give a ſhort ſupplement to his account. He aſcribes both the Acts of the Apoſtles, and the Apocalypſe to Chocquet, who wrote only the latter. Mr. Bayle was miſled by Du Verdier, who makes Chocquet the Author of theſe two Poems (α). But la Croix du Maine, who, as Mr. Bayle very well obſerves, knew nothing of Chocquet, mentions the Book of the Acts of the Apoſtles, and tells us, that this work was begun by one Arnoul Greban, and finiſhed by Simon Greban his brother. Arnoul Greban, ſays he (β), born at Compiegne in Picardy, who was a Canon of Mans, in or about the year 1450, and brother of Simon Greban . . . . tranſlated the Acts of the Apoſtles out of Latin into French verſe, which tranſlation has been finiſhed by his ſaid brother, and printed at Paris by Galiot du Pré. In another place he ſays (γ), that Simon Greban, Secretary to Charles d' Anjou Count du Maine . . . continued the book of the Acts of the Apoſtles, begun by his brother Arnoul, which, continues he, were acted in ſeveral cities of France, viz. at Mans, Angers, Bourges and in other cities: I have them by me in manuſcript, they are written in French verſe. Peter Curet or Cúeuret printed them, after he had reviſed and corrected them, &c. Laſtly in the Article of Cuevret he ſays (δ), that Peter Cuevret, or according to others, Curet, a Canon of the Church of St. Julian at Mans in the year 1510 . . . . . reviſed and corrected the Acts of the Apoſtles, written and compoſed in French verſe by Arnoul and Simon Greban brothers born at Compiegne in Picardy. Let us obſerve, that the Apocalypſe is not mentioned in the King's licenſe granted to Alabat, and of which Mr. Bayle ſpeaks. Let us alſo obſerve, that Sir Hans Sloane has in his Library an Edition of the Acts of the Apoſtles, which he ſhewed to Mr. Des Maizeux, and which is different from that mentioned by Mr. Bayle. It is a large Folio very well printed in a black letter. It is divided into two parts. The firſt is intitled, Le premier Volume du triumphant Myſtere des Actes des Apoſtres, tranſlate fidelement a la verite hiſtoriale, eſcripte par Sainct Luc a Theophile, & illuſtre des legendes autentiques & vies des Saincts receues pas legliſe: tout ordonne par perſonnages. Avec privilege du Roy. i. e. " The " firſt volume of the triumphant myſtery of the Acts " of the Apoſtles, faithfully tranſlated according to the " hiſtorical truth written by St. Luke to Theophilus, " and illuſtrated with authentick Legends, and with " the lives of the Saints acknowledged by the Church: " the whole written in a dramatic method. With the " King's Licenſe." Neither the place where it was printed nor the year of the impreſſion are ſet down. The King's Licenſe is dated July the 24th 1536. We find after it an advertiſement of Alabat, in which he ſeems to aſcribe the Acts of the Apoſtles only to Simon Greban, a very eloquent man, an excellent Poet, and a Doctor of Divinity. He alſo tells us, that this work has been approved by the Doctors of Divinity. It appears alſo from this Advertiſement; 1, That this Comedy, if we may call it ſo, had been acted at Bourges ſome time before it was printed. There is an edition of it printed at Paris for the Angeliers, in 1540, in 4to, with this title, Le triumphant Myſtere des Actes des Apoſtres joue a Bourge. " The triumphant myſtery " of the Acts of the Apoſtles acted at Bourges." 2. That Sir Hans Sloane's Edition, which I ſpeak of, is the firſt, and muſt have been printed in 1536. Alabat's advertiſement was left out of the Edition printed in 1541. 3. That Chocquet's Apocalypſe was printed for the firſt time in 1541, with the Acts of the Apoſtles; and indeed we find the following words at the end of Chocquet's work. Fin du Myſtere de l'apocalipſe Sanct Jehan Evangeliſte nouvellement redigé par perſonnages, avec les Miracles faicts en liſle de Pathmos, le tout hiſtorie ſelon les viſions. Et fut acheve ledit livre d'imprimer le XXVII jour de May l'an mil cinq cent XLI, pour Arnoul & Charles les Angeliers freres. i. e. " Here ends the myſtery of the Apocalypſe of St. John " the Evangeliſt, newly written in a dramatic way, " with the miracles performed in the iſland of Patmos, " the whole being related according to the viſions. " It was printed off May the 27th, 1541 &c. (ε)." [ADD. REM.]'

(α) Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 796.

(β) Bibliotheque de la Croix du Maine, pag. 24.

(γ) Pag. 456.

(δ) Pag. 391.

(ε) Taken from Mr. Des Maizeaux's Remarks upon Mr. Bayle's Letters. Lettres de Mr. Bayle, tom. 3. Let. 245. à Mr. Des Maizeaux, pag. 221, &c. note 3.

CHRYSEIS, the daughter of Chryſes Prieſt of Apollo, is more known by this Patronymic than by her true name Aſtynome. She was taken by Achilles, when he ſacked Lyrneſſus and ſome other places in the neighbourhood of Troy; and was married to the King of that country (a). Agamemnon taking a great fancy to her retained her for himſelf, and was ſo far from conſenting to reſtore her to the good old Chryſes who came to demand her back, attired in his Sacerdotal ornaments, and furniſhed with a conſiderable ranſom, that he repulſed him in a very unworthy manner (b). The reaſons why he was deſirous to keep this Concubine may be ſeen in Homer [A]. Chryſes beſought

(a) Dictys, lib. 2. pag. m. 172.

(b) Homer. Iliad. lib. 1.

[A] The reaſons why Agamemnon was deſirous to keep this concubine may be ſeen in Homer.] He declares in the Council of War, that he thought her preferable to his wife Clytæmneſtra, whom he had married; and that Chryſeïs was not at all inferior to Clytæmneſtra, with regard either to her perſon, her mind, or her ſkill in women's works:

. . . . . Ἐπεὶ πολὺ βούλομαι αὐτὴν
Οἴκοι ἔχειν· καὶ γάρ ῥα Κλυταιμνήστρης προβέβουλα
Κουριδίης ἀλόχου, ἐπεὶ οὐ ἧσσον ἔη γε χερείων,
Οὔ δέμας, οὐδὲ φυήν, οὐτ' ἄρ φρένας, οὔτε τι ἔργα. (1)

That is,

Becauſe my prize, my beauteous maid I hold,
And heav'nly charms prefer to proffer'd gold:
A maid, unmatch'd in manners as in face,
Skill'd in each art, and crown'd with every grace.
Not half ſo dear were Clytæmneſtra's charms,
When firſt her blooming beauties bleſt my arms.
Mr. Pope.

(1) Homer. Iliad. lib. 1. ver. 112.

He had already told Chryſes that he would detain Chryſeïs till ſhe was old, and that he deſigned to keep her to weave cloth for him and to lie with him.

Τὴν δ' ἐγὼ οὐ λύσω, πρίν μιν καὶ γῆρας ἐπείσῃ
Ἡμετέρῳ ἐνὶ οἴκῳ ἐν Ἀργείῃ τηλόθι πάτρης
Ἰστὸν ὑφαινομένην καὶ ἐμὸν λέχος ἀντιόωσαν (2).

That is,

Mine is thy daughter, Prieſt, and ſhall remain;
And pray'rs, and tears, and bribes ſhall plead in vain:

(2) Ibid. ver. 29.

fought Apollo to revenge him, and was heard: the peſtilence began to rage in the Grecian army, and ceaſed not till Chryſeïs was ſent back to her father, according to the advice of the Soothſayer Calchas (c). She was with child; and yet ſhe pretended that no one had touched her: and when ſhe could no longer conceal her condition, ſhe affirmed ſhe was not with child by a man, but by the God Apollo (d). The ſon which ſhe was delivered of was named Chryſes. He was informed of his extraction ſomewhat late; however he was informed of it time enough to render a conſiderable ſervice to his brother Oreſtes [B]. Some ſay Iphigenia was the daughter of Agamemnon and Chryſeïs (e). Others relate that Chryſes, being acquainted with the kind treatment which the Greeks had ſhewn his daughter, brought her back to the army, and delivered her again into the hands of Agamemnon (f). We have ſhewn, in the Remarks on the Article BRISEIS, that Horace reaſoned ill, when he made uſe of the example of that Grecian Prince † to prove his friend need not be aſhamed of loving his ſervant-maid. I ſhall obſerve here that Briſeïs and Chryſeïs were couſin germans [C].

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Hygin. cap. 121.

(e) Tzetzes in Lycophron. & Magnum Etymologicum, in Voce Χρυσόπολις.

(f) Dictys, lib. 2. pag. 180.

† [Horace makes uſe of Agamemnon's example with regard not to Chryſeïs, but to Caſſandra. See the Article of CASSANDRA, Remark [G]. ADD. REM.]

'Till time ſhall riſle ev'ry youthful grace,
And age diſmiſs her from my cold embrace,
In daily labours of the loom employ'd,
Or doom'd to deck the bed ſhe once enjoy'd.

Mr. Pope.

Monſr. Perrault, ridiculing this paſſage of the Iliad, has taken one name for another: let Agamemnon, ſays he, keep Briſeïs the High-Prieſt's daughter to make him cloth (3). However, as well pleaſed as Agamemnon was with Chryſeïs, he declared in the Council of War, that provided they would repair his loſs he would reſtore her, if that were neceſſary to prevent the army's deſtruction. He actually did reſtore her, but he indemnified himſelf at the expence of Achilles, from whom he took Briſeïs (4). Achilles would fight no more, whence proceeded an infinite number of evils; and ſo the calamities of that War were always occaſioned by women. If three or four perſons could have lain without females, the lives of two or three hundred thouſand men had been ſaved. The caſe was not ſo deplorable or ſo ſhameful, when it was ſaid:

(3) Paralle'e, tom. 2. pag. 34.

(4) See Arrian's Epictetus, Book 2. chap. 24.

Scilicet, ut Turno contingat regia conjux,
Nos animæ viles, inhumata infletaque turba,
Sternamur campis (5).

(5) Virgil. Æn. lib. 11. verſ. 371.

That is,

" That Turnus may obtain a royal bride,
" We, an ignoble crowd, without a name,
" Unwept, unworthy of the fun'ral flame,
" Are laid in duſt. . . . .

[B] The ſon which ſhe was delivered of . . . rendred a conſiderable piece of ſervice to his brother Oreſtes.] By helping the Author out a little, we find in the CXXIſt Chapter of Hyginus, that Oreſtes and Iphigenia, having eſcaped from Taurica Cherſoneſus with the ſtatue of Diana, landed in the iſland of Sminthe where Chryſes was Prieſt of Apollo. The young Chryſes, I mean the ſon of Agamemnon and Chryſeïs, had a mind to ſend thoſe two perſons back to Thoas King of Taurica; but his father † acquainted him with the fraternal relation which he bore the new comers. Then the young Chryſes joined Oreſtes to return into Taurica, there to kill Thoas; which having executed they went thence to Mycenæ with the ſtatue of Diana. This is ill enough related in the ſupplement of Moreri; circumſtances have been added which are not in Hyginus, and thoſe which are in that Writer have been forgotten, and yet he is the only one cited. Stephanus Byzantinus tells us that the city of Chryſopolis took its name from Chryſes the ſon of Agamemnon and Chryſeïs. Thoſe who ſay this woman inſiſted that ſhe brought back her honour ſafe and ſound from the Grecian army, follow probability; for it is the language of almoſt all women who are run away with, or are found in towns taken by ſtorm (6). It was a very convenient thing at the time of the ſiege of Troy, that a girl might ſay ſhe was with child by a God.

† [Mr. Bayle ſhould have ſaid his grandfather.]

(6) Louis Guyon, in his Diverſes Leçons, tom. 3. liv. 4. chap. 14 & 15, approves and adviſes this language.

[C] Chryſeïs and Briſeïs were Couſin-Germans.] For Briſes and Chryſes were brothers, and ſons of Adrys, Βρίσης γὰρ καὶ Χρύσης ἀδελφοὶ ἦσαν, παῖδες Ἀδρύος. Theſe are the words of Euſtathius (7). The learned and obliging Mr. Drelincourt directed me to them.

(7) In Iliad. A. pag. 58. lin. 28.

CHRYSIPPUS, natural ſon of Pelops [A], was of incomparable beauty (a). Laius became paſſionately in love with him, and carried him away by force (b); but he was purſued with ſuch ſpeed, that his prey was taken from him, and himſelf brought priſoner to Pelops, who forgave him the fact, in conſideration that Love had induced him to commit it. The affection of Pelops for Chryſippus was greater than that which he bore his legitimate children; for which reaſon his wife Hippodamia, animated by a Step-mother's ſpirit, exhorted Atreus and Thyeſtes, two of her ſons, to take away this baſtard's life; for ſhe made no doubt but he would one day aſpire to the Crown. They refuſed her that baſe act of complaiſance; and then ſhe took the reſolution to execute her ill deſign with her own hand: ſhe took Laius's ſword, while he ſlept, and made uſe of it to diſpatch Chryſippus. The ſuſpicion fell upon Laius, becauſe of his ſword; but Chryſippus, before he expired, had time to clear him. Pelops contented himſelf with turning away Hippodamia (c). There are ſome Authors (d) who ſay that ſhe did not kill Chryſippus with her own hand, but cauſed the murder to be committed by Atreus and Thyeſtes, and that when they had ſlain Chryſippus they threw him into a well. Their father would not ſee them any more, and they retired to Triphylia (e). Some ſay (f) he was not ſo favourable as to content himſelf with baniſhing his wife, and that it was principally on her that he deſigned to revenge the death of Chryſippus; but he could not do it, for ſhe eſcaped to Midea (g). Others ſay that ſeeing her ſelf accuſed by her huſband ſhe ſlew her ſelf (h). We learn from Thucydides, that Atreus fled to his nephew Euryſtheus King of Mycenæ (i). It muſt not be imagined that this Chryſippus was a different perſon from him whom Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and Firmicus Maternus,

(a) Hygin. cap. 85 and 272.

(b) See the Remark [B].

(c) Extracted from Plutarch, in Parallelis, pag. 313. He cites Dæſitheus in Pelopidis.

(d) Scholiaſt. Euripidis in Oreſt. Tzetzes, Hiſt. 18. See alſo Hyginus, cap. 84.

(e) A part of Elis in Peloponneſus.

(f) Pauſan. lib. 6. pag. 502, Ed. 1696.

(g) A town in the territory of Argos.

(h) Hygin. cap. 75.

(i) Φεύγοντα τὸν πατέρα διὰ τὸν Χρυσίππου θάνατον. Patrem fugienti (Atreo) propter Chryſippi necem. Thucyd. lib. 1. See alſo Plato, in Cratyl. pag. m. 272, C.

(1) Plutarch. in Parallel. p. 313.
(2) Apoſtolius, Cent. 18. num. 7. Scholiaſt. Eurip. in Oreſt. verſ. 5.
(3) Scholiaſt. Pindari, ad Olymp. A.

[A] He was natural ſon of Pelops.] Some ſay the miſtreſs who bore him this fine child was the Nymph Danaïs (1). Others name her Axioche (2), or Aſtyoche (3); but the Scholiaſt on Homer ſuppoſes the mother of Chryſippus to have been the lawful wife of Pelops. Conſult him on the 105th verſe of the ſecond Book of the Iliad. He ſpeaks, as well as the other writers, of the jealouſy of Hippodamia, and the aſſaſſination committed by Atreus and Thyeſtes, and cites Hellanicus.

Maternus, have given for a companion to Ganymede [B]. Moreri's Dictionary has not as yet ſpoken of this ſon of Pelops, or of CHRYSIPPUS of Tyana [C], Author of a Book concerning the method of making bread (k): but CHRYSIPPUS a famous Phyſician, and native of Cnidos [D], and CHRYSIPPUS the ſcholar of Eraſiſtratus have not been forgotten. It is there wrongly affirmed of this Scholar of Eraſiſtratus, that he had compoſed Georgies; for that is a Work which Diogenes Laertius aſcribes to a different Chryſippus (l).

(k) Athenæus, lib. 3. pag. 113. and lib. 14. pag. 647.

(l) Diogen. Laert. lib. 7. num. 186.

CHRYSIPPUS

[B] It muſt not be imagined that this Chryſippus was a different perſon from him whom Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius . . . have given for a companion to Ganymede.] Clemens Alexandrinus reproaches the Pagans with the Pederaſty of their Gods, and makes uſe of the following words: Οὐδὲ γὰρ οἱ θεοὶ παίδων ἀπέσχοντο οἱ παρ' ὑμῖν θεοί. ὁ μέν τις, Ὕλλε· ὁ δὲ, Ὑακίνθε· ὁ δὲ, Πέλοπ· ὁ δὲ, Χρυσίππε· ὁ δὲ, Γανυμήδης ἐρῶντες· τούτους ὑμῶν καὶ γυναῖκες προσκυνεῖσθαι τοὺς θεοὺς· τοιούτους δὲ σύζυγάς εἶναι τοὺς ἄνδρας τοὺς ἑαυτῶν, οὕτω σώφρονας, ἵνα ὅτι ὁμοιοι τοῖς θεοῖς, τὰ ἴσα ἐζηλωκότες. Nam nec à pueris quidem dii veſtri abſtinuere, unus quidem Hyllam, alius verò Hyacinthum, alius Pelopem, alius Chryſippum, alius autem Ganymedem, amantes. Hos deos veſtræ uxores adorent, tales autem ſuos eſſe maritos precentur, adeò temperantes, ut ſint diis ſimiles, ſimilia conſectantes (4). i. e. "For neither did "your Gods abſtain from boys; one loving Hylas, "another Hyacinthus, another Pelops, another Chry- "ſippus, and another Ganymede. Let your wives "worſhip theſe Gods, and let them pray that their huſ- "bands may be ſuch and as ſober, that they may reſem- "ble the Gods, and purſue the like things." Arnobius, who copies this paſſage, as he does a great many others, from the ſame father, expreſſes himſelf in altogether as vague a manner: Quid, quòd non contenti feminei generis attribuiſſe Diis curas, etiam ſexus adjungitis adamatos ab his mares? Hylam neſcio quis diligit; Hyacintho eſt alius occupatus: ille Pelopis deſideriis flagrat: hic in Chryſippum ſuſpirat ardentius: Catamitus rapitur delicium futurus, & poculorum cuſtos: & ut Jovis dicatur pullus, in partibus Fabius aduritur mollibus, obſignaturque poſticis (5). Firmicus Maternus is a little more particular: he names not only Jupiter with regard to Ganymede, but alſo Hercules with regard to Hylas, and Apollo as to Hyacinthus. Chryſippus and Pelops are the only youths whoſe lovers he does not name. Puerorum aliquis delectatur amplexibus, Ganymedem in ſinu Jovis quærat, Herculem videat Hylam impatienti amore quærentem, Hyacinthi deſiderio captum Apollinem diſcat. Chryſippum alius, alius Pelopem videat, ut per Deos ſuos ſibi licere dicat, quicquid hodie ſeveriſſime Romanis legibus vindicatur (6). His Commentator (7) has nothing to ſay. I have hunted in vain for ſome note in Theodore Canterus, in Godeſchalcus Stewechius, in Gebhartus Elmenhorſtius, and in Deſiderius Heraldus, four famous Commentators on Arnobius; I found them all four as mute as fiſhes with reſpect to our Chryſippus, and the God or Hero who loved him in a criminal way: but what can be the reaſon that the three ancient Writers whom I have cited keep to ſuch uncertain expreſſions as to this laſt particular, and that the firſt has even forborn to name the lover either of Hyacinthus, or of Ganymede? It would be raſh and unjuſt to ſuſpect him of any unfair deſign, as if knowing that Chryſippus's lover was a meer man, he had not dared to name him; and that it might not be thought there was any artifice in this omiſſion, he had at the ſame time ſuppreſſed the names of the others. Let us ſay, either that his memory deceived him, and that on ſome confuted notions he thruſt in Chryſippus among the boys who had been beloved by Gods; or rather that he remembred ſome Authors (8) attributed to Jupiter what almoſt all the reſt attributed to Laius. Let us ſtick to this latter tradition, and ſay that the lover of this beautiful youth was neither a God, nor a Demigod, but a Theban (9), the ſon of Labdacus. Conſult Athenæus, who will inform you that Laius being entertained in Pelops's houſe, fell in love with Chryſippus, his hoſt's ſon, carried him off, and fled with him to Thebes (10). This Author adds, that Laius was ſaid to be the firſt who loved in that way. Ælian aſſerts the ſame thing, and that from thence the Thebans came to think it honourable and praiſe-worthy to make love after the ſame manner (11). Note that according to Hyginus it was Theſeus who forced away Chryſippus (12); but the paſſage muſt be ſuppoſed to have been corrupted: wherefore ſee the ingenious Conjecture of Perizonius, according to which, inſtead of quem Theſeus ludis rapuit, he would have us read quem Nemeis Laius rapuit (13). And indeed Hyginus had related in his LXXXVth chapter that Laius carried off Chryſippus at the Nemean games (14). Take notice he ſubjoins that Pelops recovered him, having made war on the raviſher. Take notice alſo Piſander was of opinion that the young man was ſo aſhamed of his adventure that he ſlew himſelf. Piſander apud Eurip. Scholiaſt. pag. 402. Edit. Steph. ipſum (Chryſippum) præ pudore intuliſſe ſibi manus autumat (15).

(4) Clem. Alexandr. in Protrept. pag. 21, A.

(5) Arnob. lib. 4. pag. 145.

(6) Firmicus Maternus, de Errore profanar. Religionum, pag. m. 24.

(7) Joannes à Wower.

(8) Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 603, 604, cites Praxilla Sicyonia.

(9) He was King of Thebes.

(10) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 603, 604.

(11) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 13. cap. 5. and Hiſtor. Animal. lib. 6. cap. 15. pag. m. 339.

(12) Hygin. cap. 272.

(13) In Notis ad hunc locum referente Thoma Munckero.

(14) Propter formæ dignitatem Nemeæ ludis rapuit. Hygin. cap. 85.

(15) Munckerus in Hygin. ibid. pag. 140.

[C] Moreri's Dictionary has not as yet ſpoken of . . . CHRYSIPPUS of Tyana.] Jonſius ſuppoſes Athenæus has beſtowed on him the elogy of a moſt venerable Writer (16): but it is a meer irony in the mouth of one of Athenæus's interlocutors; and this may ſafely be compared to the docte Cati which I have ſpoken of above (17). There is more reaſon to ſay that Athenæus calls him an able diſcourſer about tarts and cakes. Σοφὸς πιμματολόγος. Sapiens ille Pemmatum ſcriptor (18).

(16) Σεμνότατος συγγραφεὺς dicitur apud Athenæum XIV, 16. Jonſ. de Script. Hiſt. Philoſ. pag. 157.

(17) Remark [E] of the Article CATIUS.

(18) Athen. lib. 14. cap. 15. pag. 648.

[D] CHRYSIPPUS a famous Phyſician, and native of Cnidos.] Pliny ſpeaks of him as of a man who had made extraordinary innovations in Phyſic: Horum placita, ſays he (19), Chryſippus ingenti garrulitate mutavit, plurimumque & ex Chryſippo diſcipulus ejus Eraſiſtratus, Ariſtotelis filia genitus. i. e. "Their doc- "trines did Chryſippus change with great garrulity, "and after him his Scholar Eraſiſtratus, begotten on "Ariſtotle's daughter, made conſiderable alterations "therein." Let us obſerve the two qualifications which are here given to Eraſiſtratus: the 1ſt is that of Chryſippus's Scholar; the 2d, that of the ſon of Ariſtotle's daughter. This agrees not with what we read in Sextus Empiricus (20), that Pythias the daughter of Ariſtotle was thrice married, 1ſt, to Nicanor; 2, to Procles, by whom ſhe had two ſons who ſtudied Philoſophy under Theophraſtus; 3, to the Phyſician Metrodorus, who had been the Scholar of Chryſippus the Cnidian, and who taught Eraſiſtratus. Of this third marriage iſſued a ſon who was named Ariſtotle. Perhaps Eraſiſtratus was adopted by Metrodorus and Pythias (21), and in that caſe Pliny would be to blame only for having made ſomewhat an ill choice of the word genitus, i. e. begotten. We find in Diogenes Laertius that Eraſiſtratus acknowledged he had learned many things from this Chryſippus (22); but the expreſſion being equivocal, it cannot be determined whether he learned them by lectures, or by reading. Galen looks on Chryſippus the Cnidian as the maſter of Eraſiſtratus, and as the head of thoſe who diſapproved bleeding (23). Father Hardouïn obſerves that this Chryſippus compoſed a treatiſe de Braſſica, i. e. of the Colewort, and an entire Work περὶ λαχάνων, de Oleribus, i. e. of Kitchen-herbs. He quotes Pliny and Diogenes Laertius as to the firſt of theſe two particulars, and the Sholiaſt on Nicander (24) as to the ſecond (25). But Camerarius, in the catalogue of Authors de Re Ruſtica which he has joined to his own Treatiſe de Re Ruſtica printed at Nurembergh 1595, in 12mo. has aſcribed the Book de Braſſica to a Chryſippus the Scholar of Eraſiſtratus. Conſult Jonſius, who has reckoned up no leſs than nineteen Chryſippus's, without affirming them, however, to have been all diſtinct perſons (26). His Collections are good and curious. The Author of the Treatiſe de Braſſica ſet up the Colewort for a Panacea. Chryſippus medicus peculiarem braſſicæ librum dicavit, omnium morborum ex ea remedia continentem (27). Let us not forget that Chryſippus the Cnidian was father of another Chryſippus, who was Phyſician to King Ptolemy, and being oppreſſed by calumny, was ſcourged and put to death (28). Laſtly, let us obſerve that Moreri is in the wrong to ſay it is not well known at what time Chryſippus of Cnidos lived. It is eaſy to infer that he was contemporary with Alexander the Great, and the firſt Ptolemy.

(19) Plinius, lib. 29. cap. 1. pag. m. 663.

(20) Sextus Empiricus adverſus Mathemat. cap. 12. pag. 51.

(21) See Father Hardouin on this paſſage of Pliny.

(22) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 186.

(23) Galen. de Venæ Sect. contra Eraſiſtr. cap 2, & 5, item alibi.

(24) Ad Theriac. pag. 39.

(25) Hard. in Indice Autor. Plinij, pag. 104.

(26) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſ. pag. 157.

(27) Plinius Valerianus, de re Medica, lib. 4. cap. 29. See alſo Pliny, lib. 20. cap. 9.

(28) Diogen. Laert. lib. 7. num. 186.

CHRYSIPPUS, a Stoick Philoſopher, was born at Solos in Cilicia (a). Some Authors aſſert that he was Zeno's diſciple (b); but we know with more certainty, that he ſtudied under Cleanthes Zeno's ſucceſſor (c); but as he had a very acute genius [A], and a particular ſkill in arguing, he did not adhere to the whole doctrine of theſe two great Philoſophers, but confuted them in ſeveral points (d). He wrote a great many books, above 705, as we are told, ſeveral of which related to Logic [B], for he applied himſelf with a great deal of care to cultivate and improve that part of Philoſophy. The great number of books he compoſed, will not be ſo ſurpriſing, if it be conſidered, that he wrote ſeveral times upon the ſame ſubject; that he ſet down whatever came into his head;

(a) Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 462.

(b) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. in Chryſippo, num. 179.

(c) Valerius Maximus, lib. 8 cap. 7. num. 12. ext. ſuppoſes that Cleanthes was Chryſippus's diſciple, which is a very great blunder.

(d) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. in Chryſippo, num. 179.

[A] He had a very acute genius.] Let us ſee what Seneca ſaid of it; but the better to underſtand his meaning, it muſt be remembred, that he had been cenſuring ſeveral trifles, which ancient Authors had related concerning the three Graces. Chryſippus quoque, adds he (1), penes quem ſubtile illud acumen eſt, & in imam penetrans veritatem, qui rei agendæ cauſa loquitur, & verbis non ultra, quam ad intellectum ſatis eſt, utitur, totum librum ſuum his ineptiis replet: ita ut de ratione dandi, accipiendi, reddendique beneficii, pauca admodum dicat: nec bis fabulas, ſed hæc fabulis inſerit. i. e. "Chryſippus alſo, who has a ſharp wit, which diſcovers the moſt hidden truth, who ſpeaks to the purpoſe, and does not employ more words, than are neceſſary to be underſtood, fills his whole book with theſe trifles; ſo that he ſays but very little of the manner of beſtowing, receiving, and returning a favour: nor does he intermix theſe fables with his principal ſubjects, but drowns his ſubject amongſt theſe fables." And as Seneca feared to be blamed for his boldneſs in finding fault with ſo great a Philoſopher, he vindicates his conduct in the following manner. Tu modo me tuere, ſi quis mihi objiciet quod Chryſippum in ordinem coegerim, magnum mehercule virum, ſed tamen Græcum, cujus acumen nimis tenue retunditur, & in ſe ſæpe replicatur: etiam cum agere aliquid videtur, pungit non perforat. Hoc verò quod acumen eſt? . . . . Ad hanc honeſtiſſimam contentionem, beneficiis beneficia vincendi, ſic nos adhortatur Chryſippus, ut dicat verendum eſſe, ne quia Charites Jovis ſunt filiæ, parum ſe grate agere, ſacrilegium ſit, & tam bellis puellis fiat injuria. Tu me aliquid eorum doce; per quæ beneficentior gratiorque adverſus bene merentes fiam, per quæ obligantiumque obligatorumque animi certent, ut qui præſtiterint, obliviſcantur, pertinax ſit memoria debentium. Iſtæ verò ineptiæ poetis relinquantur, quibus aures oblectare propoſitum eſt, & dulcem fabulam nectere. At qui ingenia ſanare, & fidem in rebus humanis retinere, memoriam officiorum ingerere animis volunt, ſeriò loquantur, & magnis viribus agant: niſi forte exiſtimas levi ac fabuloſo ſermone, & anilibus argumentis, prohiberi poſſe rem perniciоſiſſimam beneficiorum novas tabulas (2). i. e. "Do you but defend me, if any one finds fault with me, for cenſuring Chryſippus, who was indeed a great man, but yet a Greek, whoſe wit, as being too ſharp, loſes its edge and becomes blunt: and even when he ſeems to be in earneſt, he pricks only, but does not ſtrike home. Now what ſharpneſs is there in this? . . . . How does Chryſippus perſuade us to this moſt noble ſtrife of outdoing one another in kindneſs? Why, he tells us, that as the Graces are the daughters of Jupiter, we muſt fear leſt we be guilty of ſacrilege, and do theſe beautiful maids an injury, if we be not grateful. But let me be taught ſuch things, by which I may become more benevolent and grateful towards thoſe who have been kind to me; by which they, who oblige others, and they who are obliged may learn to ſtrive, the former to forget the favours they beſtowed, the latter to remember for ever thoſe they received. Let us leave theſe trifles to the Poets, who have no other deſign but to pleaſe the ear, and to tell agreeable ſtories. But they, who propoſe to reclaim the mind, to maintain honeſty amongſt men, and to imprint into their heart the remembrance of the favours they receive, muſt ſpeak with more gravity, and employ the utmoſt ſtrength of eloquence, unleſs you think that idle ſtories and old women's reaſons be ſufficient to prevent that moſt pernicious thing, the cancelling of all obligations." Nothing can be more judicious than this cenſure of Seneca: He was very much in the right to expoſe the impertinence of thoſe poetical arguments, thus diſplayed in a work, which treated of one of the moſt important duties of common life. But yet he was ſo juſt as to mention even in his cenſure one of the moſt beautiful parts in Chryſippus's character, I mean, his ſharp wit. Let us ſee how Cicero ſpeaks of this Philoſopher. Chryſippus, qui Stoicorum ſomniorum vaferrimus habetur interpres, magnam turbam congregat ignotorum Deorum, atque ita ignotorum, ut eos ne conjectura quidem informare poſſimus cum mens noſtra quidvis videatur cogitatione poſſe depingere (3). i. e. "Chryſippus, who is ſuppoſed "to be the moſt ſubtle interpreter of the fancies of "the Stoicks, brings in a multitude of unknown Gods, "and ſo unknown, that we cannot form an idea of "them even by conjecture, tho' it ſeems, that our "mind can frame ſome notion of every thing poſſible." Chryſippus quidem, quamquam eſt acerrimo ingenio, tamen ea dicit, ut ea ab ipſa naturâ didiciſſe, non ut ipſe reperire videatur (4). i. e. "Tho' Chryſippus had a "very quick genius, yet the things he ſays are ſuch, "that he ſeems to have learnt them from nature, rather than to have found them out himſelf." Et Chryſippus tibi acute dicere videbatur, homo ſine dubio verſutus & callidus. Verſutos eos appello, quorum celeriter mens verſatur; callidos autem, quorum tanquam manus opere, ſic animus uſu concalluit (5). i. e. "You "thought that Chryſippus ſpoke acutely; he was certainly a man of a quick and experienced genius. I "call thoſe quick, whoſe mind moves briſkly; and "thoſe I ſtile experienced, whoſe mind is ſtrengthened "by experience, as a workman's hand grows hard by "working." Chryſippus's application to Dialecticks, which I ſhall mention immediately, is a very ſtrong proof of the ſubtlety of his genius.

(1) Seneca, de Benefic. lib. 1. cap. 3.

(2) Ibid. lib. 1. cap. 5. Compare this with Plutarch. De audiendis Poetis, pag. 31, E.

(3) Cicero, De Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 15.

(4) Idem, ibid. lib. 2. cap. 6.

(5) Idem, ibid. lib. 3. cap. 10. In the 2d book De finibus. he calls him homo acutus & diligens.

[B] He wrote a great many Books . . ſeveral of which related to Logic.] Diogenes Laertius makes them amount to the number 311 (6); which makes me find ſome difficulty in what Valerius Maximus aſſerts; he tells us, that this Philoſopher was fourſcore years old, when he began his thirty ninth Treatiſe of Logic. Citeriores ætatis metas, ſed non parvi tamen ſpatii Chryſippi vivacitas flexit: nam octogeſimo anno cæptum undequadrageſimum λογικῶν exactiſſimæ ſubtilitatis volumen reliquit. Cujus ſtudium in tradendis ingenii ſui monumentis tantum operæ laboriſque juſtinuit, ut ad ea quæ ſcripſit penitus cognoſcenda longa vita ſit opus (7). i. e. "The ſtrength of Chryſippus's mind did not laſt "quite ſo long, tho' it continued a great while; for "he was fourſcore years old, when he began his "thirty ninth book upon Logic, a work written "with the utmoſt ſubtlety. He has ſpent ſo much "pain and labour to leave us theſe proofs of his genius, that they require the whole life of a man, to "be perfectly underſtood." There are ſome inſtances, by which it appears, that Authors do not always publiſh every part of their works in its natural order: Scaliger publiſhed the XVth Book of his Exotericæ Exercitationes without the fourteen that were to precede it, and which were never printed, or I am much miſtaken. You will find an inſtance of the ſame kind in the article MORISON. We might therefore ſuppoſe, that Chryſippus having divided his whole work of Dialectics into ſeveral Books, omitted the thirty ninth, and put it off to another time (8); and did not begin to compoſe it till he was fourſcore years old. It may perhaps alſo be ſuppoſed, that there was ſuch a diviſion of his logical works, according to which the thirty ninth Book was almoſt the laſt: and thus Valerius Maximus may be made to agree with Diogenes Laertius. Obſerve that Moreri has committed here a very groſs blunder. Valerius Maximus, ſays he, relates, that at the age of fourſcore he finiſhed a Treatiſe of Logic, which

(6) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 198. pag. m. 485.

(7) Valer. Max. lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 10. De Stud. & Induſtr.

(8) Diog. Laert. lib. 8. num. 198, obſerves, that the work περὶ τῶν καταλειπομένων ζητημάτων contained 39 books.

head; that he did not take much pains to correct his works [C]; that he crowded them with an infinite number of quotations (e); that he was very laborious (f); and that he lived to the age of above fourſcore years (g). He was a very little man (h), but the opinion he had of himſelf was very great [D]. He adhered for ſome time to the Academicks, and argued after their manner concerning the uncertainty of every thing (i). Yet notwithſtanding this, he is looked upon as a true Stoick, and even as one of the moſt illuſtrious ornaments, and moſt zealous and learned maintainers of this Sect (k). Scioppius

(e) Idem, ibid. num. 180.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) See the Remark [B] quotation (g).

(h) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. in Chryſippo, num. 183.

(i) Idem, ibid. num. 184.

(k) See the Remark [L].

which he had begun when he was forty years old. Monſr. Menage has committed the ſame blunder (9). Lucian could not forbear ridiculing this Philoſopher's logical ſubtleties (10). Let us obſerve, that he makes him live fourſcore and one years (11), which confirms Valerius's Maximus's aſſertion, concerning the long life of Chryſippus; ſo that I thought Diogenes Laertius was not to be credited, who ſuppoſes he died at the age of ſeventy three years (12).

(9) Menage, in Laertio, lib. 7. num. 189.

(10) Lucian. In Vitar. Auctione, pag. 374, & ſeq. tom. 1. See alſo his Icaromenippus, pag. 295. tom. 2.

(11) Idem, in Macrobiis, pag. 641. tom. 2.

(12) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 184.

[C] He did not take much pains to correct his works.] I pretend to ſupport this aſſertion by Diogenes Laertius's Authority, tho' we read quite the contrary in his works. Ἐπλήθυνε δὲ αὐτὰ, πολλάκις ὑπὸ τῷ αὐτῷ δόγματος ἐπιχειρῶν, καὶ πάνυ τὸ ὑπόπτωσιν γράφειν, καὶ διορθοῦν πλειονάκις. πλείστη τε τῶν μαστυριῶν παραθέσει χρῶνται (13). You ſee that there is very bad reaſoning in this paſſage; for it is there aſſerted, that Chryſippus compoſed ſo many books, becauſe he often wrote upon the ſame ſubject, becauſe he ſet down whatever came into his head, becauſe he often corrected what he wrote, and becauſe he made uſe of a great many quotations. Here are four reaſons, whereof the firſt, ſecond, and fourth are very good; but the third is good for nothing, and even proves the contrary of what the Author intended: ſince the trouble of reviſing a work often, and correcting it now and then, will prevent an Author from writing a great many Books. But if he ſets down whatever occurs to him, if he tranſcribes all that he finds in other Writers, and ſeldom corrects what he has once written, he may eaſily overload the learned world with his works. I do therefore believe, that Diogenes Laertius aſſerted, that moſt part of the time Chryſippus did not correct his writings, and I am of opinion that the tranſcribers omitted the privative Alpha in the word διορθούμενος (14). I am confirmed in this conjecture by Diogenes Laertius himſelf, who obſerves, that as Chryſippus intended to publiſh as many books as Epicurus, he often repeated the ſame things, and publiſhed whatever occurred to him, without correcting it. He did not read over what he had written; he wrote too haſtily, and filled his Books with quotations (15). Εἰ γάρ τι γράψαι ὁ Ἐπικούρος, φιλοπικεῖ τοσοῦτο γράψαι ὁ Χρυσίππος, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο καὶ πολλάκις ταῦτα γέγραφε, καὶ τὸ ἐπιλαθὸν καὶ ἀδιόρθωτον (16) εἶκε τῷ ἐπείγεσθαι. καὶ τὰ μαρτύρια τοσαῦτα ἐστὶν ὡς ἐκείνων γέμειν τὰ βιβλία. It is plain that the Hiſtorian intended to ſay the ſame thing in theſe two paſſages, ſo that the one muſt ſerve to correct the other. Let us obſerve, that our Philoſopher, through his ſtrong deſire of publiſhing a great many Books, not only filled his works with quotations, and ſaid the ſame things over again ſeveral times, but even contradicted his own aſſertions: for he would ſometimes tranſcribe what he had already publiſhed, and at other times he confuted himſelf (17). None of his works are extant: their titles only have been tranſmitted to us; and it is even thought by ſome, that there is ſomething wanting in Diogenes Laertius, where he mentions thoſe titles. This is Jonſius's opinion in his Treatiſe De Scriptoribus Hiſtoriæ Philoſophicæ (18), in which he endeavours to ſupply in ſome meaſure the defect in Diogenes Laertius. Obſerve, that Chryſippus never dedicated any of his works to a King (19); ſome Authors think, that this was owing to his haughty and diſdainful temper; they add, that he refuſed to go and meet Ptolemy, who had deſired Cleanthes, either to come to him himſelf, or to ſend him one of his Diſciples (20); but Chryſippus does not deſerve to be blamed on any of theſe accounts; far from it he deſerves to be praiſed; ſince nothing did better become a Philoſopher, than to act as he did. We ſhall give below much ſtronger proofs of his haughtineſs.

(13) Idem, ibid. num. 180.

(14) Or perhaps διορθούμενον.

(15) Diog. Laert. lib. 10. pag. 724. edit. Genev. 1616.

(16) The edition of Amſterdam in 1692, has in this place τῷ μὴ ἐπιλαθεῖν καὶ ἀδιόρθωτα &c.

(17) See the Remark [E] in the Article EPICURUS.

(18) Book 2. chap. 8. pag. 151 &c. See alſo Menage in Laert. lib. 7. num. 190, & ſeq.

(19) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 185.

(20) Idem, ibid.

[D] The opinion he had of himſelf was very great.] He uſed to ſay often to his Profeſſor, Shew me but the doctrines; that is ſufficient for me, and all I want; I ſhall find the proofs of them my ſelf (21). A perſon aſked him one day; Whom ſhall I chuſe for my ſon's Tutor? Me, anſwered Chryſippus; for if I knew any body more learned than my ſelf, I would go and ſtudy under him (22).

(21) Idem, ibid. num. 179.

(22) Idem, ibid. num. 183.

[E] Scioppius has abuſed him very much.] He looks upon him as a Chief of thoſe Stoicks, who had diſgraced their Sect, by making an ill uſe of their wit, and by hunting after idle ſubtleties, which were proper only to caſt a ridicule upon the gravity of the Sect. Neque tamen (23) defendere ac negare velim fuiſſe Stoicorum non paucos, qui ſpecie ingenii illecti, inanibus argutiis ludibria quædam excitando dignitatem ſeveriſſimæ ac graviſſimæ rationis in contemptum adduxerint: quorum Princeps jure dici poſſit Chryſippus, qui cum eſſet magna quadam ingenii vi præditus, mireque ad quidvis excogitandum celer & acutus, nihil æquè ſolebat laborare, quam ut non reliquarum tantum ſectarum inventoribus contradiceret, ſed a Magiſtris etiam ſuis Zenone & Cleanthe pleriſque in rebus diſſideret. His pride, adds he, made him diſpute pro and con upon every ſubject; and he wrote a great deal, out of jealouſy againſt Epicurus, who had compoſed more Books than any other Philoſopher: but notwithſtanding all his endeavours, he could never come up with this competitor: he often repeats the ſame things over again, and oftener ſtill contradicts himſelf (24). So that Plutarch had ſome reaſon to attack chiefly this Stoick Philoſopher, and to reprove him for his temerity and audaciouſneſs. This, continues Scioppius, happens generally, when a man in any diſpute aims at gaining the victory, rather than at finding out the truth. Sed ſolet hoc fieri, quoties victoriæ majorem, qui diſputant, quam veritatis rationem ducunt, verumque eſt illud Poetæ

(23) Scioppius, Element. Philoſoph. Stoicæ Moralis, folio 165 verſo.

(24) Sæpe enim ſcripſit eadem, ſæpius ſibi contraria ac repugnantia. Idem, ibid. folio 166.

Nimium altercando veritas amittitur.

Quod Carneadi quoque eveniſſe Cicero teſtatur, ut odio ſcilicet Stoicorum in conſtituendo bonorum fine, plurimum ac reliquorum Academicorum, ſuâque ipſius ſententiâ diſcederet (25). i. e. "So true is the Poet's ſaying, We "loſe the truth by diſputing too much: and this, as Tully "affirms, happened to Carneades, who out of hatred "againſt the Stoicks not only contradicted the opinions "of the reſt of the Academicks, with regard to the "Summum Bonum or Supreme Good, but even depart-"ed from his own ſentiments." It muſt be confeſſed, that Scioppius's Reflections are very judicious. It is a very great misfortune for any Sect to be defended by a man, who has a great, quick, ready, and proud genius, and who deſires to acquire the reputation not only of a fine Writer, but alſo of a fruitful Author. The chief or rather only deſign of ſuch a Writer is to gain the victory over any adverſary, whom he undertakes to confute: and as he labours to promote his own glory, rather than the intereſt of his Sect, he inſiſts chiefly upon thoſe particular hints, which his imagination furniſhes him with. He does not much care, whether they be agreable to the principles of his Sect, if they be but proper either to evade an objection, or to puzzle his adverſaries. Being in love with his own fancies, he does not obſerve their weak ſide, nor does he foreſee what an advantage his preſent adverſaries, or thoſe he may happen to diſpute with afterwards, can make of them. The preſent time is his only care, and he does not mind that which is to come. And beſides as he is continually publiſhing Book after Book, now againſt one Sect, then againſt another, he cannot avoid contradicting himſelf, and it is impoſſible his reaſonings ſhould be well connected together. Thus he betrays the cauſe of his party, and as he ſtrives to eſcape one extremity, he throws himſelf headlong into the other, and by turns into both. The ſaying of an ancient Poet quoted by Scioppius, namely, that by too much diſputing we loſe the truth, will perhaps make ſome perſons think, that the diſputes been Philoſophers are like that concerning the Oyſter, which has been ſo elegantly deſcribed both by Monſr. Boileau (26), and by Monſr.

(25) Scioppius, Element. Philoſph. Moral. folio 166 verſo.

(26) In his 2d Epiſtle.

pius has abuſed him very much [E], and has done it even in a book, in which he extols, to the utmoſt of his power, the opinions of the Stoicks; but he treats him after that manner, becauſe he looked upon him as a man of a proud and contradicting ſpirit, who by his haughty and arrogant behaviour very much injured the whole Sect. The Stoicks complained, that Chryſippus had collected ſo many arguments in favour of the Sceptical Hypotheſis, that he could not afterwards anſwer them himſelf [F], and had thus furniſhed Carneades their antagoniſt with weapons againſt them. This ſeems to prove that he acted with ſincerity, and did not labour to gain an eaſy victory, by a fraudulent miſrepreſentation of his adverſary's arguments. But as on the other hand he blamed thoſe who took care to ſet their antagoniſt's arguments in as fair a light as their own, one might think that his conduct was owing to his vanity rather than to his ſincerity; this at leaſt might be objected to him, that his precepts and his conduct were not of a piece [G]. The Stoicks might Monſr. de la Fontaine (27). But there is a great difference to be obſerved here; for if the oyſter in conteſt was not given to either of the parties, yet it fell to the ſhare of a third, namely of a Judge; whereas the diſputes between Philoſophers produce quite another effect; they make both the ſpectators of the battle and the champions loſe the truth; no body does nor can ſeize upon it in the ſequeſtration in which it is put, whilſt the ſuit is depending. I ſhall enlarge a little more upon this ſubject in one of the remarks of the article EUCLID (28).

(27) In the 9th Fable of the 4th Part, Book 3. pag. m. 44.

(28) In the Remark [E].

[F] The Stoicks complained that Chryſippus had collected ſo many arguments in favour of the Sceptical Hypotheſis, that he could not afterwards confute them himſelf.] The words which I ſhall quote are very remarkable; Cicero makes an Academick ſpeak them. De quibus volumina impleta ſunt, non a noſtris ſolum, ſed etiam a Chryſippo, de quo queri ſolent Stoici, dum ſtudioſe omnia conquiſierit contra ſenſus & perſpicuitatem, contraque omnem conſuetudinem, contraque rationem, ipſum ſibi reſpondentem inferiorem fuiſſe; itaque ab eo armatum eſſe Carneadem (29). i. e. "Whole volumes "have been written upon this ſubject, not only by "thoſe of our ſect, but even by Chryſippus himſelf; of "whom the Stoicks uſe to complain, that whilſt he "collected all the arguments he could, againſt the "ſenſes and evidence, againſt cuſtom and againſt rea"ſon, he was not able to anſwer them himſelf, and "thus furniſhed Carneades with weapons againſt them." Plutarch expatiates very much upon this ſubject; that Chryſippus "himſelf in his diſputations often inſiſted "upon arguments, that were contrary to his own "opinion, and that he did it ſeriouſly, and with ſo "much zeal and ardour, that it was not eaſy to diſ"cover what opinion pleaſed him moſt, is confeſſed "even by thoſe, who admire the ſtrength of his mind: "and they aſſert, that Carneades ſaid nothing of his "own invention, but that thoſe arguments, by which "Chryſippus had endeavoured to ſhew, how one may "argue pro and con upon the ſame ſubject, Carnea"des turned them againſt Chryſippus himſelf, ſo that "whilſt they diſputed the former uſed often to repeat "aloud to the latter * this line of Homer,

(29) Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 4. cap. 27.

* This is not tranſlated according to the Greek, but according to Amiot's French tranſlation. The reader will ſee the reaſon below, after the quotation (30).

"Unhappy man, thy ſtrength will ruin thee.

"becauſe he had furniſhed thoſe with ſtrong argu"ments, who would undertake to confute him. But "with regard to what Chryſippus has ſaid againſt e"vidence, they boaſt of it to ſuch a degree, that they "do not ſcruple to aſſert, that all the writings of the "Academics taken together are not worthy to be com"pared with what Chryſippus alone wrote againſt "the certainty of the ſenſes. This indeed is a proof "either of the ignorance or of the blind ſelf-love of "thoſe who aſſert it: but yet it is true, that when "Chryſippus undertook to write in favour of the ſenſes "and of cuſtom, he was not equal to the taſk, and "this Book proved much weaker, than the former, "ſo that he contradicts himſelf (30)." Obſerve by the by an error of Amiot. Theſe words the former uſed often to repeat to the latter &c. do but too clearly hint, that Chryſippus and Carneades diſputed often together. Now, this is not true (31); for Chryſippus died before Carneades could diſpute with him. Plutarch's words, καὶ πολλάκις παρεφθέγγεσθαι Δημώνια φάσιν ὅτι τὸ σὸν μόνῳ, ſignify, according to Xilander, not that Carneades ſaid this, but that men uſed to cry to Chryſippus, unhappy man, thy ſtrength will ruin thee; & Chryſippo ſolent acclamare; Infelix, tua te vis perdet. I ſhould rather think, that this muſt be referred to Carneades, and that it ſignifies, that when this Philoſopher confuted Chryſippus in his Lectures he uſed to direct his diſcourſe to him, as tho' he had been preſent, and applied that verſe to him: but to do this, it was not neceſſary that Chryſippus ſhould be preſent, nor even that he ſhould be alive. Nay, Plutarch himſelf obſerves in another paſſage, not very far from that which we have quoted, that theſe two Philoſophers were not contemporaries. He brings in a Stoick Philoſopher, who obſerves, that it was not by chance, but through the Providence of the Gods, that Chryſippus was born after Arceſilaus, and before Carneades, the former of whom had been the author and promoter of the injury againſt common notions, and the latter had gained a greater reputation than any other of the Academicks. And Chryſippus having been between them both, did by his writings againſt Arceſilaus prevent the effects of Carneades's eloquence (32). This Stoick does not grant, that Chryſippus furniſhed Carneades with weapons; for he compared him to a General, who puts ſtrong Garriſons in all the Towns, which the enemy is to beſiege, and who with a great order and prudence aſſigns to every ſoldier the poſt he muſt defend (33).

(30) Plutarch, De Repugnant. Stoicorum, pag. 1036.

(31) See the Remark [E] of the Article CARNEADES quotations (39) and (40).

(32) Idem, De Communibus Notionibus, init. pag. 1059 B.

(33) Idem, ibid.

[G] It might be objected to him, that his precepts, and his conduct were not of a piece.] I have obſerved (34), that he ſeems to have acted with ſincerity, and did not artfully propoſe his adverſary's objections in a weak manner. He repreſented them ſo faithfully in their whole ſtrength, that he could not afterwards confute them with the ſame ſucceſs, as he had propoſed them. It is ſaid, he acted in this reſpect againſt his own principles, and this is one of the inconſiſtencies which Plutarch objects to him. Here is the ſequel of the paſſage I have quoted above (35). "So that he contradicts himſelf, ſince he required, "that we propoſe the adverſary's opinions, not as tho' "we admitted them, but in ſuch a manner as to ſhew, "that they are not true: and yet he confutes his own "opinions with more ſtrength, than he eſtabliſhes "them. He adviſes others to beware of contrary ar"guments, as being capable only to make them with"hold their aſſent, and at the ſame time he invents "ſuch arguments, as are much ſtronger, to prove there "is nothing certain, than thoſe he alledges to prove "there is ſuch a thing as certainty in nature. Nay "he himſelf was aware of this; for in the fourth "Book of his Lives he expreſſes himſelf thus: You "muſt not too inconſiderately propoſe the contrary "opinions, nor what may appear probable on the o"ther ſide of the queſtion; but in this you muſt act "with prudence, leſt the hearers ſhould be diſpoſed "to withdraw their aſſent; for as they are not able "ſufficiently to conceive the anſwers, that are made "to what was firſt propoſed, they are eaſily ſhook "out of their aſſent, and drawn contrariwiſe by the "Megarick interrogations, and by a great many other "and more ſtrong arguments (36)." Upon this they "attack him two different ways, and preſs very hard "upon him; for they maintain againſt him, 1. That "his maxim is a bad one; 2. That as he did not fol"low it, he has contradicted himſelf." With regard to the firſt article, read the following words of Plutarch. He ſays that he does not abſolutely condemn the method of arguing pro and con upon the ſame ſubject; but he adviſes us to do it cautiouſly, as the Lawyers do, who ſometimes alledge the reaſons of their party, not in order to approve and ſupport them, but only to confute them. They only can act otherwiſe, ſays he, who pretend to doubt of every thing; for their arguing with the ſame ſtrength

(34) In the text of this Article.

(35) Quotation (30).

(36) Plutarch, de Repugnat. Stoicorum, pag. 1036.

might more juſtly complain of his indiſcretion in maintaining ſeveral doctrines, which might render their Sect odious; for he did not ſcruple to aſſert, that it was lawful for a father to lie with his daughter, a ſon with his mother, a brother with his ſiſter (l); and that men ought to eat the bodies of the dead (m). Moſt of the contradictions and abſurd paradoxes, which Plutarch charges the Stoicks with (n), and for which he is very ſevere upon them, which could not but vex them very much, are borrowed from Chryſippus's works. If he had only accuſed them of contradicting themſelves in their doctrine of Fate, and in that concerning the liberty of man, he would not have gained a great victory over them; for to vindicate Chryſippus, the Stoicks might have made the ſame anſwer

(l) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 188. See alſo Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotypoſ. lib. 3. cap. 24, 25.

(n) See his Treatiſe De repugnantiis Stoicorum, and that De communibus notitiis contra Stoicos.

(m) Idem, ibid. See alſo Sextus Empiricus, ibid. cap. 24. I do not ſpeak of his opinion, that women ought to be common among Philoſophers; for in this, other Philoſophers had ſhewed him the way. Ὡς τὸν ἐντυχόντα τῇ ἐντυχούσῃ χρῆσθαι. i. e. "Every man "may enjoy the "firſt woman "he meets." Diog. Laert. lib. 8. in Zenone, num. 131.

ſtrength pro and con ſerves their turn, as it is proper to ſhew that every thing is uncertain. But he who intends to eſtabliſh a true knowledge, according to which we ought to regulate our conduct, muſt indeed lay the whole ſubject before us from the beginning to the end, and as occaſion offers, he may mention the adverſary's objections, but only in order to weaken and confute them, as Lawyers do at the Bar. Theſe are his own words. We have ſhewed in another place, how abſurd it is for Philoſophers to alledge their Antagoniſt's opinions unfairly, and to confute them only after having weakened and miſrepreſented the arguments that ſupport them, like Lawyers, who plead at the Bar; as if the deſign of the whole diſpute was not to find out the truth, but only to gain the victory (37). As to the ſecond article Chryſippus could not but be extremely puzzled; for they object to him (38) one of his works, in which he ſpoke with the utmoſt contempt of Stilpo's and Menedemus's arguments (39). But yet, good man, continues Plutarch, you fear leſt theſe very arguments, which you ridicule . . . . ſhould be capable to make men withdraw their aſſent. And even you, who wrote ſo many Books againſt certainty, in which you have inſerted all that your imagination could furniſh you with, and in which you laboured to outdo Arceſilaus himſelf, did you not intend to raiſe doubts in your reader's mind? For Chryſippus does not make uſe of arguments only, when he diſputes againſt Certainty; but as if it were at the Bar, he endeavours to ſtir up men's paſſions, and ſpeaks with great heat and fervency, ſtiling Certainty ſometimes a folly, and ſometimes a ſilly and idle thing. And that he may not pretend, he did not contradict himſelf, let us quote what he ſays in his Book upon Natural Philoſophy. When a thing is clearly conceived, ſays he, one may venture to argue a little againſt it, and then ſupport it as much as is poſſible. And when neither ſide of the queſtion is clearly underſtood, one may diſpute pro and con. And in his Book concerning the uſe of reaſon, having ſaid, that we ought not to employ the ſtrength of reaſon any more than that of arms, where it is not proper, he adds, for we muſt make uſe of theſe in order to find out the truth, and what comes neareſt to it, and not the contrary, as a great many do. By a great many, he means, I think, thoſe who withhold their aſſent. But as they pretend, that nothing can be clearly conceived, they act conſiſtently, when they argue for and againſt both ſides of a queſtion; and this, they think, is the only, or at leaſt the chief method to find out the truth, ſuppoſe there be ſomething, that can be clearly conceived. But you, Chryſippus, who accuſe them, ſince you wrote againſt what you conceived yourſelves concerning certainty and evidence, and even have earneſtly adviſed others to do the ſame, you muſt confeſs that you employed your eloquence in things not only uſeleſs, but even detrimental, only out of an idle ambition to ſhew your wit, like a young Scholar.

(37) Idem, ibid. pag. 1035, 1036.

(38) Idem, ibid. pag. 1037.

(39) They are the ſame with thoſe he called Megarick Interrogations.

One cannot eaſily gueſs, how Chryſippus, notwithſtanding his ſharp genius, could extricate himſelf out of this difficulty; for his maxims do not become a Philoſopher, and if he had been able to vindicate them, he would have pronounced a ſentence of condemnation againſt himſelf, ſince he had acted againſt them, where he ſupported with all his ſtrength, and even better than Arceſilaus himſelf, the cauſe of the Academicks, which according to him was a bad one. In my opinion they were in the right to ſay, that the vanity of a young Scholar tranſported him to ſuch a degree, that he made a ſacrifice of his own maxims, to the ſtrong deſire he had of taking hold of a favourable opportunity, to diſplay the ſubtlety of his imaginations, even to the detriment of the truths, which the Stoics maintained. The glory which he expected, if he could but make men ſay, that he had improved upon Arceſilaus himſelf, and had expreſſed the objections of the Academicks in a much ſtronger manner than he, was his only aim, ſo that he did not mind the reſt. Thus we have ſeen a late controverſial Writer, who did not ſcruple to contradict himſelf on every occaſion, nor to lay open very dangerouſly the intereſts of his own Church, and even the moſt important truths acknowledged amongſt the Chriſtians, to the objections of the adverſaries, if he could but gain the reputation of being a man, who found out new and untrodden roads, and new methods of attacking and defending. What was the Idol, to which he offered incenſe, and to which he ſacrificed? Himſelf. After all, ſaid he within himſelf, men muſt own, that I have a very extenſive genius, and a very fruitful imagination.

Let us expoſe here the falſity of Chryſippus's maxims. He pretended, that they who undertake to teach any truth, muſt ſpeak but very ſparingly of the arguments, that might be alledged on the other ſide of the queſtion, and ought to imitate the Lawyers. This was the reigning opinion amongſt the Dogmaticks; and there were but few Philoſophers, beſides the Academics, who propoſed with the ſame ſtrength the arguments on both ſides. Now I aſſert, that the method of the Dogmaticks was very bad, and did not much differ from the deceitful art of the Sophiſtical Rhetoricians, which rendered them ſo odious, and which was, to make the beſt cauſe of that which was the worſt (40): for one of their chief artifices was to ſuppreſs all that could be ſaid in favour of the cauſe which they oppoſed, and to hide the weak ſide of that which they maintained; yet for form's ſake, they would propoſe ſome objections, but never failed to chooſe thoſe which they could moſt eaſily confute. Now this is really, what Chryſippus adviſed the Philoſophers to do: he would have them mention but ſlightly the arguments that favoured their adverſary's opinions, and might ſhake the perſuaſion of the hearer or reader; he would have them act like thoſe who plead at the bar. Why did he not roundly aſſert, that we muſt philoſophize in a mercantile manner, and like the Shop-keepers, mention only the good qualities of our Wares or Stuffs, ſet them off to the beſt advantage, and artfully cry down thoſe of our neighbour? Why did he not ſay, that we muſt do like thoſe, who having ſoundly quarrelled together, go and complain before a Magiſtrate? Each of them relates the affair ſo much to his own advantage, that if you will believe him, he is not in the leaſt to blame (41); but it is, becauſe he omits all the circumſtances that are againſt him, and for his adverſary. Chryſippus is to be blamed, not only for the diſhoneſty, and the low artifice by which he would have us gain the victory; but alſo for his indiſcretion in revealing ſuch a practice. Such a thing ought not to have been communicated to the public in a work; it ſhould have been kept ſecret, as the Politicians do their State-Myſteries, the Arcana Imperii; or at leaſt, it ſhould only have been whiſpered to ſome diſcreet and learned Scholar.

(40) Τὸν ἥττονα λόγον κρείττονα ποιεῖν. See Creſollius, Theatr. Sophiſt. lib. 1. cap. 11. pag. 79, & ſeq.

(41) Compare this with what we have obſerved in the article BLONDEL Remark [Q] in the A lines concerning the account of facts in the controverſies of the Learned.

Obſerve, that there were amongſt the Ancients two ſort of Philoſophers; ſome were like the pleading Counſellors, and the others, like a Recorder or Judge, who ſums up the evidence on both ſides. The former when they proved their opinions, hid as much as they could the weak ſide of their cauſe, and the ſtrength of their adverſary's arguments. The latter were the Scepticks or Academicks, who faithfully and without any partiality expoſed all that could be ſaid on either ſide of a queſtion. But ſuch a diſtinction has ſeldom been obſerved amongſt the Chriſtians in their ſchools of Philoſophy, and leſs ſtill in thoſe of Divinity. Religion does not ſuffer that academical or ſceptical humour; it requires, that we abſolutely deny or affirm. We do ſwer, which is made at this time in behalf of thoſe who cannot reconcile God's decree with our free-will, and who, when they ſpeak of Predeſtination cannot but make uſe of ſuch expreſſions as ſeem to be inconſiſtent with thoſe they employ, when they would perſuade men to virtue, and reprove them for their vices. None of the Philoſophers ſpoke in ſtronger terms of the fatal neceſſity of every thing, nor more pompouſly of the liberty of man (o), than the Stoicks. Judge then, whether Chryſippus, who wrote ſo many volumes in a hurry, and who had a quick and bold genius, could forbear aſſerting in his moral treatiſes ſeveral propoſitions, which could not be reconciled with thoſe, which he maintained in his metaphyſical books. Plutarch charges him with making God the Author of ſin; not meet there with any Judges, but ſuch as are at the ſame time parties concerned; and there are numberleſs Authors, who plead their cauſe according to Chryſippus's maxims; I mean, who act only like Lawyers; and there is no Judge or Recorder to report the cauſe; for if any perſon ventures to repreſent faithfully and without any artifice or diſguiſe, the whole ſtrength of the adverſary's arguments, he becomes odious and ſuſpected, and is in danger of being treated like an infamous prevaricator, who betrays his own party (42). It is not only human prudence, policy, and the intereſts of one's own party, that make a man act only the part of a pleading Lawyer: this is alſo owing to a charitable zeal, on which occaſion I ſhall relate here, what I was told the other day by a learned Divine, who is at the ſame time a very honeſt man. I aſſerted that an Author, who, without pretending to dogmatize, keeps within the bounds of Hiſtory, may and ought to repreſent faithfully, the moſt ſpecious arguments, which the moſt erroneous Sects have to alledge either to ſupport their own opinions, or againſt Orthodoxy: and as he denied it, I replied; ſuppoſe you are a Profeſſor of Divinity, and you chuſe the myſtery of the Trinity for the ſubject of your Lectures during a whole winter. You examine thoroughly all that the Orthodox have ſaid, and the Heretics have objected; and by your own meditation and the ſtrength of your mind, you find that one might anſwer the ſolutions of the Orthodox much better than the ſectaries have done; in a word you find out new difficulties, much ſtronger than all thoſe that have been ſtarted till this time; and which are much harder to ſolve; I ſuppoſe you will lay them before your audience; .... Not I, replied he, I ſhall do no ſuch thing; it would be digging a precipice before them; neither Chriſtian Charity, nor the zeal we ought to have for truth, will ſuffer us to do that. Such was his anſwer. Now it may very well be, that ſome Authors boaſt in a preface, that they have overthrown all the fences and bulwarks of the Hereticks, tho' they be conſcious, that out of mere charity they have omitted to examine their ſtrongeſt and moſt captious objections. We may believe this chiefly of the Roman Catholick Writers on Controverſy, ſince complaints were made againſt Bellarmin, that the ſincerity, with which he repreſented the arguments of the Heretics proved detrimental (43).

(o) See Præſantium & Eruditorum Virorum Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ at Theologicæ, pag. 640. and 659. edit. 1684.

(42) See the remark [P] in the article CHARRON.

(43) See the remark [I] of the article BELLARMIN.

WHETHER they who prohibit the books of the Heretics, ought to ſuffer that their objections be publiſhed in the books of the Orthodox, who confute them.

I muſt examine in this place, what I promiſed in the article of that Cardinal (44). Do they who burn the books of an Heretick, and ſuffer nevertheleſs, that the books in which they are confuted, be publickly read, reaſon coherently, and is their conduct uniform and all of a piece? You will anſwer, no: for the reaſon why the reading and ſelling of Heretical Books is prohibited, is, that it is feared leſt they ſhould poiſon the readers. They are apprehenſive in Italy, leſt they who ſhould ſee in what manner a Proteſtant Writer proves his own Doctrine, and how he confutes that of the Catholics, ſhould fill their heads with doubts and ſcruples, and ſhould even be entirely convinced by the arguments of ſuch an Author. But is not the ſame misfortune to be feared if they read Bellarmin's works? Will they not find there the arguments and objections of the Hereticks? And ſuppoſe Bellarmin acted honeſtly, will they not find them there repreſented with as much ſtrength as they are in the Books even of the moſt learned Proteſtants? Yes, you will ſay, but then they will find them there with the anſwers added to them; whereas if they read only the Book of the Heretick, they would find the poiſon without having a wholeſome and well prepared antidote. But this anſwer is not ſatisfactory; for it ſuppoſes, that the Readers are extremely imprudent and lazy; it ſuppoſes that they would chooſe to venture their own ſalvation, rather than take the pains of paſſing from one book to another, and that tho' they knew, they could find Bellarmin's Works at the ſame Bookſeller's ſhop, where they bought the Work of a Calviniſt, they would yet determine the queſtion on the ſide of the latter, before they inquired into this Cardinal's arguments, tho' they could immediately have upon their table both the Book which contains the poiſon, and that which affords the antidote. You muſt own that the difference there is between the arguments of an Heretick, bound up in one volume with thoſe of the Orthodox, and the ſame arguments bound up ſeparately, thoſe of the Heretick in one volume, and thoſe of the Orthodox in another; you muſt own, I ſay, that ſuch a difference does not afford ſufficient ground either for hope or fear. The hope muſt therefore be grounded on ſome other conſideration. It muſt be ſuppoſed, that what may be a ſufficient antidote, when the readers compare the arguments which the Orthodox quotes from the Book of the Heretick, with the Orthodox's anſwer, is not a ſufficient remedy, when the Readers compare the whole Book of the Heretick, with the whole Book of the Orthodox. It muſt therefore be alſo ſuppoſed, that ſetting aſide the anſwer, the arguments of the Heretick are weaker in the Book of the Orthodox, than they are in the work of the Heretick himſelf; conſequently it muſt be ſuppoſed, that the Author of the Anſwer was ſo cautious, as not to propoſe thoſe arguments, till he had diſguiſed and curtailed them, and given them ſuch a turn, that they could not make any impreſſion upon thoſe, who ſeeing them only in that dreſs, ſhould compare them with the anſwers. At this rate the Inquiſitors who prohibit a Book, and ſuffer people to read a confutation of it, do not act inconſiſtently, nor is their conduct incoherent; they are perſuaſed that their prohibition will be uſeful at the ſame time that their permiſſion is not prejudicial. However, we may infer from thence, that the ſame policy, the ſame prudence, the ſame charity, the ſame zeal, (call it by what name you pleaſe) which ingages them to burn ſome works, or to prohibit the reading and ſelling of them, muſt of courſe ingage them not to ſuffer, that all the arguments of the author of theſe works, be inſerted in the Books which are deſigned as a confutation of them. For if againſt Chryſippus's maxim, theſe arguments were propoſed with all poſſible ſincerity, and in their whole ſtrength, it would be needleſs to deſtroy theſe bad Books, unleſs thoſe in which they are confuted, were deſtroyed at the ſame time. This is ſo evident, that it is probable, all the Authors who are zealous for maintaining the diſcipline, accommodate themſelves to the humour of them who govern, and who prohibit ſome Books. It is very probable, I ſay, that if theſe Authors undertake to confute ſome of thoſe prohibited Books, they will take care that their confutation does not contain the leaſt thing that might ſhake the faith of the Readers. They bring within the compaſs of three or four lines an objection which took up ſeveral pages; they ſeparate it from all its ſupports, and from all the preliminary obſervations that ſerved to ſtrengthen it, and what they cannot anſwer, they prudently omit (45). After all it is very difficult, for a Work, be it never ſo ſtrong with regard to thoſe who read it attentively from one end to the other, to appear to have any ſtrength, in the fragments which an Author quotes from it, and which he diſperſes here and there in ſeveral places of his anſwer, tranſcribing four lines in one place, five or ſix in another, &c. theſe are as ſo many branches lopped off from the trunk of a tree; it is clock-work taken to pieces, in which it is impoſſible to obſerve the diſmembered body (46). All the Controverſial Writers complain in their turns of the artifices

(44) Quotation (45) of the Article BELLARMIN.

(45) Et quæ Deſperat tractata nitescere poſſe relinquit. Horat. de Arte Poetic. ver. 150. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Juilet, 1685, Art. 3. pag. 804.

(46) Non ... invenias etiam diſjecti membra poetæ. Horat. Sat. 4. lib. 1. ver. 62.

ſin; and Lipſius, who endeavoured to clear him of this blemiſh, did not ſucceed in his attempt [H]: nor do I wonder at it; for the very definition of God (p), given by Chryſippus, ſhews, that he did not diſtinguiſh the Deity from the Univerſe; ſo that if he reaſoned

(p) See the Remark [H] quotation (49).

(47) Compare this with the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Juliet 1685, Art. 3.

ſices of thoſe who write againſt them (47). I have known a Roman Catholick, who ſaid, that all the Works publiſhed againſt Bellarmin, deſerved to be intitled Bellarminus enervatus, Bellarmin enervated, (as Ameſius intitled his Book againſt this Cardinal;) enervatus, added he, not by the ſtrength of the anſwer, but by the manner of repreſenting his objections. The Proteſtants do ſtill more complain of the unfair proceedings of their adverſaries. Obſerve the diſputes, which ſometimes ariſe between perſons of the ſame party: read the reſpective works of the diſputants; you will find ſome ſtrength in them: but if you will judge of Mævius's Books by the ſcraps which his adverſary Titius quotes from them, and by the reflections he makes upon them, you will think, that Mævius can neither write nor reaſon well, and that he even wants common ſenſe.

Obſerve, that I do not pretend to aſſert, that they who prohibit heretical Books, always act conſiſtently (48).

(48) See the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, Sept. 1685, pag. 1053. Juin 1686, pag. 639. Juillet 1686, Art. 8. pag. 810.

[H] Plutarch charges him with making God the Author of Sin; Lipſius, who endeavoured to clear him . . did not ſucceed in his attempt.] You will find the charge in the remark [G] of the article PAULICIANS. Let us leave it there, ſince it was put there in the firſt edition of this Dictionary. Let us only examine in this place the arguments, which Juſtus Lipſius propoſed; but firſt of all let us ſee what was Chryſippus's opinion concerning the Nature of God. Ait (Chryſippus) vim divinam in ratione poſitam, & univerſæ naturæ animo atque menti: ipſumque mundum Deum dicit eſſe, & ejus animi ſuſtionem univerſam: tum ejus ipſius principatum, qui in mente & ratione verſetur, communemque rerum naturam univerſa atque omnia continentem, tum fatalem umbram, & neceſſitatem rerum futurarum. Ignem præterea, & tum quem antea dixi æthera; tum ea, quæ natura fluerent, atque manarent, ut aquam & terram, & æra, ſolem, lunam, ſidera, univerſitatemque rerum, quâ omnia continerentur, atque homines etiam eos, qui immortalitatem eſſent conſecuti. Idemque diſputat, æthera eſſe eum, quem homines Jovem appellarent, quique aër per maria manaret, eum eſſe Neptunum; terram eam quæ Ceres diceretur, ſimilique ratione perſequitur vocabula reliquorum Deorum. Idemque etium legis perpetuæ & æternæ vim, quæ quaſi dux vitæ, & magiſtra officiorum ſit, Jovem dicit eſſe: eandemque fatalem neceſſitatem appellat, ſempiternam rerum futurarum veritatem, quorum nihil tale eſt, ut in eo vis divina eſſe videatur. Et hæc quidem in primo libro de Natura Deorum. In ſecundo autem vult Orphei, Muſæi, Heſiodi, Homerique fabellas accommodare ad ea quæ ipſe primo libro de Diis immortalibus dixerat: ut etiam veterrimi poetæ, qui hæc ne ſuſpicati quidem ſint, Stoici fuiſſe videantur (49). i. e. "Chryſippus ſays, the divine energy or power "is univerſal reaſon, and the mind and ſoul of "whole nature: and he aſſerts that the World is God, "and the univerſal effuſion of that mind: and that "it is endowed with the governing power of the "mind and of reaſon, and is the common nature of "all things, as alſo a fatal ſhadow, and the neceſſity "of future events. Beſides, he ſays that God is a "fire, and that Æther, which I have mentioned a"bove: then he aſſerts, that it is all that flows and "emanates from nature, as water, earth, air, the ſun, "the moon, the ſtars, and the univerſality of things, "which comprehends all, and even thoſe men, who "obtained immortality. He alſo endeavours to prove, "that the Æther is, what men call Jupiter, and that "the air which flows over the Seas is ſtiled Neptune, "and that the earth is what is named Ceres. After "the ſame manner does he explain the other names of "the Gods. He alſo aſſerts, that the efficacy of that "perpetual and eternal law, which is as it were the "guide of our lives, and the teacher of our duties, "is nothing but Jupiter himſelf; and he calls it the "fatal neceſſity and the eternal truth of things to "come; tho' no divine energy can be obſerved in "any of thoſe things he mentions. This is what he "ſays in his firſt Book concerning the Nature of the "Gods. In the ſecond he undertakes to reconcile "the fables of Orpheus, Muſæus, Heſiod and Homer "with the ſyſtem he laid down in his firſt Book con"cerning the immortal Gods; thus to make the moſt "ancient Poets, who did not dream any ſuch thing, "appear to have been Stoicks." This paſſage alone would determine the queſtion to Chryſippus's ſhame, had he been a man who ſtuck to his own principles; but as he altered them daily, and maintained by turns the moſt contrary opinions, his Apologiſts may find ſomething to ſay in his favour, and by the means of his contradictions and inconſiſtencies, they may for ſome time keep their ground, and maintain him orthodox. The paſſage, which I have quoted from Cicero, contains an unintelligible jargon, it is a more rude and undigeſted Chaos, than that of the Poets. Yet through all this darkneſs we can clearly perceive, that according to Chryſippus God is the Soul of the World, that the World is the univerſal extenſion of that Soul, and that Jupiter is the eternal Law, the fatal neceſſity, the unalterable truth of all future events. The direct and unavoidable conſequence of this is, that the ſoul of man is a part of God, and that a man's actions have no other cauſe but God himſelf. But let us grant this Philoſopher the liberty of making as many ill-grounded diſtinctions as he pleaſes; after all his windings and turnings he muſt at laſt fall into the precipice. He ſuppoſes that the ſoul of man eſcaped the general fatality, he exempts it from the fate, to which all other things are ſubject, and he makes it free. Ac mihi quidem videtur, quum duæ ſententiæ fuiſſent veterum Philoſophorum; una eorum, qui cenſerent omnia ita fato fieri, ut id fatum vim neceſſitatis afferret, in quâ ſententia Democritus, Heraclitus, Empedocles, Ariſtoteles fuit; altera eorum, quibus viderentur ſine ullo fato eſſe animorum motus voluntarii; Chryſippus tanquam arbiter honorarius medium ferire voluit, ſed applicat ſe ad eos potius, qui neceſſitate motus animos liberatos volunt . . (50). Chryſippus autem cum & neceſſitatem improbaret, & nihil vellet ſine præpoſitis cauſis evenire, cauſarum genera diſtinguit, ut & neceſſitatem effugiat, & retineat fatum. Cauſarum enim, inquit, aliæ ſunt perfectæ & principales, aliæ adjuvantes & proximæ. Quamobrem cum dicimus omnia fato fieri cauſis antecedentibus, non hoc intelligi volumus, cauſis perfectis & principalibus, ſed cauſis adjuvantibus, antecedentibus, & proximis (51). i. e. "As "there were two opinions amongſt the ancient Philo"ſophers; the one that of thoſe, who held, that all "things are ſo ſubject to fate, in ſuch a manner, that "they are abſolutely neceſſary; the other that of thoſe, "who maintained that the determinations of the mind "are voluntary, and not ſubject to fate; it ſeems to "me, that Chryſippus like an honourable arbiter ſtept "between them both, tho' he comes nearer to thoſe, "who hold that the determinations of the mind are "free from neceſſity. . . As Chryſippus did not admit "an abſolute neceſſity, and yet maintained, that no"thing happens without antecedent cauſes, he diſtin"guiſhed two ſorts of cauſes, thus to eſcape neceſſity "whilſt he maintains a Fatum. For ſome cauſes, ſays "he, are perfect and principal cauſes, others are help"ing and near. So that, when we ſay, that every "thing happens by fate thro' antecedent cauſes, we "do not mean it of perfect and principal cauſes, but of "near, helping, and antecedent cauſes." He does not deny, as you ſee, that every thing is produced by an antecedent cauſe, but he admitted two ſorts of cauſes, the latter of which did not deſtroy man's liberty. The perfect and principal cauſes, ſaid he, do not ſuffer an action to be free, but they may be ſo notwithſtanding the helping cauſes. Since therefore he aſſerted, that our deſires were not produced by an external principal cauſe, but only by an external not principal cauſe, which only excited them, he concluded from thence, that the ſoul itſelf produced its deſires, and had a power over them. It wants to be excited by the external objects, without which it could not form the leaſt act of aſſenting; but the objects, which excite it, do not produce the determinations or acts of the will; it determines itſelf by its own ſtrength, when the objects have given it the firſt motion. He explains this by a compariſon. He who throws a cylinder, ſays he, gives it the firſt motion, but not the volubility, or faculty of rolling, and the cylinder rolls afterwards by its own

(49) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 15.

(50) Cicero, de Fato, cap. 17, & ſeq.

(51) Idem, ibid.

ſtrength;

reaſoned conſiſtently, he could not but make God the Author both of moral and natural evil. One cannot, without being ſtruck with horror, read what he taught concerning the mortality ſtrength; thus our ſoul being excited by the objects, moves afterwards of itſelf. Quamquam aſſenſio non poſſit fieri niſi commota viſo, tamen cum hoc viſum proximam cauſam habeat non principalem, hanc habet rationem, ut Chryſippus vult, quam dudum diximus, non ut illa quidem fieri poſſit nulla vi extrinſecus excitata, neceſſe eſt enim aſſenſionem viſo commoveri, ſed revertitur ad Cylindrum, & ad turbinem ſuum, quæ moveri incipere niſi pulſa non poſſunt. Id autem quum accidit, ſuapte natura, quod ſupereſt, & Cylindrum volvi, & verſari turbinem putat. Ut igitur, inquit, qui protruſit Cylindrum, dedit ei principium motionis, volubilitatem autem non dedit, ſic viſum objectum imprimet illud quidem, & quaſi ſignabit in animo ſpeciem ſuam, ſed aſſenſio noſtra erit in poteſtate, eaque, quemadmodum in Cylindro dictum eſt, extrinſecus pulſa, quod reliquum eſt ſuapte vi & natura movebitur (52). Obſerve, that Cicero had ſaid, that Chryſippus intangles himſelf ſo much, that whether he would or not, he confirmed the abſolute neceſſity of fate (53). This does not very clearly appear in Cicero's work, ſo that I could eaſily believe with Lipſius, that there are ſome things wanting in this place (54), as it is certain ſome are wanting in other places. Lipſius has his recourſe to Aulus Gellius, who has preſerved more exactly Chryſippus's explication. I am perſuaded the reader will permit me to tranſcribe at large what he ſays; as this is a very ſublime, intricate and inexplicable ſubject, we muſt not ſtrive to be too ſparing in our quotations. The leaving out ſome things would but render what we tranſcribe more obſcure. You will ſee, in the paſſage of Aulus Gellius, firſt the definition of deſtiny, according to Chryſippus; then the inference which was drawn from it, namely, that men did not ſin, and that all their crimes were to be laid to the charge of deſtiny alone; and laſtly this Philoſopher's anſwer. Fatum, quod Græci πεπρωμένην vel εἱμαρμένην vocant, ad hanc ferme ſententiam Chryſippus Stoicæ princeps philoſophiæ definit. Fatum eſt, inquit, ſempiterna quædam & indeclinabilis ſeries rerum & catena, volvens ſemet ipſa ſeſe & implicans per æternos conſequentiæ ordines, ex quibus apta connexaque eſt . . (55). Aliarum autem opinionum diſciplinarumque auctores huic definitioni ita obſtrepunt. Si Chryſippus, inquiunt, fato putat omnia moveri & regi, nec declinari tranſcendique poſſe agmina fati & volumina, peccata quoque hominum & delicta non ſuſtentanda neque condicenda ſunt ipſis voluntatibus eorum, ſed neceſſitati cuidam & inſtantiæ, quæ oritur ex fato, omniumque ſit rerum domina & arbitra; per quam neceſſe ſit fieri quicquid futurum eſt; & propterea nocentium pœnas legibus iniquе conſtitutas, ſi homines ad maleficia non ſponte veniunt, ſed fato trahuntur. Contra ea Chryſippus tenuiter multa & arguta diſſerit. Sed omnium fere, quæ ſuper ea re ſcripſit, ſententia hujuſmodi eſt. Quamquam ita ſit, inquit, ut ratione quadam principali neceſſariò coacta atque connexa ſint fato omnia; ingenia tamen ipſa mentium noſtrarum proinde ſunt fato obnoxia, ut proprietas eorum eſt ipſa & qualitas, nam ſi ſunt per naturam primitus ſalubriter utiliterque facta, omnem illam vim, quæ de fato extrinſecus ingruit, inoffenſius tractabiliuſque tranſmittunt. Sin vero ſunt aſpera & inſcita & rudia, nulliſque artium bonarum adminiculis fulta; etiamſi parvo ſive nullo fatalis incommodi conflictu urgeantur; ſua tamen ſcævitate & voluntario impetu in aſſidua delicta & in errores ruunt, idque ipſum ut ea ratione fiant naturalis illa & neceſſaria rerum conſequentia efficit, quæ fatum vocatur. Eſt enim genere ipſo quaſi fatale & conſequens, ut mala ingenia peccatis & erroribus non vacent (56). i. e. "Chryſippus the Prince of the Stoick "Philoſophers, defines fate, almoſt after this manner, "Fate, ſays he, is a certain, eternal and unchangeable "ſeries and chain of things, winding and turning it- "ſelf in perpetual revolutions of ſucceſſions, of which "it is compoſed and linked together. . . . The Phi- "loſophers of the other Sects, who held different opi- "nions, made the following objections againſt this "definition. If Chryſippus, ſay they, thinks, that "all things are moved and regulated by fate, in ſuch "a manner, that its influence and courſe can by no "means be turned off, nor avoided, then the very ſins "and evil actions of men are not to be charged upon "nor aſcribed to their will, but to a certain neceſſity, "which is unavoidable, and comes from fate; ſuch a "neceſſity as governs and rules every thing, and by "which whatever is to come muſt abſolutely happen; "whence it follows that the laws are unjuſt, which "ſubject the guilty to puniſhments, if men do not "willingly commit evil actions, but are forced to it by "fate. Chryſippus replied to all this by ſeveral witty "and ſharp reflections; the ſubſtance of what he wrote "upon this ſubject comes to this. Tho' it be true, "ſays he, that all things are fatally connected and "linked together by a principal cauſe, yet our minds "are ſubject to fate in ſuch a manner as is proper to "their nature and qualities; for if at firſt they have "been well and uſefully framed by nature, that whole "energy of fate paſſes through them, in a more eaſy "and gentle manner. But if they be unpoliſhed, un- "learned, and rude, and unprovided with thoſe helps, "which the liberal arts procure, though the influence "they ſuffer from fate were very ſmall, or none at all, "yet by their own unſkilfulneſs, and by the impetuo- "ſity of their will, they would run headlong into "continual crimes and errors. And that this happens "ſo, is the effect of that natural and neceſſary con- "nection of things, which we call Fate. For it is "in its own nature almoſt fatal and neceſſary, that bad "minds be not free from ſins and miſtakes." Aulus Gellius relates afterwards the compariſon of the cylinder, and the concluſion, which Chryſippus inferred from his diſcourſe, which was, that no body muſt be admitted to excuſe himſelf by laying the blame of his conduct upon deſtiny, and that criminals muſt not be heard, who have this recourſe to this Aſylum. Propterea negat oportere ferri, audirique homines aut nequam aut ignavos & nocentes & audaces, qui, cum in culpa & maleficio revicti ſunt, profugiunt ad fati neceſſitatem, tamquam in aliud fati aſylum; & quæ peſſime fecerunt, ea non ſuæ temeritati, ſed fato eſſe attribuenda dicunt (57).

It is eaſy to obſerve, that this Philoſopher could not extricate himſelf out of the labyrinth in which he was engaged; and that his diſtinction of external cauſes, which neceſſitated, and thoſe which did not neceſſitate, was of no uſe to him. He only winds and turns himſelf about, and at laſt he proves to be exactly where they are, who ſubmit every thing to the unavoidable neceſſity of deſtiny. To be convinced of this, you need but join together his compariſon of the cylinder, and the confeſſion he makes, that all the inward qualifications of the mind, which make men ſin, are a natural and neceſſary effect of Fate (58). He ſays, that there are ſome minds, which having been well framed from the beginning, go without any hurt thro' the ſtorm, which falls upon them from fate; and that there are others, which are ſo ill framed, and ſo rough, that if fate hits them ever ſo little, or even not at all, they fall into ſin by a voluntary motion. This is owing to a natural imperfection, which is in the cauſe. Now he has ſaid that the fatal neceſſity of every thing is the principle, by which it happens, that ſome minds are well and others ill framed; conſequently he muſt alſo ſay, that we may and ought to aſcribe to fate all the crimes which men commit; and ſince he moreover admitted a Divine Providence, he could not but acknowledge, in the courſe of his reaſonings, that God is the cauſe of all thoſe crimes; and conſequently, Plutarch's charge againſt him is very well grounded: for his compariſon of a cylinder cannot be exact, unleſs you compare fate, not to the firſt comer who throws the cylinder, but to the turner who made it, and afterwards ſets it a rolling. The cylinder's rolling a long time is indeed owing to its ſingular figure, but ſince the turner made it with that figure, which is the neceſſary cauſe of a laſting motion, he is himſelf the true cauſe of the motion's duration. The whole difference there is between a Cube that does not roll, and a Cylinder that does, all the conſequences, all the regularities or irregularities in the reſt of the one, and in the continued motion of the other, muſt be aſcribed to the workman, who gave each of theſe bodies ſuch a form from which theſe regularities and irregularities &c. are neceſſary conſequences. It is very eaſy to apply all this to the ſouls of men. This difficulty did not eſcape Lipſius;

(52) Cicero, de Fato, cap. 18.

(53) Dum autem verbis utitur ſuis, delabitur in eas difficultates, ut neceſſitatem fati confirmet invitus. Idem, ibid. cap. 9.

(54) Sed quod in Viſo Cicero dicit, & hæret parum pro interiore ipſa re videtur, & credo plura addidiſſe, quæ ævo exciderunt. Lipſius, Phyſ. Stoic. lib. 1. Diſſert. 14.

(55) Aulus Gellius, lib. 6. cap. 2.

(56) Idem, ibid.

(57) Idem, ibid.

(58) Idque ipſum, ut ea ratione fiat, naturalis illa & neceſſaria rerum conſequentia effecit, quæ fatum vocatur. Idem, ibid.

mortality of the Gods [I]. He not only thought that they were periſhable, but he even aſſerted, that they would really periſh in the conflagration of the world; and though he excepted Jupiter, yet he thought him liable to change. He wrote a book concerning the Amours of Jupiter and Juno, which abounded with ſo many obſcene paſſages [K], that Lipſius; but in order to clear his Chryſippus, he ſuppoſes, that the Stoicks aſcribed the defects in the ſoul of man, not to God, but to a real and unconquerable imperfection of matter. Sed heus, Chryſippe, ſi a Natura hæc conſtitutio aut divirgium; Deum a malo qui excuſas? quomodo non ille Naturæ auctor atque ipſa Natura, malum maloſque genuit, ſi tales fecit? Hoc caput eſt & Arx, ut ſic dicam, cauſſæ, nunc adeunda & occupanda. Aio Stoicos mali principium non in Deo, ſed in materia, (quæ tamen Deo, ut ipſi aliique voluerunt Ævo æquali & æterna,) in materia, inquam, conſtituiſſe. Itaque cum Deus homines aliaque faceret, omnia bona & in bonum finxiſſe, ſed repugnantem aliquam vim & malicioſam in illa fuiſſe, atque eſſe, quæ alio traheret; atque hinc interna atque etiam externa mala extitiſſe (59). i. e. "But hark you, Chryſippus, if this conſtitution "and deviation be from Nature, how can you avoid "making God the Author of evil? How is it poſſible that the Author of Nature, who is nature herſelf, "ſhould not have produced evil, and bad men, if he "made them really as they are? This is the chief "point, and if I may ſay ſo, the ſtrong hold of the "cauſe, which we muſt now attack and maſter. I "aſſert then, that the Stoicks placed the principle or "cauſe of evil not in God, but in matter (which yet "they and ſeveral others thought was co-eternal with "God) ſo that when God made man and other things, "he intended them good and for a good end; but "there was a certain repugnant and malignant efficacy "in matter, which oppoſed God's intention; and "hence ſprung all evils both internal and external." But this pretended vindication of Chryſippus has been ſo well confuted by Plutarch (60), that it cannot be of the leaſt uſe. Euſebius has preſerved a Fragment of a Peripatetick Philoſopher, called Diogenianus, who had very well expoſed the defects of Chryſippus's doctrine upon this ſubject (61).

(59) Lipſius, Phyſ. Stoic. lib. 1. Diſſert. 14.

(60) See the Remark [U] of the article PAULICIANS.

(61) See Euſebius, Præparat. Evangel. lib. 6. cap. 8. pag. 262, & ſeq. See alſo what Oenomaus ſays againſt the ſame Chryſippus. Ibid. cap. 7.

Obſerve, that neither Calvin, for inſtance, nor any other Chriſtian, who maintains abſolute Predeſtination, lie open to the ſame objections, becauſe they ſuppoſe, that there was not in the ſoul of the firſt man any neceſſitating quality towards evil.

[I] One cannot, without being ſtruck with horror, read what he taught concerning the Mortality of the Gods.] Plutarch, having a deſign to ſhew, that the Stoicks had perverted all the common notions, which men had of the Gods, begins with the ideas of eternity and incorruptibility. What man is there, ſays he (62), or has ever been, but does or did believe, that God is incorruptible and immortal? Is there any thing more agreeable to the common notions of men, and more univerſally admitted than this? . . . . . One may meet perhaps with ſome ſavage Nations, who do not believe there is a God: but there never was a man, who having ſome notion of a God, did not believe him to be immortal and eternal. They, who have been called Atheiſts, becauſe they denied the being of a God, as Theodorus, Diagoras, and Hippo, durſt not ſay that God is liable to deſtruction, but their opinion was, that there is nothing incorruptible; yet whilſt they denied the poſſibility of an incorruptible ſubſtance, they left men to enjoy the notions they had of a God. But Chryſippus and Cleanthes, who in their writings have crowded (if I may ſay ſo) heaven and earth, the air and the ſea with Gods, yet make none of them incorruptible or eternal, except Jupiter, in whom, they think, all the others are to be reſolved; ſo that he conſumes or deſtroys them, which is not much better, than to be deſtroyed himſelf: for it is not more a ſign of imperfection or weakneſs to be reſolved into the ſubſtance of another, than to feed upon the ſubſtance of another, and turn it into one's own. Nor is this abſurdity like ſome others that are drawn from their aſſertions and writings by way of inference, and as neceſſary conſequences of their doctrines; for they themſelves expreſly declare in their Books concerning the Gods, Providence, Fate and Nature, that all the Gods are born, and will periſh; that they are all combuſtible, and will be burnt, or melted down, as tho' they were made of wax or of pewter. . . . . Chryſippus ſays then, that Jupiter reſembles a man and the world, and that Providence reſembles the ſoul. So that when the conflagration of the world comes, Jupiter (who alone of all the Gods is unperiſhable) ſhall retire into Providence, and they both ſhall ſubſiſt for ever in the ſubſtance of the Æther (63). There is here, I think, a ſeparation of the body from the ſoul, and conſequently death. We have obſerved (64), that Chryſippus ſuppoſed, that God is the Soul of the World, and in the laſt paſſage we have quoted he tells us, that when the world ſhall be burnt, Jupiter will retire to another place. Let us ſee the battery of his contradictions, and at the ſame time, a parallel between the impiety of Epicurus, and that of Chryſippus. "They, ſays he "(Antipater) who deny the Benevolence of the Gods, "come in ſome meaſure pretty near to thoſe, who aſſert, that the Gods are born and will periſh; for "there is as much abſurdity in maintaining that the "Gods are corruptible, as there is in denying their "providence and benevolence. Chryſippus therefore "is as much miſtaken as Epicurus, ſince the former "denies the Eternity of the Gods, and the latter their "Benevolence. . . . All the other Gods, ſays Chryſippus, uſe equally food, which keeps them up. But "Jupiter and the World are nouriſhed after another "manner than they, who are begotten, and will periſh by fire. Here then he aſſerts, that all the "Gods are nouriſhed, except Jupiter and the World, "and in his firſt Book concerning Providence, he ſays, "that Jupiter is continually increaſing, till all things "be conſumed in him. And ſince death is the ſeparation of the ſoul from the body, and the ſoul of "the world is not ſeparated from it, but is continually "increaſing, till it has conſumed all the matter within itſelf, we ought not to ſay, that the World dies. "Can any one contradict himſelf more glaringly, "than by aſſerting, that the ſame God is and is not "nouriſhed (65)?" It is poſſible, that ſo acute a Philoſopher ſhould have had ſuch monſtrous notions?

(62) Plutarch, de Commun. Notit. contra Stoicos, pag. 1074, 1075.

(63) Idem, ibid. pag. 1077, D.

(64) Quotation (49).

(65) Plut. de Repugnant. Stoicor. pag. 1052.

[K] He wrote a Book concerning the amours of Jupiter and Juno, which abounded with . . . . obſcene paſſages.] Diogenes Laertius is not the only Author that acquaints us with this. Εισὶ δέ, ſays he, οἳ κατατρίβεσι τῷ Χρυσίππῳ, ὡς πολλὰ ἀισχρῶς καὶ ἀῤῥήτως ἀναγεγραφότος. ἐν μὲν γὰρ τῷ περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων φυσιολόγων συγγράμματι αἰσχρῶς τὰ περὶ τὴν Ἥραν καὶ τὸν Διὰ ἀναπλάττει, λέγων κατὰ τὰς ἑξακοσίους σχεδὸν μονοδίους ἠυχηκὼς μολύνειν τὸ σῶμα, εἴποι ἄν. αἰσχροτάτην γὰρ (φησὶ) ταύτην ἀναπλάττει ἐφορίαν, εἰ μὴ ἐπαίνει ὡς φυσικὴν, Χαμαιτύπαις μᾶλλον πρέπουσαν, ἢ Θεοῖς. ἔτι τε τὰ παρὰ τοῖς περὶ πινάκων γράψασι κατακεχωρισμένα (66). i. e. "There are "ſome who expoſe Chryſippus's reputation, becauſe "he wrote a great many abominable and obſcene "things; for in his Book concerning the ancient Phiſiologers, he feigns very ſhameful ſtories relating to "Juno and Jupiter, and ſays in almoſt ſix hundred "lines, what none but the moſt immodeſt men would "ſpeak: he relates a ſtory as they ſay, which tho' he "praiſes it as being natural, yet it is ſo impudent, "that it becomes common proſtitutes rather than Deities; and indeed it has been omitted by thoſe who "wrote upon pictures." We may add to this a paſſage from Origen. Καὶ τί μὴ δεῖ καταλέγειν τὰς περὶ Θεῶν ἀτόπους Ἑλλήνων ἐφορίας, αἰσχύνης αὐτόθεν ἀξίας καὶ ἀλληγορουμένας; ὅπου τι ὁ Σόλους Χρύσιππος, ὁ τὴν Στοὰν τῶν φιλοσόφων πολλοῖς συγγράμμασι σπουδοῖς κεκοσμηκέναι νομιζόμενος, παρεμπεπλεύκει γραφὴν τὴν ἐν Σάμῳ, ἐν ᾗ ἀῤῥητοποιοῦσα ἡ Ἥρα τὸν Δία ἐγέγραπτο (67). i. e. "Why "ſhould I relate the abſurd ſtories of the Greeks con"cerning the Gods, which are ſhameful both in themſelves, and when they are allegorized? Since Chry"ſippus of Solos, who is reckoned to have raiſed the "reputation of the Stoic Philoſophers very high, by "the many books he wrote, explained a picture, "which was at Samos, and in which Juno was repreſented with Jupiter in a very unbecoming poſture." How abominable it is, that there ſhould have been ſuch pictures in the Temples of the Heathens? Obſerve that Chryſippus allegorized all this, and explained it, not in a moral but in a Phyſical ſenſe: judge then whether his expreſſions could be modeſt. You have ſeen above (68), that he had allegorized after the ſame manner all the impertinences of Mythology: he found in them the whole Theology of the Stoics.

(66) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 187.

(67) Origenes contra Celſum, lib. 4.

(68) In the Remark [H] quotation (49).

that it was loudly exclaimed againſt. It is therefore eaſy to gueſs, that the Stoicks had not much reaſon to be pleaſed with his writings. For as he was a conſiderable man amongſt them [L], it gave people a pretence to charge the whole body with the errors of ſo illuſtrious a member of it. Nor do we find, that the celebrated Authors amongſt the Stoicks, ſuch as a Seneca, an Epictetus, an Arrian, were very forward to ſhew their veneration for him [M]; they are, generally ſpeaking, very ſparing in this reſpect. I do not find that any objection was made againſt his morals; which makes me think, that his conduct was blameleſs. It is ſuppoſed, that the only ſervant he had was an old woman [N], which is a proof of his chaſtity and temperance. He uſed often to repeat five lines of Euripides (q), which condemn all daintineſs and intemperance, and put us in mind that Nature has ſufficiently provided for all our wants by the means of bread and water; and he abhorred the works of Archeſtratus (r): this may convince us that he was a very ſober man. I have obſerved already that he applied himſelf very much to Dialectics; I add, that he took extraordinary pains to find out the ſolution of a Sophiſm, which puzzled the Philoſophers very much, and which was called Sorites [O]; it was a heap

(q) Aulus Gellius, lib. 7. cap. cap. 16.

(r) See the quotation (80).

[L] He was a conſiderable man amongſt the Stoics.] He was conſidered as the chief ſupport of that ſect (69), and it became a common Proverb, that had it not been for him, the Stoics had never been. Ὅθεν φασὶν ἐπ' αὐτῷ λεχθῆναι.

Οἷος πέπτωται, τὸν δ' ἂς σκιὰ ἄλετο πάντα.

Καὶ

Εἰ μὴ γὰρ ἦν Χρύσιππος, οὐκ ἂν ἦν Στοά (70).

That is,

" Hence it was ſaid of him, He alone is wiſe, all the " reſt are carried away like as a ſhadow. And, If " Chryſippus had not been, the Porch (that is, the Stoics) had never been.

[M] A Seneca, an Epictetus, an Arrian were not very forward to ſhew their veneration for him.] We have ſeen above (71), how Seneca reproved him in his Work de Beneficiis. He quotes him in ſome other places, and moſtly without any elogium. I own however, that in his Treatiſe de otio Sapientis he aſſerts, that Zeno and Chryſippus have performed greater things by the labours they underwent in their cloſets, than if they had commanded armies, and he conſiders them as the lawgivers of mankind (72). Nos certe ſumus, qui dicimus & Zenonem, & Chryſippum majora egiſſe, quam ſi duxiſſent exercitus, geſſiſſent honores, leges tuliſſent, quas non uni Civitati, ſed toti humano generi tulerunt. Epictetus ſeverely cenſures thoſe, who boaſted, that they explained Chryſippus's opinions, and bids them tell themſelves, If Chryſippus had not wrote too obſcurely, we ſhould not have wherewithal to boaſt (73). Arrian does often exclaim againſt thoſe, who read this Philoſopher's Works, and looked upon it as a very noble deed (74). It cannot I think be poſitively aſſerted, that he applies to Chryſippus the glory, which ariſes from a reflection he makes, after he had conſidered the divine honours which were paid to Triptolemus (75). I believe, that he means only in general, that he who diſcovered truth to men, and ſhewed them the way to virtue, would more juſtly deſerve to have Altars raiſed to him, than they who taught them to ſow corn.

[N] The only ſervant he had was an old woman.] Diogenes Laertius mentions this two or three times. Ἤρκειτο τῇ γερωκόμῳ μόνῃ. He was ſatisfied with one old woman only (76) for his ſervant. He had already obſerved, that it had been known by this old ſervant, that Chryſippus uſed to write five hundred lines every day (77). Monſieur Menage, who thought that Plutarch ſpoke of the ſame old woman, in the words which I ſhall juſt now quote, was miſtaken (78). Chryſippus ſays in his Book concerning Jupiter, that it is an idle, abſurd and ridiculous thing to praiſe as the effects of virtue ſuch actions, like theſe for inſtance, the ſuffering patiently the ſting of a waſp, and forbearing to lie with an old decrepit woman (79). Chryſippus ſays this in general, and thus Plutarch who criticizes upon him, underſtood it, and he alledges this only to convince the Stoics, that they contradicted themſelves, and oppoſed the common notions of mankind. They maintain, (he had ſaid a little before,) that it is the ſame thing, not to lie with an old woman, and not to lie with a young one; both theſe actions being the effects of chaſtity: But that chaſtity in the latter caſe being ſomething great and glorious, a man ought to die rather than not be chaſte: but it would be ſhameful and ridiculous to boaſt of chaſtity in the former caſe. I have ſaid it a thouſand times; one is liable to miſapply a paſſage, if one does not carefully examine what goes before it, and what follows it. Monſr. Menage is an inſtance of it. I have met with a paſſage in Athenæus, which confirms the good opinion we ought to have of Chryſippus's temperance. See the Margin (80).

(80) Χρυσίππου δ' αὖθις φέλοι τὸν τῆς ὑὸς ἡγεμόνα κατὰ πολλὰ θαυμάζων ἔτι μᾶλλον ἐπαινῶ τὸν πολυθρύλλητον ἐπὶ τῷ φιλολογίᾳ Ἀρχίστρατον· εἰ δέ ποτε μετὰ Φιλιπίδου καὶ τοιούτου, εἰς ἀναφέρεται τὸ περὶ Ἀφροδισίων ἀκόλαστον σύγγραμμα. " My friend: I " do very much " admire Chryſippus, the " chief of the " Stoick Sect; " but I commend him " more eſpecially, becauſe " he deſpiſed " Archeſtratus, " who was famous for his " book concerning meats, as " much as he " deſpiſed Philinides, to " whom they " aſcribe a very " obſcene book " upon a venereal ſubject." Athen. lib. 8. pag. 335.

[O] He took extraordinary pains to find out the ſolution of a Sophiſm . . . . which was called Sorites.] In Greek Σωρίτης from the word σωρὸς, which ſignifies acervus a heap. Hence the Latins thought they might call this Sophiſm Acervalem (81). Ulpian defines it thus, cum ab evidenter veris, per breviſſimas mutationes diſputatio ad ea, quæ evidenter falſa ſunt, perducitur (82). i. e. " When from ſuch propoſitions, as are " evidently true, you come by ſmall changes to draw " ſuch inferences, as are evidently falſe." Cicero deſcribes it ſo as to make us underſtand the etymology of the word. Primum quidem hoc reprehendendum, quod captioſiſſimo genere interrogationis utuntur. Quod genus minime in Philoſophia probari ſolet, quum aliquid minutim & gradatim additur aut demitur: Sorites hos vocant qui acervum efficiunt unico addito grano (83). i. e. " The firſt thing that is to be blamed in them " is, their making uſe of a very captious kind of " interrogation, which is by no means to be admitted in Philoſophy; when ſome thing is imperceptibly and by degrees added or taken away. They " call it Sorites, who by the addition of one ſingle " grain make an heap." They inſtanced in a grain of corn, as you will ſee below, and from this propoſition, which is very true, one grain of corn is not an heap, they endeavoured to bring the diſputant by degrees to this palpable falſity, one grain of corn makes an heap. You will find in Sextus Empyricus ſome inſtances of this captious way of interrogating. I ſhall quote by and by a long paſſage from Cicero, which ſhews, that they pretended to prove by the means of a Sorites, that the mind of man can never come to a perfect knowledge of the fixed point which ſeparates the oppoſite properties, or which determines exactly the reſpective nature of every thing. What is it, they aſked, that conſtitutes what we call little, much, long, broad, ſmall, great &c. Do three grains of corn make a heap? The anſwer muſt be, no. Do four grains make a heap? You muſt make the ſame anſwer; and thus they continued their interrogations from one grain to another without end; and if you ſhould happen to anſwer at laſt, here is a heap, they pretended your anſwer was abſurd, ſince it ſuppoſed, that one ſingle grain makes the difference between what is and what is not an heap. I could prove by the ſame method, that a great drinker is never drunk. Will one drop of wine fuddle him, would I aſk? You would anſwer, no. Two drops then? By no means, neither three nor four. I would thus continue my interrogations from one drop to another; and if at the 999th drop you anſwered, he is not fuddled, and at the thouſandth he is, I would infer from thence, that one ſingle drop of wine makes the difference between the being drunk and being ſober of a great drinker, which is abſurd. If the interrogations went on from three pints to three hundred pints, you could eaſily mark the difference between enough and too much. But he who attacks you with

(69) Chryſippus, qui fulcire putatur Porticum Stoicorum, Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 4. cap. 28. See ſeveral ſuch paſſages in Mr. Menage's Diogen. Laert. lib. 7. num. 183. pag. m. 339.

(70) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 339.

(71) In the Remark [E].

(72) Seneca, De otio Sapientis, ſub fin.

(73) Epictet. Enchr. cap. 64.

(74) See Arriani Epictetum, lib. 1. cap. 10, 17. lib. 2. cap. 16, & alibi.

(75) Arrianus, Ibid. lib. 1. cap. 4. James Schegkius, his Latin Tranſlator, puts here in the margin, Chryſippus Triptolemo divinis honoribus dignior. i. e. " Chryſippus " does better " deſerve divine " honours than " Triptolemus."

(76) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 184.

(77) Ἡδὺ παρδρώσα αὐτῷ πρεσβύτις ἔλεγεν &c. Idem, ibid. num. 181.

(78) Menag. in Laert. lib. 7. pag. 339.

(79) Plutarch. De Comun. Notit. pag. 1060. See alſo de Repugn. Stoic. pag. 1038, 1039. Mr. Bayle quotes Amiot's French Tranſlation; but it is for the moſt part ſo dark, and agrees ſo little with the original, that we have been obliged to tranſlate moſt of the paſſages in this Article immediately from the Greek of Plutarch.

(81) Cicero, De Divinat. lib. 2. cap. 4.

(82) Ulpian. l. 65. ff. de regulis juris.

(83) Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 1. cap. 28.

heap of interrogations, in which one could find no end. The progreſs he made in Dialectics, which was no doubt very great, did not ſerve in the leaſt to improve his ſtyle. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus quotes him as an inſtance, which ſufficiently proves, that thoſe Authors, who are perfectly well ſkilled in Logic, do not well obſerve the rules of Grammar.

with a Sorites is at liberty to chooſe his own weapons, and he makes uſe of the ſmalleſt particles of quantity, that you may not find any where a fixed point which ſeparates the not being drunk from the being drunk, little from much, enough from too much, &c. The generality of men, who are not profeſſed Scholars, would juſtly laugh at theſe ſophiſtical quibbles, and would appeal to common ſenſe, and to that degree of knowledge, which in common life is ſufficient to make us diſtinguiſh in the general little from much, &c. But a man who ſet up for a Logician, could not have his recourſe to that Tribunal, he was obliged to anſwer in form, and unleſs he could find a ſolution according to the rules of art, he loſt the field of battle; his defeat, his overthrow were unavoidable. And at this time an Iriſh Tutor *, who ſhould haraſs a Profeſſor of Salamanca with a thouſand captious ſubtilties, and who ſhould receive no other anſwer but this, common ſenſe and the general conſent of mankind ſufficiently ſhew that your inferences are falſe, would gain the victory, and it would juſtly be ſaid, that the Profeſſor had been defeated; for he was obliged to anſwer in due form, and according to the rules of his trade, ſince it was by thoſe very rules his Theſes had been attacked. Chryſippus, who in this reſpect knew very well what his duty was, did clearly perceive that Sorites of the Dialecticians of Megara required a categorical anſwer. The reader will ſee what his device was; but I muſt firſt quote a Latin paſſage. Sed quoniam tantum in ea arte (Dialectica) ponitis, thus Cicero makes a Sceptick ſpeak, videte ne contra vos tota nata ſit, quæ primo progreſſu feſtive tradit elementa loquendi, & ambiguorum intelligentiam concludendique rationem; tum paucis additis venit ad Soritas lubricum ſane & periculoſum locum, quod tu modo dicebas vitioſum interrogandi genus. Quid ergo, iſtius vitii num noſtra culpa eſt? Rerum natura nullam dedit cognitionem finium, ut illa in re ſtatuere poſſimus, quatenus nec hoc in acervo tritici ſolum unde nomen eſt. Sed nulla omnino in re minutatim interrogandi dives, pauper, clarus, obſcurus ſit; multa, pauca, magna, parva, longa, brevia, lata, anguſta, quanto aut addito aut dempto, certum reſpondeamus non habemus. At vitioſi ſunt Soritæ. Frangite ergo eos ſi poteſtis, ne moleſti ſint. Erunt enim niſi caveatis (84). i. e. "But ſince it depends ſo much upon "that art (of Dialectieks), beware leſt the whole "ſtrength of it be turned againſt yourſelves; for it "begins with teaching the elements of ſpeech in a "very agreeable manner, and ſhews how to get at "the ſenſe of ambiguous expreſſions, and how to draw "inferences; but ſoon after it brings to the Sorites, "a very ſlippery and dangerous place; tho' you ſaid "juſt now, that the Sorites was a bad manner of in-"terrogating. What then are we anſwerable for its "badneſs? Nature has not made us capable of know-"ing the exact boundaries of things; ſo that we can-"not exactly mark where any thing begins or ends, "which is true not only in a heap of corn, whence "the Sorites took its name, but in every other ſub-"ject. For if we are aſked by degrees what it is pre-"ciſely that makes a man rich or poor, famous or "obſcure, or what is much, little, great, ſmall, long, "ſhort, broad, narrow, by what addition or ſubſtrac-"tion it becomes ſo, we have nothing to anſwer. "Yet, you will ſay, the Sorites is an erroneous me-"thod of arguing. Shew then where the error lies; "anſwer the argument, leſt it be puzzling to you; "and it will be ſo, if you do not take care." Chryſippus could not find any other device, but to anſwer a certain number of interrogations, and then to keep ſilence. His device was called the method of reſting. "Multum in eo Chryſippus ſudaverat, ut finitorem "acervi inveniret, ſed fruſtra: quare ſpe inveniendi, "quod quærebat, dejectus, κατὰ διάνοιαν, τινα πλὴν, quod "aiunt, excogitaverat quod vocabat τοπικὸν ζητεῖν λέγειν "(85) cum interrogatus perveniret (86)." Conſult Caſaubon in his excellent Commentary upon theſe words of Perſius

——— Depunge ubi ſiſtam
Inventus, Chryſippe, tui finitor acervi (87).

That is,

"Then ſay, Chryſippus, thou who wou'd'ſt confine
"Thy heap, where I ſhall put an end to mine.
Dryden.

This invention of Chryſippus had not a happy ſucceſs: See how Carneades ruined it entirely (88). Cautum eſt inquit. Placet enim Chryſippo, cum gradatim interrogetur, verbi cauſa tria pauca ſint (89) an ne multa, aliquanto priuſquam ad multa perveniat quieſcere, id eſt, quod ab his dicitur ἡσυχάζειν. Per me vel ſtertas licet, inquit Carneades, non modo quieſcas. Sed quid proficit? Sequitur enim, qui te ex ſomno excitet, & eodem modo interroget, quo in numero conticuiſti. Si ad eum numerum unum addidero multa ne erunt? progrediar rurſus quoad videbitur, quid plura? Hoc enim fateris, neque ultimum te paucorum, neque primum multorum reſpondere poſſe. Cujus generis error ita manat, ut non videam quò non poſſit accedere. Nihil lædit, inquit. Ego enim ut agitator callidus priuſquam ad finem veniam, equos ſuſtinebo, eoque magis, ſi locus ille quò ferentur equi præceps erit. Sic me, inquit, ante ſuſtinebo, nec diutius captioſe interroganti reſpondebo, Si habes, quod liqueat, neque reſpondes, ſuperbis; ſi non habes, ne tu quidem perſpicis, quia obſcura concedis. Sed negas te uſque ad obſcura progredi: illuſtribus ergo rebus inſiſtis. Si id tantummodo ut taceas, nihil aſſequeris. Quid enim ad illum qui te captare vult, utrum tacentem irretiat te, an loquentem. Sin autem uſque ad novem, verbi gratia ſine dubitatione reſpondes pauca eſſe, in decimo inſiſtis, etiam a certis & illuſtrioribus cohibes aſſenſum, hoc idem me in obſcuris facere non ſinis. Nihil ergo te contra Soritas ars iſta adjuvat, quod nec augendi nec minuendi quid aut primum ſit aut poſtremum docet. i. e. "It is a prudent device, ſays he; and Chryſippus "makes uſe of it, when he is interrogated by degrees; "if he was aſked for inſtance, whether three be few "or many, he ſtood ſtill, for ſome time before he came "to anſwer, many. And this is what thoſe (Philoſo-"pers) call being ſilent. With all my heart, ſays "Carneades, be not only at reſt, but even ſnore, if you "pleaſe. But what are you the better for it? For "here comes one, who will ſoon rouze you out of "your ſleep, and will interrogate you about that very "number, at which you were ſilent. If you add one "to that number, will it make many? I ſhall go "further ſtill, as much as I pleaſe. What ſhould I "ſay more? by your very ſilence you own, that you "cannot tell what is the laſt number conſiſtent with "the few, and what is the firſt, that makes it many. "That is nothing to me, you'll ſay: for I, like a ſkil-"ful coachman, will ſtop my horſes, before they come "to the end, and will do it ſo much the more, as "the place, to which they drive, is down hill. Thus "ſhall I be ſilent, you ſay, nor will I any longer an-"ſwer captious queſtions. But if you are able to an-"ſwer any thing to the purpoſe, and refuſe to do it, "you are proud; and if you have nothing to anſwer, "it ſhews that you don't comprehend the thing your "ſelf; ſince you grant it is incomprehenſible. But, "you ſay, you do not go ſo far as to what is incom-"prehenſible; but ſtop at what you clearly under-"ſtand. But if it is only to be ſilent, you do not "get any thing by it. For what is it to him, who "endeavours to catch you, whether he inſnares you "whilſt you are ſilent, or when you ſpeak. But if "you ſhould anſwer without heſitation, as far as nine, "for inſtance, and ſay, nine are few, and ſhould ſtop "at ten, this would be, witholding your aſſent in things "certain and evident; why then would you not ſuffer "me to do the ſame in what is unintelligible? Your "artifice or device is therefore of no manner of uſe to "you, ſince it does not teach you, what is the term "between ſmall or great, few or many, in any thing "that is either increaſing, or diminiſhing." The Sceptics took advantage of Chryſippus's device, and employed it as an Argumentum ad hominem. See Sextus Empiricus (90). Obſerve that Horace made uſe of a Sorites

* Mr. Bayle ſays, un Repetiteur Hibernois. A Repetiteur is a teacher in a College, who reads private Lectures to the ſcholars, and makes them rehearſe their leſſons. The Hybernians or Iriſh were reckoned to be very well ſkilled in Dialecticks.

(84) Cicero, Acad. Quæſt. lib. 4. cap. 16 and 28.

(85) One might tranſlate this the Quietiſt or Silent, and give that name to this device, as others were called the Reaper, the Lyar, &c.

(86) Caſaubonus in Perſium, Satyra ultima verſu ultimo, pag. m. 521.

(87) Perſius, Sat. ultima, in fine.

(88) Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 1. cap. 16.

(89) This ſhews that there is a chaſm in Diogenes Laertius, lib. 7. in Zenone, num. 82. for the inſtance which is there given of the Sophiſm called obvelatus, (velled), belongs evidently to the Sorites; as Cujas Tractatu V ad Africanum, and Gaſſend. Oper. tom. 1. pag. 41. have very well obſerved.

(90) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotypoſ. lib. 2. cap. 22.

Grammar, concerning the ſituation of words [P]. This inaccuracy of ſtyle is leſs ſurpriſing at firſt, than to ſee that this Philoſopher himſelf deſtroyed the foundations of that very Science, which he had cultivated with ſo much care [Q]. But even this will not appear very ſtrange, if we conſider with ſome attention, what are the effects of a long and cloſe application to the ſubtleties of Logic. A man of wit, who applies himſelf too much to this kind of ſtudy, ſeldom fails of becoming a caviller, and by his ſophiſtical ſubtleties he perplexes and imbroils the very theſes, which he moſt zealouſly maintained. He chooſes to deſtroy his own work, rather than forbear diſputing, and he ſtarts ſuch objections againſt his own opinions, that his whole art cannot ſolve them. The Spaniſh School-men a Sorites againſt the admirers of the ancients; the paſſage is ſo beautiful, that I cannot forbear tranſcribing it here; I hope the reader will forgive it me.

Si meliora dies ut vina poemata reddit,
Scire velim, pretium chartis quotus arroget annus.
Scriptor abhinc annos centum qui decidit, inter
Perfectos veteresque referri debet? An inter
Viles atque novos? Excludat jurgia finis.
Eſt vetus atque probus, centum qui perficit annos.
Quid? Qui deperiit minor uno menſe, vel anno,
Inter quos referendus erit? Veteresne poetas?
An quos & præſens & poſtera reſpuet ætas?
Iſte quidem veteres inter ponetur honeſtè,
Qui vel menſe brevi, vel toto eſt junior anno.
Utor permiſſo, caudæque pilos ut equinæ
Paulatim vello, demo unum, demo etiam unum;
Dum cadat eluſus ratione ruentis acervi,
Qui redit ad faſtos, & virtutem æſtimat annis.
Miraturque nihil, niſi quod libitina ſacravit (91).

(91) Horat. Epiſt. 1. lib. 2. ver. 34, &c.

That is,

"How many years will make a Poem good?
"One Poet writ an hundred years ago,
"What is he old and therefore fam'd, or no?
"Or is he new, and therefore fam'd, or no?
"Let's fix upon a certain term of years.
"He's good who lived an hundred years ago.
"Another wants but one, and he is ſo too?
"Or is he new and damn'd for that alone?
"Well he's good too and old, that wants but one.
"And thus I'll argue on, and bate one more,
"And ſo by one and one waſte all the ſtore.
"And ſo confute him, who eſteems by years,
"A Poem's goodneſs by the date it bears.
"Who nor admires, nor yet approves a line,
"But what is old, and death has made divine."

Creech.

I find in Monſr. Menage a tamen, a yet, which is very wrong. He ſays that Carneades ridiculed this device of Chryſippus, and that he yet made uſe of the Sorites, when he endeavoured to prove that there are no Gods. Ridet illud inventum Carneades apud Ciceronem . . . . Tamen ipſe Carneades Soritice multa rogat apud Sextum Empiricum adverſus Mathematicos, p. 339 & 340, dum probare ſatagit non eſſe Deos (92). But Carneades's contempt for the other Philoſopher's Quietiſt, could not prevent him from making uſe of the Sorites; on the contrary, it is for this very reaſon, that he muſt employ it.

(92) Menag. in Diogen. Laertium, lib. 7. num. 197. pag. m. 343.

[P] Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus quotes him as an inſtance, ... that thoſe Authors, who are perfectly well ſkilled in Logic, do not well obſerve the rules of Grammar, concerning the ſituation of words.] I ſhall quote him according to the Latin Tranſlation. Denique temporibus conſequentibus omnino neglecta eſt (bona collocatio verborum) nullaſque prorſus exiſtimabat (eam) neceſſariam eſſe, quidpiamve ad orationis pulchritudinem conferre. Itaque ejuſmodi ſtructuras reliquerunt, . . . Dico autem Philarchum, Durim . . . & alios infinitos. . . . . Verum quid opus eos admirari, ubi etiam hi, qui Philoſophiam profitentur, & de dialecticis diſſerunt diſciplinis, adeo ſunt in collocandis verbis futiles, ut etiam pudeat dicere. Sufficiat autem argumento uti oratione Chryſippi Stoici: (ulterius enim non procedam) quo neque melius quisquam, neque exactius dialecticas diſciplinas proſequutus eſt (93): neque deteriori junctura compoſitos ſermones protulit, ex his qui alicujus nominis & famæ ſunt (94). i. e. "The proper ſituation of words has been afterwards entirely neglected, nor was there any Author who thought it was of any conſequence, or added any beauty to the diſcourſe. So that the ſituation of words was not in the leaſt minded. . . I ſay even by Philarchus, Duris . . and an infinite number of others. . But why ſhould we wonder at it? ſince even they, who pretend to Philoſophy, and treat of Dialecticks, are ſo neglectful of the right ſituation of words, that it is a ſhame. Let it be ſufficient, for argument's ſake, to inſtance in Chryſippus the Stoick; (for I do not intend to go further): no one has treated of Dialecticks better nor with more accuracy than he; nor is there any man amongſt all thoſe that gained ſome reputation, who put his words in a worſe ſituation." We may quote Diogenes Laertius in order to confirm Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus's judgment. For if Diogenes tells us on the one hand, that Chryſippus's Logic was ſo much admired, that it was ſaid, if Dialecticks were in uſe amongſt the Gods, they would employ no other but Chryſippus's; yet he obſerves on the other hand, that this Philoſopher did not write well, nor in a clear ſtile. Οὕτω δ' ἐπιδοξῶ ἐν τοῖς διαλεκτικοῖς ἐγένετο, ὥςε δοκεῖ τοὺς πλείους ὅτι εἰ παρὰ θεοῖς ἦν ἡ διαλεκτική, οὐκ ἂν ἦν ἄλλη ἢ ἡ Χρυσίππειος. πλεονάσας τοῖς πράγμασι, τὴν λέξιν ἐ κατώρθουτε (95).

(93) The Greek words are, τούτου . . ἄμεινον οὐδεὶς τὰς διαλεκτικὰς τέχνας ἐκθέσεται.

(94) Dionyſ. Halicarn. de Collocatione Verborum. cap. 15. pag. m. 10.

(95) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 180. See alſo Cicero De Finibus, lib. 8. cap. 3. where he ſpeaks of Chryſippus's Rhetorick, with the utmoſt contempt.

[Q] He himſelf deſtroyed the foundations of that very ſcience, which he had cultivated with ſo much care.] Here follows the proof of this, which we borrow from Plutarch. "Believe our friends the Stoicks, ſays he "(96), when they aſſert, that it was not by chance, "but by a divine Providence, that Nature deſigning "to turn every thing upſide down, that relates to hu"man life, brought forth Chryſippus, no body being "more proper for that deſign than he. But as Cato "ſaid of Julius Cæſar that none before him ever con"ſpired againſt the State when ſober and in his ſenſes; "ſo this man endeavours with the utmoſt ſtrength and "accuracy to overthrow certainty. This they them"ſelves witneſs, who argue againſt him concerning the "Sophiſm called the Lyar. For does not a man over"throw all kind of demonſtration and all certainty, "when he maintains that ſuch propoſitions as conſiſt "of inconſiſtent terms, are not falſe, or that a ſyllo"giſm, the promiſes of which are true, and the in"ference well drawn, may yet have its conſequence "falſe. . . . Since therefore Chryſippus's Dialecticks "overturn and deſtroy their own parts and principles, "what other principle can they allow, but ſuch as "may be ſuſpected of error? For who can believe the "ſuperſtructure to be firm and laſting, when the very "foundations are ſo looſe and unſettled? and what "certainty can there be, where there is ſuch a confuſion and ſo many doubts?" Plutarch adds, that the Stoicks, who complained that the Academicks deſtroyed all common notions of men, were more guilty than they, of that fault. It muſt be ſaid, at leaſt, that our Chryſippus deſerved as much as Arceſilaus, to be compared to thoſe Tribunes at Rome, who diſturbed the public tranquillity (97). There never was a greater diſturber of every thing in the Empire of Philoſophy, than he; and tho' by name he was a Dogmatiſt, yet he did really labour in favour of Scepticiſm as much as the greateſt Scepticks themſelves. For if in a ſyllogiſm, as ſome pretended he aſſerted, the concluſion drawn from true premiſes be true in ſuch a manner as that the contrary propoſition may alſo be true, it is labour ſpent in vain, to reaſon or argue, and we muſt not hope ever to arrive at any certainty: the moſt evident propoſitions are the moſt problematical; and it is the ſame as tho' we doubted with Carneades, that two things, which are equal to a third, are equal to each other (98). Such is the fate of thoſe, who apply themſelves too much to the ſubtleties of Dialecticks. They fall at laſt into their own ſnares, out of which they cannot diſintangle themſelves; they find difficulties, which they cannot ſolve, and which even overthrow what they had eſtabliſhed before. Cicero has well drawn their character; I ſhall quote his words, tho' I had quoted them already in another place, in the

(96) Plutarch. De Com. Notitiis, adverſus Stoicos, pag. 1059.

(97) See the Article ARCESILAUS quotation (49).

(98) See above, the Article of CARNEADES, quotation (26).

School-men are unqueſtionable proofs of this. They had not the ſame accompliſhment which Chryſippus had; he was an univerſal ſcholar; being perfectly acquainted with Mythology, with the ancient and modern Poets, with Hiſtory, &c. (s). He wrote upon almoſt every ſubject, and even condeſcended to give rules for the education of children [R]; and as this is a ſubject which nearly concerns all mankind, we ought to praiſe him for it. But he does not deſerve our approbation either for his grammatical works (t), or for his books of Divination, in which he explained even the preſages of dreams (u). He could not omit mentioning the famous controverſy concerning things poſſible or impoſſible [S]; it belonged to his province as he was a Philoſopher, who aſſerted a fatal neceſſity

(s) Permulta alia tollegit Chryſippus, ut eſt in omni Hiſtoria curioſus. Cicero, Tuſcul. lib. 1. cap. 45.

(t) Varro, De Lingua Latina, lib. 7. pag. m. 101. mentions Chryſippus's ſix Books περὶ τῆς ἀνωμαλίας; and calls him homo acutiſſimus.

(u) See Cicero in Libro De Divinatione, ver. 9. I. 19, and 20. and 39. II. 15, &c.

the firſt edition of this work. Dialectici ad extremum ipſi ſe compungunt ſuis acuminibus, & multa quærendo reperiunt non modo ea, quæ jam non poſſunt ipſi diſſolvere, ſed etiam quibus ante exarſa & potius detexta prope retexantur (99). He therefore compares Dialecticks to Penelope, who unravelled her own web (100). Nobody could better than Chryſippus find his own picture, in that which Cicero made of the Logicians.

(99) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. 2. cap. 38.

(100) Quod quod eadem illa ars quaſi Penelope telam retexens tollit ad extremum ſuperiora, Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 4.

[R] He condeſcended to give rules for the education of children.] He had ordered the Nurſes to ſing a certain kind of ſongs, and adviſed them to chooſe the moſt modeſt. He even wiſhed, that if it had been poſſible, children had not been nurſed but by learned women. Chryſippus etiam nutricum, quæ adhibentur infantibus, allectationi ſuum quoddam carmen aſſignat (101). Ante omnia ne ſit vitioſus ſermo nutricibus; quas, ſi fieri poſſit, ſapientes Chryſippus optavit: certe, quantum res pateretur, optimas eligi voluit (102). He ordered that children be three years under the care of their nurſes, and that the nurſes ſhould begin to inſtruct them, without waiting till they were older. He did not approve thoſe, who did not begin to inſtruct them, till they were ſeven years old; and Quintilian was of his opinion. Quidam literis inſtituendos qui minores ſeptem annis eſſent non putaverunt, . . . melius autem, qui nullum tempus vacare cura volunt, ut Chryſippus, nam is quamvis nutricibus triennium dederit, tamen ab illis quoque jam informandam quam optimis inſtitutis mentem infantium judicat (133). He had examined this queſtion, whether one ought to chaſtiſe children with blows, and he declared he was not of that opinion. Cædi vero diſcentes, quanquam & receptum ſit, & Chryſippus non improbet, minime velim (104). i. e. "I "would not have you ſtrike the children, tho' it be "the common practice, and Chryſippus did not diſ-"approve it *." I wiſh I could know what Voſſius grounded his aſſertion upon (105), when he ſaid that Chryſippus the Stoick was the author of thoſe ſongs, which the nurſes ſung, and which Athenæus calls καταβαυκαλήσεις (106), that is, Songs proper to lull children to ſleep. The words, which I have quoted from the Xth Chapter of Quintilian's firſt Book, and which Voſſius alſo cites, are not a ſufficient proof for his aſſertion.

(101) Quintil. Inſtit. Oratore, lib. 4. cap. 10. pag. m. 55.

(102) Idem, ibid. cap. 1. pag. 6.

(103) Idem, ibid. pag. 8. Obſerve that he quotes him again in chap. 11 of the ſame book, pag. 57.

(104) Idem, ibid. cap. 3. pag. 17.

* Mr. Bayle has been guilty here of an overſight, or of an inaccuracy. For he aſcribes to Chryſippus quite the contrary opinion; or elſe the He in the foregoing ſentence muſt be referred to Quintilian, which is an inaccuracy of ſtile.

(105) Voſſius, de Poetis Græcis, pag. 87.

(106) Αἱ δὲ τῶν τιθηνῶν ᾠδαὶ καταβαυκαλήσεις ὀνομάζονται. Athen. lib. 4. cap. 3.

[S] He could not omit mentioning the famous controverſy concerning things poſſible and impoſſible.] This controverſy was occaſioned by the doctrine of the Stoics concerning fate. The queſtion was, whether amongſt thoſe things that never were and never ſhall be, there be ſome that are poſſible? Or whether all that never was, is not and never ſhall be, is impoſſible? A famous Logician of the ſect of Megara, whoſe name was Diodorus, denied the former and affirmed the latter of theſe propoſitions. But Chryſippus did ſtrongly oppoſe him. Here follow two paſſages from Cicero: πρὸς διόδωρον με ſcito κατὰ Διόδωρον λέγειν. Quapropter ſi venturus es, ſcito neceſſe eſſe te venire. Sin autem non es, τῶν ἀδυνάτων eſt te venire. Nunc vide utra te χρῆσις magis delectet. Χρυσιππόν ne an hæc quem noſter Diodorus (107) non conquebat (108). i. e. "You "muſt know I am of Diodorus's opinion concern-"ing things poſſible. If therefore you are to come, "know that it is neceſſary you ſhould come; but if "you are not to come, your coming is amongſt the "things impoſſible. See now what opinion you like "beſt, that of Chryſippus, or that which our friend "Diodorus could not digeſt." That is taken from a letter which Cicero wrote to Varro. He puts the whole queſtion in a ſtronger light, in his little Book de Fato. I ſhall tranſcribe ſome paſſages out of it. Vigila, Chryſippe, ne tuam cauſam, in qua tibi cum Diodoro valente Dialectico magna luctatio eſt, deſeras. . . . annne ergo quod falſum dicitur in futuro, id fieri non poteſt. At hoc, Chryſippe, minime vis, maximeque tibi de hoc ipſo cum Diodoro certamen eſt. Ille enim id ſolum fieri poſſe dicit, quod aut ſit verum, aut futurum ſit verum: & quicquid futurum ſit, id dicit fieri neceſſe eſſe: & quicquid non ſit futurum, id negat fieri poſſe. Tu etiam quæ non ſint futura poſſe fieri dicis, ut frangi hanc gemmam, etiamſi nunquam futurum ſit: neque neceſſe fuiſſe Cypſelum regnare Corinthi, quamquam id milleſimo ante anno Apollinis oraculo editum eſſet. . . . Placet Diodoro id ſolum fieri poſſe, quod aut verum ſit, aut verum futurum ſit: qui locus attingit hanc quæſtionem, nihil fieri, quod non neceſſe fuerit: & quicquid fieri poſſit, id aut eſſe jam, aut futurum eſſe: nec magis commutari ex veris in falſa ea poſſe, quæ futura ſunt, quam ea quæ facta ſunt: ſed in factis immutabilitatem apparere, in futuris quibuſdam, quia non apparent, ne ineſſe quidem videri: ut in eo, qui mortifero morbo urgeatur, verum ſit, his morietur hoc morbo, at hoc idem ſi vere dicatur in eo, in quo tanta vis morbi non appareat, nihilominus futurum ſit. Ita fit ut commutatio ex vero in falſum, ne in futuro quidem ullo fieri poſſit (109). i. e. "Take care Chryſippus, that you do not betray "the cauſe in which you are ſo ſtrongly oppoſed by Di-"odorus that able Logician . . . all then that is falſe "with regard to futurity, is impoſſible. But this you "will not grant Chryſippus, and this is the very ſub-"ject of your controverſy with Diodorus. For he aſ-"ſerts that only to be poſſible, which either is true "or will be true; and all that is to happen, he "ſays is neceſſary: and all that is not to happen, he "maintains is impoſſible. Whereas you aſſert, that "even thoſe things which will not happen are poſſi-"ble, as for inſtance, that this gem can be broke, "tho' it would never be broke; and that it was not "abſolutely neceſſary that Cypſelus ſhould reign at "Corinth, tho' the Oracle of Apollo had foretold it a "thouſand years before. . . . According to Diodorus, "that alone is poſſible, which either is true or will "be true. Which ſubject comes very near to this pro-"poſition, nothing happens but what is neceſſary: "He alſo maintains, that all that is poſſible, is al-"ready or will happen: and that thoſe things that "will come to paſs, can no more be changed from "true into falſe, than thoſe that have already hap-"pened: But the unchangeableneſs appears evidently "in thoſe that are paſt, whereas they that are to come "do not ſeem to be thus unchangeable becauſe we "have no knowledge of them: as for inſtance, it is "true that a man who labours under a mortal diſeaſe "will die of it: but if the ſame be truly ſaid of a "man whoſe diſeaſe does not appear to be ſo dange-"rous, yet it will nevertheleſs happen. So that there "cannot be even in future events a change from true "to falſe." Cicero gives us ſufficiently to underſtand, that Chryſippus was very much perplexed in this controverſy; nor ought we to wonder at it; for the ſide of the queſtion he choſe to maintain, was not in the leaſt connected with his doctrine concerning fate. Had he been able, or had he dared to argue coherently, he would have admitted with all his heart Diodorus's whole hypotheſis. The Reader may have obſerved above (110), that notwithſtanding the liberty which he ſuppoſed the ſoul enjoys, and notwithſtanding his compariſon of the Cylinder, yet all the acts of human will were really unavoidable conſequences of fate; whence it follows, that whatever does not happen is impoſſible; and that nothing is poſſible, but what does actually happen. Plutarch bears him down both with regard to this, and with regard to his diſpute with Diodorus, and maintains againſt him, that his opinion concerning poſſibility is entirely inconſiſtent with his doctrine of fate (111). Obſerve that the moſt illuſtrious amongſt the Stoics wrote upon this ſubject without following the ſame method. Aulus Gellius names four of them,

(107) A Stoick, who had lodged a great while at Cicero's houſe.

(108) Cicero, Epiſt. 4. lib. 9. ad Familiares.

(109) Cicero, de Fato, cap. 6, & ſeq.

(110) In the Remark [H].

(111) Plutarch. de Stoic. Repugn. pag. 1053, 1054.

neceſſity. In his Treatiſe concerning Providence, he ſtarted a thought, which may be conſidered as a pretty good ſkerch of one of the moſt beautiful maxims, which a great Philoſopher of the ſeventeenth Century has aſſerted and cleared up [T]. Some Authors relate, that he uſed to take hellebore in order to encreaſe the ſtrength of his genius (x). He died in the 143d Olympiad (y). They raiſed a monument to him amongſt thoſe of the moſt illuſtrious Athenians (z). His ſtatue was to be ſeen in the Ceramicus * [U]. He

(x) See the remark [E] in the Article CARNEADES.

(y) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 184. Concerning the circumſtances of his death. See the quotation (119).

(z) Pauſan. lib. 1. pag. 55. edit. 1695.

* The Ceramicus was a public place near Athens, where they who had been killed in the war, were buried at the expence of the public. There was within the City another place of that name, which was a ſettled habitation for proſtitutes. Geſner. Onomaſt. in voce Ceramicus.

them, who are Chryſippus, Cleanthes, Archedemus, and Antipater (112). He ſhews a great contempt for this controverſy, and Monſr. Menage ſhould not have quoted him as an Author who commended Chryſippus's Work περὶ δυνατῶν (113) concerning things poſſible: For certainly theſe words γέγραφε δὲ Χρύσιππος θαυμασίως &c. Chryſippus wrote wonderfully &c. are no commendation in that place, as appears from what goes before it and from what follows it. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus mentions (114) two treatiſes of Chryſippus, in which he expatiated very much upon Logical Subjects, tho' the title ſeemed to promiſe quite different things. The work was intitled περὶ τῆς συντάξεως τῶν τοῦ λόγου μερῶν. i. e. Concerning the diſpoſition of the parts in a diſcourſe; and yet it treated only of propoſitions true and falſe, poſſible and impoſſible, contingent, ambiguous, &c. a ſubject which our Schoolmen have treated over and over again, and upon which they have exhauſted all their ſcholaſtic learning. Obſerve that Chryſippus acknowledged, that things paſſed were neceſſarily true, which Cleanthes would not admit (115). Οὐ πᾶν ὃ παρελήλυθὸς ἀληθὲς ἀναγκαῖον ἦν καθάπερ οἱ περὶ Κλεάνθην φέρουσι δοκοῦσι. (116). We have ſeen above (117), that ſome perſons pretended, Abelard taught a doctrine much like that of Diodorus. I believe that the Stoics reſolved to maintain that ſeveral things are poſſible, which yet never come to paſs, in order to ſoften the odious and horrid conſequences that were drawn from their doctrine of fate. The Spinoſiſts labour at this time under a very great difficulty, becauſe according to their hypotheſis, it was from eternity as impoſſible, that Spinoſa, for inſtance, ſhould not die at the Hague, as it is impoſſible that two and two ſhould make ſix. They are ſenſible that this is a conſequence which follows unavoidably from their principles, and that it is a conſequence ſo abſurd and ſo directly oppoſite to common ſenſe, that it cannot but diſpleaſe and highly offend all reaſonable men. They do not care that the world ſhould know they contradict a propoſition ſo univerſally received, and ſo evidently true as the following is; namely, all that implies a contradiction is impoſſible, and all that does not imply a contradiction is poſſible. Now how could it be contradictory, for inſtance, that Spinoſa ſhould have died at Leyden? Would nature in that caſe, have been leſs perfect, leſs wiſe, or leſs powerful?

(112) Arrian. in Epictet. lib. 2. cap. 19. pag. m. 166.

(113) Citatur honorificè apud Arrianum Menag. in Laertium, lib. 7. pag. 341.

(114) Dion. Hal. de Collocatione verborum, cap. 17. pag. m. 11.

(115) Omnia enim vera in præteritis neceſſaria ſunt, ut Chryſippo placet diſſentienti à Magiſtro Cleanthe, quia ſunt immutabilia, nec in falſum è vero præterita poſſunt converti. Cicero, de Fato, cap. 7.

(116) Arrian. in Epictet. lib. 2. cap. 19. pag. m. 165.

(117) In the Remark [M] of the article BERENGER.

Let us not finiſh this remark, without obſerving that Chryſippus placed the reſurrection of men, and their reſtoration to the State in which they appeared before amongſt poſſible events. Lactantius acquaints us with this, and even quotes Chryſippus's own words (118). Melius Chryſippus . . . . qui in Libris, quos de Providentia ſcripſit, cum de innovatione mundi loqueretur, hæc intulit. Τάδε δὲ ἄττα ἔχοντες, δῆλον ὡς οὐδὲν ἀδύνατον, καὶ ἡμᾶς μετὰ τὸ τελευτῆσαι, πάλιν περιόδων τινῶν ἐλειμμένων χρόνῳ εἰς ὃν νῦν ἐσμὲν καταστήσειν σχῆμα. i. e. "Chryſippus reaſons better . . . . for ſpeaking of the renovation of the world, in his Books concerning providence, he has the following words. Since then it is ſo, it is plain that it is not impoſſible, that we after our death may be reſtored to the ſtate in which we are at preſent, after ſome revolutions of time." The ſame Father aſcribes to him another material opinion, which is no leſs orthodox, but which engaged him to do a very wicked action. He ſays, that Chryſippus was perſuaded, that the moment his ſoul ſhould leave his body, the former would aſcend into heaven, and that he killed himſelf in order to enjoy that happineſs the ſooner (119). Multi ex iis, quia æternas eſſe animas ſuſpicabantur, tanquam in cælum migraturi eſſent, ſibi ipſi manus intulerunt, ut Cleanthes, ut Chryſippus, ut Zenon (120).

(118) Lactant. Divin. Inſtit. lib. 7. cap. 23. pag. 506.

(119) Diogenes Laertius does not ſay this; he only relates, lib. 7. num. 184, 185. that Hermippus ſaid, that Chryſippus having been invited to a ſacrifice by his diſciples, drank ſweet wine without water, and fell into a giddineſs, and died five days after. But that others ſay, he died with laughing, bidding his maid to give ſome wine to the Aſs, that had eat his figs.

(120) Lactant. Divin. Inſtitut. lib. 3. cap. 18. pag. 194.

[T] He ſtarted a thought which may be conſidered as a . . . . ſketch of one of the maxims, which a Philoſopher of the XVIIth Century cleared up.] Chryſippus in his Work concerning providence examined the following queſtion amongſt ſeveral others. Whether the nature of things, or providence, which made this world and all mankind, was alſo the Author of thoſe diſeaſes to which men are ſubject? He anſwers, that the chief deſign of nature was not to make man obnoxious to diſeaſes; for this did not become the cauſe of all kinds of good. But as nature was preparing and producing ſevaral great things, very well ordered and very uſeful, ſhe found that ſome inconveniences aroſe from thence. They were not therefore agreeable to the chief deſign and aim of nature, but happened to come along with the Work, and exiſted only as conſequences. With regard to the formation of the body of man, a more nice reaſon, the very benefit of the work required, that the head, for inſtance, ſhould be compoſed of very ſmall and thin bones, but for this very reaſon it could not be proof againſt blows. Nature prepared health for man, but at the ſame time the ſpring of all diſeaſes was opened by an unavoidable conſequence. It is the ſame with virtue, the direct action of nature, which produced it, did alſo produce by way of conſequence the brood of vices. This is the ſenſe of Aulus Gellius's words; I have not tranſlated the paſſage literally, I ſhall therefore tranſcribe the original here, in behalf of thoſe who underſtand Latin. Idem Chryſippus in eodem Libro (quarto περὶ προνοίας) tractat conſideratque, dignumque eſſe id quæri putat, εἰ αἱ τῶν Ἀνθρώπων νόσοι κατὰ φύσιν γίνονται. Id eſt, naturâne ipſa rerum vel providentia, quæ compagem hanc mundi & genus hominum fecit, morbos quoque & debilitates & ægritudines corporum, quæ patiuntur homines, fecerit: exiſtimat autem, non fuiſſe hoc principale naturæ conſilium, ut faceret homines morbis obnoxios: nunquam enim hoc conveniſſe naturæ auctori, parentique rerum omnium bonarum: ſed cum multa, inquit, atque magna gigneret pareretque aptiſſima & utiliſſima, alia quoque ſimul agnata ſunt incommoda, iis ipſis, quæ faciebat, cobærentia: eaque non per naturam, ſed per ſequelas quaſdam neceſſarias facta dicit, quod ipſe appellat κατὰ παρακολούθησιν. Sicut, inquit, cum corpora hominum natura fingeret, ratio ſubtilior & utilitas ipſa operis poſtulavit, ut tenuiſſimis minutiſque oſſiculis caput compingeret; ſed hanc utilitatem rei majoris alia quædam incommoditas extrinſecus conſecuta eſt; ut fieret caput tenuiter munitum, & ictibus offenſionibuſque parvis fragile: proinde morbi quoque & ægritudines partæ ſunt, dum ſalus petitur: Sic hercle, inquit, dum virtus hominibus per conſilium naturæ gignitur, vitia ibidem per affinitatem nata ſunt (121). I do not think that an Heathen could ſay any thing more reaſonable than this, ſince he knew nothing of the fall of the firſt man, with which we are not acquainted but by the Revelation of God, and which is the true cauſe of all our misfortunes. If we had ſeveral ſuch extracts from Chryſippus's Works, or rather if we had his Works, we ſhould entertain a much more favourable opinion of the excellency of his wit.

(121) Aulus Gellius, lib. 6. cap. 1.

The modern Philoſopher, whom I meant, when I ſaid that he cleared up a very beautiful maxim, of which Chryſippus thought a pretty good ſketch, is the celebrated Author * of the Recherche de la verité (the inquiry after truth). The Reader will find the ſubſtance of his opinion in the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes (122), and this will enable him to judge whether or no Chryſippus hinted the ſame thought.

* Father Malebranche.

(122) Paragraph 234. pag. 704, &c.

As to the other obſervations he made to clear the providence of God (123), you will find them examined in the Remarks [E] and [G] of the Article PAULICIANS. See alſo the Remark [F] of the Article DEJOTARUS.

(123) See Aulus Gellius, lib. 6. cap. 1.

[V] His ſtatue was to be ſeen in the Ceramicus.] Diogenes Laertius, who ſays this, adds an obſervation which is not very concluſive. His words are. Ἦν δὲ καὶ τὸ σωμάτιον ἰυτύλης, ὡς δῆλον ἐκ τοῦ ἀνδριάντος τοῦ ἐν κεραμεικῷ, ὃς σχεδόν τι ὑποκύρτῳ τῷ πλησίον ἵππῳ. οὕτω αὐτὸν ὁ Καρνεάδης Κρύσιππον ἔλεγεν (124). i. e. "He was a little man, as appears by his ſtatue in the Ceramicus

(124) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 182.

He accepted the freedom of the City of Athens, which neither Zeno nor Cleanthes had done; Plutarch's cenſure upon this is, I think, too ſevere [X].

" ramicus, which is almoſt entirely hid by a figure " on horſeback which is near it. Hence Carneades " uſed to call him Cryppſippus (a)." It ſeems that Diogenes Laertius, in order to prove that Chryſippus's ſtatue was little, obſerves, that it was almoſt intirely hid by a figure on horſeback. But this is not a good argument. I ſhould therefore rather think, for Diogenes's credit, that he relates this circumſtance only as a matter of fact, and not as a proof of what he had aſſerted. For one may eaſily underſtand, that a man on horſeback may hide from our ſight even a very tall perſon. If we add to this, that our Philoſopher was repreſented ſitting (125), we ſhall ſtill more eaſily underſtand how his ſtatue could be hid by a figure on horſeback, ſo that this does not in the leaſt prove that Chryſippus was a ſhort man. I wonder therefore, how Voſſius and others could admit the proof, which Diogenes Laertius is ſuppoſed to make uſe of. Cheſippum contumelioſe, quaſi latrinam dixeris, vocabat Zeno (126), teſte Tullio in I. de Nat. Deorum. Chryſippum Carneades quia eſſet exiguus, ita ut ſtatua ejus in Ceramico poſita a vicino equite occuleretur: teſte Laertio (127). i. e. " Cicero tells us in his 1ſt Book concern- " ing the nature of the Gods, that Zeno uſed to call " Chryſippus, Cheſippus, as you might ſay, a houſe of " office. And Carneades ſtiled him Chryſippus, becauſe " he was ſo little that his ſtatue in the Ceramicus was " hid by the figure of a man on horſeback; as Dio- " genes Laertius informs us." I muſt obſerve by the by, that it is a miſtake to ſay, that Diogenes Laertius, who relates this ſaying of Carneades, does alſo relate, that the ſame Carneades charged Chryſippus with being a Paraſite of Books, becauſe he had tranſcribed word for word the works of Epicurus. Hunc (Chryſippum) Carneades lepide Paraſitum librorum appellat, quod ſcripta Epicuri ſit furatus, ſcripſitque eadem & verbis & numeris Diogenes (128). That is what Volateranus dares to give us as if it were quoted from Diogenes Laertius. This is a ſtrange miſrepreſentation of another thing that was laid to Chryſippus's charge, namely that he was ſo jealous of Epicurus's reputation, that he went to write a Book as ſoon as Epicurus had publiſhed any treatiſe whatſoever. See upon this the Remark [C]. Robert Stephens and Theodore Zwinger have tranſcribed Volateranus's blunder (129). Let us obſerve, that according to Pauſanias (130), our Philoſopher's ſtatue was not in the Ceramicus, but in the College, which was called after the name of Ptolomy, who founded it. Monſr. Menage in order to make theſe different accounts agree; obſerves that the ſtatue was in the inner Ceramicus (131); Lipſius had already made this obſervation (132). Plutarch mentions a braſs ſtatue, which was raiſed to Chryſippus, by one of his diſciples, with a very glorious inſcription. Ἀριστοκρέων γὼν ὁ Χρυσίππου μαθητὴς ἡ ἀκμῆς, εἰκόνα χαλκῆν ἀνεκτλώσας ἐπέγραψε πόδι τὸ ἐλεγεῖον,

Τόνδε νέον Χρύσιππον Ἀριστοκρέων ἀνέθηκε
Τῶν Ἀκαδημιακῶν ἐγγαλίδων κοπίδα (133).

That is,

" Ariſtocreon has raiſed this Statue for the young man " Chryſippus, who was the ſword that cut the knots " of the Academicks."

(a) From the Greek word κρύπτω, which ſignifies, to hide.

(125) Statua eſt in Ceramico Chryſippi ſedentis, porrecta manu, Cicero, de Finib. lib. 1. cap. 11. Obſerve that Sidonius Apollinaris Ep. 9. lib. 9. ſays that Chryſippus was repreſented, digitis propter numerorum indicia conſtrictis. See the ſame, Carm. 23. ver. 118.

(126) He means Zeno the Epicurean.

(127) Voſſius, de Philoſoph. Sect. cap. 19. num. 11. pag. m. 102.

(128) Volateran. lib. 14. pag. m. 531.

(129) See Thomaſius de Plagio Literario, pag. 170, 171.

(130) Pauſan. lib. 1. pag. 39.

(131) Menag. in Laertium, lib. 7. num. 182.

(132) Lipſius, Manud. ad Stoic. Philoſoph. lib. 1. Diſſert. 11. pag. m. 654.

(133) Plutarch. De Repugn. Stoic. init. pag. 1033.

[X] He accepted the freedom of the city of Athens, . . . Plutarch's cenſure upon this is too ſevere.] " Antipa- " ter, in his book concerning the controverſy between " Cleanthes and Chryſippus, writes, that neither Zeno " nor Cleanthes would ever accept the freedom of " the city of Athens, leſt they ſhould ſeem to do an " injury and an affront to their own country. If " therefore they did well, we muſt own that Chry- " ſippus did wrong, who procured himſelf to be ad- " mitted into the number of the citizens of Athens. " Yet I will forbear ſaying many things more upon " this ſubject at preſent; I ſhall only obſerve, that " there is a contradiction and inconſiſtency in their " behaviour, ſince they left their own country only a " bare name and ſhadow: whilſt they themſelves were " abſent, and lived in foreign countries. It is as if a " man forſaking his lawful wife, went to live with " another, lay uſually from her, had children by her, " and yet would not marry her, nor ſign a marriage- " contract, leſt he ſhould do an injury to his former " wife (134)." It is obvious to every reader, that Plutarch compares here together two things, which are not in the leaſt like to each other. The regard which Zeno and Cleanthes had for their country was a civility, which was accepted as ſuch. But the huſband's regard for his wife in Plutarch's compariſon, will never paſs for any thing but a downright raillery.

(134) Idem, ibid. pag. 1034.

CHRYSIS, Prieſteſs of Juno at Argos, was by her negligence the occaſion of the Goddeſs's Temple being burnt to the ground. She had ſet a lamp too near the ſacred ornaments, which took fire; and as ſhe ſlept ſo ſound as not to awake time enough to prevent the conſequences of that accident, the Temple was intirely conſumed (a). Some ſay ſhe herſelf periſhed in the flames [A]; but others affirm that ſhe eſcaped the ſame night to Phlius [B]. She had reaſon to fear the reſentment of the Argians; for inſtead of recalling her, they created another Prieſteſs (b). This dignity was very conſiderable among them; it regulated their dates and their Chronology (c). This conflagration happened in the ninth year of the Peloponneſian War [C].

St.

(a) Thucydides, lib. 4. ſub fin.

(b) Named Phaëinis. Thucydid. lib. 4.

(c) Joſua Barnes. in vitâ Euripidis, pag. 7. See the Remark [C].

[A] Some ſay ſhe periſhed . . . . in the flames.] Arnobius not only aſſerts this, but draws an argument from thence againſt the Pagans. Ubi Juno regina, ſays he (1), cum inclitum ejus fanum ſacerdotemque Chryſidem eadem vis flammæ Argiva in civitate deleret? i. e. " Where was Queen Juno, when the ſame flames " deſtroyed her celebrated temple, and burned her " Prieſteſs Chryſis, at Argos?" Clemens Alexandrinus had furniſhed him with the whole of this, both the fact and the conſequence (2). Little judgment is ſhewn in employing ſuch a proof againſt the Heathen Gods; for, beſides that Lucretius makes uſe of the very ſame reaſon to ruin the worſhip of the Gods in general, might not the queſtion be retorted on Arnobius himſelf? Might they not aſk him where the God of Iſrael was, when the King of Babylon pillaged and burned the Temple of Solomon? I do not know what the Fathers were thinking of when they wrote ſome of their Arguments againſt the Gentiles.

(1) Arnob. lib. 6. pag. m. 207.

(2) Clem. Alexand. in Protrept. pag. 35.

[B] . . . . Others affirm ſhe eſcaped the ſame night to Phlius.] Since Thucydides, who lived at that time, aſſerts this fact (3), there is great probability that it is true, and conſequently that Arnobius has grounded a very ſorry objection on a falſhood. Pauſanias (4) relates that this Prieſteſs fled to Tegea, and took refuge at the altar of Minerva, and that the Argians, in reſpect to that Aſylum, did not demand her to be delivered to them (5). They even preſerved her ſtatue; for it was yet to be ſeen in the time of Pauſanias at the entrance of the ſame Temple which had been burnt (6).

(3) Thucyd. lib. 4. ſub fin.

(4) Pauſan. lib. 2. pag. 59.

(5) Idem, lib. 3. pag. 86.

(6) Idem, lib. 2. pag. 60.

[C] This conflagration happened in the 9th year of the Peloponneſian War.] It is Thucydides who affirms it (7). The learned perſon to whom the public is obliged for the Edition of Euripides printed in England in the year 1694, acquaints us that Chryſis was ordained Prieſteſs of Juno at Argos in the 3d year of the 75th Olympiad, and that ſhe had executed that office 56 years when the Temple was burnt. Here follow his words and his citation: Argis quidem hoc anno Chryſis Sacerdos Junonis conſtituitur, ex cujus ſacerdotio mos erat Argivis periochas ſuorum temporum numerare. At illa quum per illa quinquaginta * ſex annos ſuo fungeretur officio, tum demum lucerna negligenter ad corollas poſita, templum incendio conflagravit (8). There is no body but would judge from the place where Mr. Barnes has inſerted

(7) Thucyd. lib. 4. ſub fin.

* Thucyd. lib. 4. in ipſo fine, folio 164. Vide Joh. Meurſii Archont. Athen. lib. 3. cap. 6.

(8) Joſua Barneſius, in Vita Euripidis, pag. 7.

(d) Hieronymus adverſus Jovinian. lib. 1. pag. m. 498.

St. Jerome, in his 1ſt book againſt Jovinian (d), has obſerved that our Chryſis the Prieſteſs of Juno was a virgin. Marianus Victorius erroneouſly aſſerts, in his Notes on that paſſage, that the ſaid Father ſpeaks of Chryſeis the concubine of Agamemnon.

inſerted the citation of Thucydides, that that ancient Hiſtorian informs us Chryſis was in the 56th year of her Prieſthood when the fire conſumed the Temple; and yet Thucydides ſpeaks not of this at all: he only ſays it was then eight years and ſix months after the war of Peloponneſus had been begun. If any one ſhould think fit to cenſure Mr. Barnes for this, he would be a caviller; for if it be once certain that Chryſis was conſtituted Prieſteſs in the third year of the 75th Olympiad, a man has ſome right to alledge the authority of Thucydides in order to ſupport the aſſertion that this woman was in the 56th year of her Prieſthood, more or leſs, when the Temple was burnt, ſince Thucydides obſerves that conflagration happened in the ninth year of the Peloponneſian war (9). Beſides, Thucydides, in another place which Mr. Barnes does not quote (10), obſerves that the War of Peloponneſus began in the 48th year of Chryſis's Prieſthood. It is true, this proves that Prieſteſs to have been in the 57th year of her office at the time of the fire, and not in the 56th, as Monſr. d'Ablancourt (11) and Mr. Barnes aſſert.

(9) That is, in the 2d year, or thereabouts, of the 89th Olympiad.

(10) Lib. 2. init. pag. m. 99.

(11) In his Tranſlation of Thucydides.

CHRISTINA, Queen of Sweden, who died at Rome the 19th of April 1689. See SWEDEN. CHURCHILL. See MARLBOROUGH.

(a) He is named Cicchus de Eſculo, or Æſculanus, or Aſculanus. Some perſons, inſtead of Cicchus, ſay Cichus, or Cbicus.

CICCHUS (a), a native of Aſcoli in Italy, was ſaid to be an Author who amuſed himſelf with magical ſuperſtitions. It is not certainly known, that he aſcribes to himſelf a familiar ſpirit. His Commentary on Sacroboſco's Sphere was printed at Venice in 1499. I ſhall quote the judgment which Naudæus gives of him [A].

He relates that Cicchus lived in 1320 (b), at the ſame time with Garbo a Phyſician of Florence, who accuſed him, as a Necromancer, to the Inquiſitors, by whoſe ſentence he was burnt alive. He adds, that he ſaw his tryal in Rome in the Library of the Chevalier del Pozzo, and that he was an arch fellow who pretended to paſs for a Magician, and wrote a treatiſe of Phyſicks in Italian verſe.

(b) Naudæana, pag. 41. Paris edit.

The Author of Turco-Papiſmus committed an egregious error, in declaring that he lived under the Pontificate of Paul III [B]. Very near two Centuries intervened, between the death of this Aſtrologer and the acceſſion of that Pope to the Pontificate, if we may credit Creſcimbeni, according to whom, Cecco of Aſcoli was burnt in Florence, the 16th of September 1327 (c). From theſe circumſtances I ought to ſay, that he lived, not about the end of the 15th Century, but about the beginning of the 14th. I muſt not omit that he is ranked among ſuch Italian Poets, as are far from being inconſiderable. Some of his Poems, written in Italian, have been printed [C]. A certain Author ſays, that he was a better Aſtrologer than Poet (d).

(c) Giovanni Mario de Creſcimbeni, Iſtoria della volgar Poeſia, pag. 47 and 262.

(d) Leandro Alberti, Deſcrit. di tutta l'Italia folio m. 267.

CICONIA

[A] I ſhall quote the judgment which Naudæus gives of him.] (1) "The only Commentary we have of "Chicus Æſculanus, on the Sphere of Sacroboſco, "ſhews ſufficiently, that he was not only ſuperſtitious, as Delrio calls him (2); but that he alſo was "wrong-headed, he having endeavoured to obſerve "three things therein, which muſt neceſſarily ſpeak "him a weak man; the firſt was, his interpreting "Sacroboſco's book agreeably to the ſenſe of Aſtrologers, Necromancers, and Chiroſcopies; the ſecond, his citing a great number of falſified Authors, "ſtuffed with old ſtories and idle chimæras, as for inſtance, Solomon de umbris idearum, Hipparchus de "vinculo ſpiritus, de miniſterio naturæ, de Hierarchiis "ſpirituum; Apollonius de Arte magica, Zoroaſter de "Dominio quartarum octavæ Spheræ, Hippocrates de "ſtellarum aſpectibus ſecundum lunam, Aſtafon de mineralibus conſtellatis, and a great many more ſuch; "and the third, his making uſe very often of the Revelations of a Spirit called Floron †, whom he ſaid "was of the order of Cherubims; and who being "aſked, on a certain time, what the ſpots in the Moon "were, he anſwered in theſe few words, ut terra terra "eſt. But beſides that he does not aſcribe to himſelf "this Spirit, in any part of the ſaid Commentary; "we alſo may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that this relation "is like what Pliny ſays ‡ of the Grammarian Appion, who raiſed the Devil, purpoſely to know of "what Country Homer was." Leo Allatius relates more at large the anſwer made by this Floron; Patrum noſtrorum memoria (3), ſays he (4), Cichus Aſculanus Commentar. de Sphæra cap. 4. tradit Floron ſpiritum naturæ nobiliſſimæ ex cherubinica hierarchia quærente quæ eſſet illa umbra quæ in luna conſpiceretur, tradit reſpondiſſe, ut terra terra eſt, ſic idea humiditatum eſt terra: ſi totam umbram habueris, te non decipiet ſicut umbra. Rurſumque, ab alio de Chriſto interrogatum dixiſſe, carnem ſumpſit humanam ut per ipſum ſalvaretur omnis caro. i. e. "In the memory of our Fathers, "Cicchus Aſculanus in the 4th chapter of his Commentary on the Sphere, ſays that the Spirit Floron, "of the moſt noble nature of the cherubinic Hierarchy, "being aſked, what that ſhade is which is diſcovered "in the Moon, replied, as the earth is earth, ſo the "idea of moiſture is earth; had you the entire ſhade "it would not deceive you as ſhade. Again being aſked by another perſon concerning Chriſt, he ſaid, that "he had aſſumed the fleſh, in order that all fleſh "might be ſaved by him."

(1) Apolog. des grans Hommes, chap. 13. pag. m. 344.

(2) Diſquiſit. lib. 1. cap. 3.

† Cap. 4. Sph.

‡ Lib. 2. cap. 30.

(3) This ſhews he did not well know the time when he lived.

(4) Allatius, de Patria Homeri, pag. 3 and 4.

[B] The Author of Turco-Papiſmus committed an egregious error, in declaring that he lived under the Pontificate of Paul III.] He ranks this Pope among thoſe who were addicted to Necromancy, and as a proof of this, he reproaches him with his ſtrict intimacy with Aſculanus a famous Necromancer (5). Paulum tertium cum Cecio Aſculano, magiæ & necromantiæ inſigniter perito, magnam familiaritatem habuiſſe teſtantur Hiſtoriæ *. Sleidan one of the two Authors cited by him, cannot be charged with this error. Here follow his words which he extracts from a libel that had been publiſhed againſt the abovementioned Pope. An non turpiſſimum eſt te pendere totum ab Aſtrologis & Necromanticis? Negari factum non poteſt: nam & honoribus illos & facultatibus atque donis amplificaſti, Cecium, Marcellum, Gaurecum Luſitanum, & alios (6). i. e. "Is it not moſt ſhameful, that thou ſhouldeſt be "ſo much wrapped up in Aſtrologers, and Necromancers? This cannot be denied: for thou haſt "raiſed them to honours, and leaved them with riches; "viz. Cecius, Marcellus, Gauricus the Portugueze, "and others." Sleidan ſays indeed, that one Cecius had ſhared the favour of Paul III, but he does not ſurname him Aſculanus; and he therefore may clear himſelf from the imputation of being in an error. Had he been as cautious with regard to Gauricus, he could not have been reproached with the following miſtake, viz. of making a man who was born in Italy a Portugueze.

(5) Sutlivius, in Turco-Papiſmo, lib. 1. cap. 8. pag. 55.

* Sleidan and Verger.

(6) Sleidan. lib. 21. pag. m. 668, ad ann. 1549.

[C] Some of his Poems, written in Italian, have been printed.] His Poem della natura dell' Univerſo was firſt printed in 1478, with a Commentary by an anonymous Author; afterwards in 1516, and laſtly in 1552 in 8vo (8). Creſcimbeni who informs me of this particular ſays elſewhere (9), that the Work entitled L'acerba di Maeſtro Cecco d'Aſcoli Aſtrologo del Duca di Calavria has been publiſhed.

(8) Creſcimbeni, Iſtoria della volgar Poeſia, pag. 306.

(9) Ibid. pag. 47.

CICONIA (FLAMINIUS) a native of Vicenza in Italy, was a tolerable Philoſopher, and lived about the end of the ſixteenth Century. I am perſuaded that his name in Italian was Cicogna, or Cigogna. He printed a book at Vicenza in 1592 [A]. Konig had never ſeen this edition (a). There was one STROZZI CIGOGNA, a Gentleman of Vicenza, who was a Divine, a Philoſopher, a Doctor of Laws, and Nuncio of the city of Vicenza. Theſe are the titles he gives himſelf at the beginning of a work, dedicated by him to the Doge of Venice and the Council of Ten, the 16th of July 1605 [B].

(a) He ſays that Ciconia publiſhed Quæſtiones naturales, Anno 1603.

[A] He printed a Book at Vicenza in 1592.] It is in 4to and conſiſts of eighty leaves, entitled, Quæſtiones naturales in quibus juxta Ariſtotelis principia multa diligenter pertractantur, & ſumma facilitate diſputantur, contra Robertum Juvenatenſem. I have now by me a work printed at Venice in 1585, and entitled, Quæſtiones tres. R. P. Domini Honorati de Robertis Juvenatenſis, Congregationis Lateranenſis, Canonicorum Regularium Sancti Auguſtini. Theſe are the names and qualities of the Author refuted by Ciconia. He attacks ſome other Authors in different parts of his work, as Averroes, Pomponatius, Zimara; but in this Age, all ſuch Books, like baſe coin, are cried down.

[B] STROZZI CIGOGNA . . . . dedicated a work to the Doge of Venice, and the Council of Ten . . . in 1605.] It is entitled, Del Palagio de gl' incanti, & delle gran meraviglie de gli Spiriti, & di tutta la natura loro. The edition I here uſe is of Breſcia, appreſſo Comino Preſegni, 1605 in 8vo. The Bodlean Catalogue takes notice of an edition of Vicenza in 4to, printed alſo anno 1605 (1). This work was printed in Latin, the year after, at Colen in 8vo, and its title is Magiæ Theatrum de Spirituum & Incantationum naturâ. This tranſlation is by one Gaſpar Ens.

(1) Konig only mentions the edition of 1617.

CIECA, Author of a Hiſtory of Peru in Spaniſh. See LEO.

CYGNE (MARTIN DU) a Jeſuit, was looked upon as the moſt famous Rhetorician of the ſeventeenth Century. He publiſhed in 1661, an Analyſis of Cicero's Orations, which has been ſeveral times reprinted, and particularly at Paris in 1704. He alſo left an Art of Poetry, an Art of Hiſtory, and a Rhetorick. He died at Ypres in 1699 (a).

(a) Extracted from the Mémoires de Trevoux, for July 1704, Art. 95.

CIMON, ſon of that Miltiades who vanquiſhed the Perſians in the famous battle of Marathon, was one of the beſt Generals of the Athenian Republic. There are ſome Hiſtorians who relate that he was caſt into the ſame priſon wherein Miltiades died, and was not diſcharged but on paying the fine which the deceaſed had been ſentenced to pay, and which he would not have been able to pay, had not Elpinice, his ſiſter and wife, married Callias [A]. Others ſay he voluntarily ſacrificed his liberty to obtain permiſſion to bury his father [B]. It would be no good refutation of this laſt opinion, to ſay he was [A] Some Hiſtorians ſay he was caſt into the ſame priſon in which Miltiades died, and was not diſcharged &c.] Cornelius Nepos has followed this opinion: (1) Quum pater ejus, ſays he (1), litem æſtimatam populo ſolvere non potuiſſet, ob eamque cauſam in vinculis publicis deceſſiſſet, Cimon eadem cuſtodia tenebatur, neque legibus Athenienſibus emitti poterat, niſi pecuniam, qua pater multatus erat, ſolviſſet. "When his father "could not pay the mulct ſet on him to the people, "and for that reaſon died in the public priſon, Cimon "was confined in the ſame place, nor could he be "releaſed by the Athenian laws, unleſs he paid the "ſum which his father had been fined." Callias, adds he, a perſon better ſtocked with money than with nobleneſs of birth, deſired to marry Elpinice, and offered to pay Cimon's debts, if ſhe were granted him. Cimon rejected the propoſal; but Elpinice declared ſhe would not ſuffer the ſon of Miltiades to die in priſon, and that ſince ſhe could prevent it by eſpouſing of Callias, ſhe was reſolved to do it. This was the upſhot of the affair: Cimon recovered his liberty by the marriage of his ſiſter Elpinice (2), a woman who was not reckoned overchaſte (3); I have ſpoken of her in another place (4): ſhe refuſed not the laſt favour to a Painter named Polygnotus: I do not know whether he teſtified his acknowledgment to her otherwiſe than by the picture of Laodice. To underſtand this, you muſt know that Polygnotus, being to paint the Trojan Ladies, drew Laodice perfectly like Elpinice (5). Take notice that Herodotus, ſpeaking of the proſecution againſt Miltiades (6), ſays nothing of the impriſonment either of the father, or of the ſon, and clearly inſinuates that Miltiades was not impriſoned. That great man got a fall at the ſiege of Paros, and hurt his thigh, and for that reaſon he could not anſwer to his accuſation in perſon. His hurt confined him to his bed: he was ſentenced to pay a fine of fifty talents; and as he died ſoon after by the mortifying of his thigh, it was his ſon Cimon who paid the fine. This is the account of Herodotus. There is wanting in it a circumſtance which Plato will inform us of. The ſentence declared that Miltiades ſhould be put into the dungeon: but that part of it was not executed; for the College of Prytanes oppoſed it. Μιλτιάδην δὲ τὸν ἐν Μαραθῶνι εἰς τὸ βάραθρον ἐμβαλεῖν ἐψηφίσαντο· κ᾽ εἰ μὴ ἀξ τὸ πρυτανεῖον, ἐνέπεσεν ἄν. Miltiadem vero, qui in Marathone pugnavit, in carceris barathrum detrudere decreverunt, ac niſi obſtitiſſet magiſtratus, procul dubio incidiſſet (7). It is ſtrange, if the affair paſſed thus, that Cornelius Nepos ſhould relate it in the manner you have ſeen above: and here is what he ſays in the life of Miltiades; Hanc pecuniam quòd ſolvere non poterat, in vincula publica conjectus eſt, ibique diem obiit ſupremum. i. e. "Becauſe he could not pay this "ſum, he was thrown into the public priſon, and "there breathed his laſt." I ſhall, in the following Remark, quote ſome Authors who maintain that Miltiades died in priſon.

(1) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, init.

(2) Tali modo cuſtodiâ liberatus. Idem, ibid.

(3) Plutarch. in Cimone, pag. 480, F.

(4) In the Article of PERICLES, Remark [N].

(5) Plut. in Cimone, pag. 480, F.

(6) Herodot. lib. 6. cap. 136.

(7) Plato, in Gorgia, pag. m. 352, B.

[B] . . . . Others ſay he voluntarily ſacrificed his liberty to obtain permiſſion to bury his father.] This was ſo noble an action, that I wonder Plutarch, who follows the opinion of thoſe who aſſert that Miltiades died in priſon (8), has ſaid nothing of it. It appears from Seneca's Controverſies (9) that the impriſonment of Miltiades, and the putting of Cimon in his place, ſerved for a theme to the declamations of the Rhetoricians. See alſo Valerius Maximus, who relates that the inhabitants of Athens conſtrained Miltiades to die in Chains, and would not permit him to be buried, but on condition that his ſon ſhould go to priſon in his ſtead. Bene egiſſent Athenienſes cum Miltiade, ſi eum, poſt trecenta millia Perſarum Marathone devicta, in exilium protinus miſiſſent, ac non in carcere & vinculis mori coëgiſſent. Sed, ut puto, hactenus ſævire adverſus optime meritum abunde non duxerunt. Imo ne corpus quidem ejus, ſic expirare coacti, ſepulturæ prius mandari paſſi ſunt, quàm filius ejus Cimon eiſdem vinculis ſe conſtringendum traderet. Hanc hæreditatem paternam maximi ducis filius, & futurus ipſe ætatis ſuæ dux maximus, ſolam ſe ſortitum, catenas ſcilicet & carcerem, gloriari potuit (10). i. e. "The Athenians would "have done well by Miltiades, if, after he had over-"thrown three hundred thouſand Perſians at Marathon, "they had ſent him directly into baniſhment, and "not compelled him to die in priſon and in chains. "But, I think, they did not deem it ſufficient to deal "ſo cruelly with a man who had deſerved extremely "well: they did not even ſuffer his corps, after he "had been conſtrained to die in that manner, to be "interred, before his ſon Cimon ſurrendered himſelf

(8) Ἐτελεύτησεν ἐν τῷ δεσμωτηρίῳ. Diem ſuum obiit in carcere. Plutarch. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 480, D.

(9) See Seneca the Father, Controverſ. 29. pag. m. 243.

(10) Valer. Maximus, lib. 5. cap. 3. num. 3 Ext. pag. m. 460, 461.

was decried for his debaucheries in his younger years [C]; for even those who have blamed him agree that he was of a frank and perfectly generous temper (a). There is reason

(a) See the Remark [C], Citation (18).

" to be bound in the same chains. This was the " only paternal inheritance which the son of a great " General, and who was himself to become the great- " est General of his age, could boast of succeeding " to, I mean chains and a prison." In the next chapter he takes notice in express terms that Cimon voluntarily purchased leave to bury his father at the price of his own liberty. Ne te quidem Cimon silentio involvam, qui patri tuo sepulturam voluntariis vinculis emere non dubitasti (11). I should lay no great stress on this Author's testimony, did I not see it confirmed by an Historian; for though nobody had said this besides Seneca's Rhetoricians (12), we should nevertheless have seen it in the Collections of Valerius Maximus: but here is an authority of greater weight. Græci ducem constituunt Cimonem Athenienſem, filium Miltiadis, quo duce apud Marathonem pugnatum est, juvenem, cujus magnitudinem futuram pietatis documenta prodiderunt. Quippe patrem ob crimen peculatus in carcerem conjectum, ibique defunctum, translatis in se vinculis ad sepulturam redemit (13).

(11) Idem, ibid. cap. 4. num. 2 Ext. pag. 473.

(12) Miltiades peculatus damnatus in carcere alligatus decessit, Cimonque filius ejus ut eum sepeliret vicarium se pro corpore patris dedit. Seneca, Controv. XXIX, pag. 243.

(13) Justin. lib. 2. sub fin.

[C] He was decried for his debaucheries in his younger years.] He was not only accused of stupidity, but also of dissoluteness and drunkenness, and of lying with his sister (14). Κακῶς ἤκουεν ὡς ἄτακτος καὶ πολυπότης . . . . νίος ὢν αἰτίαν ἴσχε πλησιάζειν τῇ ἀδελφῇ. Male audivit ex lustris & vinolentia . . . adolescentia ejus famosa fuit quasi sorori suæ illuderet (15). Here are great defects both of the heart and mind. It is reasonable to believe there was some calumny in the first accusation; for he discovered so great a capacity after he was advanced to offices, that there is no likelihood he ever was a fool or a blockhead. I acknowledge that some minds open but by slow degrees, and become skilful by being enured to business; but observe, these are minds which even in the time of their heavy dulness act with judgment, and if they have no vivacity, have good sense, and deserve nothing less than the imputation of stupidity or foolishness. Let us therefore, at the worst, keep to the testimony of Stesimbrotus; who was nearly his contemporary (16): now what has he said of our Cimon? that in his youth he learned neither music nor any of the other things which amongst the Greeks were taught those to whom they gave a good education (17), that is, he had not that politeness, and those agreeable ornaments of speech which were proper to the Athenians, and his candour and generosity savoured rather of Peloponnesus than of Attica. Τῷ τρόπῳ πολὺ τὸ γενναῖον καὶ ἁπλοῦς ἐπικράτουν καὶ μᾶλλον εἶναι Πελοποννήσιον τὸ χρῆμα τῆς ψυχῆς τοῦ ἀνδρὸς. Mores insigni generositate & sinceritate tinctos, potiusque ingenium hujus viri Peloponnesium fuisse (18). I know not even whether this testimony of Stesimbrotus be true; for it is said that Cimon having been requested to sing when he dined with Laomedon had the complaisance to do it, and acquitted himself well. Παρακληθέντος ᾆσαι καὶ ᾄσαντος ἱκανῶς, cum rogatus esset canere, & non illepide ceciniſſet (19). Ion, who was present at the entertainment, published this in one of his Poems. Cornelius Nepos asserts that Cimon early attained to a tolerable degree of eloquence, and was well versed in the knowledge of the Civil Law, and of Military Affairs. Celeriter ad principatum pervenit, habebat enim satis eloquentiæ, summam liberalitatem, magnam prudentiam cum juris civilis, tum rei militaris, quod cum patre à puero in exercitu fuerat versatus (20). Let us also cite Plutarch: he does not much confirm what is related of the stupidity and bad education of this young man. Cimon, says he (21), was as daring as Miltiades, and not at all inferior to Themistocles for judgment, and he was incomparably more just and honest than either of them. As he was equal to them in understanding, and in discharging all the functions of a Commander; so for the Political part of Government, he excelled them and every one else; and this too when he was very young, and his years not yet confirmed by any experience. However it be, we find this in an ancient Compiler; Cimonis incunabula opinione stultitiæ fuerunt reserta (22). i. e. " Cimon was generally supposed to be dull in his " childhood."

(14) Plut. in Cimone, pag. 480.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Stesimbrotus Thasius, apud Plutarch. ibid.

(18) Idem, ibid.

(19) Plutarch. in Cimone, pag. 484. He cites Ion.

(20) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 2.

(21) Plut. in Cimone, p. 481.

(22) Val. Maximus, lib. 6. cap. 9. num. 3 Ext. pag. m. 583.

Thus much for the first accusation. The second, I mean that which relates to his bad morals, is not so easy to be refuted. Plutarch confesses that Cimon was excessively addicted to the love of women. Οὐ μὴν ἀλλὰ καὶ ὅλως φαίνεται τοῖς περὶ τὰς γυναῖκας ἐρωτικοῖς ὁ Κίμων ἔσχος γενέσθαι. At qui apparet omnino hæsisse circa mulierum libidines Cimonem (23). He cites the Poet Melanthius, who had named two concubines (24) of whom that General was passionately fond; but it may be matter of surprize that he alledges, as another instance, his grief for having lost a lawful wife; for this sentiment is not always a proof of unchastness: the most virtuous are sometimes inconsolable for the death of their spouses. However that be, you will find this observation in the same passage of Plutarch where his design is to prove Cimon's lasciviousness: you will also find there that this disconsolate widower had need of the Philosophers on that occasion, and that Archelaüs is supposed to have composed the consolatory Elogies which were written on that subject. Δῆλος δ' ἐστὶ καὶ πρὸς Ἰσοδίκην, τὴν Εὐρυπτολέμου μὲν θυγατέρα τοῦ Μεγακλέους, κατὰ νόμους δ' αὐτῷ συμβιώσασαν, ὁ Κίμων ἐμπαθέστερον διατεθείς, καὶ δυσφορήσας ἀποθανούσης, εἴ τι δεῖ τεκμαίρεσθαι ταῖς γεγραμμέναις ἐπὶ παραμυθίᾳ τοῦ πένθους ἐλεγείαις πρὸς αὐτὸν· ὧν Παναίτιος ὁ φιλόσοφος οἴεται ποιητὴν γεγονέναι τὸν φυσικὸν Ἀρχέλαον, οὐκ ἄπο τρόπου τοῖς χρόνοις εἰκάζων. Jam non obscuro amore filiam Euryptolemi Megaclis filii, justam tamen uxorem, est Cimon prosequutus, ejusque mortem tulit ægerrimè, quatenus conjicere licet ex scriptis ad leniendum luctum ejus elegiis, quas Panætius Philosophus condidisse physicum Archelaum putat, neque absurdè ducit ex temporibus conjecturam (25). i. e. " However this is certain, that he loved his wife Iso- " dice very passionately; she was the daughter of Eu- " ryptolemus the son of Megacles. Her death he re- " gretted even to impatience, as appears by those Ele- " gies of condolance addressed to him upon the loss of " her. The Philosopher Panætius is of opinion that " Archelaus was the Author of those Elegies; and " indeed the time seems to favour that conjecture." Let us take notice, by the way, there was a report that Cimon having discovered that his wife the daughter of Callias abandoned herself to adultery, put her to death. The Rhetoricians declaimed very copiously on this topic (26): for they supposed him accused of ingratitude, under pretence that by marrying of that woman he had been enabled to pay his debts for which he was detained in prison. Some say it is a feigned case, and that the Rhetoricians changed the circumstances the better to shew their talents at wit (27). This might be, but the reason on which it is founded does not appear convincing to me. Callias, say they, paid the fine, not to procure his daughter the advantage of espousing Cimon, but to procure himself the happiness of marrying Elpinice Cimon's sister. Might not one answer, that Callias stipulated these two marriages on his disbursing fifty talents, I mean that he engaged Cimon to give him Elpinice, and to marry his daughter? There is a great deal of confusion in Authors about this whole affair; for Tzetzes relates that Callias the son of Cimon and Isodice paid a fine of fifty talents to prevent his father's being punished for having lain with his sister (28). Let us boldly reckon this incest among Cimon's debaucheries. As to drunkenness, I do not see that Plutarch undertakes to clear him: he only excuses the matter, by saying that it did not hinder him from performing great actions. Here are his words (29): Consonant to these calumnies are the famous verses of Eupolis the Poet upon Cimon:

Ill nature to him we cannot reproach;
But he is lazy, and he will debauch.
He goes to Sparta, and is so unkind
He leaves poor Elpinice in bed behind (30).

But if when slothful and a drunkard he could storm so many towns, and gain so many victories, certainly if he had been sober, and minded his business with the least application, there had been no Grecian Commander, either before or after him, who could have surpassed him for exploits of war.

(23) Plut. in Cimone, pag. 481.

(24) Aristeria of Salamis, and Mnestra.

(25) Plut. in Cimone, pag. 481.

(26) See the 24th Controversy of Seneca, pag. m. 243: the Title of it contains these words: Callias sordide dives natus redemit eum à republica & pecuniam solvit, eique filiam suam collocavit, quam ille deprehensam in adulterio, deprecante patre occidit. Ingrati reus est.

(27) Rutgersius, Variar. Lect. lib. 1. cap. 9. pag. 43.

(28) Tzetzes, Chil. 1. Hist. XXII.

(29) Plut. in Cimone, pag. 488.

(30) Here is Eupolis's Greek: Κακὸς μὲν οὐκ ἂν λάβοις φιλοπότης δὲ καμιλλᾶται. Κἄπειτ' ἀπειμὶ σπουδάσας ἂν εἰς Λακεδαίμονα, Κἀν Ἐλπινίκην τὴν δὲ κατυλοπιὼν μόνην.

reaſon to believe that in his youth he was not deſtitute, as ſome aſſert (b), either of the advantages of education, or of quick natural parts. I ſhall have ſeveral things to ſay concerning his marriage with his ſiſter [D]. He ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Salamis,

(b) See the Remark [C].

[D] I ſhall have ſeveral things to ſay concerning his marriage with his ſiſter.] The commerce between Cimon and Elpinice is differently related: ſome conſider it no otherwiſe than as a thing lawful, and others as a thing utterly unlawful. Cornelius Nepos is of the number of the former: Neque enim Cimoni fuit turpe Athenienſium ſummo viro, ſororem germanam habere in matrimonio: quippe quum cives ejus eodem uterentur inſtituto. i. e. "Neither was it ſcandalous for Cimon, a principal "man among the Athenians, to have his own ſiſter "in marriage: becauſe his fellow citizens uſed that "cuſtom." Thus he ſpeaks in his Preface. Habebat autem, ſays he elſewhere (31), in matrimonio ſororem ſuam germanam nomine Elpinicen, non magis amore quam more ductus, nam Athenienſibus licet, eodem patre natas, uxores ducere. i. e. "He had his own ſiſter "named Elpinice to wife, induced thereto no leſs by "the cuſtom than by love; for it is lawful for the "Athenians to marry their ſiſters by the ſame father." Athenæus ſpeaks of it in a quite contrary manner: he aſſerts that Cimon lay with Elpinice againſt the laws (32). I have quoted a man who ſuppoſes this infamous commerce had expoſed Cimon to ſome rigorous puniſhment if a large fine had not been paid for him.

(31) Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 1.

(32) I have ſet down his words in the Remark [N] of the Article of PERICLES.

Καλλίας δὲ πεντήκοντα τάλαντα ζημιῶται
Ὅπως ὁ Κίμων ὁ πατὴρ μηδὲν δεινόν τι πάθῃ
Ἕνεκα γάμων τῶν αἰσχρῶν τῆς ἀδελφομιξίας.

Decies talenta quinque multam Callias
Solvit, Cimon ne quid mali pateretur ob
Turpes ſororis atque fratris nuptias (33).

(33) Tzetzes, Chil. I. Hiſt. XXII.

That is,

"Callias a fine of fifty talents paid,
"To free his father Cimon from the pains
"Due to his ſhameful marriage with his ſiſter.

Rutgerſius, who quotes this paſſage, and afterwards that of Athenæus, as two authorities which teſtify that this inceſt of Cimon's was puniſhed, produces three other Authors to the ſame fact, Andocides, Suidas, and Varinus. The firſt aſſerts that Cimon ſuffered the puniſhment of Oſtraciſm, for having violated the laws by lying with his ſiſter (34). According to Suidas he was accuſed of having lain with her, and was baniſhed on account of that crime (35). Varinus obſerves the ſame thing (36); but by a ſlip of memory he puts Ariſtides inſtead of Cimon. All theſe Writers advance mere idle fancies, if we believe Rutgerſius (37): he objects to them that the laws of the Athenians permitted marriages between brothers and ſiſters by the ſame father, which he proves by the teſtimony of Cornelius Nepos (38), by that of Philo (39), and by that of the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes (40). He cites theſe words of Minucius Felix, Athenis cum Sororibus legitima conjugia, i. e. "At Athens it was lawful to marry with ſiſters;" and Seneca, who ſays, Athenis dimidium licet, Alexandriæ totum, i. e. "At Athens it is allowed to marry "half ſiſters, and at Alexandria thoſe of the whole "blood (41)," and Plutarch (42), who relates that Archeptolis the ſon of Themiſtocles eſpouſed Mneſiptolema his ſiſter by the ſame father (43). He makes uſe alſo of other batteries; he is of opinion that the oſtraciſm ſerved not to puniſh crimes, but to diminiſh the luſtre of envied virtue, and he ſhews the variations among thoſe who ſay that Cimon was puniſhed. Some affirm he was baniſhed, others that he was ſentenced to pay a fine of fifty talents. Some ſay he was condemned to pay that fine for his father's fault; whereupon he brings us quotations from ſeveral Writers, Herodotus, Cornelius Nepos, Seneca the father, Valerius Maximus, and Juſtin: quotations which are very uſeleſs, and very ill underſtood; for they have no relation to the queſtion which he is examining, and do not at all concern the puniſhment of which the Authors whom he would refute intended to ſpeak. They only meant the chaſtiſement which was inflicted on Cimon after a long adminiſtration of the Commonwealth. At length he cites Demoſthenes, who aſſures us that Cimon, having attempted to appropriate to himſelf the public adminiſtration, was condemned to pay fifty talents, and that there were but three votes wanting to condemn him to death (44). He alſo quotes a paſſage of St. Cyril (45), where we find that Cimon's puniſhment was founded on his being convicted of having aſpired to the Sovereignty.

(34) Ὅτι τὸν ἐξοστρακισθέντα Κίμωνα διὰ παρανομίαν ὅτι τὴν ἀδελφὴν τὴν ἰδίαν συνοίκιον. Andocides, in Orat. contra Alcibiadem, apud Rutgerſ. Variar. Lect. lib. 1. cap. 9. pag. 39.

(35) Suidas, in voce Κίμων & Ὀστρακισμός.

(36) Varinus, in Voce Ὀστρακίνδα.

(37) Rutgerſ. Var. Lect. pag. 39.

(38) Above, Citation (31).

(39) Philo, περὶ τῶν ἀναιρουμένων ἐν ἑβδόμῳ νόμων.

(40) Schol. Ariſtoph. in Nub. Act. 5. Sc. II. pag. m. 168.

(41) Seneca, in Ludo de Morte Claudii.

(42) Plut. in Themiſtocle, ſub fin. pag. 128.

(43) Ὁμοπάτριον, eodem patre genitam.

Rutgerſius, methinks, is in the wrong and in the right in different reſpects. He has ſufficient grounds to maintain that the laws of Athens permitted men to marry their ſiſters provided they were not by the ſame venter, and that the baniſhment of Cimon was not founded on his marriage with Elpinice. But he is in the wrong to impute what he does to Athenæus. That Writer giving the particulars of the impurities of Pericles, concludes with the adventure of Elpinice. This concluſion contains four things: 1, that Cimon had criminally enjoyed his ſaid ſiſter; 2, that he had afterwards married her to Callias; 3, that he had been exiled; 4, that Pericles, for having procured him to be recalled, was rewarded with the enjoyment of Elpinice. This is what Athenæus ſays; but this is not ſaying that Cimon was exiled for having enjoyed his ſiſter. Rutgerſius therefore is to be blamed for having inſerted in the Tranſlation of the Greek Words of that Writer a clauſe which he ought not to have inſerted. You will find it in the parentheſis of the words following: Cum Cimon Elpinice Sorore quam poſtea Calliæ elocavit contra leges abuteretur, ac (ob id) in exilium pulſus eſſet (46). i. e. "When Cimon, in breach of the "laws, abuſed his ſiſter Elpinice, whom he afterwards "married to Callias, and was (for that reaſon) baniſh-"ed." He is not the only perſon who is miſtaken in this point. Wower (47), Kirchmaier (48), and ſeveral others, impute the ſame thing to Athenæus. The worſt is that they impute it alſo to Plutarch, tho' he has ſaid very clearly that the cauſe of Cimon's oſtraciſm was the indignation which was conceived at an affront the Athenian troops had received at Lacedæmon (49). This reſentment renewed and redoubled the ill deſigns which were hatching againſt Cimon, who had been long ſuſpected of bearing too much friendſhip to the Lacedæmonians, and was become odious to the popular faction (50), becauſe he endeavoured to reſtore the authority of the Areopagus, and to cauſe the Tribunals to be ſurrendred back to the Nobles, which the people had taken from them. The reaſon which may have deceived thoſe whom I here criticiſe is very weak. Plutarch tells us that the efforts to reeſtabliſh the Ariſtocracy raiſed a clamour againſt Cimon, that they animated the people againſt him, and renewed the ſcandalous diſcourſes about his commerce with Elpinice (51). Is this a ſufficient reaſon to maintain that the ſaid Author aſſerts that commerce to have been the cauſe of Cimon's exile? Muſt it not be granted that an infinite number of Authors examine what they alledge very ſlightly, and that few of them are exact?

(44) Demoſth. adverſ. Ariſtocrat. pag. m. 457.

(45) Cyril. lib. 6. contra Julianum.

(46) Rutgerſ. Variar. Lect. pag. 138. Dalechamp, in his Tranſlation of Athenæus, has not put in ob id.

(47) Wower, in Minuc. Felicem, pag. m. 334.

(48) Georgius Gaſpar Kirchm. in Cornel. Nepot. Cimon. pag. m. 242.

(49) Plut. in Cimone, pag. 489.

(50) Idem, ibid. pag. 488.

(51) Idem, ibid. A.

We grant you, will ſome ſay, that neither Athenæus, nor Plutarch, have ſaid what ſeveral impute to them; yet it will not be the leſs true for that reaſon, that Cimon's commerce with Elpinice cauſed him to be baniſhed. I anſwer that there remains no other authority for this fact except that of the Orator Andocides; for we may believe Suidas depended upon him: and as to Varinus (52), his teſtimony is of no weight, ſince he lived in the beginning of the XVIth Century. Let us ſee therefore what regard is to be had to Andocides, and let us remember that an Orator makes no ſcruple to extenuate or amplify things according to the intereſt of his cauſe. He eclipſes the circumſtances which make not for him; he takes for the principal that which was but acceſſory, or that for acceſſory which was the principal. Andocides knew, either by reading, or by tradition, that Cimon's enemies decried him as much as they could, when they laboured to get him condemned to baniſhment. They publiſhed all the faults of his youth, and above all they raked into the old orduſe of his commerce with Elpinice. He was baniſhed, not for that, but becauſe he was ſuſpected of too much ambition, and becauſe they hated his attachment to the intereſt of Lacedæmon. It was of no uſe to Andocides to mention this true cauſe of the baniſhment;

(52) That is, Varinus Phavorinus.

(c) Plutarch. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 481.

mis (c), and rendred himſelf ſo agreeable to the Athenians that they quickly advanced him to the moſt conſiderable poſts. If his merit was of ſervice to him, on the one hand, he found, niſhment; wherefore he ſpoke not of it: but as it was of great uſe to him to repreſent that their anceſtors had ſeverely puniſhed manners which gave ſcandal, he inſiſted only on the reproaches of a debauched life, alledged by Cimon's enemies, and was glad to aſſign them for the ſole cauſe of that great man's exile. But it will be replied, Does not Tzetzes ſay that a great number of Authors have aſſerted that Callias, the ſon of Cimon and Iſodice, paid fifty talents to prevent the misfortune to which his father had expoſed himſelf by his marriage with Elpinice? I own he ſays this:

Τὸ δ' ὅτι ταῦτα γράφουσι, μακρὸν ἐξ ἐμοῦ λέγειν,
Ἐξ ἐγὼ πλῆθος ἀπείρου τῶν ταῦτα γεγραφότων,
Οἱ κωμικοὶ, καὶ ῥήτορες, Διόδωρος καὶ ἄλλοι.

Quòd iſta tradant, longum id eſſet exequi,
Nam ſunt eorum plurimi, qui hæc ſcripſerunt,
Diodorus, alii, Comici, atque Rhetores (53).

(53) Tzetzes, Chil. I. Hiſt. XXII, apud Rutgerſium, Var. Lect. lib. 1. cap. 9. pag. 37, 38.

But in the firſt place, we have no Author remaining who makes mention of a Callias the ſon of Cimon, or who affirms that a ſon of Cimon paid for his father. In the ſecond place, the Authors which are remaining at preſent furniſh us with grounds to doubt of theſe facts, and therefore we muſt not lay any great ſtreſs on the teſtimony of ſuch a Poet who lived in an age very diſtant from antiquity. III, Pray take notice that he principally refers to comic Poets and Rhetoricians, people who play with circumſtances, and diſpoſe of them according to their fancy. To conclude, I ſay it is uſual for Writers of more ſolidity than Tzetzes, to quote ſeveral Authors at the end of a long narration, though thoſe Authors have ſet forth only the groſs of that narration. We may ſuppoſe therefore that this great number of Authors to whom Tzetzes refers us, had only ſpoken of the unlawful amours of Cimon and Elpinice.

There yet remains another difficulty to examine. If it was allowed in Athens to marry one's ſiſter by a different mother, whence comes it that Cimon was ſo defamed for a marriage of that kind? I anſwer that probably the ſlander which was raiſed againſt him was founded only on the ſuppoſition that he had lain with Elpinice before he married her. Plutarch leads us to this, ſince having obſerved (54) that Cimon was believed guilty of criminal converſation with his ſiſter, he adds, that others ſay ſhe was his wife, and that not being able to find a ſuitable match becauſe ſhe was poor, ſhe had made choice of her brother for her huſband. Εἰσὶ δ' οἳ τὴν Ἐλπινίκην, ὑ κρύφα τῷ Κίμωνι, φανερῶς δὲ γημαμένην συνοικῆσαι λέγουσιν, ἀξίᾳ τῆς εὐγενείας νυμφίου διὰ τὴν πενίαν ἀποροῦσαν. Sunt qui Elpinicen non clàm cum Cimone, ſed apertè ſtrant contractis nuptiis ut uxorem habitaſſe, quod ſponſum pro generis dignitate non inveniret ob inopiam (55). As far as there is any certainty in Hiſtories of this nature we may aſſure ourſelves, in conſequence of theſe words, that Cimon enjoyed his ſiſter before ſhe was his wife (56). They were both of an amorous diſpoſition; if he was laſcivious, ſhe was not chaſte. They were very young, and lodged together: judge, I pray you, whether they could contain themſelves. A commerce of this kind laſts not long without being ſuſpected by the world, and the ſcandal ſoon fills the whole town; here then is Cimon defamed. It is probable that to ſcreen himſelf from ſatire, without depriving himſelf of the ſweets of that amour, he did what the laws allowed; I mean that he married Elpinice. He acted therein as many others do, who wed the miſtreſſes they have diſhonoured. It is a reparation of honour with reſpect to the Magiſtrates, but not with reſpect to private people: theſe continue to puniſh the fault by their ſatires; the breach appears to them always open; it is a wound ill cloſed which they maliciouſly tear open again as occaſion offers. We need not therefore wonder that Cimon's enemies took advantage of his old infamy whenever they had a mind to vex and perſecute him. But when Hiſtorians have been favourable to him, they only conſidered the thing on the fair ſide; they omitted the preliminaries of the marriage, and contented themſelves with ſaying Elpinice was his wife. Cornelius Nepos has blindly followed this road, in imitation of thoſe other people whom Plutarch mentions. You ſee plainly by this time, that knowing what the laws of Athens permitted, it might be ſaid that our Cimon tranſgreſſed the laws by his intrigue with his ſiſter. If I am aſked why he did not marry her when he began to love her, I ſhall anſwer, that it was becauſe ſhe was poor. He was glad to divert himſelf without entring into any engagement which might deprive him of the liberty of marrying a rich girl if an opportunity offered. When the ſcandal of his commerce with her fell upon him, he was obliged to take other meaſures, and changed the concubinage into wedlock. We frequently ſee ſuch changes.

(54) Plut. in Cimone, pag. 480, F.

(55) Idem, ibid. pag. 481, A.

(56) Plutarch, de his qui ſerò à Numine puniuntur, pag. 552, ſuppoſes a criminal proſecution might have been carried on againſt Cimon on account of his commerce with his ſiſter: ἢ Κίμωνα συνόντα τῇ ἀδελφῇ διαῤῥᾳσθαι: aut Cimonem cum ſorore concumbentem in judicio reum tanti criminis peregiſſet.

EXAMEN of Muretus's Critique.

I did not remember any one had already employed the diſtinction I have juſt now made; but having read a ſecond time two chapters of Muretus wherein he criticiſes Cornelius Nepos, I find that the Latin Tranſlator of Plutarch has made uſe of it above a hundred years ago. Let us ſee the ſubſtance of this critique a little. Muretus declares (57) that having read in Cornelius Nepos that it was no ſhame for Cimon to marry his own ſiſter, ſince the cuſtom of the Athenians allowed it, he was ſurprized thereat; for he did not remember that any other Author ſays ſuch a thing of the Athenians. He conſidered the matter attentively, and recollected the Oration of Andocides, where it is ſaid that Cimon was baniſhed for that marriage, as a tranſgreſſor of the laws; he therefore thought he had caught Cornelius Nepos in a miſtake. Two or three years after (58) the Apology of this ancient Hiſtorian appeared in ſome Notes on Plutarch (59). The Apologiſt made uſe of two arguments. He obſerved 1, that Cimon was baniſhed only for having had to do with his ſiſter before ſhe was his wife: 2, that the ſon of Themiſtocles married his ſiſter by the ſame father, as Plutarch teſtifies, and therefore Cornelius Nepos is not the only one who has imputed ſuch a cuſtom to the Athenians. The firſt obſervation was confirmed by the word παρανόμως illegally, which an Author has made uſe of in ſpeaking of that commerce (60), a word which would have been uſeleſs if the laws of Athens had not, in ſome caſe, permitted a man to lie with his ſiſter. Muretus replied, that he was not ignorant that the Laws of Athens allowed the marriage of a brother and ſiſter who were not by the ſame venter (61): Theon, continues he, had informed me of it in his Notes on Ariſtophanes; and I had read in Philo the difference there was between Solon and Lycurgus: the latter permitted a man to marry his ſiſter by the mother, the former permitted one to marry his ſiſter by the father; but I did not know they ever allowed the marrying of ſiſters both by father and mother: and if Elpinice was not Cimon's ſiſter by the ſame venter, it is a fault in Cornelius Nepos to call her Sororem germanam, and they would not have had a juſt reaſon to baniſh Cimon; for it is not an inceſt, but ſimple fornication, to lie with a maid whom the laws allow a man to marry. The addition of the word παρανόμως proves nothing; one might as well tell me that Cicero would not have uſed the term nefariè, ſpeaking of the enterprize of Catiline (62), if it was not permitted in any caſe to conſpire the ruin of one's country. Muretus concludes that Elpinice and Cimon had both the ſame father and mother; and that this was the reaſon why their marriage was looked on as a breach of the laws. He adds that S. Cyril (63) would not have reproached Cimon with this marriage as a ſcandalous action, if it had been conformable to the cuſtoms of the Athenians. In that caſe, the condemnation muſt have fallen on Solon, and not on Cimon.

(57) Muret. Var. Lect. lib. 7. cap. 1. pag. m. 989.

(58) Idem, ibid. lib. 15. cap. 5. pag. 1138.

(59) See the Notes of Xylander and Cruſerius in Vitas Plut. pag. 40.

(60) Athenæus, lib. 13.

(61) See the 5th chap. of the 15th Book of his Variæ Lectiones.

Let us make ſome Animadverſions on this diſpute of Muretus. I. It was ſo natural to join with the cenſure of Cornelius Nepos the obſervation of the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes, and that of Philo, that it cannot be imagined the critic would have omitted them had he known them. I appeal here to the conſciences of all the learned; one word, if you pleaſe, Gentlemen: Do you think that an able man who declares what Cornelius Nepos ſays, viz. that it was allowable according to the Athenian Laws for a man to marry his ſiſter, to be a lie, would content himſelf with quoting found; on the other, a powerful ſupport in the envy which was borne to the glory of Themiſtocles, who had been a long time in too great authority [E], not to make people ing Andocides, and there end his chapter, when he knows what has been obſerved by a Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes and by Philo? Do you think that if he remembers they tell us it was permitted in Athens to marry one's ſiſter by a different venter, he will make no reflections thereon, but quit Cornelius Nepos abruptly, without acquainting the public with ſo curious a difference as there was between the Laws of Lycurgus and thoſe of Solon as to the marriages of brothers with their ſiſters? I am ſure if you ſpeak ſincerely you will anſwer me in the negative, and that if Muretus has not inſerted thoſe Remarks, it is ſolely becauſe he did not then know what Theon and Philo taught him afterwards. Let us conclude then that in this paſſage of his Anſwer to the Apologiſt of Cornelius Nepos, ego autem non eram neſcius licuiſſe Athenienſibus ſorores eodem patre, dum ne eadem matre, natas uxores ducere. Docuerat me id Theon . . . . docuerat me id Philo (64) he yielded to the weakneſs of many learned men, who cannot prevail on their vanity to make an ingenuous confeſſion that they are beholden for ſome light to their Cenſurers (65), whether the obligation be owing to what has been borrowed from their Works, or to the ſeeing of things there which have put them on making farther enquiries which they would not otherwiſe have ſet about. What confirms me in this thought is, that if he had then known what thoſe two Writers ſay, he would have perceived the falſity of his own criticiſm; for he could not be ignorant that the Hiſtorian whom he cenſures ſuppoſes very clearly that Elpinice was her huſband's ſiſter by another venter (66). Muretus therefore could only accuſe him of uſing an improper word, by inſiſting that Soror germana ſignifies a ſiſter by the ſame father and mother. II. Muretus did not forget this Grammatical Obſervation, when he anſwered the Apologiſt; but who can believe that a polite Writer of the Auguſtan age ſhould not have known that Soror germana may ſignify a Siſter by the father only? Muretus has been ſhewn that his criticiſm is ill grounded (67). III. He is in the wrong to imagine that under pretext of its being allowed to marry one's ſiſter by a different venter, the defiling her out of marriage was not a crime which might be puniſhed. It muſt be ſuppoſed that the Laws by permitting certain things do not clear thoſe who commit them from all blame. I am ſure that few among the Athenians acted in this reſpect as Cimon did, and that the public was offended at a marriage of that ſort. If I am not miſtaken, they found therein ſomething odious and ſcandalous. The action therefore of a man who debauched his own ſiſter, and being at liberty to marry her choſe rather to live in concubinage with her, was looked on as a horrid fact. IV. The argument drawn from the word παρανόμως might have been refuted in a better manner; Athenæus himſelf might have been produced, who ſays ſomewhere that Alcibiades was accuſed of not having obſerved the Laws in his amours with women, ſince, after the Perſian cuſtom, he lay with his mother, his daughter, and his ſiſter. Παράνομον εἶναι λέγων καὶ εἰς γυναῖκας καὶ εἰς τὴν ἄλλην δίαιταν· συνεῖναι γὰρ φησὶν αὐτὸν καὶ μητρὶ καὶ θυγατρὶ καὶ ἀδελφῇ ὡς Πέρσας. Dicens contra leges eum & fœminarum congreſſu abuti, & reliquam vitæ partem agere: eſſe NAMQUE illi cum matre, filia, ſorore, more Perſarum, ſtupri conſuetudinem (68). V. What relates to St. Cyril is weak. Here are the words of Muretus: Poſtremo ſanctiſſimus & eruditiſſimus vir Cyrillus Alexandrinus libro ſexto adverſus Julianum, non furtivos concubitus, ſed nuptias cum ſorore Cimoni, ut ſcelus nefarium, objicit: non facturus, ſi id apud Athenienſes legitimum & uſitatum fuiſſet. Tunc enim accuſari Solonem oportuerat, qui id permiſiſſet, non civem, qui patriæ ſuæ legibus paruiſſet (69). i. e. "Laſtly, that moſt holy and learned "perſon Cyril of Alexandria, in his 6th Book againſt "Julian, reproaches Cimon not with private intrigues, "but with his marrying his ſiſter, as a wicked crime; "which he would not have done, if it had been lawful and cuſtomary among the Athenians: for then "Solon ought to have been accuſed, who allowed it, "and not a private man who acted conformably to "the Laws of his country." If S. Cyril has ſpoken only of the marriage, it does not thence follow that Cimon did not abuſe his ſiſter before he married her. Beſides, there are permiſſions ſo oppoſite to decency, that thoſe who make uſe of them are often very much to be blamed; and then, is it not viſible that the aforeſaid father principally propoſed to himſelf to ſhame Paganiſm on account of the public diſorders which were committed in it? Is it not viſible that he deſigned to wound the Republic of Athens thro' the ſides of Solon?

(62) Nam illud quidem argumentum ex Athenæo, non fuiſſe additurum παρανόμως, niſi idem fieri poſſet etiam οὐ παρανόμως, æque bellum eſt, ac ſi quis, quia Cicero alicubi dicit, Catilinam peſtem patriæ nefario moliri, colligat, idem non ſemper nefarie, ſed interdum etiam ſine ſcelere fieri poſſe. Muret. Var. Lect. lib. 15. cap. 5. pag. 1138, 1139.

(63) Cyrillus, lib. 6. adverſus Julianum.

I cannot conclude without ſaying one word as to the contrary regulations of Solon and Lycurgus. The former permitted men to marry their ſiſters by the ſame father, and forbade them to marry thoſe by the ſame mother. Lycurgus, on the other hand, permitted them to marry the latter, and forbade them to marry the others. There is ſomething ridiculous on either ſide, and I would fain know on what reaſons they founded their diſtinction: I am of opinion they could be but frivolous ones; for what could be more ſilly than to ſay, in juſtification of the Athenian Lawgiver, that the conſanguinity is always more certain with reſpect to the ſiſters by the ſame venter, whereas a man's daughters by his ſecond marriage are ſometimes nothing at all to the children by the firſt venter? Does this leſſen the inceſt? Is it not ſufficient to believe that one marries his ſiſter? The Legiſlator of Egypt very juſtly ridiculed the ſcruple of theſe two Grecians, and though in the main he was very much in the wrong to reunite what they had divided, yet he had reaſon to call their diſtinction a chimæra. Read theſe words of Philo. Ὁ μὲν δὴ Ἀθηναῖος Σόλων ὁμοπατρίους ἀφιεὶς ἄγεσθαι, τὰς ὁμομητρίους ἐκώλυσεν· ὁ δὲ Λακεδαιμόνιος νομοθέτης ἔμπαλιν, τὸν ἐπὶ ταῖς ὁμομητρίοις γάμον ἐπιτρέψας, τὸν πρὸς τὰς ὁμοπατρίους ἀπεῖπε. ὁ δὲ τῶν Αἰγυπτίων, κλευάζων τὴν ἑκατέρων ἐυλάβειαν, ὡς ἡμίεργα διαττεμένων, ἐυφόρησεν εἰς ἀσέλγειαν, ἐπιδιψιλευόμενος δυσθεράπευτον κακὸν σώμασι καὶ ψυχαῖς ἀκρασίαν, καὶ παρασχὼν ἄδειαν ἁπάσας ἀδελφὰς ἄγεσθαι, τάς τε ἰδίας τῷ ἑτέρῳ τῶν γενέων, τοῦδε, ἢ τοῦδε, καὶ τὰς ἐξ ἀμφοῖν, καὶ τὰς ἀνεψιάς μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ πρεσβυτέρας καὶ ἡνιλικας. καὶ δίδυμοι γὰρ πολλάκις ἐγεννήθησαν, ὧς ἡ μὲν φύσις ἅμα τῇ γενέσει διήρτησε καὶ διέζευξεν· ἡ δ' ἀκολασία καὶ φιληδονία εἰς κοινωνίαν ἐκάλεσεν ἀκοινώνητον, καὶ ἁρμονίαν ἀνάρμοστον. i. e. "Solon the "Athenian prohibited the marriage of ſiſters by the "ſame mother, leaving men free to marry their ſiſters "by the father: but, on the contrary, the Lawgiver of "the Lacedæmonians, permitting them to marry their "ſiſters by the ſame venter, forbad them their ſiſters "by the father. But the Lawgiver of the Egyptians, "laughing at the circumſpection of both, as inſtituting Laws by halves, gave a looſe to wantonneſs, "indulging in their bodies and minds the incurable "evil of intemperance, and allowing them with impunity to marry all their ſiſters, as well thoſe by "either parent, as thoſe by both parents, and not only thoſe who were younger, but thoſe alſo who were "elder or of the ſame age; for twins were frequently born, whom nature even at their birth ſeparated "and disjoined, but incontinence and voluptuouſneſs "invited to diſagreeable ſociety, and diſcordant "union." Here are three ſorts of Legiſlators whom Philo condemns; but what could he have anſwered to thoſe who might have ſaid to him, Solon does no more than authorize a Law which was uſed in the times of your Patriarchs, and which Abraham the father and ſtock of your believers put in practice (71)? It is certain Clemens Alexandrinus (72) has inferred from that Patriarch's words, that it was no ſin at that time for a man to marry his ſiſter, provided ſhe was not his ſiſter by the ſame venter.

[E] He found . . . . a powerful ſupport in the envy which was borne . . . . Themiſtocles.] Let us cite Plutarch. "The people were very glad when they ſaw "him applying himſelf to matters of State: for they "were diſguſted with Themiſtocles; in oppoſition to "whom, and becauſe of the candour and freeneſs of "Cimon's temper, which was agreeable to every one, "they advanced him to the higheſt employments in "the government. The man that contributed moſt "to his promotions was Ariſtides, who ſtill cultivated "the honeſt genius he ſaw in him; and purpoſely "raiſed him that he might be a counterpoiſe to the "craft,

(24) Muret. Var. Lect. lib. 15. cap. 5.

(65) Compare herewith the Remark [E] of the Article MARCIONITES.

(66) Habebat in matrimonio ſororem germanam ſuam, nomine Elpinicen: non magis amore, quam patrio more, ductus. Nam Athenienſibus licet eodem patre natas uxores ducere. Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 1.

(67) See Wowerus in Minucium Felicem, pag. m. 304, and Rutgerſius, Var. Lect. lib. 1. cap. 9. pag. 41.

(68) Athen. lib. 5. cap. 20. pag. 220.

(69) Muret. Var. Lect. lib. 10. cap. 5. pag. m. 1139.

(70) Philo, de ſpecialibus Legibus quæ ad ſextum & ſeptimum præceptum Decalogi referuntur, pag. 779, 780. edit. Francof. 1691.

(71) See the firſt Remark of the article SARAH.

(72) Clem. Alexandr. Stromat. lib. 2. pag. 421, B.

ple wiſh another might riſe to ſupplant him. Cimon's courteouſneſs, and the good diſcipline he eſtabliſhed among the Athenian troops which he commanded under Pauſanias the Generaliſſimo of the Greeks, a haughty and ill-natured man, greatly contributed to ſtrip Lacedæmon of the ſuperiority which ſhe had over all Greece, and to transfer it to the Athenians. All the Allies put themſelves under his conduct to beſiege Pauſanias (d), whoſe ill behaviour they no longer could endure, in Byzantium, and afterwards to attack the Perſians in a City of Thrace (e) on the river Strymon. They defeated them on the banks of that river, after which they made a deſcent into the country, and blocked up the Town in ſuch a manner that the Governor, deſpairing to ſave it, ſet fire to it. Cimon, ſome time after made himſelf maſter of the Iſle of Scyros [F], from whence he cauſed the bones of Theſeus to be tranſported to Athens. The exploits which he performed after that time were much more conſiderable. He was not ſatisfied with taking from the Perſians whatever they poſſeſſed in Greece, he hotly purſued them into their own country, and without giving them time to recover themſelves. When arms were to be made uſe of, he ſubdued his enemies by that means; but if intrigues ſeemed more expedient, he made uſe of that method to win Towns, by exciting them to rebellion. He did all this with ſuch wonderful ſucceſs, that none of the King of Perſia's troops were to be ſeen in the countries ſituate between Ionia and Pamphylia. Having intelligence that that Monarch's fleet dared not to appear on the coaſt of Pamphylia, he ſet ſail from the Port of Cnidos with two hundred gallies, and having ſubdued the Phaſelites, he attacked the ſaid fleet and deſtroyed it near the mouth of the river Eurymedon [G]; and the ſame day he landed his troops, and defeated the King of Perſia's land army (f). He afterwards went to attack the fourſcore ſail of Phœnician ſhips, which were to have joined that Prince's fleet, and gained ſo complete a victory over them, that not one veſſel eſcaped. The treaty of peace which was the fruit of ſo many ſucceſſes was a cruel mortification to the enemy [H]. The exploits of Cimon after this peace were to vanquiſh the Thracians and the inhabitants of the Iſle of Thaſos; but becauſe thoſe victories gave him

(d) They could not take him; for he got away privately. Plutarch. in Vita Cimon. pag. 483. C. See the Article CLEONICE, Remark [A].

(e) Named Eion, See the Remark [B] of the Article AGESIPOLIS.

(f) He made uſe of a ſtratagem which ſucceeded, and is deſcribed by Diodorus Siculus, lib. 11. cap. 61. ad Olymp. 77. He cauſed his ſoldiers to be dreſt in the Perſian habit.

"craft and repreſs the inſolence of Themiſtocles (73)." Here are two cauſes of Cimon's advancement very clearly expreſſed; his own merit, and the pleaſure people took in mortifying Themiſtocles. We ſee here the inconſtancy of mankind, and the effects of envy. Men grow weary of admiring the ſame perſons long, and for that reaſon ſeek for new objects of admiration, turning to the firſt riſing ſun which preſents itſelf. The Republic of Letters is not exempt from this ſpirit of inconſtancy and jealouſy (74). Sometimes a young Author is favoured, becauſe it is thought another has enjoyed applauſe too long. Ariſtides, who paſſed for ſo juſt a man, had perhaps contributed nothing to Cimon's fortune at another conjuncture; but becauſe the point was to counter-ballance Themiſtocles, he made himſelf the great promoter of that young man, who was ſo defamed on account of his debaucheries (75). If we knew the motives of the greater part of the ſervices which men render one another, it would be found that the deſire to do a pleaſure has a leſs ſhare in them than the deſire to vex another. You recommend ſuch a one with warmth, you protect him, you advance him by large ſtrides; is it not becauſe you love him, and becauſe his merit charms you? There are two Anſwers to this queſtion; one from the mouth, the other from the heart. The firſt takes the affirmative, but the heart anſwers thus: I exalt this man to the utmoſt of my power, in order to depreſs that man; what I procure for one is ſo much taken from the good fortune of the other. The maxim of the Naturaliſts may be extended to political actions, Generatio unius eſt corruptio alterius, i. e. The generation of one thing is the corruption of another; but whereas nature directly propoſes generation, and tends to deſtruction by accident only, it ſeems that in the offices of civil life deſtruction is directly propoſed: that is the end; generation is but the means.

(73) Plut. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 481.

(74) See the Preface to the Nouvelles Lettres contre l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme de Mr. Maimbourg.

(75) See Plutarch, an ſeni ſit gerenda Reſpublica, pag. 795. C.

[F] He ſome time after made himſelf maſter of the Iſle of Scyros.] Cornelius Nepos has not here rightly obſerved the order of time, for he ſuppoſes the conqueſt of this Iſland was poſterior to the two battles which Cimon gained againſt the Perſians on the ſame day (76). I refute him, not by quoting Plutarch, who makes the reduction of the Iſle of Scyros prior to thoſe two victories, but by quoting an Author who obſerves Chronological exactneſs better than Plutarch. This Author is Thucydides: read him; and you will find that Iſland was ſubdued immediately after what paſſed on the river Strymon (77). This fault of Cornelius Nepos is in Moreri, and has not been taken notice of by the Commentators whom I have conſulted (78).

(76) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 2.

(77) Thucydid. lib. 1. pag. m. 53.

[G] He deſtroyed the Perſian fleet near the mouth of the river Eurymedon.] Here is another fault of Cornelius Nepos, adopted by Moreri. It is an error in Geography which the Commentators have taken notice of (79). That Hiſtorian ſays the naval battle and the battle by land, which Cimon won the ſame day, were fought near Mycale. He is miſtaken, whether we underſtand by Mycale (80) a maritime city of Caria, or an Iſland of Ionia. That City and Iſland are both too far diſtant from Pamphylia, to allow us to juſtify Cornelius Nepos, by ſuppoſing that he differs from the other Hiſtorians only by the deſignation of a true place which they have taken no notice of. It frequently happens that a battle has three or four names; wherefore an Author is not miſtaken when he prefers one of thoſe names to all the reſt, and makes no mention of the others. But in ſuch a caſe the action muſt have paſſed near two or three places the names whereof may ſerve to characterize it. Now this is what cannot be ſaid of Mycale, and of the river Eurymedon, or of any other part of the Coaſt of Pamphylia: but the circumſtances oblige us to acknowledge thoſe two battles to have been fought by Cimon on that coaſt. I am apt to believe Cornelius Nepos fell into this miſtake by ſome confuſed ideas of the battle which was gained over the Perſians near Mycale (81), the ſame day that Mardonius was defeated in Bœotia (82).

(78) Gybertus Longolius, Janus Gebhardus, Georgius Gaſpar Kirchmaler.

(79) See Kirchmaier on this paſſage of Cornelius Nepos: he cites two other Commentators, Chriſtianus Fridericus Franckenſteinius, and Joannes Andreas Boſius.

(80) See the Theſaurus Geographicus of Ortelius. at the word Mycale.

(81) See Herodotus, lib. 9. cap. 99, &c.

(82) At Platæa.

[H] The Treaty of Peace which was the fruit of his victories was a cruel mortification to the enemy.] Nothing can be more ignominious than the conditions of peace which the Greeks impoſed on them. Let us hear Plutarch. This ſucceſs of Cimon ſo daunted the King of Perſia, that he preſently made that memorable peace whereby he engaged that his armies ſhould come no nearer the ſea than the length of a horſe-race; and that none of his gallies or veſſels of war ſhould appear between the Cyanean and Chelidonian iſles. Calliſthenes ſays, that he agreed not to any articles, but that upon the fear this victory gave him, he prudently kept off ſo far from Greece that when Pericles with fifty, and Ephialtes with thirty gallies, cruiſed beyond the Chelidonian iſles, they could not diſcover one Perſian ſail. But in the collection which Craterus made of the public acts of the people, there is an original draught of this Treaty, as following upon that defeat. And it is reported, that at Athens they erected the altar of peace upon this occaſion; and decreed particular honours to Callias, who was employed as Embaſſador him a fair opportunity, which he neglected, of ſeizing a part of Macedonia, he was accuſed of being corrupted by the preſents of King Alexander. He juſtified himſelf, and was clearly and fully acquitted. It was not ſo eaſy for him to ſtill another ſtorm which aroſe againſt him; for he could not avoid the baniſhment of Oſtraciſm. He had rendered himſelf odious by the affection he bore to the Lacedæmonians, and by his oppoſing the power of the people. He choſe rather that the authority ſhould be in the hands of the principal men, than at the diſcretion of the multitude. This procured him a great many enemies, who not only expelled him the city, but alſo hindred him from ſerving in the Athenian army againſt the Lacedæmonians. He had repaired thither during his baniſhment to fight as a voluntier, but was conſtrained to retire, by reaſon of the complaints of his enemies. The battle which the Athenians loſt in this war near Tanagra obliged them to recall him; his chief care after his return was to re-eſtabliſh peace, and he ſucceeded therein [I]; but ſeeing their thoughts ran on nothing but war, and fearing that warlike humour, if it were not employed againſt the barbarians would raiſe diſturbances among the Grecians, he prepared all things for attacking the Iſland of Cyprus and Egypt. He gained a victory over the Perſians at Sea on the coaſts of Pamphylia; and if he had not died at the ſiege of Citium in the Iſland of Cyprus, it is thought he would have ſubdued all Egypt (g). His liberality to every body, and his charity to the poor, were admirable (b), as may be ſeen in Moreri. Suidas attributes to him an excellent Book concerning the method of knowing horſes (i).

(g) Extracted from Plutarch, in Vita Cimonis.

(b) See Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 4. Cicero, de Officiis, lib. 2. cap. 18. Plutarch. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 484; Athenæus, lib. 12. pag. 533, citing the 10th Book of Theopompus.

(i) Ἔγραψεν ἱππικὸν βιβλίον θαυμάσιον. Admirabilem librum de cognoſcendis equis agentem ſcripſit. Suidas, in Κίμων.

(83) Plut. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 486, 487.

(84) Diod. Siculus, lib. 11. cap. 61.

(85) Idem, lib. 12. cap. 4.

Embaſſador to manage the Treaty (83). Diodorus Siculus mentions this treaty; but he does not agree with Plutarch as to the time: he does not ſay it was concluded after Cimon had obtained two victories in one day in Pamphylia: he places thoſe victories under the 77th Olympiad (84), and the treaty of peace under the 82d (85). It is true, he ſuppoſes that a little before the King of Perſia conſented to ſuch ſhameful conditions, the Athenians under the conduct of Cimon had gained two battles very near the ſame time, the one at ſea, and the other at land, the one in the ſea of Cyprus and the other on the coaſts of Cilicia. The news of this diſaſter, continues he, obliged the King to ſend word to his Generals to conclude a peace at any price. They ſent Deputies for that purpoſe to Athens: their propoſals were agreeable to the Athenians, who immediately named Callias for their firſt Plenipotentiary; and this is what was concluded: *Ut Græcis per Aſiam civitatibus univerſis libertate ac ſuo jure uti permittatur. Ne Satrapæ Perſarum trium dierum itinere inferius ad mare deſcendant. Ne longa navi intra Phaſelidem & Cyaneas excurratur. Hæc ubi Rex & militiæ præfecti rata habuerent, Athenienſes contra jurarunt, ſe in provincias Artaxerxis arma non expeditu*ros (86). i. e. "That all the Grecian cities throughout Aſia ſhould be "allowed the uſe of their liberty and their own laws; "that the Perſian Governors ſhould not approach "nearer to the ſea than three days journey; that no "ſhip of war ſhould cruize beyond Phaſelis and the "Cyanean Iſles. When the King and his Generals "had ratified theſe articles, the Athenians ſwore on "their part, that they would not make any invaſions "on the Provinces of Artaxerxes." As Diodorus Siculus is more exact than Plutarch in ſetting down dates, we may preſume he is in the right. It muſt be confeſſed that Plutarch is no good guide in Chronology; he ſometimes tranſpoſes events juſt as if he was writing an Epic Poem, and aſpired to the praiſe which Horace beſtows on Homer (87).

(86) Idem, ibid. pag. m. 413.

(87) In mediat res Non ſecus ac notas auditorem rapit. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 148.

[I] His chief care after his return was to re-eſtabliſh peace, and he ſucceeded therein.] I have followed Plutarch (88), and not Cornelius Nepos, who ſeems to ſay that before he returned to Athens, he went to Lacedæmon, and there reconciled the differences between thoſe two cities. Ille quod hoſpitio Lacedæmoniorum utebatur, ſatius exiſtimans contendere Lacedæmonem, ſua ſponte eſt profectus, pacemque inter duas potentiſſimas civitates conciliavit (89). The Orator Æſchines obſerves that Cimon, who enjoyed the right of hoſpitality at Lacedæmon, procured a truce for fifty years, which laſted but thirteen (90). This number I a little ſuſpect, when I conſider that Thucydides mentions only one alliance of five years (91). Obſerve that Cimon's exile, which ſhould have laſted ten years, laſted but five (92).

(88) Plut. in Vita Cimonis, pag. 490.

(89) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 2.

(90) Æſchines, de falſa Legatione, pag. m. 270.

(91) Thucydides, lib. 1. pag. m. 59, 60.

(92) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Cimonis, cap. 2.

CINYRAS, King of Aſſyria, according to certain writers, and of Cyprus according to ſome others, was not more famous for any circumſtance, than for his having begot Adonis on his own daughter Myrrha [A]. We obſerve in other articles (a), that this inceſt was involuntary with regard to Cinyras, he not knowing that the maiden whom they brought him was Myrrha. The inſtant he diſcovered this he endeavoured to murther her, and would certainly have done it, had it been in his power. It is related, that the thoughts of this inceſt tortured him ſo much, that he was going to lay violent hands on himſelf (b); but his death is alſo aſcribed to other cauſes, for, according to ſome, he loſt his life by his diſputing the prize of Muſic with Apollo (c), which was after he had forfeited his promiſe with the Greeks [B]. Cinyras was to have furniſhed them with proviſions during the ſiege of Troy, but failed them entirely (d). Agamemnon loaded him with imprecations; and the worſt circumſtance for him was, the Greeks poſſeſſed themſelves of the Iſland of Cyprus, and drove him from it (e). The long life which Anacreon

(a) Thoſe of ADONIS and MYRRHA.

(b) Hygin. cap. 242.

(c) Suidas in Κινύρας.

(d) Euſtath. in lib. 10. Iliad.

(e) Theopompus apud Photium, pag. 389.

[A] He was not more famous for any circumſtance, than for his having begot Adonis on his own daughter Myrrha.] It is not but that there are other very ſingular incidents in his life; but as the Claſſic Authors, the Writers of Hiſtorical Dictionaries, and the Compilers of Common places, do not ſpeak ſo much of them, as of the adventure of Myrrha, it has ſo happened that Cinyras is but little known to the Literati, except for the abovementioned incident. Some very learned men have been of opinion, that Pindar is oppreſſed with the copiouſneſs of his ſubject, when he is going to write of Cynyras (1); and they ſuppoſe, that the following words of that Poet allude to this Prince Πολλὰ γὰρ πολλεῦς λέλικται. i. e. "Several Authors "have related a great many things of him (2)." But the ſequel of the piece does not exhibit any thing which may induce us to take the words of that Poet in this ſenſe.

(1) Pindar. Nem. Od. 8.

(2) Meziriac, ſur les Epitres d'Ovide, pag. 398. Benedictus in Pindari Nem. Od. 8. Meziriac reads πολλὰ γὰρ λέλικται; i. e. "Many and ma- "ny things are "ſaid of him."

[B] After he had forfeited his promiſe with the Greeks.] Palamedes had been ſent to this King, in order to obtain auxiliary forces from him; but inſtead of deſiring any, he adviſed him not to join with the Greeks. He returned loaded with preſents, and kept them all for himſelf, except a ſorry coat of mail which he gave to Agamemnon, as a preſent from Cinyras. He flatter'd them with the hopes, that this King of Cyprus would ſend an hundred ſail of ſhips; which hopes however proved abortive. Theſe are ſome of the things of which Alcidamas accuſes Palamedes. He would be in the wrong to ſpeak contemptuouſly of the Coat

Anacreon aſcribes to him (f), does not coincide with the muſical conteſt before ſpoken of; for who could believe that a man of an hundred and threeſcore years of age would conteſt with Apollo for the prize of Muſic? The Mythological Hiſtory varies infinitely with regard to the father, the wives, the ſons and daughters of Cinyras (g). He is related to have had fifty daughters, who were all metamorphoſed into Halcyons or Kingsfiſhers (b); and others ſay, that Juno transformed them into Stones, which were employed as ſteps for the ſtair-caſe of her Temple (i). He was very much beloved by Apollo (k), and he amaſs'd ſuch prodigious riches, that they, as well as thoſe of Crœſus, became proverbial (l). He was extremely beautiful (m), and had a great ſhare in the favours of Venus. The Fathers of the Church who have written againſt the abominations of the Heathens, reproached them with ſaying, that the Venus who was honoured in the Iſland of Cyprus, had been Cinyras's ſtrumpet [C]. The chief Temple of Venus in this Iſland was that of Paphos. There indeed was an antient tradition which declared, that it had been built by King Aerias (n); but according to modern tradition, Cinyras had conſecrated it, and the Goddeſs came thither immediately after her birth. It was not he who inſtituted the Science of the Aruſpices, but Thamyras who came from Cilicia; after which an ordinance was made, that the deſcendants both of Cinyras and Thamyras ſhould preſide in the ſacred Ceremonies. In proceſs of time the deſcendants of Thamyras reſigned their privilege to thoſe of Cinyras; which removed all occaſion of complaint, (as being an irregular practice) viz. that the royal family did not employ any prerogative above that of a foreign one. Tacitus obſerves (o), that no one but the Cinyrades (p) was conſulted. Cinyras had united in himſelf the prieſthood and the regal office (q); for which reaſon, the prieſthood of the Paphian Venus was, afterwards, enjoyed always by a Prince of the blood; and hence it was, that Cato imagined he had made very advantageous offers to King Ptolomy, in ſending him word, that provided he would give up the Iſland, the Roman People would appoint him Prieſt of Venus (r). Mention was made of another Temple which Cinyras had built on Mount Libanus (s). He alſo had built three Cities, Paphos, Cinyrea and Smyrna, and called the laſt by his daughter's name (t). He was the inventor of ſeveral implements, as tiles, pincers, the hammer, the lever and the anvil (u). He alſo was the firſt who diſcovered copper-mines in the iſland of Cyprus. He is ranked among the antient Soothſayers (x). His monument, and that of his deſcendants, ſtood in the temple of Venus in Paphos, as is obſerved by Clemens Alexandrinus (y), in his citation from the hiſtory of Philopater, written by Ptolomy, ſon to Ageſarches. According to ſome writers, Cinyras was not born in the iſland of Cyprus, but came thither from Aſſyria over which he reigned. See the Remark [A] of the article ADONIS.

(f) Apud Plinium, lib. 7. cap. 45. 2.

(g) See Meurſius in Cypro, cap. 9.

(b) Euſtathius in Iliad. lib. 10.

(i) Ovid. Metamorph. lib. 6.

(k) Pindar. Pyth. Od. 2.

(l) Idem, Nem. Od. 8. Plato de Legibus. lib. 2. Suidas in Καταγράσας.

(m) Anthol. lib. 4. cap. 1. Hygin. cap. 270.

(n) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 3.

(o) Ibid.

(p) i. e. He who deſcended from Cinyras.

(q) Schol. Pind. in Pyth. Od. 2.

(r) Plutar. in Vita Catonis.

(s) Lucian. de Dea Syria.

(t) Hygin. cap. 275.

(u) Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 56.

(x) Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. 1. pag. m. 333. Meurſius, de Cypro, pag. 110.

(y) Admon. ad Gent. pag. 29. Arnob. lib. 6. pag. 193.

Coat of Mail, if it anſwered the deſcription which Homer has given of it (3). Some Authors ſay, that all the veſſels, one excepted, ſent by Cinyras were of earth; and manned with glaſs figures ſhaped like ſoldiers (4). Thoſe who pretend, that the Cinyras of the Heathens is the Noah mentioned in Scripture (5), would find it very difficult, to make the particulars which have been related of Cinyras, and what we are now going to relate of the former ſuit with Noah. I yet do not pretend to ſay but that this may be done, for has not Monſr. Huet (6) pointed out Moſes, where we ſhould never have expected to meet with him?

(3) Iliad. A.

(4) Euſtath. in Iliad. A. apud Meurſ. in Cypro, pag. 111.

(5) Bibliot. Univerſelle, tom. 3. pag. 18.

(6) Biſhop of Avranches.

[C] The Fathers of the Church ſay . . . that the Venus honoured in the Iſland of Cyprus, had been Cinyras's ſtrumpet.] Arnobius ſhall firſt give us ſome account of this. Numquid rege à Cyprio, ſays he (7), cujus nomen Cinyras eſt, ditatam meretriculam Venerem Divorum in numero conſecratam? i. e. "Have you never heard "that Cinyras, a King of Cyprus, made Venus his "rich Strumpet a Deity?" Firmicus Maternus employs as ſtrong expreſſions (8). Audio Cinyram Cyprium templum amicæ meretrici donaſſe, ei erat Venus nomen. Initiaſſe etiam Cypriæ Veneri plurimos & vanis conſecrationibus deputaſſe, ſtatuiſſe enim ut quicumque initiari vellet ſecreto Veneris ſibi tradito, aſſem in manum mercedis nomine Deæ daret. Quod ſecretum quale ſit omnes taciti intelligere debemus, quia hoc ipſum propter turpitudinem manifeſtius explicare non poſſumus. Benè amator Cinyras meretriciis legibus ſervit, conſecratæ Veneri à ſacerdotibus ſuis ſtipem dari juſſit, ut ſcorto. i. e. "I find that Cinyras the Cyprian dedicated a Temple to his Strumpet, named Venus. He even conſecrated many perſons by idle ceremonies, to this Cyprian Venus; for "he enacted, that whoever ſhould deſire to be initiated into the myſteries, with which he was entruſted, "ſhould give to the Goddeſs, a little piece of money "as a reward. What theſe myſteries are, all ought "to conjecture in ſilence, becauſe modeſty will not "permit me to explain them more clearly. This "lover of Cinyras well kept up the fornicating trade; "he ordering his Prieſts to pay a hire to the conſecrated Venus, as to a ſtrumpet." What irregularities were committed! what diſſolute ſcenes are theſe? Myſteries were inſtituted, the ritual of which declared, that whoever was initiated on theſe occaſions ſhould receive a handful of ſalt and a phallus; and give a piece of money, by way of offering, to Venus, (9). What kind of ribbon or collar (in this order of Knighthood) was there given? See Clemens Alexandrinus, who informs us, that Cinyras was the firſt, who preſumed to bring theſe abominable ceremonies out of darkneſs, in honour of a courtezan of his own Country. Οὐ γάρ μοι ὁ Κύπριος ὁ νησιώτης Κινύρας παραπίσοι ποτ' ἂν τὰ περὶ τὴν Ἀφροδίτην μαγγάνια ὄργια ἐκ νυκτὸς ἐμοὶ παραδοῦναι τελμήσας, φιλοτιμούμενος θεᾶσαι πόρνην πολίτιδα (10). i. e. "I will never ſuffer my ſelf to be perſuaded by "Cinyras the Cyprian, who dared to bring, from "darkneſs into light, the looſe orgies of Venus; and "endeavoured to rank a ſtrumpet in the number of "the Deities." See alſo Arnobius, page 169 of book Vth, where he ſays, Nec non et Cypriæ Veneris abſtruſa illa initia prætereamus, quorum conditor indicatur Cinyras rex fuiſſe, in quibus ſumentes ea certas ſtipes inferunt ut meretrici, & referunt phallos propitii numinis ſigna. i. e. "We "alſo will omit thoſe abſtruſe myſteries of Venus, ſaid to "have been inſtituted by King Cinyras; and to which "Venus, all who were introduced gave a hire, as to "a ſtrumpet, and brought back Phallus's, as a mark "that the Goddeſs had been propitious." Now, who could doubt after this, but it is he whom Lucian (11) ranks with Sardanapalus, and exhibits as a complete model of effeminacy?

(7) Lib. 4. pag. m. 143.

(8) De Errore prof. Relig. pag. m. 22.

(9) Clem. Alexand. Admon. ad Gent. pag. m. 10.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) In Rhetor. Præcept.

CINUS or CYNUS, a famous Civilian, was of Piſtoia, and nobly deſcended [A]. He

[A] And nobly deſcended.] Forſterus calls his family Familiam Sygiſbaldorum (1) and ſome other Authors call it Sygiſbuldi (2). Leander Albertus uſes the Italian word Simbaldi (3). Creſcimbeni ſays Sighibaldi (4).

(1) Forſter. Hiſt. Juris Civilis, pag. m. 499.

(2) See Konig. Bibliotb. p. 753.

(3) Leand. Alberti, Deſcritt. d'Italia, folio m. 41.

(4) Creſcimbeni, Iſtoria della volgar Poeſia, pag. 87.

He flouriſhed in the fourteenth Century. His Commentary on the Code was finiſhed in 1313. He alſo wrote on ſome parts of the Digeſt. He did not approve of the Interpreters of the Canon Law, and cenſured them very often, for which he himſelf was cenſured by Nicholas de Tudeſchis (a). He died in Bologna, and was buried near Dinus, whoſe diſciple he had been (b) [B]. His death is fixed to anno 1336 (c). He was as famous for his Italian Poems as for his Law Lectures; and he is ranked among thoſe who were the firſt that began to add graces to the Tuſcan Lyric Poetry. Petrarch may be conſidered as his diſciple, and the latter did not ſcruple to ſteal ſome thoughts from him. The Canzoniere of Cinus is ſtill extant, for which we are obliged to a Lady (d) whom the Author loved very tenderly (e). I ſhall cite a paſſage, which ſhews that he was of an amorous complexion [C].

(a) It is he who is ſo well known under the name of Panormitanus.

(b) Extracted from Forſterus, Hiſt. Juris Civilis, pag. m. 498, 499.

(c) Kohig. Bibliotb, pag. 193, 753.

(d) Madonna Ricciarda de' Selvaggi.

(e) Extracted from Creſcimbeni, Iſt. della volgar Poeſia, pag. 87.

[B] He was buried near Dinus, whoſe diſciple he had been.] This was done without his being diſtinguiſhed by any mark of honour. Juxta Dinum pari, hoc eſt ignobili & vulgari ſepulchro terræ conditus (5). i. e. "He was buried near Dinus, in the like vulgar grave." Some Writers ſay, that theſe two civilians, and Florianus de Sancto Petro lie in the ſame grave, in the Cloyſter of the Dominicans at Bologna (6). Obſerve, that Cynus had been Law-Profeſſor in the Univerſity of this City (7). Here follows his Epitaph: Cino, eximio juriſconſulto Bartolo Præceptore dignißimo, Populus Piſtorienſis B. M. poſuit. This gives us room to ſuppoſe, that his countrymen endeavoured to compenſate for the neglect of the inhabitants of Bologna, who had not placed any inſcription over his grave. The word Bartolo muſt be changed in this epitaph to Bartoli; for Cinus was Bartolus's maſter and not his diſciple (8).

(5) Forſter. Hiſt. Juris Civilis, pag. m. 499.

(6) Leand. Alberti, Deſcritt. d'Italia folio 41.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Forſter. Hiſt. Juris Civ. pag. 503. Creſcimbeni, Iſtoria della volg. Poeſia, pag. 87.

[C] I ſhall cite a paſſage which ſhews that he was of an amorous complexion.] Julius Clarus having aſſerted, that if a woman lies with her footman ſhe deſerves puniſhment, but that a maid who lies with her maſter is not puniſhed, but rather rewarded; adds, that this furniſhed Cynus the Lawyer with a reaſon to aſſert, that preſents ought to be made by perſons who love, and not by thoſe beloved. It will be more proper to inſert the ſequel of this paſſage in Latin, than in Engliſh. Unde ſumit argumentum Cynus in d. l. 1. quod amatores debent donare amaſiis ſuis, non e contra ſubdens; & crede experto, quòd donum magis valet quàm ſuſpirium, imo ſuſpirium nihil valet ſine dono: ferrum tamen præponitur auro, nam ſecundum Juven. Ferrum eſt quod amant: Quod (ut ipſe ait) quidam exponunt, id eſt, ferreum membrum, propter cujus ferri fortitudinem inſignes etiam ſervis viliſſimis ſe exponunt (9). Julius Clarus obſerves on this occaſion, that Dr. Cynus was of a very amorous diſpoſition, and an excellent Poet. Quæ verba D. Cyni ſunt notanda, quia licet eſſet excellens doctor, fuit etiam maximus amator, & egregius poeta, ut Franc. Petrarcha atteſtatur in iis carminibus, in quibus ipſius mortem deplorat. Et extant adhuc cantiones & alia carmina amatoria D. Cyni non inſulſa (10). i. e. "Which words of Cynus are worthy of remark, "for tho' he was ſo well ſkilled in the Law, he was "no leſs ſo in matters of love, and an excellent Poet, "as Petrarch teſtifies in thoſe verſes where he bewails "his death. And there are ſtill extant ſome pretty "odes and other love-verſes of Cynus's compoſing."

(9) Julius Clarus, recept. Sententiarum, lib. 5. cap. de Fornicatione, num. 20. pag. m. 23.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(a) This Article was communicated by FERDINAND LEWIS DE BRESLER, of Aſchemburg, Tranſlator and Continuator of Moreri in German. See the Article BIBLIANDER above, citation (f).

CIOLEK (a) (ERASMUS) in Latin Vitellius [A], Biſhop of Ploczko in Poland, was born in Cracow, of low and baſe extraction (b); his parents, as well as the education which was given him, being abſolutely unknown (c). Nevertheleſs, what he wanted in birth was largely compenſated by the penetration of his genius, by his wiſdom, his erudition and eloquence [B]. He was in great favour with Alexander King of Poland. It is alſo thought that this Prince, at the time that he was created Duke of Lithuania, had taken him into his intimate confidence, and followed his Councils chiefly (d). Alexander having aſcended the throne of Poland (e), after the death of John Albert his brother, was deſirous of recompenſing Ciolek, his miniſter, from whom he had received ſuch faithful ſervices; and accordingly he nominated him, anno 1504, to the Biſhoprick of

(b) Vili & plebeio loco Cracoviæ natus. Staniſlai Lubienski Vitæ & Series Epiſcoporum Plocenſium; in Operibus ejus Antwerpiæ, an. 1643 excuſis, pag. 370. Eraſmum Cioclum hominem plebeium, quemadmodum creditum eſt, appellat Mart Cromer. de Origine & Rebus geſtis Polonorum, lib. 30, cap. ult.

(c) Lubienski, Operum pag. 369. Quo genere quave ſtirpe genitus fuerit Eraſmus Ciolek, unde prodierit, quomodo creverit, & illa ipſa, qua vixit, ignoravit ætas.

(d) Cromerus, de Origine & Rebus geſtis Polon. lib. 30, cap. ult.

(e) Ann. 1501.

[A] In Latin Vitellius.] The art of metamorphoſing names has alſo not been unknown to the Poles; and our Vitellius imagined, that he ſhould have well confirmed himſelf, in caſe he made Vitellius out of the word Cioleck, which bears ſome relation to the word Calf, in the Poliſh Language. Martin Cromer, who declines this Poliſh word by a Latin termination, calls him Ciolcum (1). There ſtill ſubſiſts in Poland a very noble and very conſiderable family called Ciolek, (formerly Vitellina in Latin) which came thither from Italy anno 971, in Mieciſlaus's time, by Robert Archbiſhop of Gneſua, of the Houſe of the Vitellii; inaſmuch as Paulinus, brother of Robert, increaſed his family in Poland; whence there have ſprung ſeveral Archbiſhops of Gneſua, and other perſons of diſtinction (2). It will be proper to add here, what Okolſki relates of ſome one of his family (3). I ſhall cite his own words, in order that the reader may be the better able to procure the remedy from the ſource itſelf, which very well ſuits a Poliſh ſubject. His words are theſe, Staniſlas Ciolek ſeu Vitellius, nobilis Polonus, circa ſec. XV clarus, fertur ante conſuetum tempus natus, quapropter 4 ſeptimanas in adipe apri conſervabatur, crevit in maximum virum, Caſtellanum, Sendomir, Mareſcallum Curiæ &c. i. e. "Staniſlaus Ciolek, or Vitelli-"us, a noble Pole, living about the fifteenth Cen-"tury, is ſaid to have come into the world before the "uſual time, and therefore was kept four weeks in the "fat or lard of a boar. He roſe to be a very great "man, Caſtellan of Sendomir, Marſhal of the Court "&c."

(1) Mart. Cromerus, de Origine & Rebus geſtis Polonorum, lib. 30. cap. ult.

(2) Simon Okolski, in Orbe Polono, tom. 1. pag. 108, ſeq.

(3) Ibid. pag. 114.

[B] And eloquence.] T. Spiegelius (4) draws his character exactly; and deſcribes him, in his Letter to Eraſmus, as one of the moſt learned and moſt eloquent men of his time; and likewiſe beſtows the following encomium on him, Singularis integritatis vita, a Perſon of ſingular integrity and life. Richard Bartholinus (5) confirmed this, by ſaying, Epiſcopus Plocenſis vir literatus & gravis orationem habuit Latinam plane & rei ſatis accommodatam, in qua ſapienter & erudite de expeditione contra Turcas ſuſcipienda diſputavit: That is, "The Biſhop of Ploczko, a very learned and grave "man, delivered an oration which was much to the "purpoſe; and argued therein with great judgment "and learning upon the expedition deſigned againſt "the Turks." Add in another place (6): Hæc mihi reverendiſſimus Epiſcopus Plocenſis, apud Cæſarem Poloniæ regis oratorem agens recitavit, vir graviſſimus & literatus, & cui ſine controverſia fides adhibenda. i. e. "The Biſhop of Ploczko, a man of great judgment and "learning, and very worthy of credit, informed me of "this, when he was Embaſſador from the K. of Poland "to the Emperor." But Staniſlaus Lubienſki (7) gives him indeed the character of a learned and diſcreet man; ſince he ſays that he had obtained, by his artful management, the Biſhoprick of Ploczko: however, one would

(4) In his Letter to Eraſmus. See the note [C].

(5) In Concinna Deſcriptione de Conventu Auguſtenſi edita à Conrado Adelmann de Adelmanusfelden, Canonico Auguſtano, anno 1518 in 4to.

(6) In Concinna Deſcript. &c.

(7) Operum, pag. 370; he ſays Tantum ingenio valuit, ut Epiſcopatum Plocenſem adipiſceretur.

of Ploczko, which Vincent I Prozeræbeſki had enjoyed before him. Several charge him with having prompted his ſovereign to tyrannical counſels (f): but be this as it will, he gave teſtimonies of his fidelity, in ſeveral embaſſies undertaken by him to the Emperor Maximilian I; and by the good ſervices he performed at the Court of Rome (g): but his Patron, to whom he owed his preferment, died two years after (b), and was ſucceeded by Sigiſmund his brother, who alſo made uſe of his ſervices, in which he acted as faithfully and diligently as he had done with regard to King Alexander. He likewiſe deputed him ſeveral times to the Emperor and the Pope; and he, particularly, was preſent, anno 1518, in the great and famous Diet of Auſburg, as Embaſſador from the King of Poland, in conjunction with Raphael, Caſtellan of Denden, and Boguſlao Marſhal of Lithuania. It was there (as being the place where all the Grandees of Germany, ſeveral Embaſſadors and perſons of diſtinction of foreign countries met) that Ciolek diſplayed his great abilities; and ſpoke, on Friday the 20th of Auguſt (at a time when the aſſembly conſiſted of the moſt illuſtrious perſons) an Oration addreſſed by him to the Emperor and the States of the Empire, which was ſo vaſtly moving, that ſeveral of the auditors wept [C], and for theſe reaſons J. Spigelius cauſed it to be printed. In fine, Ciolek died in his embaſſy at Rome (i); for, after having been deputed to that Court by King Sigiſmund I, to negotiate ſome ſecret affairs with Pope Leo X, and having obtained ſome privileges from that Pope in favour of his Church, he died there the ſame year with the Pope, viz. in 1521, and was buried in the Church of S. Maria del Popolo. Raphael Leſczynſki ſucceeded him in his Biſhoprick (k).

(f) Lubienski, Operum, pag. 370.

(g) Though it appears probable to me, that Cromer l. c. is miſtaken; and has here tranſpoſed the embaſſies he undertook under Sigiſmund I.

(b) Anno 1504.

(i) See the cloſe of the remark [C].

(k) Lubienski, Operum, p. 370.

would imagine that Lubienſki did not believe what Spiegelius relates of Ciolek's integrity, ſince he ſays (8), Vafrum fuiſſe hominem & callidum, & qui Regi, cujus gratia florebat, (Alexandro) tyrannidem ſuaderet, plerique credidere: i. e. "Moſt people thought him a ſubtle man; and that he inſpired King Alexander, in whoſe favour he had a great ſhare, with tyrannical counſels."

(8) Ibid.

[C] That ſeveral of the Auditors wept.] This is a very ſingular circumſtance, as related by J. Spiegelius, Counſellor and Secretary to the Emperor (9); and I am of opinion, that few Orators could have effected by their ſpeeches, what Ciolek did by his, eſpecially in ſuch an Aſſembly. J. Spiegelius was ſo fully perſuaded of the ſtrength of this Oration, that he did not doubt but it would draw tears from the readers of it. As the words written by him, in a Letter to Eraſmus (10), are difficult to be met with, and he therein gives an ample deſcription of this circumſtance; of Ciolek's eloquence; and of his chief hearers, I will inſert them here at full length. Reverendiſſimus Dominus Eraſmus Vitellius Epiſcopus Plocenſis, ſingulari integritate vitæ, raraque doctrina, Romanaque facundia inſignis; vel eo mihi nomine præcipue colendus, quia cognominis, de te perquam egregiam frequenter facit mentionem. Primam (ut anticus antico utar verbo) audientiam coram Cæſare, ſacri Imperii, electoribus omnibus, & cæteris Germaniarum principibus proceribuſque obtinuit. Sic ornate, ſic graviter oravit, ut ad intima uſque præcordia auditorum vehementia ſententiarum penetraverit, pluresque ad fletum concitaverit, ei vero docto ſimul & facundo omnes docti & eloquentes palmam tribuunt. Aderant enim viri non pauci, tum exquiſite docti, tum in judicando naris emunctiſſimæ, Antiſtes Torgeſtinus, Peutingerus, Huttenus, Bartholinus, Spalatinus, & Statius in nullo doctrinæ genere non verſatus, Henricus Stromer Medicus, & Laurentius Zochius Juriſconſultus, Cardinalis Moguntini, florentiſſimi Principis, cancellarius. Igitur facta mihi primum præ cæteris elegantiſſimæ hujus orationis copia. Quia digna multorum lectione viſa fuit eruditorum calculo, & ab omnibus deſiderata, imprimendam curavi ſub auguſto tuo nomine; non dubito quin ut audientibus lacrymas commovit, ita hæc eadem legentibus magis copioſas excutiet, & in rem Chriſtianam protenſiores eorum animos reddet. i. e. "The right reverend Eraſmus Vitellius, Biſhop of Ploczko, a perſon of ſingular integrity of life, uncommon erudition and perfectly well ſkilled in the Roman eloquence, merits a particular eſteem from me, becauſe of the frequent and honourable mention he makes of you; this Biſhop I ſay, was admitted to his firſt audience (to ſpeak in the ſtyle of Courts) before the Emperor, all the Electors of the Empire, and the reſt of the Princes and Noblemen of Germany. He delivered himſelf on this occaſion with ſuch force and elegance, that his expreſſions pierced the very hearts of the auditors, and threw many of them into tears. All who are themſelves learned and eloquent, decree the prize to this learned and eloquent man. There were preſent on this occaſion, perſons of very great erudition, judgment, and ſagacity, as the Preſident of Torgau, Peutinger, Hutten, Bartholinus, Spalatinus and Statius, who is ſkilled in all the branches of Literature, Henry Stromer the Phyſician, and Laurence Zochius the Civilian, Chancellor to that moſt renowned Prince and Cardinal of Mentz. Being therefore ſo fortunate, as to procure this moſt elegant Oration; and as in the opinion of the learned it was judged worthy the peruſal of the public, and was eagerly deſired by every one, I preſumed to ſhelter it under your great name; not doubting but that, as it forced tears from the eyes of the auditors, it will draw them more abundantly from the readers; and cauſe their minds to be more intent to the cauſe of Chriſtianity." To conclude; to heighten the relation of the magnificence of the Aſſembly, before which Ciolek ſpoke, I ſhall here inſert what John Muller, an eminent Printer at Auſburg who printed Ciolek's Speech, added inſtead, or by way of Appendix. Aderant, ſays he, in hoc conventu tres reverendiſſimi Domini Cardinales, Cajetanus, Gurænſis & Moguntinus, pluresque Regum oratores, & omnes fere Germaniæ Duces, cum magna parte Epiſcoporum & Nobilitatis ſuæ primariæ; quales in imperio ſupra triginta annos viſus non eſt: i. e. "In this Aſſembly, the like of which had not been ſeen for thirty years paſt in the Empire, were three moſt reverend Cardinals, many Embaſſadors of Kings, moſt of the Commanders of Germany, with a great number of Biſhops and of their prime Nobility." With regard to the edition of this Speech, J. Spiegelius, as we have already obſerved, had it printed in 4to, at Auſburg, anno 1518, under the title of, Oratio per R. P. Dominum Eraſmum Vitellium Epiſcopum Plocenſem in celeberrimo Auguſtenſi Conventu ad Cæſarem Maximil. nomine victorioſiſſimi Regis Poloniæ Sigiſmundi habita coram omnibus S. Imp. Electoribus plurimiſque Germaniæ Principibus, die veneris, 20 Aug. A. Dom. 1518. It was afterwards reprinted ex Bibliotheca Joh. Piſtorii in Corpore Hiſtoriæ Polonicæ (11). Marquardus Freherus (12) ſays alſo, that it is inſerted in Reuſneri Anti-Turcico.

(9) In Epiſt. ad Eraſmum Roter. Orationi Vitellii præmiſſa.

(10) Ex Auguſta Vindelic. prid. Kal. Sept. an. 1518.

(11) At Baſil, in 1582, folio.

(12) In Indice Autorum, tom. 2. Rer. German. Scriptorum præmiſſo.

CIPIERRE (PHILIBERT DE MARCILLI, Lord of) was a native of * Maconnois (a). He gave ſo many proofs of his courage and prudence in the ſervice of Henry II, both in France and Italy, that this Prince appointed him Governor of the Duke of Orleans his ſecond ſon, who was afterwards Charles IX, King of France. It is ſaid, that had not others depraved the excellent education he had beſtowed on that young

(a) Le Labourcur, Addit. to Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 526.

* [A country in Burgundy. Addit. by the Tranſlator.] young Prince, he would have made him a great Monarch [A]. On Charles IXth's acceſſion unto the throne, it was thought proper to do him the greater honour, to have a Prince of the blood always near his perſon, in order that he might have an eye to his conduct; and this employment was given to the Prince de la Roche-ſur-yon (b); notwithſtanding which Cipierre ſtill kept his employment [B]. There was a very good underſtanding between theſe two Governors. The Prince paid great deference to Cipierre's judgment, knowing him to be a Nobleman of as great abilities as any in France; and on the other ſide Cipierre, being a perſon of great prudence, paid great honour and reverence to the Prince, ... and it was a pleaſing ſight to ſee theſe two Governors about the King, holding their reſpective ranks in a due manner; the one in an exalted way, and the other a little beneath him. Cipierre was made Knight of the Order by Francis II, anno 1560 (c). It is related, that finding himſelf afflicted with a mortal diſeaſe, and preparing to go and drink the waters of Aix, he earneſtly exhorted the Queen-mother, to pacify the diſſenſions which reigned between the Guiſes and the Colignis, and by that means, cut away the root of the factions and troubles, whoſe evil conſequences might be ſo dreadful as to quite ſubvert the Government (d). He died in Liege in September 1565, before he could have an opportunity of drinking the waters. The French Proteſtants were not ſatisfied with his conduct [C]; and therefore wrote ſome ſatyrical pieces againſt him in verſe both in his life-time, and after his death (e). It was from him that the Prince of Conde received advice in Orleans, anno 1560, that de la Renaudie's plot had been diſcovered (f). And it was he alſo who was appointed, ſome months after, to ſecure the city of Orleans (g); the fidelity of whoſe inhabitants was ſuſpected. He commanded, during ſome days, the French army at the ſiege of that city, after the Duke of Guiſe had been killed (h); and obtained, (b) Ibid. Extracted from Brantome.

(c) Le Laboureur, Addit. a Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 374.

(d) Thuan. lib. 38.

(e) Le Laboureur quotes ſome of them. Addit. to Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 374.

(f) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. m. 19.

(g) Beze, Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 3. pag. 290. Thuan. lib. 26.

(h) Brantome, cap. Etrangers, tom. 1. pag. 132.

[A] Had not others depraved the excellent education he had beſtowed on this young Prince, he would have made him a great Monarch.] Brantome aſcribes to Court-Favourites, and not to the Governor, the two ill qualities of Charles IX, viz. ſwearing and diſſimulation. He affirms, that Cipierre was "the moſt excellent Nobleman that ever was Governor to a King; upright and ſincere both in word and thought; neither a liar nor a diſſembler; and that he had given the King an excellent education, and was far from having taught him to diſſemble (1)." He adds, that Cipierre, among other things, taught King Charles the IXth to ſpeak eloquently. "Mr. de Cipierre, ſays he (2), in my opinion, ſpoke French, Spaniſh, and Italian better than any Gentleman or Soldier I ever knew. This reaſon prompted the King to conform himſelf to Cipierre's beautiful language, rather than to that, or as it was ſaid, of Du Perron, afterwards Marſhal de Retz, who certainly was maſter of a very graceful expreſſion." He ſays elſewhere, "that no man in the world could relate a ſtory ſo well as Cipierre; and that he could repreſent it with the fineſt grace, and the moſt noble expreſſion that could be uſed; ſo accompliſh'd was he in all things."

(1) Brantome, quoted by Le Laboureur, Additions aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 374.

(2) Cited ibid. tom. 2. pag. 260.

(3) Idem cited tom. 1. pag. 528.

[B] Notwithſtanding which Cipierre ſtill kept his employment.] The words above cited of Brantome prove this; but yet we muſt believe, that he loſt his place for ſome time, and was afterwards reſtored to it: for Languet affirms, that he was removed from the King; and that the interceſſion of the King of Navarre, to get him reſtored, was to no purpoſe. Languet took notice of theſe particulars not above two days after they had happened, in a Letter dated from Paris, the 1ſt of February 1562. The account he gives of the cauſe of this Governor's diſgrace is ſo curious and ſo little known, that I think myſelf obliged to relate it. The affair is this; Charles the IXth was ſo incenſed at Cipierre, for taking a Book of Divinity from him, that he declared he ſhould no longer be his Governor. The words employed by Languet a little before, make me conclude, that the Book taken from the young Monarch was heretical, in Cipierre's opinion; for this Author had juſt before ſaid, that it was imagined Charles IX and his two brothers would ſoon declare themſelves Proteſtants; &c. Regina cautius ſua adminiſtrat, nam accommodat ſe tempori, & oſtendit ſe nobis addictiorem quam antea. Rex & fratres videntur brevi tranſituri ad noſtras partes. Hæc ſi non fiunt matre impellente, fiunt ſaltem ipſa non nolente, nam ſi vellet poſſet hoc impedire. Aurelianenſis jam ſatis oſtendit ſe eſſe a noſtris partibus. Andegavenſis planè puer, nuper petiit a matre coram plurimis, ne deinceps daret ei miniſtros, qui non eſſent Lutherani. Hæc verba mater excepit riſu. Rex habuit gubernatorem nobilem virum (nomine Sipierre) natum in Burgundia, ex tenui fortuna ſua induſtria pervenit ad magnas opes, & fuit admodum charus Regi Henrico. Is cum nuper Regi librum theologicum eripuiſſet, ita offendit eum, ut diceret matri, ſe nolle amplius habere eum gubernatorem. Mater itaque eum removit à filii gubernatione, & ei ſuffecit Principem de la Roche ſur Yon. Cum Navarrus pro remoto apud reginam deprecaretur, illa reſpondit hoc non ſua, ſed filii voluntate eſſe factum, qui nolit eum habere gubernatorem. Hoc nudius tertius primum accidit. Referunt & alias cauſas, quare ſit remotus; nam fuit valde addictus Guiſiis (4). i. e. "Her Majeſty acts "with great caution, accommodates herſelf to the "times, and ſeems to favour our intereſt more than "formerly. The King and his brother ſeem inclined "to come ſoon over to us: if this ſhould not be by "the Queen's advice, it at leaſt is not againſt her conſent, ſince ſhe could prevent it if ſhe pleaſed. "The Duke of Orleans has already ſufficiently ſhewn "that he ſides with us. The Duke of Anjou, tho' a "child, lately entreated the Queen his mother, before "ſeveral perſons, that for the future he might have "none but Lutheran domeſticks, which made her Majeſty ſmile. The King's Governor was one Sipierre, "a perſon well deſcended, and born in Burgundy, "who by his induſtry and application raiſed himſelf "from an humble condition of life to an exalted ſtation and great riches. This Gentleman, having "not long ſince taken a book of Divinity out of the "King's hand, the latter was ſo much offended, that "he declared to her Majeſty, that this man ſhould no "longer be his Governor. The Queen thereupon removed him from his employment, and gave it to the "Prince de la Roche ſur Yon. The King of Navarre "deſiring the Queen to reſtore Cipierre, ſhe replied "what had been done was not by her direction, but "by that of her ſon, who abſolutely refuſed to have "him for his Governor. This circumſtance happened "but three days ago. His removal is alſo aſcribed "to other cauſes; for he was ſtrongly attached to the "Guiſes." If the reader conſults the paſſage in the Queen of Navarre's Memoirs, inſerted in her article (5), he will be of opinion that Languet was well acquainted with the tranſactions of the Court of France.

(4) Languet. Epiſt. 68. lib. 2. pag. 201, 202.

(5) In the note [B].

[C] The French Proteſtants were not ſatisfied with his conduct.] Le Laboureur gives only the following reaſon for it; viz. the order which Sipierre had received, to diſarm the people of Orleans (6); but the verſes he quotes, intimate, that this City met with a barbarous treatment; and that Cipierre's cruelty extended not only to the walls but alſo to the inhabitants. Thuanus, who in other reſpects beſtows encomiums on this Nobleman, ſays that he was devoted to the Guiſes (7). In a word, when the Proteſtants made their complaints, after the concluſion of the firſt peace, they took notice, not only of the cruel treatment of Burgundy by Tavannus, and of Guienne by Monluc, but likewiſe what Orleans had ſuffered from Cipierre (8).

(6) Additions à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 529.

(7) Thuan. lib. 26. pag. m. 520.

(8) Vraie Hiſt. des Troubles, folio 4 verſo, ad ann. 1563.

tained, from the Pope's Legate, leave for the ſoldiers to eat fleſh in Lent [D]. He married Louiſa de Halluin (i), by whom he had but one daughter, who was wife of Francis de la Magdeleine, Lord of Ragni, grandfather to the Ducheſs of Leſdiguieres (k). His father had married N.... de Saint Amour, Lady de Cipierre (l).

(i) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 374.

(l) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 374.

(k) She died in Paris the 2d of July 1656, according to Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des Officiers, pag. 243.

[D] He obtained from the Pope's Legate leave for the ſoldiers to eat fleſh in Lent.] The Cardinal of Ferrara, the Pope's Legate, was then in the camp with the Queen-Mother. He was very much ſhock'd at the requeſt which was made him, at the very time that they were engaged in war againſt Hereticks, the enemies of Lent: But after reflecting a little, he anſwered, that as to fleſh, no mention muſt be made of it, as being a deteſtable thing; and that he would permit them to eat only butter, cheeſe, or things made of milk (9). Here follows Cipierre's anſwer. "Sir, do not pretend "to direct our ſoldiers, in the ſame manner as you do "your Eccleſiaſticks; for there is a wide difference "between ſerving God, and ſerving Bellona: ſhall "I tell you the truth; it is not at this time, nor in "this army, compoſed of various kinds of people, "that you ought to raiſe ſuch ſcruples; for as to your "butter, cheeſe, &c, our French Soldiers will not eat "any of them, tho' your Italians and Spaniards are "well ſatisfied with ſuch food; they will have good "fleſh-meats in order to ſupport themſelves the bet-"ter. They will eat it in this, as well as any other "Country; and in private, how ſtrongly ſoever it "may be prohibited them. I therefore adviſe you "to better things; order them to eat fleſh; and "give them a diſpenſation, ſince, ſhould they give it "themſelves, it will leſſen your authority; but, on "the contrary, it will be increaſed, ſhould you in-"dulge them your permiſſion; and then all of them "to a man will cry, that excellent man the Legate has "given us a diſpenſation, which will ſound much bet-"ter (10)." The Legate, approved of ſo judicious an admonition, and accordingly granted Cipierre's requeſt (11). The paſſage which Brantome had related a little before, is ſo well adapted to confirm the judgment which all worthy, pious, and prudent perſons form of war, that I find myſelf under a neceſſity of tranſcribing it. Charles V, to excuſe ſuch brave and gallant men as himſelf, uſed to ſay, that he being couragious, ambitious, and a great Warrior, could not be religious and conſcientious. And here follows what the famous Marquis of Peſcayre, in the wars of Lombardy, obſerved once to the Legate, who was afterwards Pope Clement, with regard to the riotous exceſſes and diſorders committed by his ſoldiers. Mon Sennor Legado, no ay coſa mas difficultoſa a los que exercen la guerra, que con igual diſciplina ſervir en un miſmo tiempo à Mars y à Chriſto, porque el uſo de la guerra en eſta corruption de militia parece ſer todo contrario a la Juſtitia y Religion. That is, Moſt noble Legate; nothing is more difficult to thoſe who are devoted to a military life, than to ſerve at the ſame time with the like order and diſcipline Mars and Chriſt, becauſe the corruption which reigns in the practice of war, is quite repugnant to Juſtice and Religion (12). This is the judgment which thoſe who are acquainted with war form of it; and ſince unicuique in ſua arte credendum eſt, that is, "every one ought to be believed in his own profeſſion," we muſt conclude, that an army conducted according to the laws of the Chriſtian Religion, is a Platonic Idea, an Eutopia, and the Philoſopher's Stone, which will never be found.

(9) Brantome, Capit. Etrangers, tom. 1. pag. 132.

(10) Ibid. pag. 133.

(11) Ibid. pag. 134.

(12) Ibid. pag. 151.

CIPIERRE (RENATUS DE SAVOY, Lord of) was ſon to Claude of Savoy, Count de Tende, Governor and great Seneſchal of Provence, who married, for his ſecond wife, Frances de Foix, who brought him a ſon and a daughter, whom their mother educated in the Proteſtant Religion. Her huſband was very much ſuſpected to favour theſe principles, either on account of his Lady's profeſſing them openly, or becauſe he would not ſuffer thoſe under his government, who were branded with the name of Heretics, to be treated with the leaſt violence. This moderation occaſioned his own ſon, Count de Sommerive, whom his firſt Lady had brought him, to rebel againſt him; ſo that he was obliged to defend himſelf, ſword in hand, againſt the man to whom he had given birth. He was worſted, and forced to abandon his government to this unnatural ſon. Cipierre, who had exerted himſelf to the utmoſt to maintain the rights of his father, whoſe poſt of Colonel of Horſe was beſtowed upon him (a), at the ſame time that Cardet, his brother-in-law (b), commanded a regiment of foot, was unhappily aſſaſſinated by a band of mutineers in Frejus [A], anno 1568. He was returning from Nice, whither he had been to pay his compliments to the Duke of Savoy. The ruffians way-laid him in a wood; and not being able to prevent his reaching Frejus, with all his followers, they purſued him into it, ſounded the alarm, and beſieged him in the houſe where he had fled for refuge. The Conſuls endeavoured to ſave him, and prevailed ſo far with Marquis d'Arci, who headed this rebellious crew, as to agree to his going away, upon condition that Cipierre and his ſervants ſhould give up their arms. However, the mutineers returned a little after, and killed all the unfortunate ſervants, who were no longer able to defend themſelves. But the Marquis not ſeeing the dead body of Cipierre among the reſt, (the Conſuls having lodged him in a place of ſafety) pretended to be afraid that Cipierre's life was in danger, and proteſted that the only way to ſave it would be to deliver him into his, d'Arci's, hands; and this being done, they covered his body with wounds [B]. Tantum

(a) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 12. pag. 319.

(b) He was of the Houſe of Saluzzo, and married the daughter of Count de Tende, and of Frances de Foix. Beza, ibid. pag. 318.

[A] He was unhappily aſſaſſinated.... in Frejus.] Thus I tranſlate the Forum Julii of Thuanus. Daubigné (1) calls this place Forques (2), and aſſerts, that Arci who was Governor of it cauſed Count de Tende, with twenty nine others to be aſſaſſinated, and cried aloud, that he had orders for every thing he did. It is no eaſy matter to reconcile this Hiſtorian with Thuanus; for if Gaſpar de Villeneuve, Lord of Ars, or Arci, Arcii Regulus, had been Governor of the city where this maſſacre was perpetrated, as d'Aubigné pretends; would he have been obliged to employ artifice with reſpect to the Conſuls, to get this Count delivered up to him, after he had entered the city at the head of the mutineers, as Thuanus relates?

(1) Tom. 1. liv. 5. chap. 1. pag. 370.

(2) He ſhould have ſaid Frejus, as Mezerai does, Abregé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 110.

[B] They covered his body with wounds.] Thuanus aſcribes this cowardly aſſaſſination to the mutiny of the rabble (3). Brantome, who had but a confuſed notion of this infamous butchery charges one man only with it. He was killed ſays he (4), whilſt the peace was ſubſiſting, in a city of Provence, by a wretch whom I have ſeen an hundred times carry lemons every year to the Queen-Mother; I have forgot both his name, and that of the city where this maſſacre happened. The Huguenots, adds he, of Provence repoſed great confidence in him; and had he lived, he would have occaſioned great diſturbances; for he was valiant and a very great Lord in this country. He had juſt before obſerved, that he was a brave Gentleman; that he was a Huguenot; and that Count de Sommerive, his half-brothers, and himſelf, uſed to be often at variance; and nevertheleſs that they ſometimes behaved courteouſly to one another.

(3) Ab irruente multitudine innumeris pugionum ictibus confoditur, deboneſtato etiam poſt mortem repetitis vulneribus cadavere. Thuanus, lib. 44. pag. 895. col. 1.

(4) Brantome, Diſcours du Connétable de Montmorenci.

tum religio potuit ſuadere malorum! i. e. "Such horrid acts Religion could perſuade." It was not doubted but that the Court, and Count de Sommerive had a hand in this wicked attempt, and that Cipierre had been treated thus inhumanly, out of hatred to the Proteſtant Religion. This gave great uneaſineſs to the Prince of Conde, the Admiral, and their whole party (c).

(c) Ex Thuano, lib. 44. ad ann. 1568.

CLARKE (SAMUEL) was born in the City of Norwich October the 11th 1675. His father was Edward Clarke Eſq; Alderman of that City, and one of the Repreſentatives of it in Parliament for ſeveral years. His mother was Hannah, the daughter of Mr. Samuel Parmenter, Merchant, of the ſame City. He was educated in the Free-School at Norwich under the Reverend Mr. Burton. In the year 1691 he was removed to Caius-College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and placed under the tuition of Mr. Ellis, afterwards Sir John Ellis (a). Though the Philoſophy of Des Cartes was at that time the eſtabliſhed Philoſophy of the Univerſity, and Mr. Clarke's Tutor extremely devoted to that ſyſtem, yet our Author ſoon made himſelf maſter of the chief parts of Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy [A], and in order to his firſt degree performed a public exerciſe in the ſchools upon a queſtion taken from thence, which ſurprized the whole audience both for the accuracy of knowledge, and clearneſs of expreſſion, which appeared through the whole (b). In 1697 he publiſhed a Latin Tranſlation of Monſieur Rohault's Phyſics, with large Annotations [B]. Immediately after this he turned his thoughts to Divinity, which he propoſed to make the peculiar ſtudy and profeſſion of his life; for the proſecution of which deſign he ſoon met with a very favourable opportunity (c), being in the end of 1698, or beginning of 1699 (d), appointed Chaplain to Dr. John Moore, then Lord Biſhop of Norwich, who treated him with all the marks of the higheſt friendſhip and eſteem [C]. His firſt ſtudies, in order to qualify himſelf for the office which he propoſed to undertake, were the Old and New Teſtament in the Original Languages, and the primitive Chriſtian Writers [D]; and the reſult of his application appeared ſo early as the year 1699 in two Treatiſes, one intitled, Three Practical Eſſays on (a) Preface to the 1ſt volume of Dr. Clarke's Sermons, giving ſome Account of the Life, Writings, and Character of the Author, by Benjamin, Lord Biſhop of Salisbury, pag. 1, 2. edit. London 1730, in 8vo.

(b) Ibid. pag. 3, 4.

(c) Ibid. pag. 5, 6.

(d) Hiſtorical Memoirs of the Life of Dr. Samuel Clarke; being a Supplement to Dr. Sykes's and Biſhop Hoadly's Accounts; including Memoirs of ſeveral of Dr. Clarke's Friends. By William Whiſton, M. A. ſometime Profeſſor of the Mathematicks in the Univerſity of Cambridge, pag. 9. edit. London 1730, in 8vo.

[A] Our Author ſoon made himſelf maſter of the chief parts of Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy.] The Biſhop of Saliſbury, now of Wincheſter, obſerves (1), that the great Sir Iſaac had indeed then publiſhed his Principia; but that this book was but for the few, both the manner and matter of it placing it out of the reach of the generality even of learned readers, and ſtrong prejudice, in favour of what had been received, working againſt it. "But neither the diffi- "culty of the taſk, nor the reſpect Mr. Clarke paid "to the Director of his Studies, nor the warmth and "prejudice of all around him, had any effect upon his "mind. Not at all ſatisfied therefore with Hypotheſes "arbitrarily adapted to appearances, he ſet himſelf "immediately to the ſtudy of what was real and ſub- "ſtantial. And in this ſtudy he made ſuch uncommon "advances, that he was preſently maſter of the chief "parts of the Newtonian Philoſophy." Mr. Whiſton likewiſe informs us (2), that from a converſation, which he had with our Author at Norwich about the year 1697, he was greatly ſurprized, that ſo young a man as Mr. Clarke then was, not much, ſays he, above twenty two years of age, ſhould know ſo much of thoſe ſublime diſcoveries, which were then almoſt a ſecret to all, but a few particular Mathematicians. Nor did I, continues he, remember above one or two at the moſt, whom I had then met with, that ſeemed to know ſo much of that Philoſophy, as Mr. Clarke.

(1) Preface to the 1ſt volume of Dr. Clarke's Sermons, pag. 3. edit. London 1730, in 8vo.

(2) Hiſtorical Memoirs of the Life of Dr. Samuel Clarke, pag. 7. edit. London 1730, in 8vo.

[B] In 1697 he publiſhed a Latin Tranſlation of Monſr. Rohault's Phyſics, with large Annotations.] The Syſtem of Natural Philoſophy then generally taught in the Univerſity was that written by Monſr. Rohault, entirely founded on the Carteſian Principles, and very ill tranſlated into Latin. Mr. Clarke juſtly thought, that Philoſophical notions might be expreſſed in pure Latin. But his aim was much higher than the making a better Tranſlation of it. He reſolved to add to it ſuch Notes, as might lead the young Students inſenſibly and by degrees to other and truer notions, than what could be found there. And this certainly, ſays the Biſhop of Saliſbury (3), was a more prudent method of introducing truth unknown before, than to attempt to throw aſide this Treatiſe entirely, and write a new one inſtead of it. The ſucceſs anſwered exceedingly well to his hopes; and he may juſtly be ſtiled a great Benefactor to the Univerſity in this attempt. For by this means, the true Philoſophy has without any noiſe prevailed, and to this day his Tranſlation of Rohault is generally ſpeaking the ſtanding text for Lectures, and his Notes the firſt direction to thoſe, who are willing to receive the reality and truth of things in the place of invention and romance. And thus before he was much above twenty years old, he furniſhed the Students with a Syſtem of Knowledge, which has been ever ſince, and ſtill continues to be, a public benefit to all, who have the happineſs of a liberal and learned education in that Univerſity. Mr. Whiſton (4) tells us, that it was his tutor, who put him upon this Tranſlation; which was firſt printed in 1697 in 8vo. There have been already four editions of it, in every one of which improvements have been made eſpecially in the laſt in 8vo 1718, which has the following title: Jacobi Rohaulti Phyſica. Latinè vertit, recenſuit, & uberioribus jam Annotationibus ex illuſtriſſimi Iſaaci Newtoni Philoſophiâ maximam partem hauſtis, amplificavit & ornavit S. Clarke, S. T. P. Accedunt etiam in hac quartâ editione novæ aliquot tabulæ æri inciſæ, & Annotationes multum ſunt auctæ. His Notes were likewiſe tranſlated into Engliſh by his brother John Clarke D. D. Dean of Sarum, in his Tranſlation of Rohault, publiſhed at London in two volumes in 8vo under this title; Rohault's Syſtem of Natural Philoſophy; illuſtrated with Dr. Samuel Clarke's Notes taken moſtly out of Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy; with Additions. Done into Engliſh by John Clarke, D. D.

(3) Ubi ſupra, pag. 4, 5.

(4) Ubi ſupra, pag. 5.

[C] Appointed Chaplain to Dr. John Moore, then Lord Biſhop of Norwich, who treated him with all the marks of the higheſt friendſhip and eſteem.] He received our Author into his familiarity and friendſhip to ſuch a remarkable degree, that he lived for twelve years in that ſtation, with all the decent freedom of a brother and an equal rather than an inferior. There was no mark of confidence, as well as eſteem, which that Prelate did not ſhew him as long as he lived; and at his death the higheſt mark of confidence he could give him was, the leaving all the concerns of his family ſolely in his hands, a truſt, which he executed with the moſt faithful exactneſs, and to the entire ſatisfaction of every perſon concerned (5).

(5) Biſhop of Salisbury, ubi ſupra, pag. 6, 7.

[D] His firſt ſtudies . . . were the Old and New Teſtament in the Original Languages, and the primitive Chriſtian Writers.] The Old Teſtament he then read with that exactneſs of judgment, which very few have ſhewn after a much longer application, and which furniſhed him with many obſervations written at that time with his own hand in the margin, relating to the miſtakes of the common Tranſlation of it. The New Teſtament he read with a true critical accuracy; and with great care purſued his deſign farther thro' the Writers of the earlieſt Ages, in order to diſcover, if poſſible, the genuine ſentiments and cuſtoms of antiquity, as well as to ſupport the authority and true interpretation of the ſacred Books (6).

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 7.

on Baptiſm, Confirmation, and Repentance [E], and the other intitled, Some Reflexions on that part of a book called, Amyntor, which relates to the Writings of the Primitive Fathers, and the Canon of the New Teſtament [F]. In 1701 was publiſhed his Paraphraſe upon the Goſpel of St. Matthew; which was followed in 1702 by the Paraphraſes upon the Goſpel of St. Mark, and St. Luke, and ſoon after by a third volume upon St. John. They were afterwards reprinted together in two volumes in 8vo, and are univerſally admired [G], ſo that a fourth edition of them has been publiſhed. He had actually begun a Paraphraſe upon the Acts of the Apoſtles immediately after the others were publiſhed; and had certainly propoſed to go through all the remaining books; but ſomething accidental interrupted the execution; "and it is now, ſays the Biſhop of Saliſbury (e), only "to be lamented that any thing firſt diverted him from it; or that he did not afterwards "prevail upon himſelf to reſume and compleat ſo excellent a work, which his friends "often preſſed upon him, and to which he would ſometimes anſwer, that it was made leſs "neceſſary by the labours of ſeveral worthy and learned perſons, ſince the appearance "of his work upon the Four Goſpels." Biſhop Moore, his Patron, having formed a juſt notion of Mr. Clarke's great abilities, reſolved to uſe all his intereſt to fix him in a more conſpicuous ſtation in the Metropolis of the Kingdom; but in the mean while gave him the Rectory of Drayton near Norwich, and procured for him a pariſh in that City, both together of very inconſiderable value; and theſe he ſerved himſelf in the ſeaſon, when the Biſhop reſided at Norwich (f). His preaching at firſt was without notes, and ſo continued till he was Rector of St. James's [H]. In the years 1704 and 1705 he preached, and ſoon after publiſhed his ſixteen Sermons at Mr. Boyle's Lecture [I], containing (e) Ubi ſupra, pag. 18.

(f) Idem, pag. 10, 11.

[E] His Three Practical Eſſays &c.] The whole Title is, The Practical Eſſays on Baptiſm, Confirmation, and Repentance; containing full Inſtructions for a holy life, with earneſt Exhortations, eſpecially to young perſons. Drawn from the conſideration of the ſeverity of the diſcipline of the Primitive Church. There have been five Editions of this printed. The Biſhop of Saliſbury tells us (7), that he mentions this, and our Author's Reflections on Toland's Amyntor, not to put them upon a level with his other performances; but only as having "upon them the plain marks of a Chriſtian "frame of mind, and as proofs of his knowledge in the "writings of thoſe early Ages, even at his firſt ſetting "out into the World." Mr. Whiſton (8) eſteems the three practical Eſſays the moſt ſerious Treatiſe, that Mr. Clarke ever wrote, and one, that with a little correction will be ſtill very uſeful in all Chriſtian families. And I venture, continues he, to ſay, the judicious ſagacity, as well as Chriſtian temper of Mr. Clarke in his youth, are moſt eminently ſhewn therein.

(7) Pag. 8.

(8) Ubi ſupra, pag. 10.

[F] The other intitled, Some Reflexions on that part of a Book called Amyntor, which relates &c.] This Tract was publiſhed in 1699 without a name; and ſince added to Dr. Clarke's Letter to Mr. Dodwell, &c.

[G] They . . . are univerſally admired.] Dr. Sykes in his Elogium upon our Author (9) obſerves, that the ſeveral Editions of them ſhew plainly how well the world has read them; and that every impartial reader ſees with what truth our Author ſaid, that he had "endeavoured to expreſs the full ſenſe of the Evan-"geliſt in the plaineſt words, and to continue the ſenſe "without interruption, by the cleareſt tranſitions he "could;" and that "through the whole he had ſin-"cerely endeavoured to repreſent the doctrine of our "Saviour in its original ſimplicity without reſpect to "any controverſies in Religion." The ſame Writer remarks, that if he had finiſhed the Epiſtles in the ſame manner as he has done the Goſpels, (which he had engaged to do, if his life had been continued,) we had had the ſenſe of the New Teſtament in the greateſt plainneſs and perſpicuity, the hard places of Scripture moſt probably made eaſy, and what appears to many to be inconcluſive rambling, would have been ſhewn to be calm, conſiſtent reaſoning. The Biſhop of Saliſbury (10) tells us, that our Author had chiefly in his eye the underſtanding the Phraſeology of the Holy Scriptures, and the explaining the meaning of them ſo, as to make them uſeful to all, who are concerned in them; and that his Paraphraſes are written with a manly plainneſs and perſpicuity, and accompanied with a very few ſhort Notes, where any critical explication was neceſſary. Of how great benefit, continues the Biſhop, theſe have been, and always will be to Engliſh readers, who have ſenſe and goodneſs enough to be pleaſed with a juſt repreſentation of the true meaning of what is recorded in the Goſpel, I need not ſay; experience has already ſaid enough of the uſefulneſs of ſuch a manner of interpretation from ſo maſterly an hand.

(9) Publiſhed in The Preſent State of the Republick of Letters, for July 1729, Art. 4. pag. 61, 62.

(10) Ubi ſupra, pag. 8, 9.

[H] His preaching at firſt was without Notes, and ſo continued till he was Rector of St. James's.] He was peculiarly happy in this method, not by truſting to his memory entirely, and ſpeaking a Sermon compoſed before, in which ſome have excelled; nor by heating himſelf gradually into any ſort of paſſion, to which others have owed all their fluency of language; but by a certain ſtrength and coolneſs of head, which could not eaſily be ſurprized or deceived, and a certain faculty of expreſſion, which was hardly ever at a loſs for plain and proper words (11).

(11) Idem, ibid. pag. 11.

[I] In the years 1704 and 1705 he preached and ſoon after publiſhed his ſixteen Sermons at Mr. Boyle's Lecture.] They were printeſt in two diſtinct Volumes, the former in 1705, and the latter in 1706. Since that they have been printed together in one volume, and have paſſed through ſeveral editions. In the 4th and 5th editions were added ſeveral Letters to Dr. Clarke from a Gentleman in Glouceſterſhire †, relating to the firſt part of this Book, with the Doctor's Anſwers. In the 6th and 7th Editions were added, A Diſcourſe concerning the Connection of the Prophecies in the Old Teſtament, and the Application of them to Chriſt, and an Anſwer to a ſeventh Letter concerning the Argument a priori. Dr. George Smalridge, afterwards Biſhop of Briſtol, ſaid of one or both theſe volumes, that it was the beſt book on thoſe ſubjects, that had been written in any language (12). Dr. Sykes in the Elogium quoted above has given us an account of the ſucceſs of our Author in his Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God, and of the Obligations of Natural and Revealed Religion; and obſerves (13), that the Chriſtian World has all agreed in the Unity of the ſupreme Cauſe; but that none have been very ſucceſsful in the proof, that there could be but one Cauſe of the univerſe. The Heathens acknowledged one ſupreme God; nor doth it appear, that any of the more underſtanding men amongſt them aſſerted a multitude of eternal, independent, underived Gods. They worſhipped indeed a multitude of inferior, ſubordinate Deities; and they erected ſtatues and images to them; and even theſe ſymbols were often, abuſively, called Gods. But yet one Mind, one ſupreme Cauſe of all things, was the general notion of all their Philoſophers and men of learning. Revelation has fully confirmed this notion, and has made it inconteſtable by Jews and Chriſtians. But notwithſtanding all that are agreed in this, that there is but one God, one ſupreme Cauſe of all things; yet it has been found a difficulty to prove, that there may not be many finite and independent Cauſes of the ſeveral Syſtems, or Parts of Syſtems in the Univerſe. It is certain, that a finite cauſe is ſufficient to produce a finite effect. The Phænomena of Nature, ſays Dr. Clarke, which come within the reach

† Dr. Joſeph Butler, Author of Fifteen Sermons preached at the Rolls Chapel, the ſecond edition of which was printed at London 1729 in 8vo.

(12) Whiſton, pag. 11.

(13) Pag. 56, & ſeq.

taining Diſcourſes concerning the Being and Attributes of God, the Obligations of Natural Religion, and the Truth and Certainty of the Chriſtian Revelation. It was about this reach of our obſervation, prove indeed demonſtrably, that there is a ſupreme Author and Director of that Nature, or of thoſe Phænomena, whereof we have any knowledge. But that this Supreme Author and Governor of this nature, or of theſe Phænomena, is likewiſe the Supreme Author and Governor of univerſal Nature, cannot be proved by us from our partial and imperfect knowledge of a few Phænomena, in that ſmall part of the univerſe, which comes within the reach of our ſenſes. To find out a medium then, whereby to prove one only, infinite, immenſe Author and Governor of the Univerſe,

(14) Idem, ibid. pag. 57. was an attempt worthy, continues Dr. Sykes (14), the genius, and worthy the pains of the moſt ſagacious man on earth. All agreed that the Unity of God is a principle of Natural Religion, as well as Revealed; and yet to be unable to prove ſuch a leading principle, was in effect to give up to its adverſaries all that depended upon it. The Unity of God is juſtly eſteemed the foundation of all Morality; becauſe without this, men may be involved in abſurdities; and with this, no inconſiſtency appears in the whole Moral Syſtem. If this principle be admitted, men may reaſon ſolidly, and proceed in direct conſequences from juſt premiſes, till they have proved the neceſſity of every duty, and have demonſtrated the obligation of virtue in its fulleſt extent. "Now Dr. Clarke ſeeing the inſufficiency of the arguments drawn a poſteriori to prove this point, attempted, and has ſucceeded in the argument a priori; and has demonſtrated that there is and can be but one Author and Governor of the Univerſe. If ever man was bleſſed with ſagacity, ſtrength of parts, clearneſs of reaſoning upon the moſt abſtract metaphyſical ſubjects, it was this man, who was capable of treating upon ſuch ſublime ſubjects, ſo as to to make them intelligible by men of moderate underſtandings (15)." When he had demonſtrated the Being and Unity of God, and had cleared up the ſubject of Liberty, in oppoſition to the doctrine of Neceſſity and Fate, his next view was to give us the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion. The unalterable obligations of the one, and the truth of the other, were ſubjects of the greateſt importance in a ſceptical and irreligious Age; and the Doctor had that happineſs, that he could not treat upon any ſubject, to which he did not bring new light. He had clear and diſtinct ideas in his own mind, and the cleareſt manner of expreſſion. And being deſirous that things ſhould appear what they really are, and not being warp'd by the hopes of pleaſing others, or by fame, or riches, or power, he purſued the way that truth led him. He conſidered and proved the eternal and neceſſary relations of things to one another. And ſince men are made capable of perceiving theſe relations, it follows that it is the will of God that they ſhould act according to them. They are under obligations as reaſonable creatures, ſo to act; and a moral Governor of the Univerſe cannot be careleſs or indifferent, whether men follow theſe obligations or not (16). His next labour was to prove the Truth of Chriſtianity, and to vindicate it from the objections, which have been made, not only againſt the application of the Prophecies to Chriſt, but againſt the Prophecies themſelves. "The things, "ſays Dr. Sykes (17), which the generality of Chriſtiſtians have ſaid upon theſe topics, have certainly "been very precarious and inconcluſive. It required "therefore the abilities of the exacteſt critic, and the "cleareſt reaſoner, to make good the connection of "the Prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and to ſhew "how they were applicable to Jeſus of Nazareth." Our Author therefore undertook to ſhew, that as a promiſe appeared in the Old Teſtament, that truth and virtue ſhould finally prevail over the ſpirit of error and wickedneſs: ſo there are direct predictions, that all the great promiſes of God ſhould receive their final accompliſhment by means of a particular perſon anointed by God for that purpoſe. And that when "Jeſus had proved "himſelf to be ſent of God, by the works, which "he did in his Father's name, and it appeared, that "there was wanting in him no circumſtance, no ſine "qua non, no character, appropriated by any of the "antient Prophets to the promiſed Meſſiah; he then "had a clear right to apply to himſelf all the Pro"phecies, which ſpoke of the Meſſiah, or pointed at "him." Dr. Sykes obſerves (18), that this method of proving the truth of Chriſtianity is certainly clear and rational; and that it is certain, that the places of Scripture, from whence the proofs of Chriſtianity are to be collected, are here to be found together. The only points therefore are, Whether Jeſus had not a right to appropriate to himſelf certain prophecies in the manner he did? And whether there be not ſufficient motives to believe that he did it juſtly? And laſtly, whether the exact coincidence of things, in ſo many of the inſtances the Doctor produced, does not ſhew very clearly, that neither enthuſiaſm nor chance can poſſibly account for ſuch an agreement (19)? The Biſhop of Saliſbury likewiſe in his Account of the Sermons about the Being and Attributes of God tells us (20), that he exceeded the expectations even of thoſe, who knew him enough to expect great things from him, and laid the foundations of true Religion too deep and ſtrong to be ſhaken either by the ſuperſtition of ſome, or the infidelity of others. That in thoſe diſcourſes "he began "with ſelf-evident propoſitions. From them he ad"vanced to ſuch as received their proof from the for"mer. In theſe he took no ſtep till he had ſecured "the way before him. Throughout the whole no "word is uſed, but what is intelligible to all, who "are at all verſed in ſuch ſubjects, and what expreſſes "the clear idea in the mind of him, who makes uſe of "it; and all is one regular building, erected upon "an unmoveable foundation, and riſing up from one "ſtage to another with equal ſtrength and digni"ty (21)." In his Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion, as the Biſhop obſerves (22), he laid the foundations of Morality deep, in the mutual relations of things and perſons, one to another; in the unalterable fitneſs of ſome actions, and the unfitneſs of others; and in the will of the great Creator of all things, evident from his making man capable of ſeeing theſe relations, and this fitneſs; of judging concerning them; and of acting agreeably to that judgment. He then proceeded to demonſtrate the Chriſtian Religion to be worthy of God, from the internal evidence, taken from the perfect agreeableneſs of its main deſign to the light of nature, and to all the moral obligations of eternal reaſon; without which agreeableneſs all the arguments in the world could never conclude in its favour; and after this to prove it to be actually recommended to the world by God, from all the external evidence of Prophecy going before it, and miraculous works performed expreſly for the honour and propagation of it. All which he executed with ſuch maſterly ſenſe and perſpicuity of expreſſion, as recommended both the Preacher and the ſubject to all who heard him (23). The Biſhop concludes his Account of theſe Sermons with remarking (24), that "every Chriſtian "in this Country, in which they firſt ſaw the light, "ought to eſteem them as his Treaſure, as they con"tain the true ſtrength not only of Natural, but of Re"vealed Religion; which, if ever it be removed "from ſuch a foundation, or ſeparated from ſuch an "alliance with reaſon and uncorrupted nature, will "not long ſubſiſt in the belief of underſtanding perſons "after ſuch a ſeparation. And therefore, What God "hath joined together, let no man put aſunder." Mr. Edmund Law, in his Notes upon Archbiſhop King's Eſſay on the Origin of Evil tranſlated from the Latin, having animadverted upon our Author's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God, there was publiſhed at London in May 1732 in 8vo, A Defence of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God. Wherein is particularly conſidered the Nature of Space, Duration, and neceſſary Exiſtence. Being an Anſwer to a late Book intitled, A Tranſlation of Dr. King's Origin of Evil, and ſome other Objections. Together with a Compendium of a Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God. Mr. Law having ſubjoined a Poſtſcript to the ſecond Edition of this Tranſlation of Archbiſhop King's Eſſay on the Origin of Evil, it occaſioned in September the ſame year, A ſecond Defence of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God. In anſwer to a Poſtſcript publiſhed in the ſecond Edition of Mr. Law's Tranſlation of Dr. King's Origin of Evil. By the Author of the firſt Defence. In anſwer to this and the former Defence of Dr. Clarke

(15) Idem, ibid. pag. 58.

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. 58, 59.

(17) Pag. 59.

(18) Pag. 60.

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) Preface, pag. 12.

(21) Idem, ibid. pag. 13.

(22) Ibid. pag. 14.

(23) Idem, ibid. pag. 14, 15.

(24) Ibid. pag. 15.

this time, or not much later, that Mr. Whiſton diſcovered that our Author had been looking into the primitive writers, and began to ſuſpect that the Athanaſian Doctrine of the Trinity was not the Doctrine of the early ages (g) [K]. In 1706 he publiſhed his Letter to Mr. Dodwell concerning the Immortality of the Soul, and this was ſoon followed by four Defences of it in four ſeveral Letters to the Author of the Remarks on that Letter [L]; which were all printed together in a fifth edition, and the Anſwer to Toland's Amyntor added to them. The ſame year he tranſlated Sir Iſaac Newton's Optics into elegant Latin, which ſo highly pleaſed that great man, that he gave him five hundred pounds, or one hundred pounds for each of his children (b). This Tranſlation was printed at London 1706 in 4to, and reprinted in 1719 in 8vo. In 1706 Biſhop Moore procured him by his intereſt the Rectory of St. Bennet's Paul's-Wharf (i). Not long after the Biſhop brought him to Court, and procured him to be made one of the Chaplains in ordinary to Queen Anne; to whoſe greater favour his own merits recommended him ſo ſoon and ſo powerfully, that upon the vacancy of St. James's Weſtminſter, ſhe immediately conſented to the requeſt of the Biſhop, and preſented him to that Rectory (k) [M]. Upon his advancement to this ſtation he took in 1709 his Degree of Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where the public exerciſe, which he performed, was prodigiouſly (g) Whiſton's Hiſtorical Memoirs, pag. 12.

(b) Idem, ibid. pag. 13.

(i) Biſhop of Salisbury's Preface, pag. 16.

(k) Idem, ibid. pag. 18, 19.

there was publiſhed in November the ſame year a pamphlet, intitled, Dr. Clarke's Notion of Space examined. In Vindication of the Tranſlation of Archbiſhop King's Origin of Evil. Being an Anſwer to two late Pamphlets, intitled, the one, A Defence of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration &c. and the other, A ſecond Defence, &c. In January 1734 Mr. John Jackſon publiſhed at London in 8vo a Pamphlet, entitled, The Exiſtence and Unity of God proved from his Nature and Attributes. Being a Vindication of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God. In June following there appeared two Pamphlets, printed at Cambridge, one intitled, An Enquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time, Immenſity, and Eternity, as alſo the Self-Exiſtence, neceſſary Exiſtence, and Unity of the Divine Nature. By Edmund Law, M. A. the other intitled, A further Examination of Dr. Clarke's Notion of Space. By Joſeph Clarke, M. A. Mr. John Clarke, the Author of the two Defences of Dr. S. Clarke's Demonſtration, having publiſhed a third Defence of it, Mr. Joſeph Clarke publiſhed in December 1734 a Further Examination of Dr. Clarke's Notions of Space, with ſome Conſiderations on the Poſſibility of Eternal Creation. In Reply to Mr. John Clarke's Third Defence of Dr. Samuel Clarke's Demonſtration, &c. To which are added ſome Remarks on Mr. Jackſon's Exceptions to Dr. Clarke's Notions of Space examined in his Exiſtence and Unity, &c. By Joſeph Clarke, M. A. Fellow of Magdalen-College Cambridge.

[K] That our Author . . . . began to ſuſpect, that the Athanaſian Doctrine of the Trinity was not the Doctrine of the early ages.] Mr. Whiſton, who informs us of this particular (25), adds theſe words: Whether Mr. Newton (26) had given Mr. Clarke yet any intimations of that nature, for he knew it long before this time; or whether it aroſe from ſome enquiries of his own, I do not directly know; tho' I incline to the latter. This only I remember to have heard him ſay, that he never read the Athanaſian Creed in his Pariſh at or near Norwich, but once, and that was only by miſtake, at a time when it was not appointed by the rubrick.

(25) Hiſtorical Memoirs, pag. 12, 13.

(26) Afterwards Sir Iſaac Newton.

[L] In 1706 he publiſhed his Letter to Mr. Dodwell concerning the Immortality of the Soul, and this was ſoon followed by four Defences of it in four ſeveral Letters to the Author of the Remarks on that Letter.] Mr. Henry Dodwell had publiſhed at London in 1706 An Epiſtolary Diſcourſe proving from the Scriptures and the firſt Fathers, that the ſoul is a principle naturally mortal, but immortalized actually by the pleaſure of God to puniſhment or to reward by its union with the divine baptiſmal ſpirit. Wherein is proved that none have the power of giving this divine immortalizing Spirit ſince the Apoſtles but only the Biſhops. In anſwer to this our Author publiſhed at London 1706 in 8vo, A Letter to Mr. Dodwell, wherein all the arguments in his Epiſtolary Diſcourſe againſt the Immortality of the Soul are particularly anſwered, and the judgment of the Fathers concerning that matter truly repreſented. The Biſhop of Saliſbury obſerves (27), that in this Letter he anſwered Mr. Dodwell "in ſo excellent a manner, both with "regard to the Philoſophical part, and to the opi- "nions of ſome of the primitive Writers, upon whom "theſe Doctrines were fixed, that it gave univerſal ſa- "tisfaction." Mr. Anthony Collins having taken this opportunity of coming into this controverſy, as a ſecond to Mr. Dodwell, went much farther into the Philoſophy of the diſpute, and indeed ſeemed to produce all that could plauſibly be ſaid againſt the Immateriality of the Soul, as well as the liberty of human actions. This enlarged the ſcene of the diſpute; into which our Author entered, and wrote with ſuch a ſpirit of clearneſs and demonſtration, as at once ſhewed him greatly ſuperior to his adverſaries in Metaphyſical and Phyſical Knowledge, and made every intelligent Reader rejoice that ſuch an incident had happened to provoke and extort from him that plenty of ſtrong reaſoning and perſpicuity of expreſſion, which were indeed very much wanted upon this intricate and obſcure ſubject. And I am perſuaded, continues the Biſhop (28), that as what he has writ in this controverſy, comprehends the little that the Antients had ſaid well, and adds ſtill more evidence than ever clearly appeared before, and all in words that have a meaning to them; it will remain the ſtandard of good ſenſe on that ſide of the queſtion, on which he ſpent ſo many of his thoughts, as upon one of his favourite-points. Mr. Henry Grove tells us (29), that the argument from the Diviſibility of Matter in proof of the Immateriality of the Soul, "tho' an old "one, ... hath yet of late years been managed to "greater advantage than ever; particularly by the "learned Dr. Clarke in his admirable Letters, which "for ſtrength of reaſoning and fair controverſy have "not been often equalled."

(27) Preface, pag. 17.

(28) Ibid. pag. 18.

(29) Preface to his Eſſay towards a Demonſtration of the Soul's Immateriality, pag. 5. edit. London 1718, in 8vo.

[M] Preſented him to that Rectory.] He continued in that Rectory above twenty years; "and had as Dr. "Sykes informs us (30) ſuch an univerſal eſteem and "reputation in his pariſh, that whatever he ſaid or "propoſed to the Gentlemen of the veſtry, was not "only never oppoſed, or barely ſubmitted to, but in- "ſtantly approved." As ſoon as he was ſettled here, he left off his former way of preaching without notes, and made it one of his chief ſtudies to compoſe and write down as accurate Sermons as he could; not, ſays the Biſhop of Saliſbury (31), becauſe he could not proceed in the former method (32), with a copiouſneſs of good ſenſe and clear expreſſion, which the nobleſt audience might with pleaſure have attended to; but chiefly becauſe from that time it became his reſolution to prepare his Sermons in ſuch a manner, that they might hereafter be as uſeful from the preſs, as he wiſhed them then to be from the pulpit. From the time of his taking poſſeſſion of this pariſh, his reſidence was where his heart and his employment were, in the Rectory-houſe, in the midſt of his Pariſhioners, ſeldom leaving the place at all, unleſs for a few weeks in the long vacation, when the town was empty, which he ſpent in viſiting his friends at Norwich and other places; and towards the latter part of his life, in doing his duty as maſter of Wigſton's Hoſpital at Leiceſter. During the time of his being Rector of St. James's, beſides the regular performance of all the other offices of his profeſſion, he followed the cuſtom of his predeceſſors in reading lectures upon the Church-Catechiſm every Thurſday morning for ſome months in the year. In the latter part of his time he reviſed theſe with great care, and left them under the title of an Expoſition upon that Catechiſm completely prepared for the preſs (33).

(30) Ubi ſupra, pag. 63.

(31) Preface, pag. 19, 20.

(32) See Note [H].

(33) Biſhop of Salisbury, idem, ibid. pag. 26, 27.

prodigiously applauded [N]. The same year he revised Mr. Whiston's Translation of the Apostolical Constitutions into English (l). In 1712 he published a beautiful and pompous edition of Cæsar's Commentaries [O], dedicated to the Duke of Marlborough; and the same year appeared his Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity [P], which gave occasion to a great number of books written upon that subject by himself as well as others [Q], and (l) Whiston, Historical Memoirs, pag. 23, 24.

[N] The public exercise which he performed, was prodigiously applauded.] The two questions which he maintained, were, that all Religion supposes the freedom of human actions, and that the Christian Religion contains nothing contrary to Reason (33). I. Nullum Fidei Christianæ Dogma in S. Scripturis traditum, est rectæ rationi dissentaneum. II. Sine Actionum Humanarum libertate nulla potest esse Religio (34). The Royal Professor of Divinity, Dr. James, exerted himself beyond his common practice. He went first into a long examination of Dr. Clarke's Thesis, sifting every part of it with the strictest nicety; and afterwards pressed him with all the force of syllogism in its various forms thro' the course of the disputation. To the former Dr. Clarke made an extempore Reply in a continued discourse for near half an hour; in which, without any hesitation either for thought or language, he took off the force of all that the Professor had said, in such a manner, that many of the auditors declared themselves astonished, and owned, that if they had not been within sight of him, they should have supposed him to have read every word of this Reply out of a paper. After this thro' the course of the syllogistical disputation, he guarded so well against the arts, which the Professor was master of in perfection; he replied so readily to the greatest difficulties, that such an objector could propose, and pressed upon the Professor so close and so hard with his Answers, clear and intelligible to all, that perhaps never was such a conflict heard in these schools, never such a disputation kept up for so long a time with such spirit, nor ever any, which ended with greater, if equal honour to the Respondent (35). The Professor himself, who was a man of humour as well as learning, said to him aloud towards the end of the disputation, Profecto, me probè exacuisti (36), or exercuisti, as Mr. Whiston thinks it ought to be read (37), and he declared, that now he might well retire and leave the chair, since one so able to fill it appeared among them (38). The learned members of the University, who had with pleasure attended to every part of the whole Disputation, went away discoursing to one another of the unusual entertainment they had had in the schools; not a little pleased with such an ornament to their own University, and admiring particularly, that after an absence of so many years, and after a long course of business of quite another nature, they heard him now handling the subjects he undertook in such a masterly manner, as if this sort of academical exercise had been his constant employment; and with such fluency and purity of expression, as if he had been accustomed, thro' the whole time, to no other language in conversation but Latin (39).

(33) Whiston, ubi supra, pag. 18.

(34) Idem, pag. 178.

(35) Bishop of Salisbury, Preface, pag. 22, 23.

(36) Idem, ibid. pag. 22.

(37) Hist. Memoirs, pag. 158.

(38) Ibid.

(39) Bishop of Salisbury, pag. 22.

[O] In 1712 he published a beautiful and pompous Edition of Cæsar's Commentaries.] Mr. Addison (40) speaks of this Edition in the following terms: The new Edition which is given us of Cæsar's Commentaries, has already been taken notice of in foreign Gazettes, and is a work, that does honour to the English Press. It is no wonder that an edition should be very correct, which has passed thro' the hands of one of the most accurate, learned and judicious Writers this age has produced. The beauty of the paper, of the character, and of the several cuts, with which this noble work is illustrated, makes it the finest Book that I have ever seen; and is a true instance of the English genius, which though it does not come the first into any art, generally carries it to greater heights than any other country in the world.

(40) Spectator, vol. 5. num. 367.

[P] His Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity.] The whole title is as follows: The Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity. In three parts. Wherein all the texts in the New Testament relating to that Doctrine, and the principal passages in the Liturgy of the Church of England, are collected, compared and explained. London 1712 in 8vo. Afterwards there was a second edition, with many alterations in 1719; and there has been since his death a third edition with very great additions left under the Dr's. hand ready prepared for the Press. The Bishop of Salisbury observes (41), that the Doctor in forming his own sentiments upon this important subject, proceeded in this manner: "He knew, and "all men agreed, that it was a matter of mere Re- "velation. He did not therefore retire into his closet, "and set himself to invent and forge a plausible hy- "pothesis, which might sit easily upon his own mind. "He had not recourse to abstract and metaphysical "reasonings, to cover and patronize any system he "might have embraced before. But, as a Christian, "he laid open the New Testament before him. He "searched out every text, in which mention was made "of the Three Persons, or of any one of them. "He accurately examined the meaning of the words "used about every one of them; and by the best rules "of Grammar and Critique, and by his skill in lan- "guage, he endeavoured to fix plainly what was de- "clared about every person, and what was not. And "what he thought to be the truth, he published under "the title of the Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity." The Bishop likewise remarks (42), that every Christian Divine and Layman ought to pay thanks to Dr. Clarke for the method into which he brought this dispute; and for that collection of texts of the New Testament, by which at last it must be decided, on which side soever the truth be supposed to lie.

(41) Preface, pag. 23.

(42) Ibid. pag. 24.

[Q] Which gave occasion to a great number of Books and Pamphlets written upon that subject by himself and others.] We have an account of the progress of this dispute to the end of the year 1719, in a Pamphlet printed at London 1720 in 8vo, intitled, An account of all the considerable Books and Pamphlets, that have been wrote on either side in the controversy concerning the Trinity since the year 1712. In which is also contained an account of the Pamphlets writ this last year on each side by the Dissenters, to the end of the year 1719. Dr. Clarke's Tracts upon this subject are as follow: I. A Letter to the Reverend Dr. Wells, in answer to his Remarks. London 1714 in 8vo. Dr. Wells's Remarks were dated May the 30th 1713. He wrote an Answer to Dr. Clarke, intitled, A Letter to the Reverend Dr. Clarke, in answer to his Letter to Dr. Wells. Dr. Clarke in his Reply to the objections of Robert Nelson Esq; (43) takes notice of this Letter of Dr. Wells, as wholly referring to other modern Authors, whose arguments the Dr. had answered in his first Book; and of his writing in so particular a style and manner, that it could not be thought the Dr. was under any obligation to have any further controversy with him. II. A Reply to the Objections of Robert Nelson Esq; and of an anonymous Author against Dr. Clarke's Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity. Being a Commentary on forty select texts of Scripture. To which is added an Answer to the Remarks of the Author of some Considerations upon the Trinity, and the ways of managing that Controversy. By Samuel Clarke D. D. London 1714 in 8vo. The anonymous Author to which this Book of Dr. Clarke is a Reply, is supposed to be Mr. James Knight, afterwards D. D. and late Vicar of St. Sepulchre's in London, and it was published at London 1714 in 8vo. The Scripture-Doctrine of the most holy and undivided Trinity vindicated against the misrepresentations of Dr. Clarke. To which is prefixed a Letter to the Reverend Doctor by Robert Nelson Esq; The Remarks on Dr. Clarke's Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity, by the Author of Some Considerations concerning the Trinity &c. were written by Dr. Gastrell Bp. of Chester. III. Three Letters to Dr. Clarke from a Clergyman, concerning his Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity, with the Doctor's Replies. Published by the Author of the said three Letters. London 1714 in 8vo. IV. A Letter to the late Reverend Mr. R. M. [Richard Mayo] concerning his plain Scripture-Argument. V. A Letter to the Author of a Book entitled, The true Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity, continued and vindicated, recommended first by Mr. Nelson, and since by Dr. Waterland. The two last pieces were published in 1719 in 8°, at the end of a Tract of another Author entitled, The modest and was complained of in 1714 by the Lower Houſe of Convocation [R], though the Members of the Upper Houſe afterwards declared themſelves ſatisfied with his explanations upon the ſubject of the complaint. However the Biſhop of Saliſbury aſſures us (m), "that from the time of the Doctor's publiſhing that book, to the day of his death, he "found no reaſon, as far as he was able to judge, to alter the notions, which he had "there profeſſed, concerning the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, towards any of thoſe "ſchemes, which ſeemed to him to derogate from the honour of the Father on one ſide, "or from that of the Son and Spirit on the other." Before the publication of this work, there was a meſſage ſent him from the Lord Godolphin, and ſome others of Queen's Anne's Miniſters, that "the affairs of the public were with difficulty then kept "in the hands of thoſe that were for liberty; that it was therefore an unſeaſonable time "for the publication of a book, that would make a great noiſe and diſturbance; and "that therefore they deſired him to forbear till a fitter opportunity ſhould offer itſelf." Which meſſage, ſays Mr. Whiſton †, Dr. Clarke had no regard to, but went on, according to the dictates of his own conſcience, with the publication of his book notwithſtanding. About the year 1712 he had a conference with Dr. Smalridge, afterwards Biſhop of Briſtol, concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity, at Thomas Cartwright's Eſq; at Aynho in Northamptonſhire [S]. In 1715 and 1716 he had a diſpute with the celebrated Mr. Leibnitz relating to the principles of Natural Philoſophy and Religion; and a Collection of the papers which paſſed between them was publiſhed at London in 1717 [T]. In 1718 modeſt Plea for the Baptiſmal and Scripture Notion of the Trinity, wherein the Schemes of the Reverend Dr. Bennet and Dr. Clarke are compared. VI. The Modeſt Plea &c. continued; or a brief and diſtinct Anſwer to Dr. Waterland's Queries relating to the Doctrine of the Trinity. London 1720 in 8vo. VII. Obſervations on Dr. Waterland's Second Defence of his Queries. London 1724 in 8vo.

(43) Pag. 213.

(m) Preface, pag. 25.

† Hiſtor. Memoirs, pag. 179.

[R] Complained of in 1714 in the Lower Houſe of Convocation.] We have an account of the whole affair in two Pamphlets, one ſuppoſed to be written by the Reverend Mr. John Lawrence, M. A, and printed at London 1714 in 8vo. intitled, An Apology for Dr. Clarke, containing an account of the late proceedings in Convocation upon his Writings concerning the Trinity. Being a Collection of ſeveral Original Papers: the other intitled, A full Account of the late Proceedings in Convocation relating to Dr. Clarke's Writings about the Trinity, and containing true copies of ſeveral original Papers; with ſome ſhort Remarks. London 1714 in 8vo.

[S] In 1712 he had a Conference with Dr. Smalridge .... concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity at Thomas Cartwright's Eſq; at Aynho in Northamptonſhire.] The Conference was propoſed by Dr. Smalridge in order to the conviction of Dr. Clarke. "And if any perſon "in England, ſays Mr. Whiſton (44), was able to "convince upon that head, it muſt have been Dr. "Smalridge, who had fully conſidered my fourth volume (45), and was a thorough maſter of thoſe "Books of Chriſtianity, whence the arguments were "to be taken; and who wanted no ſagacity nor good-"will to inforce them. However he failed of ſuc-"ceſs; and on the contrary the company were ge-"nerally ſatisfied, that the evidence on Dr. Clarke's "ſide was greatly ſuperior to the other. And whe-"ther Dr. Smalridge did not himſelf ſomewhat feel it, "I cannot certainly tell. So far I think will appear "hereafter, that, excepting his condemnation of the "groſs Arians, whom neither Dr. Clarke nor I ever "ſupported, he after this choſe rather to refer to "others, who had managed the Athanaſian Cauſe, than "ever to enter directly into its Vindication. Nor did "he eſcape the ſuſpicion of being himſelf inclina-"ble to what has been of late called Arianiſm, eſpeci-"ally at Oxford."

(44) Hiſtorical Memoirs, pag. 67.

(45) Of Primitive Chriſtianity reviv'd.

[T] A collection of the Papers which paſſed between them was publiſhed at London in 1717.] They were printed in 8vo, under the following title. A Collection of Papers, which paſſed between the late learned Mr. Leibnitz and Dr. Clarke, relating to the principles of Natural Philoſophy and Religion. To which are added Letters from Cambridge to Dr. Clarke concerning liberty and neceſſity, with the Doctor's Anſwers. And Remarks upon a Book, entitled, A Philoſophical Inquiry concerning human liberty. The Letters from Cambridge, which the Doctor anſwers in this volume, were written by Richard Bulkeley Eſq; Author of a Poem in twelve Books, intitled, The Laſt Day. He died in September 1718 at about twenty four years of age. The Philoſophical Inquiry concerning Human Liberty was written by Anthony Collins Eſq; (46). All the pieces contain'd in this volume were tranſlated into French, and publiſhed by Mr. Des Maizeaux in the firſt volume of Recueil de diverſes Pieces ſur la Philoſophie, la Religion Naturelle, l'Hiſtoire, les Mathematiques, &c. Par Mrs. Leibniz, Clarke, Newton, & autres Autheurs celebres, printed at Amſterdam 1720 2 Vol. in 12mo. Dr. Sykes in his account of this Book (47), having obſerved, "that it is Natural Philoſophy, which enables "us to determine the Queſtions concerning Liberty and "Neceſſity, which teaches us the extent of the Powers "of Matter and Motion, which gives us the ſtrongeſt evi-"dence of God's continual government of the world, and "which, as it ſtands oppoſed to all hypotheſes, ſo "wonderfully confirms Natural Religion, and demon-"ſtrates that there muſt be ſome free intelligent Be-"ing, by whoſe Will all things are directed;" proceeds to tell us, that from hence it was that Dr. Clarke ſaw clearly, that if all things were puſhed on by a certain Fate, or by a blind Neceſſity, there could be no ſuch thing as perſonal merit or demerit in intelligent Beings; that ſuch creatures could not be the objects of rewards or puniſhments; that therefore God would be unjuſt, if he inflicted any puniſhments upon mere paſſive inſtruments, who were not maſters of themſelves; and laſtly, if he beſtowed happineſs upon ſuch Beings, it muſt be the reſult of mere arbitrary pleaſure in the donor, and not a regard to behaviour in the receiver. "The "foundation of all Religion, both Natural and Re-"vealed, depends upon the right determination of theſe "points; and therefore Dr. Clarke truly judged, that "unleſs men were Agents, no conduct of theirs could "make them acceptable or unacceptable to God; "and that the firſt principles of all morality were de-"ſtroyed, if there were no difference of men's actions. "On this account he wrote thoſe Letters to Mr. Leib-"nitz, and publiſhed his Remarks upon a Book en-"titled, A Philoſophical Enquiry concerning Human Li-"berty." The Biſhop of Saliſbury likewiſe informs us (48), that the Controverſy between our Author and Mr. Leibnitz laſted long in a private manner, and paſſed thro' the hands of her preſent Majeſty, who was the witneſs and judge of every ſtep of it; and that it related chiefly to the important and difficult ſubjects of Liberty and Neceſſity. This Liberty or Moral Agency was a darling point to him. He excelled always, and ſhewed a ſuperiority to all, whenever it came into private diſcourſe, or public debate. But he never more excelled; than when he was preſſed with the ſtrength this learned adverſary was maſter of; which made him exert all his talents to ſet it once again in a clear light, to guard it againſt the evil of metaphyſical obſcurities, and to give the finiſhing ſtroke to a ſubject, which muſt ever be the foundation of morality in man, and is the ſole ground of the accountableneſs of intelligent creatures for all their actions. "And "as this was the laſt of Dr. Clarke's Works relating "to a ſubject, which had been by the Writings of "cloudy

(46) See the Article of COLLINS (Anthony).

(47) Elogium of Dr. Clarke, pag. 54.

(48) Preface pag. 30.

1718 his alteration in the forms of Doxology of the ſinging Pſalms occaſioned a conſiderable controverſy concerning the primitive Doxologies [V]. About this time he was preſented by the Lord Lechmere, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaſter, to the Maſterſhip of Wigſtan's Hoſpital in Leiceſter, which requiring, ſays Mr. Whiſton (n), no Athanaſian Subſcription, nor Athanaſian Creed, nor Athanaſian Worſhip, was a piece of preferment very acceptable to him. In 1724 he publiſhed in 8vo ſeventeen Sermons on ſeveral occaſions, eleven of which were never before printed; and the year following his Diſcourſe concerning the Connexion of the Prophecies in the Old Teſtament, and the Application of them to Chriſt, in anſwer to Mr. Collins's Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion; and a Sermon preached at the Pariſh-Church of St. James, April the 18th 1725, upon the erecting a Charity-School for the education of Women-Servants. In 1727, upon the death of Sir Iſaac Newton, he was offered by the Court the place of Maſter of the Mint, worth communibus annis twelve hundred or fifteen hundred pounds a year, which he abſolutely refuſed (o). In 1728 he wrote a Letter to Mr. Benjamin Hoadly, F. R. S. occaſioned by the Controverſy relating to the proportion of Velocity and Force in Bodies in Motion; printed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 401. And in the beginning of the year following he publiſhed at London in 4to the twelve firſt books of Homer's Iliad, with the Latin Verſion accurately corrected, and learned notes [W], dedicated to the Duke

(n) Pag. 100. See likewiſe the Biſhop of Saliſbury's Preface, pag. 26.

(o) Whiſton, pag. 135, 136.

" cloudy or artful men rendered ſo intricate; I ſhall " take the liberty, continues he (49), to ſay, with re- " gard to all of the ſame tendency, from his firſt diſ- " courſe about the Being of God to theſe Letters, that " what he has written to clear and illuſtrate this " cauſe, does now ſtand, and will for ever remain, " before the world, a laſting monument of a genius, " which could throw in light where darkneſs uſed to " reign, and force good ſenſe and plain words into " what was almoſt the priviledged place of obſcurity " and unintelligible ſounds. For ſuch indeed had the " ſubject before us been under the hands of moſt, " who had written upon it, either thro' a deſire of " darkening it by words without meaning, or thro' " an inability of diſcourſing clearly and conſiſtently " about it." Mr. Whiſton acquaints us (50), that Sir Iſaac Newton once pleaſantly told the Doctor, that he had broke Leibnitz's heart with his Reply to him. Mr. Trenchard in one of his Letters (51), concerning the Neceſſity of Human Actions has given us ſome animadverſions upon a paſſage or two of the Doctor's Remarks upon a Philoſophical Enquiry concerning human liberty, tho' at the ſame time he ſtiles him a very great and juſtly celebrated, and a truly worthy and learned Author. The Doctor wrote Remarks upon theſe Letters which are ſtill extant in manuſcript.

(49) Pag. 31, 32.

(50) Hiſtor. Memoirs, pag. 132.

(51) Sign'd Diogenes, and publiſhed in the Britiſh Journal, num. 17. Jan. 12, 1723.

[V] In 1718 his alteration in the Forms of Doxology of the Singing-Pſalms occaſioned a conſiderable controverſy concerning the primitive Doxologies.] Select Pſalms and Hymns having been reprinted that year for the uſe of the Pariſh-Church and Chapels belonging to the Pariſh of St. James Weſtminſter, a great number of paſſages were changed, as others had been done by the former Rectors of that Pariſh, and ſome Doxologies altered in this manner:

To God, thro' Chriſt, his only Son,
Immortal Glory be &c.

To God, thro' Chriſt, his Son, our Lord,
All Glory be therefore &c.

(52) Hiſtor. Memoirs, pag. 99.

Mr. Whiſton obſerves (52), that as the uſual Forms of Doxology " are not eſtabliſhed by any legal authority, " eccleſiaſtical or civil, they ſeemed within the care of " preſent Stewards of Charity-Schools, and of the pre- " ſent Incumbents of Pariſhes. Dr. Clarke's Alteration, I think, was this; To God, through Chriſt, his Son our Lord, All Glory be. Which is the moſt undoubted old Chriſtian Form, that is now extant in the Church, and is the moſt uſual Form at the end of the Prayers and Thankſgivings in our own publick Liturgy." A conſiderable number of theſe Select Pſalms and Hymns having been diſperſed by the Society for promoting of Chriſtian Knowledge, before the Alteration of the Doxologies was taken notice of, Complaint was made to that Society by ſome of their correſpondents in the Country. Upon this Dr. Clarke was charged by ſeveral Members thereof with having made thoſe Alterations with a deſign to impoſe upon the Society; but the affair being ſtrictly examined into, it was found that the Edition had been prepared by him for the uſe of his Pariſh only, before the Society had any thoughts of purchaſing any of the copies, and therefore he was cleared from all imputation by a majority of the Members. However the Biſhop of London thought proper to publiſh a Letter to the Incumbents of all Churches and Chapels in his Dioceſe, concerning their not uſing any New Forms of Doxology, dated December 26th 1718. It begins thus, " Reverend " Brethren, There is an inſtance of your care and duty, " which I conceive my ſelf at this time highly ob- " liged to offer, and you to regard, as neceſſary for " the preſervation of the very foundations of our Faith. " Some perſons, ſeduced, I fear, by the ſtrong deluſions " of pride and ſelf-conceit, have lately publiſhed new " Forms of Doxology, entirely agreeable to thoſe of " ſome ancient hereticks, who impiouſly denied a Tri- " nity of Perſons in the Unity of the Godhead. I do " therefore warn and charge it upon your ſouls, as you " hope to obtain mercy from God the Father, thro' the " merits of Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, and by the ſanctifica- " tion of the Holy Ghoſt, Three Perſons and One " God bleſſed for ever, that you employ your beſt " endeavours to prevail with your ſeveral Flocks to " have a great abhorrence for the abovementioned new " Forms, and particularly that you do not ſuffer the " ſame to be uſed, either in your Churches, or in any " Schools, where you are able to prevent that moſt pe- " nicious abuſe, &c." This Letter was animadverted upon in Mr. Whiſton's Letter of Thanks to the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of London, for his late Letter to his Clergy againſt the Uſe of new Forms of Doxology, &c. dated Jan. 17, 1718; and in An humble Apology for St. Paul, and the other Apoſtles; Or a Vindication of them and their Doxologies from the charge of hereſy. By Cornelius Paets. London 1719 in 8vo. Soon after was publiſhed an Ironical Treatiſe, entitled, A Defence of the Biſhop of London, in anſwer to Mr. Whiſton's Letter of Thanks, addreſſed to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. To which is added, A Vindication of Dr. Sacheverell's late Endeavour to turn Mr. Whiſton out of his Church. To Mr. Whiſton's Letter of Thanks there were the following anſwers: The Lord Biſhop of London's Letter to his Clergy defended. Wherein the conſtant Worſhip of Son and Holy Spirit with the Father during the firſt Ages is ſet forth, and the Antiquity of the Doxology uſed by the Church of England aſſerted. By a Believer. London 1719 in 8vo: and A ſeaſonable Review of Mr. Whiſton's Account of Primitive Doxologies in his late abuſive Letter of Thanks to the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of London &c. Together with ſome occaſional Remarks on the 4th volume of his Primitive Chriſtianity revived. By a Preſbyter of the Dioceſe of London. London 1719 in 8vo. This latter is ſaid to be written by Dr. William Berriman. To this laſt piece Mr. Whiſton replied in his Second Letter to the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of London, concerning the primitive Doxologies: Wherein the Seaſonable Review of his Account of them is conſidered. Dated March 11, 1718. The Author of the Seaſonable Review anſwered him in A ſecond Review of Mr. Whiſton's Account of the Primitive Doxologies, occaſioned by his Second Letter to the Biſhop of London.

[W] He publiſhed at London in 4to the twelve firſt Books of Homer's Ilias, with the Latin Verſion accurately

Duke of Cumberland. In the midſt of all theſe labours and ſtudies he had enjoyed a firm ſtate of health, without any indiſpoſition bad enough to confine him, except that of the Small-pox in his youth, till on Sunday May the 11th 1729 he went out in the morning to preach before the Judges at Serjeant's-Inn, and there was ſeized with a pain in his ſide, which made it impoſſible for him to perform the office which he was called to, and quickly became ſo violent that he was obliged to be carried home. He went to bed, and thought himſelf ſo much better in the afternoon, that he would not ſuffer himſelf to be blooded, againſt which remedy he had indeed entertained ſtrong prejudices. But the pain returning very violently about two the next morning made the advice and aſſiſtance of a very able Phyſician abſolutely neceſſary, who, after twice bleeding him, and other applications, thought him, as he alſo thought himſelf, to be out of all danger, and ſo continued to think till the Saturday morning following, when, to the inexpreſſible ſurprize of all about him, the pain removed from his ſide to his head, and after a very ſhort complaint, took away his ſenſes, ſo as that they never returned any more. He continued breathing till between ſeven and eight in the evening of that day, May the 17th 1729, and then died. He married Catherine, the only daughter of the Reverend Mr. Lockwood, Rector of Little Maſſingham in the County of Norfolk, by whom he had ſeven children, two of which died before him, and one in a few weeks after him (p). We ſhall give his character in the note [X]. Her preſent Majeſty, from her firſt acquaintance with his character to the day rately corrected, and learned Notes.] It was printed under the following title; Homeri Ilias, Græcè & Latinè. Annotationes in uſum ſerenisſimi Principis Guliel-mi Auguſti Ducis de Cumberland, &c. regio juſſu ſcripſit atque edidit S. Clarke, S. T. P. The Biſhop of Saliſbury tells us (53), that the Tranſlation is almoſt new. And Dr. Sykes obſerves (54), that his Notes have had not only the approbation of the Maſters of the great Schools of England, ſuch as Eaton, Weſtminſter, St. Paul's, &c. but alſo the higheſt commendation of Dr. Bentley, who declared the performance to be ſupra omnem invidiam, and its Author to have deſerved the compliment of longè omnium Princeps. The Biſhop of Saliſbury tells us (55), that Homer was his admired Author even to a degree of ſomething like Enthuſiaſm hardly natural to his temper. "In this he went "a little beyond the bounds of Horace's judgment; "and was ſo unwilling to allow the Favourite-Poet "even to nod, that he has taken remarkable pains to "find out, and give a reaſon for every paſſage, word, "and tittle, that could create any ſuſpicion. The "Tranſlation with his Corrections may now be ſtiled accurate; and his Notes, as far as they go, "are indeed a treaſury of grammatical and critical "knowledge. He was called to this taſk by Royal "Command; and he has performed it in ſuch a manner as to be worthy of the young Prince, for whoſe "uſe it was laboured." Mr. Whiſton (56) remarks, that he had begun this work, when he was in his younger years, and that the Notes were rather tranſcribed than made new. We find from Dr. Sykes's Elogium upon our Author (57), that he was finiſhing the remainder of Homer, and had compleated almoſt four Books, when he was ſeized with his laſt ſickneſs. The laſt twelve Books were publiſhed, by his ſon at London 1732 in 4to under the following title: Homeri Ilias Græcè & Latinè cum Annotationibus Samuelis Clarke S. T. P. nuper defuncti. Vol. II. Edidit atque imperfecta ſupplevit Samuel Clarke Filius S. R. S. Mr. Clarke tells the Reader in his Preface that his father had finiſhed his Notes upon the three firſt Books of this volume, and to the 359th verſe of the fourth Book; and had reviſed the text and verſion to line 510. There has been a ſecond Edition publiſhed at London 1735 in two volumes in 8vo.

(p) Biſhop of Salisbury's Preface, pag. 32, 33, 34. See likewiſe Dr. Sykes's Elogium of Dr. Clarke, printed in the Preſent State of the Republick of Letters, for July 1729. Art. 4. pag. 63.

(53) Preface, pag. 28.

(54) Elogium, pag. 62.

(55) Ubi ſupra, pag. 28.

(56) Hiſtorical Memoirs, pag. 142.

(57) Pag. 63.

[X] We ſhall give his character in the Note.] It is drawn to great advantage in the following paſſage of The Difficulties and Diſcouragements, which attend the ſtudy of the Scripture, in the way of private judgment, ſaid to be written by Dr. Hare, the preſent Biſhop of Chicheſter. "Dr. Clarke is a man, ſays that Writer * "who has all the good qualities, that can meet "together to recommend him. He is poſſeſt of all "the parts of learning that are valuable in a Clergyman, in a degree that few poſſeſs any ſingle one. "He has joined to a good ſkill in the three learned "languages a great compaſs of the beſt Philoſophy "and Mathematics, as appears by his Latin Works, "and his Engliſh ones are ſuch a proof of his own "piety and of his knowledge in Divinity, and have "done ſo much ſervice to Religion, as would make "any other man, that was not under the ſuſpicion of "hereſy, ſecure of the friendſhip and eſteem of all good "Churchmen, eſpecially of the Clergy. And to all "this piety and learning and the good uſe that has "been made of it, is added a temper happy beyond "expreſſion; a ſweet, eaſy, modeſt, inoffenſive, obliging behaviour adorn all his actions; and no paſſion, vanity, inſolence, or oſtentation, appear either "in what he writes or ſays; and yet theſe faults are "often incident to the beſt men, in the freedoms "of converſation, and in writing againſt impertinent and unreaſonable adverſaries, eſpecially ſuch as "ſtrike at the foundation of virtue and religion. This "is the learning, this the temper of the man, whoſe "ſtudy of the Scriptures has betrayed him into a ſuſpicion of ſome heretical opinions." Dr. Sykes in his Elogium upon him tells us (58), that he excelled in Natural Philoſophy, in Mathematics, in Divinity, in Critique, as if he had made but one of them his ſole ſtudy; and that whatever ſcience, or whatever branch of knowledge he applied himſelf to, he was ſo great a maſter of, that had another excelled in any one of thoſe extenſive parts of Literature in the ſame degree as he excelled in every one of them, he would on that ſole account have deſerved the reputation of a great man. That as he was eminent in all theſe branches of Literature, no one can read his writings without obſerving how each of them was conſtantly by him applied to the uſe and ſervice of virtue and religion (59). That as a Critic, he was perfectly acquainted with the niceties of the Greek and Latin Tongues (60), and as a Preacher, had the peculiar "art of explaining the moſt intricate texts of "Scripture. He was wont to compare together "and illuſtrate one text by another, and always "ſhewed how a clear and rational ſenſe ran through "the whole Bible. He had fully conſidered the true "import of the ſacred Phraſeology, and was a perfect "maſter of the language and ſtyle of Scripture (61)." The Biſhop of Saliſbury has given his character at large (62), and obſerves, that he was a perſon of a natural genius excellent enough to have placed him in the ſuperior rank of men, without the acquirements of learning, and of learning enough to have rendered a much leſs comprehenſive genius very conſiderable in the eyes of the world. That "the firſt ſtrokes of "knowledge, in ſome of its branches, ſeemed to be "little leſs than natural to him, for they appeared to "lie right in his mind, as ſoon as any thing could "appear, and to be the very ſame, which afterwards "grew up with him into perfection, as the ſtrength "and cultivation of his mind increaſed (63)." Mr. Whiſton (64) mentions an inſtance of this from the Doctor's own mouth. One of his parents aſked him, when he was very young, Whether God could do every thing? He anſwered, Yes. He was aſked again, Whether God could do one particular thing, could tell a lie? He anſwered, No. And he underſtood the queſtion to ſuppoſe that this was the only thing that God could not do; nor durſt he ſay, ſo young was he then, that he thought there was any thing elſe, which God could not do; while yet well he remembred, that

* Pag. 20.

(58) Pag. 53.

(59) Idem, ibid. pag. 53, 54.

(60) Ibid. pag. 62.

(61) Idem, ibid. pag. 64.

(62) Preface, pag. 34, & ſeqq

(63) Ibid. pag. 35.

(64) Hiſtor. Memoirs, pag. 22, 23.

day of his death, expreſſed the high eſteem ſhe had of his comprehenſive capacity and uſeful learning, by very frequent converſations with him upon many of the moſt important and entertaining points of true Philoſophy and real knowledge. And ſeldom a week paſſed, in which ſhe did not with pleaſure receive ſome proof of the greatneſs of his genius, and of the force of his ſuperior underſtanding. Since his death there have been printed his Expoſition of the Church-Catechiſm [Y], London 1729 in 8vo, and Ten Volumes of Sermons. They were publiſhed by his brother Dr. John Clarke, Dean of Sarum. His ſcruples about Subſcription were great [Z]. As he had taken much pains in the ſtudy of the Prophetical Writings, eſpecially thoſe of the New Teſtament, he uſed to expreſs his fears, that the face of Proteſtantiſm would once more be covered by as foul a corruption, as ever was that of Popery, before the happy liberty and light of the Goſpel would take place (q). His wiſdom, and knowledge, and inſtructive way of converſation, his readineſs to diſcourſe upon any ſubjects of Literature, and his affability made him admired and loved, as well as much courted by all. He had a ſecrecy, as to other matters, impenetrable (r). In the former part of his life he made no ſcruple of writing Letters upon any ſubject to any ſerious perſons, who were willing to enquire after truth; and with his uſual openneſs and innocent freedom he wrote his Letters to the Reverend Mr. Mayo.

(q) Dr. Sykes's Elogium, pag. 64.

(r) Idem, ibid. pag. 63.

that he had even then a clear conviction in his own mind, that there was one other thing, which God could not do, viz. that he could not annihilate that ſpace, which was in the room, wherein they were. Which impoſſibility now appears even in Sir Iſaac Newton's own Philoſophy. The Biſhop remarks (65), that he had one happineſs very rarely known "amongſt the greateſt men, that his memory was almoſt equal to his "judgment, which is as great a character as can well "be given of it. It did not indeed appear in trifles, "nor in every part of knowledge. But in thoſe particularly which regarded the claſſical and pureſt "Writers of the ancients, or any part of real and "experimental Philoſophy, as well as what can truly "be called Theology, it was ſurprizingly excellent, and "of wonderful uſe to him, through all his ſtudies "and all his converſation." The Biſhop proceeds to obſerve, that in Divinity, it was his great aim to ſettle beyond all contradiction what muſt be the ſupport of true Religion, and then to ſhew the evidences for what muſt rely upon that ſupport (66); and in Natural Philoſophy and the Mathematical Knowledge neceſſary to it, amidſt all his other employments, he excelled, as if theſe had been his darling ſtudy. Not that he could poſſibly find time himſelf to make all the proper experiments or neceſſary calculations. But he had I know not what happineſs of genius, by which he immediately comprehended what coſt others a great deal of pains; and ſuch a faculty of judging of any new Syſtems or Propoſitions from what he knew certainly before, and theſe ſupported by a memory, which hardly ever failed him upon theſe ſubjects, that he was eſteemed by the knowers to be one of the beſt judges to apply to for a quick determination about the force or failure of any arguments, or appearing demonſtrations in theſe ſtudies (67). The Biſhop afterwards (68) remarks, that "his preaching "was what one would naturally expect from a perſon "of ſo critical a genius and ſo ſedate a judgment. "The deſign and tendency of it was not to move the "paſſions, nor had he any talent this way. He wiſely "never attempted it, becauſe he was ſenſible he ſhould "not ſucceed if he did. And if this was a defect, it "was a defect in his original frame and conſtitution. "But then his ſentiments and expreſſion were ſo maſterly; his way of explaining the Phraſeology of "Scripture, by collecting and comparing all the parallel places truly relating to any ſubject was ſo extraordinary and convincing, that ſuch a delight of "ſatisfaction went along with it, as more than made "amends for the want of the other." The Biſhop concludes with obſerving (69), that "what added a "force to his preaching and inſtructive diſcourſe, was "his own unblameable example and perſonal conduct, "in all the duties of a man and a Chriſtian. His piety "was manly and unaffected, built upon the moſt ſolid "grounds, and free from all pomp and ſhew. The "charity of his temper and good will was as extenſive as the whole rational creation of God. The "charity of his aſſiſtance and beneficence as extenſive as "the circumſtances of his family would prudently admit. His love of the religious and civil liberties "of mankind was a ruling and powerful principle in "his heart and practice. In a word, his morals from "the firſt of his days to the laſt were without reproach. "There was an innocence and inoffenſiveneſs remarkable thro' his whole behaviour; and his whole life, "when he came into the view of the great world, "was an ornament and ſtrength to that Religion, "which his pen ſo well defended."

(65) Pag. 35.

(66) Ibid.

(67) Idem, ibid. pag. 38.

(68) Pag. 41.

(69) Pag. 44, 45.

[Y] His Expoſition of the Church-Catechiſm.] This was attacked ſoon after the publication of it, by Dr. Daniel Waterland in his Remarks upon Dr. Clarke's Expoſition of the Church-Catechiſm. London 1730 in 8vo. To this piece an Anſwer was immediately publiſhed by Arthur Aſhley Sykes, D. D. in a pamphlet entitled, An Anſwer to the Remarks &c. London 1730 in 8vo. This occaſioned Dr. Waterland's Pamphlet, entitled, The Nature, Obligation, and Efficacy of the Chriſtian Sacraments conſider'd: As alſo the comparative Value of moral and poſitive Duties diſtinctly ſtated and cleared. By the Author of the Remarks. London 1730 in 8vo. This was anſwered by Dr. Sykes in his Defence of the Anſwer to the Remarks upon Dr. Clarke's Expoſition of the Church-Catechiſm. Wherein the Difference between moral and poſitive duties is fully ſtated. Being a Reply to a Pamphlet, entitled, The Nature, Obligation &c. London 1730 in 8vo. And by an anonymous Writer in a Pamphlet, intitled, The comparative Excellence and Obligation of moral and poſitive Duties fully ſtated and conſidered. In anſwer to a Pamphlet, entitled, The Nature, Obligation &c. As alſo, The comparative Value of moral and poſitive Duties diſtinctly ſtated and cleared. London 1730 in 8vo. Dr. Waterland having publiſhed a Supplement to his Treatiſe, entitled, The Nature, Obligatiion &c. of the Chriſtian Sacraments, wherein the Nature and Value of poſitive Inſtitutions is more particularly examined, and objections anſwered. London 1730 in 8vo. Dr. Sykes wrote a Reply to it, entitled, The true Foundations of Natural and Revealed Religion aſſerted. Being a Reply to the Supplement to the Treatiſe, entitled, The Nature, &c. London 1730 in 8vo. Dr. Waterland having animadverted upon this piece in the Poſtſcript to his ſecond part of Scripture vindicated, Dr. Sykes publiſhed An Anſwer to the Poſtſcript of the Second Part of Scripture Vindicated. Wherein is ſhewn, that if reaſon be not a ſufficient guide in matters of Religion, the bulk of mankind for four thouſand years, had no ſufficient guide at all in matters of Religion. London 1731 in 8vo.

[Z] His ſcruples about Subſcription were great.] This we are informed of by Dr. Sykes (70), who obſerves, that he would often wiſh, that thoſe things, which were ſuſpected by many, and judged unlawful by ſome, might be ſeriouſly conſidered, and not made Terms of Communion. He thought that it would be the greateſt happineſs to ſee the occaſions of good and learned men's ſcruples removed out of the public forms of divine ſervice, and the doctrines of Chriſtianity reduced to the New Teſtament only; and that it would be right to have nothing required from the Preachers of the Goſpel, but what was purely primitive. This he thought to be the only means of making the minds of ſincere Chriſtians eaſy and quiet. This he believed would make men much more charitable to one another; and make the Governors of the Church and State tranſact their important affairs with greater eaſe and freedom from diſturbances.

(70) Elogium, pag. 63, 64.

Mayo. But when he found the uſe which was made of his freedom, and thoſe Letters, which were written in confidence as to a private friend, publiſhed to the world, he reſolved no more to engage in Epiſtolary Conferences upon ſuch Theological ſubjects for fear of the like inconveniences (s). He had a ſurprizing readineſs and quickneſs of diſpatch in what he was about, and wrote all that he did in the midſt of continual interruptions, being never denied to any, who came to him. And conſidering him at the head of ſo populous a pariſh, in the midſt of ſo much acquaintance, and of ſo much neceſſary public buſineſs, beſides his own private affairs, had he not been able to do as much in one hour, as other men could do in many, he could not poſſibly have written what he did (t). Mr. Whiſton informs us (u) that our Author, as well as Sir Iſaac Newton, was of the ſame ſentiments with him with regard to the notion of the eternity of the torments of hell, which Mr. Whiſton had declared againſt in his Sermons and Eſſays [AA].

(s) Idem, ibid. pag. 64, 65.

(t) Idem, ibid. pag. 65.

(u) Hiſtor. Memoirs, pag. 98.

[AA] Mr. Whiſton informs us, that our Author, as well as Sir Iſaac Newton, was of the ſame ſentiments with him with regard to the notion of the Eternity of the torments of hell, which Mr. Whiſton had declared againſt in his Sermons and Eſſays.] The paſſage in the Sermon and Eſſays, in which that Writer has delivered his ſentiments upon this ſubject, is as follows (71): "As "to the Eternity of the puniſhments of Hell, I own it "to be certain, ſo far the import of αἰώνιος, to which "the word anſwers, does extend; i. e. "it is cer"tain thoſe puniſhments ſhall continue the whole du"ration of the wicked, who are the ſubjects of it, or "through all thoſe αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, long and unde"terminate periods of Being, to which their lives "ſhall be preſerved by the divine power; ſo that no"thing ſhall put an end to their torment, but what "ſhall do ſo to their lives and their ſtate for ever alſo. "Whether the Scripture means any more by this E"ternity of the Torments of Hell, I ſhall not here "poſitively determine: but ſince I find the moſt pri"mitive Writers of the Church inclined to this Ex"plication of this point, and ſince this is abundantly "ſufficient for all the ends of Religion, and ſeems "moſt agreeable to the divine goodneſs, if not alſo en"forced by his juſtice, and prevents even the cavils of "the Sceptics themſelves, nay is, I really think, the ge"nuine meaning of the Scripture-Expreſſions alſo, I "ſhall at preſent acquieſce in it, leaving it ſtill to "thoſe, who think the Scripture means more than is "here aſſerted, to juſtify their own opinions and the "reaſonableneſs of them as they think convenient." The ſame Gentleman tells us (72), that about the year 1717 he wrote a ſmall Paper not yet publiſhed, containing very briefly the reaſons of the abovementioned opinion; and that Dr. Clarke thought, that few or no thinking men were really of different ſentiments in that matter. Mr. Whiſton adds, that as to himſelf he had many years thought, that "the common opinion in "this matter, if it were for certain a real part of "Chriſtianity, would be a more inſuperable objection "againſt it, than any or all the preſent objections of "unbelievers put together. T.

(71) Pag. 220, 221. edit. London 1709.

(72) Hiſtorical Memoirs, pag. 98.

CLARUS (JULIUS) one of the ableſt Lawyers of the ſixteenth Century, was a native of Alexandria in the Milaneze, and of a Patrician family. He undertook a great work, on what is called, in the ſtyle of the Lawyers, receptæ ſententiæ (received opinions) which are thoſe that moſt of the Doctors commonly follow. The public employments to which he was raiſed not allowing him the leiſure neceſſary for compleating this work [A], he detached ſome parts of it, and printed them [B]; and at laſt he declared that he would quite lay aſide the remainder (a), ſince the journies he undertook in the Spaniſh King's train, did not allow him time to reviſe his writings, which required a numberleſs multitude of books, and theſe he had not an opportunity of taking along with him in his travels (b). He ſet out for Madrid, in order to travel into Italy; and was got as far as

(a) Julius Clarus, Præfat. lib. 5. recept. Sententiarum.

(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] He undertook a great Work . . . the public employments to which he was raiſed, not allowing him the leiſure neceſſary for compleating this Work.] The war having obliged him to retire to Mantua, he employed himſelf wholly in reviſing his Work, in order to fit it for the preſs; but hearing that the King of Spain had appointed him Counſellor in the Senate of Milan, he diſcontinued this reviſal (1). Some years after, he was made Preſident of the extraordinary Queſtors, Prefect of the Annona (2), and chief Juſtice in Eyre. Whilſt he was exerciſing theſe employments with the utmoſt care and aſſiduity, he was ſent for to Spain, where King Philip II had appointed him Counſellor in the Supreme Council of Italy: upon this he left his country, his wife, and children; and was obliged to travel into Spain, France and Flanders, and to leave moſt of his works unfiniſhed (3).

(1) Julius Clarus, Epiſtola Dedicatoria Tractatus de Teſtamentis, &c.

(2) A kind of Purveyor-General.

(3) Julius Clarus in Præfatione libri 5 recept. ſententiarum.

[B] He detached ſome parts of it, and printed them ſeparately.] His deſign was, to publiſh a work entitled receptarum Sententiarum, divided into VII Books. In the Ift, he treated de legibus & conſtitutionibus; in the IId, de Jure Perſonarum; in the IIId, de materia Succeſſionum & ultimarum Voluntatum; in the IVth, de Contractibus; in the Vth, de Maleficiis; in the VIth, de civilibus Judiciis. The VIIth was to contain a copious Index of the whole Work; with ſome Treatiſes which could not be properly interwoven with the ſix preceding Books. Here follow the parts publiſhed by him.

In the firſt place, he publiſhed the Treatiſe de Feudis, three years (4) after he had been appointed Counſellor of Milan. This was a fragment of the IVth Book. Some time after, he publiſhed the Treatiſe de Teſtamentis, part of the IIId Book, and dedicated it to Anthony Perrenot, Biſhop of Arras. The Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Milan, May the 1ſt, 1559. This was followed by the Treatiſe de Donationibus & de Jure Emphyteutico; parts of the IVth Book. In fine, he publiſhed the whole Vth Book, relating to criminal matters. Theſe Treatiſes were all printed together, in the Frankfort Edition of 1572 in folio, which John Fichard Counſellor, and Syndic of that city procured. This Edition was followed by ſeveral others (5) printed in different places, and ſometimes with additions borrowed from other Writers. Morerl, in copying Ghilini, tho' he does not cite him, gives a very imperfect account of the titles of Julius Clarus's Works. Here follow his words: "He writ ſeveral "Treatiſes: Opera Juridica. Receptarum Sententiarum "Opera omnia. Volumen in quo omnium Criminum ma"teria ſub acceptis ſententiis copioſiſſime tractatur." This is ſaying almoſt nothing with regard to the particular titles of his Works, and only repeating the ſame thing three or four times over in different words. The worſt circumſtance is, that it was imagined, all the works which were particularly ſpecified by him, differ from one another; but this is an egregious miſtake. The encomiums which John Fichard beſtows on our Julius Clarus are very juſt (6); and ought not to be ſuſpected of flattery, upon pretence that he had adviſed his dear friend Sigiſmund Feyrabend to reprint the works of that Author. Such a pretence is ſometimes very juſt; for, when a man is engaged to beſtow encomiums, for the honour of his own judgment as well as for the advantage of a Bookſeller whom he favours and directs, he does not always proportion, to the merit of Authors, the expreſſions he makes uſe of in applauding them.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) I uſe the Frankfort edition of 1582, in folio.

(6) Inter illos jam recitatos (Juriſperitos) cum hic Julius Clarus vir multis certe nominibus inſignis, ſive genoroſos natales . . . ſive eruditionem (in Jure potiſſimum civili) plane raram, ſive dexteritatem denique in his quæ tractanda ſibi ſumit feliciſſimam ſpectemus facile princeps ſit &c. Jo. Fichard. Epiſtola Dedicatoria Operum Julii Clari. i. e. "Greatly ſupe"rior to all the "Lawyers a"bove cited, was "Julius Clarus, "a man conſpi"cuous on ſeve"ral accounts, "for his high "birth, his rare "and uncom"mon know"ledge, particu"larly in the "Civil Law; "and laſtly, for "the peculiar fe"licity with "which he treat"ed his ſubjects.

as Carthagena, when he was ſeized with a fit of ſickneſs which carried him off the 13th of April 1575. He was buried in Milan, in the Church della Pace or of Peace, in the ſepulchre he had cauſed to be made for himſelf, anno 1566 (c). He was born the 6th of January 1525 (d).

(c) Konig, miſled by this date, which is found in the epitaph of Julius Clarus, imagined falſely that he died in 1566; but this is only the date of the erecting of the monument.

(d) Extracted from Ghilini, Part 1. pag. 131, 132.

CLAUDE (JOHN) a Miniſter of the Church of Paris, and born in 1619, at Sauvetat in Agenois, was one of the greateſt men of the Eccleſiaſtical profeſſion. He ſtudied as far as Philoſophy under his father (a), and after going through a courſe of it, together with Divinity, at Montauban he was ordained in 1645, and was made Miniſter of a Church of Fief, called la Treine. He performed the functions of a Miniſter there a twelve-month, and afterwards was Miniſter of a Church of St. Africk in Rouergue, and eight years after, Paſtor of that of Nimes. As the Proteſtants had an Univerſity in the laſt mentioned city, Mr. Claude had an opportunity of diſplaying one of his chief talents, viz. that of explaining very happily a theological ſubject. He uſed to read to ſuch as were candidates for the Miniſtry, private Lectures, which were ſo well adapted to the pulpit, and the underſtanding of the Scriptures, that great benefit was reaped from them. He had undertaken to refute the piece entitled the Method, written by Cardinal de Richlieu [A]; but hearing that Mr. Martel, Profeſſor of Divinity in Montauban, had a ſynodical commiſſion for that purpoſe (b), he laid aſide his deſign. Having oppoſed, in a ſynod of the Lower Languedoc, a man whom the Court had won over to attempt a reunion, he was puniſhed for it by a decree of Council, which forbad him the exerciſe of the functions of a Miniſter in Languedoc; he having exerciſed them eight years at Nimes. Mr. Claude went to Paris to get, if poſſible, this reſolution taken off; and it was during his journey that he wrote a little book, which occaſioned the moſt famous diſpute that was ever carried on in France between the Proteſtants and Roman Catholicks [B]. After ſtaying ſix months to no purpoſe in Paris, he took a journey to Montauban, where he

(a) He was a Miniſter, and after being Paſtor of the Church of Sauvetat, he was Paſtor over that of Montbaziliac and of Cours near Bergerac.

(b) Mr. Martel's Anſwer was printed at Roan in 1673, 4to.

[A] He had undertaken to refute the piece, entitled the Method, written by Cardinal de Richelieu.] It will not be improper to inform the reader, that this Method was quite printed off the firſt of February 1651; this, I ſay, will not be improper, becauſe ſeveral perſons might otherwiſe think that it was finiſhed at a different time, when they read, that it was publiſhed, when Mr. Claude was already Miniſter of the Church of Nimes. In hac filium Iſaacum ſuſcepit 5 Mart. 1653, eoque tempore ad Eccleſiam Nemauſenſem . . . vocatus fuit, ſed taboriоſiſſimum erat munus illud, tum quod conciones quotidie habendæ eſſent, tum ob alia negotia paſtoralia. Nihilominus ingenium & aſſiduitas viri non tantum occupationibus illis ſuffecit, ſed & ſtudiis continuandis; ita ut editum TUNC à Cardinale Richelio contra Reformatos librum qui Methodus dicitur, refutandum ſuſceperit (1). i. e. "In this place his ſon Iſaac was "born, March 5, 1653, and at that time he was called "to the Church of Niſmes, which was an extremely "laborious employment, as well becauſe Sermons were "preached every day in that Church, as on account of "other eccleſiaſtical functions. Nevertheleſs, ſo happy was Mr. Claude's genius, and his aſſiduity ſo "great, that he not only diſcharged thoſe various duties, but even purſued his ſtudies; ſo that he under-"took to refute the book which was publiſhed at that "time againſt the Proteſtants, entitled the Method, and "written by Cardinal Richelieu." He could not have been in that employment before the year 1654, for before he was Preacher at Nimes, he had been eight years Miniſter of St. Africk (2); and, a year before that, Paſtor of la Treine (3). Theſe nine years added to 1645, which was the date of his being ordained Miniſter (4), make 1654.

(1) Acta Eruditor. Lipſ. 1687, pag. 658. Take notice that the following words, conciones quotidie habendæ eſſent, are not to be underſtood as if Mr. Claude had preached every day, for the Abridgment of his Life ſays only, that Sermons were preached every day in the church of Nimes, there being three or four Miniſters at leaſt, belonging to it.

(2) Abregé de ſa Vie, pag. 15.

(3) Idem, pag. 10.

(4) Idem, ibid.

When Mr. Claude's Library was ſold at the Hague, it was found, that he had wrote a great many particulars in his copy of this book of Cardinal Richelieu; on which account many people were eager to purchaſe it. I have been told, that it was ſent to France ſoon after, to be lodged in the King's Library.

[B] He wrote a little Book, which occaſioned the moſt famous diſpute, that was ever carried on in France, between the Proteſtants and Roman-Catholicks (5).] Meſſieurs de Port-Royal were at that time uſing their utmoſt endeavours, to make a convert of Mr. de Turenne to the Romiſh Religion; and for that purpoſe they employed an argument which was pleaſant enough, viz. to ſhew, that the Proteſtant Churches had always believed, what is taught in that of the Romaniſts, concerning the Real Preſence. The latter preſented him with a little piece, in which they pretended to prove, that a change of belief, ſuch as the Proteſtants ſuppoſe, is impoſſible. Mr. de Turenne's Lady, who always dreaded what happened after her deceaſe, viz. that her huſband would turn Roman Catholic, did all that lay in her power to confirm him in the Proteſtant Faith. For this reaſon, ſhe cauſed an anſwer to be made to the piece of Meſſieurs de Port-Royal. Mr. Claude was appointed to write it, and he acquitted himſelf admirably well on this occaſion. It was thought to be ſo very ingenious, ſo delicate and ſtrong, that ſeveral copies were taken of it (6). Meſſieurs de Port-Royal hearing this, thought themſelves abſolutely obliged to anſwer it, which they did, by publiſhing in 1664, the famous work, entitled, La Perpetuité de la Foi de l'Egliſe Catholique touchant l'Euchariſtie. i. e. "the Perpetuity of the Catholick Church with regard "to the Euchariſt." It contains the firſt piece, and a reply to Mr. Claude's anſwer. This Miniſter, who was then at Montauban, wrote a reply, which was printed with his firſt anſwer in 1666 (7). This work is entitled, Réponſe aux deux Traitez intitulez, la Perpetuité de la Foi de l'Egliſe Catholique touchant l'Euchariſtie. i. e. "An Anſwer to the Perpetuité &c." It made a prodigious noiſe, ſo that every Country-Parſon who had never heard of Du Moulin or of Daillé, knew very well that Mr. Claude, the Proteſtant Miniſter, had attacked the holy Sacrament in a very dangerous manner. The Country-Preachers, from thoſe of the greateſt fame to ſuch as were moſt obſcure among 'em, affected to preach, during the Sacrament-week, and on all other occaſions, againſt the poſſibility of this innovation. The pulpits at that time rung with nothing but Paſchaſius, Lanfrank, Ratramnus &c. It is certain, that the beautiful turn, the politeneſs and good ſenſe, which accompanied the ſolid arguments of Mr. Claude, contributed vaſtly to the great fame, which his Book acquired: but nevertheleſs, the ſtate in which Janſeniſm was at that time, was one of the chief cauſes of the mighty noiſe this work made. Several Biſhops were profeſſed friends to Meſſieurs de Port-Royal; many others favoured them ſecretly; this party had, in all places, a choſen number of learned men, who dared to ſpeak their thoughts (for men were not prohibited ſpeaking on theſe matters till 1668;) and words could never deſcribe the warmth with which the Janſeniſts extolled the Books of their party. Hence it happened, that in labouring for their own glory, they ſpread in all places the name and merit of Mr. Claude. Their enemies, on the other ſide, endeavoured very ſtrenuouſly, tho' by indirect and hidden practices, to ſet off the work of this Miniſter (8): they conſidered his triumph as nothing, provided it could but leſſen the joy of Meſſieurs de Port-Roial. This doubtleſs contributed very much to heighten the reputation which Mr. Claude's Book obtained; ſo neceſſary it is for ſome books to appear at certain ſeaſons (9), and to be wrote againſt certain perſons, rather than in other junctures.

(5) See the Remark [O] of the Article ARNAUD (Anthony) Doctor of the Sorbonne.

(6) Here follows what is ſaid in the Preface of the Perpetuité &c.
"His party extolled it in an extraordinary manner, and took ſo many written copies of it, which they ſpread every where, both in Paris and in the Provinces; ſo that, had it been printed, it could not have been made much more public."

(7) See citation (58) of the Article (ARNAULD (Anthony) Doctor of the Sorbonne.

(8) This work was ſold by the Bookſeller of the Archbiſhop of Paris. See the Preface of Mr. Claude's book againſt Father Nouet.

(9) Quantum intereſt in quæ tempora cujuſque virtus incideriт!

he preached the day after his arrival (c), and accepted the offer which the people of that Church made him. Four years after he was forbid by the Court to exercise his functions in Montauban, which obliged him to go a second time to Paris. He continued there near nine months, without being able to remove the weighty obſtacles which oppoſed his return to Montauban.... During this interval, he was invited to the Church of Bourdeaux, but the Congregation of Charenton being unwilling to loſe a perſon of Mr. Claude's abilities (d), invited him to it in 1666. From that time, till the revocation of the Edict of Nantz, he did very great ſervice to that Church, and to the whole body, by his excellent works, and by the detail he deſcended to, with regard to the affairs which the Deputies of Provinces communicated to him. No man was ever better qualified to head either a Conſiſtory or a Synod [C], or to diſpute off-hand. He diſcovered this latter talent in the laſt conference which Mademoiſelle de Duras deſired to hear [D]. He was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of the Miniſters, by the manner in which the Court ordered him to leave the Kingdom [E]. He made Holland his aſylum, where he met with a very kind reception, and was honoured with a conſiderable penſion by the Prince of Orange. He uſed to preach from time to time at the Hague, and his laſt Sermon was on Chriſtmas day 1686. He diſplayed his excellent talent at that time, to as great or greater advantage than ever, and the Princeſs of Orange was extremely well pleaſed with his Sermon. He fell ill that very day of a ſickneſs, of which he died the 13th of January 1687. Being on his death-bed, he gave ſeveral teſtimonies of his piety, and the ſincerity with which he had profeſſed the Proteſtant Religion (e). His death was a great grief to the whole

(c) It was a Sacrament Day.

(d) Abregé de ſa Vie de Mr. Claude, pag. 43.

(e) Extracted from the Abridgment of his Life, written by Mr. de la Deveze, Paſtor at the Hague. I have corrected the error with regard to the date of the year of Mr. Claude's birth.

Mr. Arnauld undertook to refute Mr. Claude's book, and publiſhed a large quarto volume in 1669. Some time after, two more volumes were made public. But before the firſt volume in queſtion appeared, Father Nouet, a famous Jeſuit, engaged in the controverſy, and publiſhed a book againſt Mr. Claude, who wrote an anſwer to it (10), that ſome prefer to his other pieces, and which was his favourite piece (11). Father Nouet made no reply, but publiſhed a Letter containing ſixty pages in 8vo (12). The Author of the Journal des Savans diſcharged his artillery againſt Mr. Claude, by inſerting the Extract of that Jeſuit's Book (13). He expatiated very much on the qualities and manner of diſputing (which he ſays was one of the characteriſtics of that Miniſter's genius) and as he ſpoke of him in very unhandſome terms, Mr. Claude was not endued with patience enough to be ſilent on this occaſion. He accordingly publiſhed a very witty Provinciale (14) againſt the Author of the Journal, which was anſwered by the latter ſome time after (15). This conteſt went no farther; but with regard to Mr. Arnauld, Mr. Claude was forced to engage in a very laborious ſtudy, in order to examine the tenets of the Greek Church, and thoſe of the Eaſtern Schiſmaticks. He alſo was obliged to read a great many Travels, and to build a multitude of hypotheſes. Mr. Claude ſhewed all the learning and abilities he had ever diſplayed in the Anſwer he publiſhed to Mr. Arnauld's firſt volume. The Janſeniſts have only made a general Reply to this Book of Mr. Claude. It is true indeed that, with regard to the opinion of the Greeks, Father Paris Friar of St. Genevieve came to their aſſiſtance, and took up the pen againſt this Miniſter. The ſubject of the diſpute was changed ſome time after: The Janſeniſts publiſhed their Préjugez légitimes contre le Calviniſme. i. e. "Juſt Prejudices againſt Calviniſm," which Mr. Claude refuted by one of the beſt works, that either himſelf or any other Proteſtant Clergyman ever compoſed; and which was not anſwered till 1684 (16) by Mr. Nicolle in his Prétendus Reformez convaincus de Schiſme: i. e. "The Proteſtants proved "Schiſmaticks."

(10) It was printed in 1668.

(11) See l'Abregé de ſa Vie, pag. 49.

(12) It is directed to Mr. Claude, and dated the 1ſt of Oct. 1668; whence we do not know what he means in page 5. where he aſſerts, that the anſwer which he wrote to Mr. Claude, had employed that Miniſter near three years, for F. Nouet's work was not publiſhed before the latter end of 1666; the Booksellers put 1667 in the title.

(13) In the Journal of June the 28th 1667.

(14) It is an anonymous Letter, and entitled, Lettre d'un Provincial à un de ſes Amis ſur le ſujet du Journal du 28 Juin 1667.

(15) In the Journal of December the 26th 1667.

(16) It is entitled, Defenſe de la Reformation. It was firſt printed in 4to at Roan anno 1673; and afterwards at the Hague, in 1682, 12mo.

[C] No man was ever better qualified to head either a Conſiſtory or Synod.] This cannot be deſcribed better than by the following words. "Mr. Claude ſhone "chiefly when at the head of an Aſſembly, as was "manifeſt during the ſeveral years that he preſided in "the Conſiſtory of Charenton, and in more Synods "than one of the Iſle of France, where he aſſiſted in qua"lity of a Moderator .... Whenever matters of a "difficult nature in themſelves, (and ſtill more per"plexed by the cloud which the ignorance or cun"ning of the parties threw over it,) were propoſed in "the Synod, Mr. Claude was poſſeſſed of ſo ſagaci"ous a faculty, that he in a moment would clear up "all theſe confuſed ideas, and lay down a clear and "exact propoſition; and give his opinion thereupon in "the moſt perſpicuous manner, as tho' the opinions "had really depended only on a negative or an affirmative; a characteriſtick by which we may al"ways form a true judgment of a perſon who preſides "in an Aſſembly; ſince the choice of ſubjects, and "the beautiful light in which they are placed, are a "ſure proof of the ready wit, clearneſs, and ſtrength of "a great genius (17)."

(17) Abregé de ſa Vie, pag. 75, & ſeq.

[D] Or to diſpute off-hand. He diſcovered this latter talent in the laſt Conference which Mademoiſelle de Duras deſired to hear.] This Lady (18) would not forſake her Religion till ſhe had heard the Biſhop of Meaux and Mr. Claude diſpute in her preſence: ſhe accordingly had her wiſh, for theſe two brave and illuſtrious Champions diſputed together at the Counteſs de Roie's her ſiſter's, the firſt of March 1678. Each Diſputant wrote the relation of his conference, and aſcribed the victory to himſelf. Theſe relations were at firſt only handed about in manuſcript; but at laſt the Biſhop of Meaux publiſhed his Relation anno 1682, and that of Mr. Claude followed ſoon after. The Authors of the Acta Eruditorum have not diſtinguiſhed the date of the Conference, from that in which thoſe Relations were publiſhed. Poſtea, ſay they (19), anno 1683, occaſione illuſtris Duraſiæ à Reformata ad Romanam religionem tranſeuntis, colloquium cum Epiſcopo Condomenſi, poſtea Meldenſi, habuit, cujus relationem, ut notum eſt, uterque edidit. i. e. "Afterwards, ſay they, "in 1683, on occaſion of the moſt illuſtrious Made"moiſelle de Duras's forſaking the Proteſtant Religion "and turning Roman Catholic, Mr. Claude had a "conference with the Biſhop of Condom, afterwards "Biſhop of Meaux. 'Tis well known that both diſ"putants publiſhed their reſpective Relations of this "Conference."

(18) Siſter of the Marſhal de Duras, & de Lorge.

(19) Acta Eruditor. 1687, pag. 661.

[E] He was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of the Miniſters, by the manner, in which the Court ordered him to leave the Kingdom.] Here follows a paſſage from pag. 100 of the Epitome of his Life. He, like the other Miniſters, had a fortnight allowed him to leave the Kingdom: but the Romiſh Clergy found means to ſhorten even that time; for on Monday the 22d of October (20) 1685, the day on which the Edict of the Revocation of that of Nantz was regiſtred in the Parliament of Paris, Mr. Claude, at ten in the morning, was ordered to leave France in four and twenty hours (21). He obeyed with the utmoſt ſubmiſſion, and ſet out, attended by one of the King's footmen, that was ordered to conduct him to the frontiers of France, and who, tho' he executed his orders faithfully, yet treated Mr. Claude with civility; ſo true it is, that exalted merit has a great influence even on the hearts of thoſe, who do not love the Proteſtant Religion ..... He ſet out from Paris, in the Bruſſels coach; and his fame flying before him, procured him ſeveral obliging offices from many perſons in his journey (22). He paſſed thro' Cambray where he lay; and was there preſented with ſome refreſhments by the Jeſuits; the Father Rector did Mr. Claude the honour to pay him a viſit, which Mr. Claude returned; and the difference of Religion did not interrupt this obliging correſpondence and marks of a reciprocal eſteem.

(20) It is December in l'Abregé de ſa Vie. In the Extract which the Authors of Acta Erudit. gave of his life in 1687, pag. 662, there's die 7 Decemb.

(21) This he himſelf declares in pag. 92, 93. of the Plaintes des Proteſtans.

(22) Abregé de ſa Vie, pag. 101.

whole party, and affected all the judicious among them ſo much the more, as ſcarce any one but himſelf was capable of removing the errors into which ſome raſh writers led perſons of credulous diſpoſitions, and of ballancing the faction of thoſe people. Many have ſaid, that had he lived longer, ſo many ſcandalous quarrels would not have broke out, which have ſince given ſo much pleaſure to the Roman Catholics; but many others believe and aſſert, that it would have been impoſſible for any man to have ſtopt the motion which that wheel had already taken before Mr. Claude died. I cannot ſay which of theſe two opinions is the moſt juſt (f). He left a ſon, a Miniſter [F], who publiſhed ſeveral fine pieces of his deceaſed father. I would expatiate in the commendation of Mr. Claude, and againſt the rude efforts of ſlander, did I not find that the Editors of Moreri in Holland, ſay all that can be advanced on this head. I ſhall cite ſome errors of the ſuppldment of Moreri, printed in France [G]. Monſr. Paulian has treated Mr. Claude very injuriouſly

(f) Non noſtrum inter vos tantas componere lites. Virgil. Eclog. 3. ver. 108. i. e. "It is not for us "to end ſuch "mighty ſtrife."

[F] He left a ſon, a Miniſter.] Mr. Claude married at Caſtres in 1648 (23), and his wife brought him Isaac Claude, who was born at St. Afrique the 5th of March 1653 (24). "His father was very fond "of him, and very well pleaſed to find that his incli-"nations led him to the Miniſtry; and that the choice "he made, and which ought to be free and uncon-"ſtrained, correſponded ſo well with his deſires. He had "had the ſatisfaction to find his ſon capable of im-"proving from his learning as well as example. He "ſtudied in the Univerſities of France under the ableſt "Maſters, who inſtructed him very carefully; after "which he returned to his father, who compleated "him in his ſtudies, eſpecially in thoſe relating to the "Pulpit; after which he was examined at Sedan in "September 1678, and judged very worthy of being "admitted into the Miniſtry. He was invited by the "Congregation of the Church of Clermont in Beau-"voiſis, fourteen leagues from Paris, in the Synod of "the Iſle of France; and his father had the ſatisfac-"tion to impoſe his hands on him the 9th of Octo-"ber 1678 (25)," and to ſee him Miniſter of the Walloon Church at the Hague, when he retired to Holland in 1685. Isaac Claude died at the Hague, July the 29th 1695. He was the fourth of his family, who, from father to ſon, had exerciſed the miniſterial functions, for his great grandfather was a Miniſter. Mr. de la Deveze has omitted this circumſtance. Mr. Claude left one or two ſons who are now purſuing their ſtudies.

(23) Idem, pag. 14.

(24) Idem, pag. 15.

(25) Idem, pag. 74, 75.

[G] I ſhall cite ſome errors of the Supplement of Moreri, printed in France.] Firſt, Salvetat (26) the native place of Mr. Claude, is not a ſmall Town of the upper Languedoc, at a little diſtance from Caſtres. II, It is an error to aſſert, that Mr. Claude's father wiſhing earneſtly to ſee his ſon ſoon in the pulpit, ordained him before he was 25 years of age. Mr. Claude was appointed Miniſter in 1645, and conſequently was 26 years old when he began to exerciſe his vocation. Now, at this age, thoſe who are deſigned for the pulpit, and are not yet admitted into the Miniſtry, begin to be look'd upon as veteran Candidates for it (27). It is therefore a falſe aſſertion to ſay, that Mr. Claude's father was impatient about his ſon. III, It is abſurd to ſuppoſe, that, to ſatisfy his impatience, he was obliged to employ his credit and intereſt in upper Guienne and upper Languedoc: for, had he been impatient, this circumſtance muſt have been founded merely on his ſon's having been admitted to Orders, when he had ſtudied Divinity during three years only; but a Candidate for Orders of ſo much good ſenſe as Mr. Claude, and of his age, makes a greater progreſs in three years than others in four or five. IV, Mr. Claude did not read public Lectures of Divinity at Nimes. He never was Profeſſor, and only read private Lectures there: this is declared expreſly in the Epitome of his Life (28). V, He did not declare, that he undertook his firſt journey to Paris, with this view only, viz. to ſhew that he had no exception to make againſt the project of a reunion, which was concerting in France. VI, The ſuppoſition made by the Author of the Supplement, viz. that Mr. Claude was prohibited the exerciſe of the functions of a Miniſter in Languedoc, by a Decree of the Council, on account of his averſion to the intended reunion, is conformable to the relation of Mr. de la Deveze (29). But to ſuppoſe, that the King's Arret or Decree contained this reaſon, would be a groſs miſtake. Now, this muſt have been ſuppoſed, ſince it was aſſerted, that Mr. Claude could not pretend to juſtify himſelf, but by ſhewing ſome inclination for a reunion. Let the reader examine carefully the paſſage of the Supplement, wherein the Author endeavours to ſhew that Mr. Claude was guilty of a knaviſh artifice, during this journey; and which this Writer ſtrives to prove by the following remark, viz. Mr. Claude wrote a Book againſt the Piece, entitled, La Perpetuité de la Foi. Let the reader, I ſay, examine this attentively, and he will find that Moreri's Continuator ſuppoſes evidently, that Mr. Claude employed no other means to get his prohibition taken off, but by declaring, that it had been obtained by ſurprize; and that it was not true, as was ſuppoſed in the Decree, that he oppoſed the intended deſign of a reunion. A Miniſter who ſhould have ſpoke in this ſtrain at Court, and who nevertheleſs had wrote a controverſial Treatiſe like that of Mr. Claude, would certainly have been a knave. But it is a falſity to aſſert, that he endeavoured to clear himſelf at Court by ſuch a method. VII, I think that reaſon a very falſe one, which is given in the Supplement, for his not accepting the offer of the Univerſity of Groninguen. I have always heard, that the invitations of the Conſiſtory of Charenton, and the entreaties of ſeveral particular perſons, were the only motives which determined Mr. Claude to refuſe civilly the offer made him by the States of Groninguen. VIII, It is not true, that even the French Proteſtants themſelves never look'd upon his Sermons as excellent ones; for they contained all thoſe things which the Proteſtants in queſtion could deſire: ſuch as the greateſt regularity and order, a deep ſearch into Divinity, much ſublimity and majeſty, a nervous, maſculine eloquence, and a juſtneſs of argument. The Proteſtants pay no regard to thoſe worldly ornaments, nor to that effeminate kind of Rhetorick, of which the Romiſh Preachers make ſo great a parade. All that can be ſaid on this ſubject, is, that Mr. Claude had not a pleaſing voice; which gave occaſion to a ſmart ſaying of Mr. Morus (30), which however did not leſſen the great fame and the eſteem in which his Sermons were had. IX, It is an errant falſhood to aſſert, that the perſons of the greateſt learning among the Calviniſts have owned, that the diſtinguiſhing characteriſticks of Mr. Claude, were properly, that of an able ſophiſter, and of an artful declaimer. X. Nothing can be more ſurprizing, than their pretending to prove this by ſome particulars which the illuſtrious Viſcount de Turenne might have ſaid; for it is univerſally known, that this Hero, who poſſeſſed a wonderful genius with regard to all parts of the ſcience of war, and the functions of a General, did not pretend to be a ſcholar; and could not be conſidered as a competent judge in controverſial writings. XI. Nothing can have more the air of a romance, I mean of that kind of romance, the incidents of which are moſt repugnant to truth and veriſimilitude, than this pretended project of Mr. Claude, in which the Proteſtant Miniſters were to deſire a conference with the Romiſh Biſhops. It is univerſally known, that under the reign of Mr. Claude (if I may ſo expreſs my ſelf) both himſelf and the reſt of the Proteſtant Miniſters look'd upon all propoſals, with regard to a controverſy or conference, as ſo many ſnares. One of them (31) publiſhed a work on this ſubject (32), wherein he ſhewed, that great care ought to be taken, not to fall into this ſnare. XII. I have nothing to obſerve, with regard to the myſterious conference, which it is pretended Mr. Claude deſired to have with the Archbiſhop of Paris. This is refuted in a Memoir which the ſon of that great man inſerted in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages

(26) It ſhould be Sauvetat.

(27) The age of 27 years, which the Authors of Acta Eruditorum diſcovered from the Relation of Mr. de la Deveze, ſhould have made them attend to the paſſage which they have tranſlated in the following manner. Manus imponente patre qui filium functioni ſacræ Maturæ addici ceptabat. Acta Erudit. 1687, pag. 658.

(28) Pag. 18.

(29) In the Abrégé de la Vie de Mr. Claude, pag. 19.

(30) When Mr. Claude was firſt deſigned for a Miniſter of the Church of Charenton, he preached a Sermon there, which being ended, Mr. Morus ſaid, "All "the voices will "be for him, "except his "own."

(31) The ſame who afterwards publiſhed "Hiſtoire de l'Edit. de Nantes.

(32) It is mentioned in the Republique des Lettres, for May 1685, pag. 574. of the 2d edition. See alſo the month of December of the ſame year, pag. 1333.

injuriouſly, in his Critique of Mr. Jurieu's Paſtoral Letters; and has falſely aſcribed to him a book, and the idea or deſign of another [H]. He has even preſumed to aſſert in print, that his death gave great ſatisfaction to the Author of thoſe Paſtoral Letters.

(33) For Nov. 1689, pag. 133, & ſeq.

vrages des Savans (33). See alſo the Dutch Edition of Moreri. It is a ſhame to our age, that any perſons ſhould have been ſo bold, as to inſert in an Hiſtorical Dictionary printed at Paris, ſo very improbable a romance; and that this boldneſs ſhould have been ſuffered to paſs uncenſured. XIII. Mr. Claude left Paris to go to the Hague, the 22d of October, and not the 22d of December 1685. XIV. Laſtly, it is falſe to declare, that Mr. Claude ever admitted the infallibility of the Church.

[H] Paulianus has falſly aſcribed to him a Book, and the idea or plan of another.] He aſcribes to him the Letter concerning ſome pacific Proteſtants, publiſhed in 1685. He aſſerts, that Mr. Claude owns himſelf the Author of it, in ſome Letters; and that a Lady, his particular friend, had lately owned this publickly. He cites in the margin, Lettre à Mademoiſelle Dangeau, & Madame de la Garde (34). Theſe proofs ſeem very ſtrong, and nevertheleſs, Mr. Claude did not write the Letter concerning the pacific Proteſtants, I am fully perſuaded, that he never informed any perſon in writing, that he was the Author of the Letter in queſtion. The Author of the critique of the Paſtoral Letters has committed as great a miſtake, in aſſerting (35), that Mr. Claude undertook to write the Hiſtory of the Perſecution, under the title of Hiſtoire Dragonale, but died before he had finiſh'd it. Mr. Claude had too fine a pen to chooſe ſuch a title: beſides, he was not writing the Hiſtory of the laſt perſecution; but that of the Princes of Orange.

(34) This is about the end of the Book.

(35) Pag. 16.

CLAUDIUS, in Latin Tiberius Claudius Druſus, a Roman Emperor, aſcended the throne after the death of Caligula his nephew, the year of Rome 794 (a). Moreri has enlarged very much on this Emperor. I ſhall leave to another opportunity the examination of what this writer relates concerning him, and the additions I my ſelf could furniſh on that head. I ſhall now obſerve only that this Emperor would not ſuffer any perſon who was ignorant of the Latin Tongue to poſſeſs an employment. It was for this reaſon that he removed a Magiſtrate, ſprung from one of the moſt illuſtrious families of Greece, and reduced him to the condition of a ſtranger or foreigner. Rome had long before diſcovered this jealouſy for the majeſty of its language; and the like paſſion has been ſeen in other countries [A]. This Emperor however ſet a high value on the Greek

(a) That is, the 41ſt of the Chriſtian Æra.

[A] He would not ſuffer any perſon who was ignorant of the Latin tongue, to poſſeſs an employment. . . . Rome had long before diſcovered this jealouſy for the Majeſty of its language and the like paſſion has been ſeen in other countries.] I have prepared my Reader (1) to expect ſome particulars relating to the zeal and veneration which nations have for their reſpective languages. We will begin with the proof of what we have advanced concerning the Emperour Claudius. Splendidum virum, Græciæque Provinciæ Principem, verum Latini ſermonis ignarum non modo albo judicum evaſit, ſed etiam in peregrinitatem redegit (2). i. e. "He not only erazed out of the roll of Judges, but "even deprived of his freedom, a very conſiderable "man, and deputy of a Province of Greece, who was "ignorant of the Latin tongue." In judging an affair of importance, which related to the Lycians, he aſked ſome queſtion in Latin of one of their Deputies who was born in Lycia, and had been made a citizen of Rome: but finding that the Deputy did not underſtand the Latin tongue, he took away his freedom; for, added he, thoſe who are ignorant of the language of Rome, cannot be Romans. Εἰπὼν μὴ δεῖν Ῥωμαῖον εἶναι τὸν μὴ κ᾽ τὴν διάλεξιν σφῶν ἐπιστάμενον (3). I ſhall take notice by the way of a miſtake of Caſaubon: he ſuppoſes that this Deputy was born in Rome (4), and he probably conſulted the Latin tranſlation with more attention than the original Greek; for had he duly weighed the import of the following words: Ἀνὴρ μὲν τὸ ἀρχαῖον ὢν ὁς, Ῥωμαῖος ϗ γεγονὼς. . . . i. e. "A "Lycian originally, but a citizen of Rome at that "time," he would have found, eſpecially by what follows, that they were ill tranſlated, Lycium quidem origine, Romanum tamen natum i. e. "ſprung from "a Lycian family, but born in Rome." The tranſlator of Xiphilinus has ſucceeded better, he explaining them as follows, Qui olim Lycius, tum civis Romanus erat (5).

(1) In the note [F] of the Article ATTILA.

(2) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 16.

(3) Dio, lib. 59. ad ann. 796. pag. m. 777.

(4) De legato Lyciorum quodam, oriundo quidem è Lycia, ſed nato Romæ. Caſaub. in Sueton. Claud. cap. 16.

(5) Xiphil. in Claudio, pag. m. 148.

Valerius Maximus obſerves, as a proof of the ancient gravity of the Romans, that their Magiſtrates always anſwered the Greeks in Latin, and obliged them to make uſe of an interpreter. They did this, not only at Rome, but alſo in Greece and Aſia. To ſhew my readers the full extent of their policy, I will quote the paſſage of this Author, by which he will ſee, how ambitious the Romans were to ſpread their language. Magiſtratus vero priſci quantopere ſuam populique Romani majeſtatem retinentes ſe geſſerint, hinc cognoſci potaſt, quod inter cetera obtinendæ gravitatis indicia, illud quoque magna cum perſeverantia cuſtodiebant, ne Græcis unquam niſi Latine reſponſa darent. Quinetiam ipſa linguæ volubilitate, qua plurimum valent, excuſſa, per interpretem loqui cogebant, non in urbe tantum noſtra, ſed etiam in Græcia, & Aſia; quo ſcilicet Latinæ vocis honos per omnes gentes venerabilior diffunderetur. Nec illis deerant ſtudia doctrinæ, ſed nulla non in re gallium togæ ſubjici debere arbitrabantur, indignum eſſe exiſtimantes, illecebris, & ſuavitate literarum imperii pondus & auctoritatem domari (6). i. e. "How greatly zealous "the Magiſtrates of antient times were, to retain their "own majeſty and that of the Roman people, may "be known from this circumſtance, that, among the "examples of enforcing their grandeur, they obſerv-"ed the following cuſtom inviolably; viz. to never "to treat with the Greeks, unleſs theſe would conſent "do it in Latin. Farther, they obliged thoſe people "to explain by an interpreter all ſuch expreſſions as "had flowed from the great volubility of their tongues, "for which they are noted. This was enjoined, not "only in Rome, but likewiſe in Greece and Aſia; "in order that the glory of the Latin Tongue might "be ſpread in the moſt auguſt manner poſſible thro' "all Nations of the univerſe. Nor were they un-"ſkilled in learning; but it was their opinion that "Greece ſhould always give way to the Romans, and "that it was inglorious for the face and majeſty of "Empire, to ſubmit to the delicacies and ſweets "of language." He obſerves ſoon after, that Molo the Rhetorician, who taught Cicero eloquence, was the firſt man that was allowed to ſpeak Greek in the Senate, which afterwards became a cuſtom. Quis ergo huic conſuetudini, qua nunc Græcis actionibus aures curiæ exſurdantur, januam patefacit? ut opinor, Molo rhetor, qui ſtudia M. Ciceronis acuit. Eum namque ante omnes exterarum gentium in ſenatu ſine interprete auditum conſtat. Quem honorem non immerito cepit, quoniam ſummam vim Romanæ eloquentiæ adjuverat (7). i. e. "Who therefore firſt brought in this cuſtom, by which "the ears of the Court are deafened with pleadings "in Greek? If I miſtake not, it was Molo the Rhe-"torician, who improved Cicero in his ſtudies. For "it is certain that he was the firſt Foreigner whom the "Senate permitted to ſpeak without employing an "interpreter. Molo was worthy of this honour, he "having added the greateſt ſtrength to the Roman "eloquence." Dion confirms what Valerius Maximus ſays on this occaſion, viz that cauſes were pleaded in the Greek tongue at Rome, under the Empire of Tiberius (8); nevertheleſs, this Emperor would not permit any ſoldier born in Greece, to give evidence in his native

(6) Val. Maxim. lib. 2. cap. 2. num. 2. pag. m. 140, 141.

(7) Idem, ibid. nnm. 3. pag. 142.

(8) Dio, lib. 57. pag. 702. ad ann. 769.

(b) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 42.

Greek tongue (b), and even ſpoke it, when he himſelf anſwered the Embaſſadors in the Senate.

CLAVIUS

native language before a Judge (9). Dion informs us of this particular. Suetonius mentions it; but it is not probable, that he wrote theſe words, which are found in his Book, Militem quoque Græce teſtimonium interrogatum niſi Latine reſpondere vetuit (10). i. e. "He enacted, that when a ſoldier ſhould be interrogated or examined in Greek, he ſhould make his anſwers only in Latin." It is better to read Græcum than Græce; for it was no leſs unworthy the Majeſty of Rome, to examine witneſſes in the Greek tongue, than to permit them to anſwer in that language; for which reaſon we ought to conclude, that had Tiberius allowed the one, he would not have prohibited the other; and that ſince he forbid the anſwers to be made in Greek, he would not permit interrogatories to be made in that language. His ſcruples, when he was obliged to employ a Greek term in the Senate, are related by Suetonius (11). He would rather have the thoughts expreſt paraphraſtically in decrees, than have a foreign word employed in them (12). However, this rule was not ſo general, but that it admitted of ſome exceptions; a perfect uniformity was never ſeen in the adminiſtration of the beſt governed States. The Reader muſt therefore not be ſurprized, to hear that the Roman Embaſſador made a ſpeech to the Tarentines in Greek. As he did not pronounce this language well, they laughed at him. This was one of the affronts that were put upon him, and which the Republic of Rome reſented very much to their coſt (13). The Romans were not then ſo powerful as when Cicero was reproached, as tho' he had been guilty of an unpardonable error, for having ſpoke in Greek, before a Grecian Senate. Ille negat & ait indignum facinus eſſe quod ego in Senatu Græco verba feciſſem, quod quidem apud Græcos Græce loquutus eſſem, id ferri nullo modo poſſe (14). "He declares that it was an unworthy action in me, to ſpeak in a Grecian Senate; and that I did an unſufferable thing in addreſſing the Greeks in their own language." This was the ſubject of the complaint; and not for his diſcourſing in Greek, at his own houſe, with Carneades, and the reſt of the Embaſſadors of Greece. The Author of the latter relation (15), has committed a wretched blunder. Cicero was not born till long after Carneades's Embaſſy; but this is not the only blunder I could point out in the above cited words of the Sieur le Bret. I muſt not omit a circumſtance, that furniſhes us with an example, which Caſaubon made an ill uſe of. Paulus Æmilius having ſubdued Macedonia, ſignified his orders, in Latin, to the vanquiſhed Macedonians; but Octavius the Prætor explained them preſently after in Greek. Silentio per præconem facto Paulus Latine quæ Senatui, quæ ſibi ex conſilii ſententia viſa eſſent pronunciavit, ea Cn. Octavius Prætor (nam & ipſe aderat) interpretata ſermone Græco referebat (16). Caſaubon pretends to prove by this paſſage of Livy, that the Magiſtrates of Rome employed their own tongue, becauſe they generally could not ſpeak Greek (17); for, adds he, thoſe who ſpoke Greek fluently, uſed it occaſionally; and he immediately gives an inſtance of this in Octavius the Prætor. This is plainly ſuppoſing, that Æmilius could not ſpeak Greek; and that had he been able, he would have ſignified his orders in that language: but this is a miſtake, for he ſpoke it fluently (18); and the reaſon why he at that time ſpoke Latin, was merely to give his words an air of authority, and becauſe it was the language of the Supreme Power or Republic of Rome.

A multitude of Authors have taken notice of a paſſage of St. Auſtin, which I ſhall cite here, concerning the policy of the ancient Romans, who at the ſame time that they ſubdued a people, obliged them to ſpeak their language, whence there was occaſion for a great number of interpreters. Opera data eſt ut imperioſa civitas non ſolum jugum, verum etiam linguam ſuam domitis gentibus per pacem ſocietatis imponeret. Per quam non deeſſet imo & abundaret etiam interpretum copia (19). We find by a paſſage of Gregory Thaumaturgus, that in his time the law was always ſtudied in Latin; for he ſays, that he himſelf had almoſt forgot the Greek tongue, becauſe the Roman Laws were written in a language which perplexed him very much. Ἐκφρασθέντες δὲ καὶ παραδοθέντες τῇ Ῥωμαίων φωνῇ καταπληκτικῇ μὲν καὶ ἀλαζόνι καὶ συσχηματιζομένῃ αὐτῶν τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ τῇ βασιλικῇ, φορτικῇ δὲ ὅμως ἐμοὶ (20). i. e. "They are written and delivered in the Roman tongue, that haughty and formidable language, expreſſive of the power they have obtained; but to me, it is perplexing and barbarous." Triphonius the Civilian obſerves, that all the decrees of Prætors were to be made in Latin (21).

The pains which the Romans took to ſpread their language, had met with ſuch ſucceſs, that in Plutarch's time, there were few perſons but ſpoke Latin (22); and Libanius was very much afraid, leſt the Greek language ſhould be loſt, becauſe the Supreme Authority was lodged in the hands of thoſe, whoſe native tongue was the Latin (23). The Popes joined with Princes in the ſame deſign; and, if we find the Emperour Marcian, a Grecian born, prefer the Latin tongue to his own, in the Council of Chalcedon, where he firſt made a ſpeech in Latin and afterwards in Greek (24); we alſo ſee, that the Deputies of Popes, in the Councils, always read their diſpatches in Latin; and uſed to think it was an act of condeſcenſion in them, when, at the intreaty of all the fathers, they permitted theſe diſpatches to be explained in Greek (25). The public records were, during ſeveral ages, written in Latin, in moſt parts of the Weſtern World; even after it was no longer ſubject to Rome, with regard to Temporals. This will be ſeen hereafter, where I take notice of ſome nations which have aboliſhed this cuſtom. I refer the Reader to Melchior Inchofer's Book entitled, Hiſtoria ſacræ Latinitatis, where he will meet with ſeveral curious particulars, and among others, the following; viz, that it is probable, Jeſus Chriſt ſpoke Latin ſometimes, ſince, as he paid ſo ſtrict an obedience to the Civil Laws, and, as the Romans had eſtabliſhed their language in all places, it is not probable that Chriſt ſhould have diſpenſed with the obſervation of that Law. Beſides, as he was examined in Latin by Pontius Pilate, we are not to doubt but that he anſwered in Latin (26). This is not very conformable to the opinion of Arnobius, who affirms that our Saviour ſpoke but one language, which every one of the Auditors tho' of moſt different countries, took for his native tongue, Unus fuit e nobis qui cum unam emitteret vocem, ab diverſis populis & diſſona oratione loquentibus, familiaribus verborum ſonis & ſuo cuique utens exiſtimabatur eloquio (27).

I will now take notice of the zeal which other nations have ſhewn for their native tongue. The Greeks were famous for it; and I could relate ſeveral ſingular particulars on this head, but the following may ſerve as a ſpecimen. They applauded Themiſtocles (28) for ſentencing to death the Interpreter, who had attended the Embaſſadors of Perſia; and who explained in Greek, the command of thoſe Barbarians, viz, that the Grecians ſhould deliver up the land and ſea to their Sovereign (29). In Themiſtocles's opinion, ſuch a profanation of the Greek tongue, employed to expreſs the arbitrary will of a Barbarian, could be expiated no otherwiſe than by the death of the Author of ſo heinous an innovation. The Greeks were doubtleſs very much grieved when they heard what was ordered at Carthage under the firſt Dionyſius. A decree was there enacted, to forbid all the Carthaginians the ſtudy of the Greek tongue. The cauſe and deſign of this prohibition, was Suniatus's having writ a letter in Greek to Dionyſius the tyrant; and to prevent any perſon from writing or ſpeaking to the enemy, without uſing an interpreter. Dux belli Hanno Carthaginienſis erat; cujus inimicus Suniatus, potentiſſimus ea tempeſtate Pœnorum, cum odio ejus, Græcis literis, Dionyſio adventum exercitus, & ſegnitiem ducis familiariter prænuntiaſſet, comprehenſis epiſtolis, proditionis damnatur: facto ſenatus conſulto, ne quis poſtea Carthaginienſis, aut literis Græcis aut ſermoni ſtuderet; ne aut loqui cum hoſte aut ſcribere ſine interprete poſſet (30). i e. "Hanno, the Carthaginian had the ſupreme command in this war. His enemy, Suniatus, (at that time very powerful in Carthage) out of hatred to him, ſent advice to Dionyſius, in Greek, of the coming of the Army and the

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 71.

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) Idem, ibid.

(13) Dion. Hal. in Excerptis Legat.

(14) Cicero. Orat. 4. in Verrem, cap. 66.

(15) In Verrinis etiam invenimus Marco Tullio quaſi crimen objectum quod domi cum Carneade cæteriſque Græciæ legatis Græce colloquutus fuiſſit. Bretus, in Ordine perantiquo Judiciorum Civilium, cap. 43. folio 85 verſo.

(16) T. Livius, lib. 45. cap. 29.

(17) Caſaub. in Baronii Exercitat. IX. Art. 3. pag. m. 199.

(18) Hæc Græco ſermone Perſeo (Paulus) Latine deinde ſuis, exemplum inſigne cernitis, inquit &c. Livius, lib. 45. cap. 8.

(19) Auguſt. de Civitate Dei, lib. 19. cap. 7.

(20) Gregorius Thaumaturgus, in Laudatione Origenis, apud Caſaubonum Exercit. XIX in Baron. pag. 199.

(21) Triphon. lib. 48. ff. de re judic.

(22) Ὥστ μὲν (Ῥωμαίων) λέγω νῦν ὁμοῦ τι πάντες ἄνθρωποι χρῶνται. Plutarch. in Quæſt. Platonicis circa fin. pag. 1010. D. i. e. "Which "tongue (the "Roman) is "now ſpoke by "all men."

(23) Libanius, de ſua Fortuna, apud Caſaub. Exercit. XIX. in Baron. pag. 201, 202.

(24) See Baronius ad ann. 16. num. 8.

(25) Idem, ibid.

(26) See Melchior Inchofer, Hiſtor. ſacræ Latinitatis, pag. 230. edit. Monach. 1638.

(27) Arnobius, lib. 1. pag. m. 27.

(28) Plut. in Themiſt. pag. 114.

(29) Ἑρμηνέα ὄντα συλλαβὼν διὰ ψηφίσματος ἀπέκτεινεν ὅτι φωνὴν Ἑλληνίδα βαρβάροις προστάγμασι ἐτόλμησε χρῆσαι. Idem, ibid.

(30) Juſt. lib. 20. in fine.

"the

CLAVIUS (CHRISTOPHER) a German Jeſuit, and born in Bamberg, excelled in the knowledge of the Mathematics, and was one of the chief perſons employed to rectify the Calendar, the defence of which he alſo undertook againſt thoſe who criticized it, and eſpecially Scaliger. I am not of opinion that the latter laid down his pen with the humility related by a modern writer [A], nor that Clavius died in the manner related by another modern [B]. The extraordinary humility which Alegambe declares that Clavius

" the indolence of the General; but his Letters having been ſeized, he was condemned as a betrayer " of his country; and a decree was enacted, that " henceforward no Carthaginian ſhould preſume to " ſtudy Greek, in order that they might not be able " to ſpeak or write to an enemy without employing " an Interpreter." I have taken notice elſewhere (31), of what we are told concerning the ambition of Attila for the glory of his native language. The ſame circumſtance is related of ſome Saracen Princes: " The " Greek tongue began to be a little diſuſed in Egypt, " after the conqueſts of the Arabians, in the reign of " the Khaliff Valid, who reſided at Damaſcus: because this Prince forbid the Greeks to employ any " other tongue but Arabick in their public inſtruments; " which prohibition very much increaſed the ignorance " (32) that then became ſo profound in Greece and " Italy (33). The veneration which the Turks have for their tongue, is very ſingular, If what I have read in the life of Bajazet II be true. This Sultan, threatning the Venetians with war: the Republick ſent him an Embaſſador to ſue for peace, Bajazet granted his requeſt, and accordingly the articles of peace written in Latin, were delivered to the Embaſſadors: but Andrew Gritti a Venetian Gentleman, who was acquainted with all the cuſtoms of the Turks, (he having reſided a long time in Conſtantinople) informed the Embaſſador that the Turks never ſtood to any agreement which was not written in their own language. For which reaſon, this Embaſſador was very urgent to have the treaty tranſlated into the language of the country, but in vain. Accordingly, he was no ſooner gone, but Bajazet's fleet ſet ſail, in order to attack the ſtrong holds which the Venetians poſſeſſed in the Morea (34). According to another Author, the Turks aſſert, that their language only is of good uſe in this ſublunary world; that, in Paradiſe, the Arabick tongue will be ſpoke; and that the jargon of the Perſians, their mortal enemies, will be employed in hell (35). Here follows a prerogative of the Sclavonian language. A Gentleman who is ignorant of it, cannot inherit any eſtate, nor enjoy certain lands in Moravia and Bohemia. Apud Bohemos & Moravos lex eſt ne cui illuſtri vel equeſtri ordine nato cujuſquam hæreditatem cernere, prædiave quæ nos Landgutter appellamus, poſſidere liceat, niſi linguæ Sclavonicæ perito (36). The Author who informs us of this, had juſt before ſaid, that in the 16th Century, the King of Spain forced the Moors to leave off ſpeaking their native tongue, and uſe the Spaniſh.

But on the other ſide, ſome nations have been ſo careleſs and indifferent with regard to their own language, that it was very long before they employed it in publick inſtruments. The Spaniards (37) and the Germans (38) began to do this in the XIIIth Century, and the French in the XVIth (39).

[A] I am not of opinion, that the latter laid down his pen with the humility related by a modern Author.] Joſeph Scaliger appeared to be one of the moſt judicious and learned Criticks of the new Calender . . . But Clavius gave him ſuch convincing reaſons for it, that this learned Critick did not refute any longer Clavius's opinions, and even declared, that he thought it glorious to ſubmit to a perſon of ſo great reputation (1). I wiſh Bullart had cited the Book, wherein Scaliger declared this; for was the citation faithful and exact, we ſhould there find an act of modeſty, and at the ſame time, of contradiction. With regard to that of modeſty, the thing ſpeaks itſelf; and as to the other point, if the reader conſults the Scaligerana, he will find that litttle account is there made of Clavius. He is called, Aſs, Dunce, tunbelly'd German (2); a thick ſkull'd Fellow who breakfaſted twice in a morning, and was a great Drinker. He is not treated much better in Scaliger's Letters; Infantiorem, imperitiorem, & magis ridiculum reperies neminem (Chriſtophoro Clavio) ſi quidem unius Geometræ ſcientiam excipias, quam in eo etiam ſi ſtipes eſſet propter longum tempus quo illud ſaxum volvit aliquam oportet eſſe. Quinquaginta enim annos publicè Euclidem legit. Hoc unum excipe, tantus eſt ſtupor hominis ut in iis etiam quæ ad Matheſin ipſam pertinent λιθωδῶς τοφλώτερος ſit (3). i. e. " You will not find any man more " childiſh, ignorant and ridiculous than Chriſtopher " Clavius, if we except Geometry, which ſcience he " has ſtudied ſo many years, that he could not but " have made ſome progreſs in it, tho' he were a mere " block, for he has read public Lectures on Euclid " theſe fifty years. If you therefore except this circumſtance, he is ſo very dull a fellow, that, even " in thoſe things which relate to Mathematicks, he " is as blind as a beetle." Here follows what he ſays in another Book. Certe non video quid mathematica ſtudia Clavio contulerint, qui in his adeo inſans eſt, ut mediocriter literis humanioribus tinctus hæc melius intelligat, quam ille qui toto vitæ ſuæ tempore nihil præter mathematica tractavit (4). i. e. " I really cannot " ſee what advantage Clavius has made of his mathe- " matical ſtudies, ſince he is ſo little ſkilled in them, " that a perſon but indifferently converſant in polite " Literature, may underſtand them better than this " man, tho' he has drudged all his life at nothing but " mathematicks." Perhaps it will be objected, that notwithſtanding all this abuſe, Scaliger may have allowed, that Clavius had maintained the cauſe of the Gregorian Calender admirably well, and this is the ſubject of Bullart's words; but this objection will be ſoon refuted. Nihil vidi ineptius, jejunius, falſius, & impudentius libro Clavii in Elenchum noſtrum de anno Juliano. i. e. " I never ſaw any thing more ſilly, " jejune, falſe and impudent, than the Treatiſe which " Clavius publiſhed againſt my piece concerning the " Julian year." In this manner Scaliger ſpeaks of Clavius in his XXIXth Letter; and, in another place, he writes as follows. Clavius has behaved ſo meanly with regard to the Papal year; de his ad Euſebium: and has even committed miſtakes in his correction: he has ſucceeded worſe than before. . . . . Quæ ſcripſeram graviora tacuit, leviora refutavit, ſed nunc omnia oſtendam in Euſebio (5). i. e. " He has taken no notice " of my ſolid arguments; has refuted thoſe of leſs " conſequence; but now I will prove all to him by Eu- " ſebius."

If Bullart depended on the authority of Richeome, 'tis evident, he did not exactly underſtand the Author's meaning; for this Jeſuit mentions but one Treatiſe antecedent to Clavius's Anſwer, and in which, conſequently, Scaliger did not own, that he acquieſced with the ſolutions of his antagoniſt. Here follow Richeome's words. *I ſhall omit . . . all the mathematical works of Chriſtopher Clavius, who is not only applauded by the late Mr. de Candal, the Euclid of our age: but alſo by Joſeph Scaliger , who goes ſo far as to ſay, that he had rather be cenſured by him, than praiſed by another; an encomium which is given him by a Proteſtant, no friend to our ſociety; and whoſe teſtimony in favour of a Jeſuit, is conſequently the more worthy of belief (6).

[B] . . . Nor that Clavius died in the manner related by another modern.] Paganinus Gaudentius affirms, that Chriſtopher Clavius, viſiting the ſeven Churches of Rome, was thrown down by a mad Bull, who trod over his body and killed him. Chriſtophorus Clavius dum ſeptem urbis templa inviſit à bubalo humi afflictus conteritur & occiditur (7). Such a kind of death befalling a famous Jeſuit, who was ſeventy five years of age, is too ſingular not to have been taken notice of by thoſe who wrote the Elogium of this famous Mathematician. Now it is certain, that neither Alegambe, Southwell, Lorenzo Craſſo, Janus Nicius Erythræus, nor Bullart, have made the leaſt mention of this incident. The following words of Nicius Erythræus prove evidently, that Gaudentius has aſſerted a falſity. Verum in iſtud etiam tantum atque immortalitate dignum ingenium, ſæva mors, cui nihil eſt eximium, nihil intactum, nihil ſanctum, vim & crudelitatem ſuam exercuit; ſed in eo ſevitiæ ſuæ modum adhibuit, quod non antea eſt illi auſa manus afferre, quam

(31) In the laſt Remark of the Article ATTILA.

(32) Compare this with the paſſage from Mariana inſerted in the Remark [E] of the Article CASTILLE (Alphonſo).

(33) Father Rapin's Compariſon of Plato, and of Ariſtotle, Part 4. chap. 3. pag. m. 388.

(34) Du Verdier, Abregé de l'Hiſtoire des Turcs, in the Life of Bajazet II. See alſo Bembo, Hiſtoria Venet. lib. 3. folio 91, verſo edit. Pariſ. 1551.

(35) La Mothe le Vaier, tom. 13. pag. 259. He cites Relat. de Thev. le jeune.

(36) Forſtnerus, in Tacitum, pag. m. 179.

(37) See the Remark [E] of the Article CASTILLE (Alphonſo).

(38) See the Remark [AA] of the article FRANCIS I.

(39) See the ſame Remark.

(1) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 118, 119.

(2) Cardinal du Perron forms the ſame judgment of him. Clavius, ſays he, in his Perroniana, whom the Jeſuits eſteem ſo much, is a heavy blundering fellow, having neither acuteneſs or politeneſs, in ſhort; he is a German looby.

(3) Joſeph. Scaliger. Epiſt. 106.

(4) Idem, Canon. Iſagog. lib. 3.

(5) In Scaligerana.

* Scaliger in Caſtig. Calendar.

(6) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique, pag. 31.

(7) Paganinus Gaudentius in Oratione de Philoſophorum quorundam luctuoſo exitu.

Clavius poſſeſſed [C], does not coincide with other qualities which Lorenzo Craſſo has aſcribed to him; he repreſenting him as very much wedded to his own opinion, and ſtrongly affected by cenſure (a).

(a) Lorenzo Craſſo, Elog. Part 1. pag. 143.

maturitatem ſuam adeptum eum eſſe vidiſſet; nam ſenex Romæ in collegio ſuæ ſocietatis eſt mortuus (8). i. e. "But cruel death, who pays no reſpect to greatneſs or "holineſs, exerciſed his ſavage power even on this "noble genius, who ſo well deſerved to be immortal; "however, he put ſuch bounds to his barbarity, that "he did not dare to give the fatal ſtroke, till he ſaw "him arrived at full maturity; for he died in an ad"vanced age at Rome, in the college of the Order to "which he belonged." Would an Author, who moralizes in this manner on the mitigated cruelty of death, have omitted the tragical incident mentioned by Gaudentius? Here follow alſo the words of Alegambe: Tandem ætate meritiſque gravis Romæ vita defunctus eſt die ſexto Februarii anno M. DXII ætatis LXXV. i. e. "At laſt, being bowed down with years, and poſſeſſed "of the greateſt merit, he died in Rome, the ſixth of "February, 1612, aged 75." Lorenzo Craſſo is to be corrected here, he having fixed it to the ſixth of January.

(8) N. Erythræus, Pinacoth. I. pag. 177, 178.

[C] The extraordinary humility which Alegambe declares that Clavius poſſeſſed.] In quo illud maxime admirandum extiterit, quod cum tanta eruditionis fama ac nominis ſui claritudine tam inſignem pietatem ac modeſtiam perpetuo conjunctam retinuerit, ut nullum ſibi hominem unquam, ſeipſum aliis omnibus poſtponeret (9). i. e. "This circumſtance is chiefly to be admired in him, "viz. that altho' he was ſo much renowned for his "vaſt erudition, yet ſo great was his piety and mo"deſty, that he always preferred other men to him"ſelf."

(9) Alegambe, in Bibliotb. Soc. Jeſu, pag. 74.

CLEOFIS, or CLEOPHIS, an Indian Queen, was diſpoſſeſſed of her dominions by Alexander the Great, but was reſtored to them upon conſenting to yield her ſelf to his embraces; and in this manner ſhe preſerved, by her uncleanneſs, a throne in which ſhe was not able to ſupport her ſelf by courage (a). The ſon this Queen brought to Alexander, was called by that Conqueror's name, and was King of India [A]. With regard to his mother ſhe was called the Royal Strumpet, from the time that ſhe proſtituted her ſelf to Alexander (b). Thus Juſtin relates this incident (c). See alſo Quintus Curtius, Book VIII. chap. x.

(a) Concubitu redemptum regnum ab Alexandro recepit, illecebris conſecuta quod virtute non potuerat. Juſtin. lib. 12. cap. 7.

(b) Propter proſtratam pudicitiam, Stortum regium ab Indis exinde appellata eſt. Juſtin. lib. 12. cap. 7.

(c) Ibid.

[A] The ſon this Queen brought Alexander . . . was King of India.] Aſſacan, her eldeſt ſon, was dead before Alexander invaded her Dominions (1). She had another ſon whom ſhe preſented to that Prince (2). He died before her ſon, by the Conqueror, was of age to aſcend the Throne: perhaps too Alexander's ſon was preſerved, on account of his father's fame. It is aſſerted in Moreri's Dictionary, that the ſon of Alexander and Cleophee (3) was aſſaſſinated or poiſoned by Caſſander; but neither Diodorus Siculus, or Q. Curtius, who are cited on this occaſion, mention this incident.

(1) Q. Curtius, lib. 8. cap. 10.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) She is ſo called in Moreri's Dictionary.

CLEONICE, a young Lady of Byzantium, whom Pauſanias deſired to enjoy, and afterwards killed through miſtake. It is related, that the ghoſt of this maiden tormented him every night [A], as will be ſeen more amply in the remark.

[A] Pauſanias . . . killed thro' miſtake. It is related that the ghoſt of this maiden tormented him every night.] It is related that Pauſanias, being one day in Byzantium, ſent for a noble young maiden, Cleonice by name, in order to have his will of her. This young Lady's relations did not dare to refuſe him, knowing his haughty temper; and therefore ſuffered him to carry her off. The young maiden deſired the ſervants to take away all the lights; but as ſhe was creeping ſoftly in the dark to the bed of Pauſanias, who was aſleep, ſhe had the misfortune to throw down the lamp, which ſtartled Pauſanias out of his ſleep; and he, ſuddenly imagining that it was ſome ruffian, who was come to murther him treacherouſly, he thereupon immediately ſeized his dagger, which lay under his bolſter, and wounded the young Lady in ſuch a manner, that ſhe died ſoon after: however her Ghoſt never ſuffered Pauſanias to be at reſt, but appeared to him every night, juſt as he was going to ſleep, repeating aloud to him, in an angry tone of voice, ſome heroic verſes, the ſubſtance of which is as follows:"

Walk upright, and revere the laws of juſtice,
Or dread the worſt of ills.

"This outrage incenſed all the Allies to ſuch a degree, "that they beſieged Pauſanias, under the conduct of "Cimon, in Byzantium, from whence he nevertheleſs eſcaped privately. And as the ghoſt of the "maiden ſtill tormented him, and did not allow him "a moment's reſt, he fled to the city of Heraclea, "where was a Temple, in which the ſouls of deceaſed "perſons uſed to be invoked; and he there called upon that of Cleonice, to beſeech her to mitigate her "anger. The ghoſt of this maiden appeared immediately to him, and ſaid, that as ſoon as he ſhould "be come to Sparta, he would be freed from all his "torments, by which, in my opinion, was tacitly "underſtood the death he was to ſuffer in that city: "thus ſeveral Hiſtorians relate the abovementioned in"cident (1)." Nothing like this is told of poor Dido, who had ſuffered more than Cleonice; for Æneas not only was the cauſe of her laying violent hands on herſelf, but alſo robbed that Queen of her honour. She deſigned to revenge herſelf on him after her death, and to return back from hell, to haunt him from place to place. Nevertheleſs, it is not ſaid, that her ghoſt tormented Æneas. Here follows the menace ſhe made him before her death; it is expreſſed in ſuch a manner as may be liable to cenſure.

(1) Plutarch, in the Life of Cimon, pag. 482. See alſo Pauſanias, lib. 3. cap. 17. pag. m. 252.

Sequar atris ignibus abſens;
Et cum frigida mors animâ ſeduxerit artus,
Omnibus umbra locis adero; dabis, improbe, pœnas;
Audiam, & hæc manes veniet mihi fama ſub imos (2).

(2) Virgil. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 384.

That is,

"Dido ſhall come, in a black ſulph'ry flame,
"When death has once diſſolv'd her mortal frame.
"Shall ſmile to ſee the traitor vainly weep;
"Her angry ghoſt ariſing from the deep,
"Shall haunt thee waking, and diſturb thy ſleep.
"At leaſt my ſhade thy puniſhment ſhall know,
"And fame ſhall ſpread the pleaſing news below."

Dryden.

If Dido's Ghoſt was to be preſent in all places with Æneas, was there any occaſion for her to wait in hell, for the relation of Æneas's misfortunes! Could not ſhe have been informed of them in our upper world, in proportion as any calamity had befallen the faithleſs man! The reader may object, that Dido muſt be ſuppoſed to have been ſo diſorder'd in her ſenſes, that Virgil was obliged to make her ſpeak without minding what ſhe ſaid. Be it ſo. Servius the Grammarian will point out another evaſion.

CLEONYMUS, contemporary with Pyrrhus King of Epirus, left Lacedæmonia on account account of ſome diſcontents of a public as well as private nature. He was ſon to Cleomenes II King of Sparta (a); but being of a violent and imperious temper, the Lacedæmonians had no friendſhip for, or confidence in him, and devolved the whole royal authority on Areus his mother's ſon. This related to the public diſcontents, and here follows thoſe of a domeſtic kind. Being already advanced in years, he had married Chelidonis [A], a Princeſs of the blood, the daughter of Leotychides a very beautiful woman, but who was paſſionately in love with Acrotatus, an exquiſitely handſome youth, and ſon to King Areus. This marriage brought the utmoſt ſorrow and infamy on Cleonymus; for the ill conduct of his wife, and the contempt ſhe had for him were univerſally known. Thus tortured with grief and anger he left Lacedæmonia, and went and ſollicited Pyrrhus to make war on the Lacedæmonians. Pyrrhus drew near the city with a numerous body of forces (b), and would have taken it by ſtorm, had he followed the counſels of Cleonymus, which was, to attack it immediately, without giving the few inhabitants whom Areus had left in it, time to recover their ſurprize; Areus, I ſay, who was then in the iſland of Crete, to ſuccour the Gortynians. Pyrrhus fearing the city would be plundered, in caſe he ſhould enter it by night, ſuſpended the aſſault till next day. But he was ſo vigorouſly repulſed in all his attacks, either before or after the return of Atreus, that he was forced to lay aſide his enterprize. We muſt not omit the courage which the Lacedæmonian women ſhewed on this occaſion [B]. A reſolution had been taken to ſhip them off for Crete all that night; but they oppoſed it; and Archidamia coming into the Senate with a drawn ſword, complained, in the name of all the women, againſt the men, for thinking they could ſurvive the deſtruction of their country. They worked, in the night, at the trenches which were oppoſed to the enemy. Chelidonis was the only woman who did not ſtir abroad, ſhe keeping always a rope about her neck, in order that ſhe might not be taken alive by her huſband. Acrotatus, her gallant, performed wonders; and as he was returning from the quarter where he had repulſed the aſſaults of the enemy, being elated by his victory, he appeared to be of a more majeſtic ſtature, and handſomer than ever in the eyes of the Lacedæmonian women, inſomuch that they cried aloud; happy is Chelidonis, to be beloved by ſo charming a man. The old men followed him with millions of acclamations; and exhorted him in the ſtrongeſt terms, to continue his warm careſſes to Chelidonis (c) [C].

(a) Plutarch. in Agid. & Cleom. Pauſan. in Lacon. Father Labbe, Chronol. Franc. ad ann. Romæ 481, ſays falſly that Areus was brother to Cleonymus.

(b) The year of Rome 480; the 3d of the 126th Olympiad.

(c) Extracted from Plutarch's Life of Pyrrhus.

[A] He had married Chelidonis.] Parthenius ſpeaks of this Princeſs, and of her amours with Acrotatus, in his XXIIId chapter; but ſhe is there called Chilonis, either thro' the forgetfulneſs of Parthenius, or the miſtake of his copyiſts.

[B] We muſt not omit the courage which the Lacedæmonian women ſhewed on this occaſion.] Calviſius aſcribes to them all the reſiſtance which was made the firſt day; and relates, that on the morrow the men returned back, and ſlew Ptolemy the ſon of Pyrrhus, and deſtroyed the greateſt part of his army (1). He cites Juſtin and Plutarch; but neither of theſe Authors relate what he aſcribes to them. Juſtin does not mention the return of the men, nor the two ſucceſſive aſſaults: he only ſays, in general, that the women made a more vigorous defence than the men; and that Pyrrhus loſt at this ſiege, Ptolemy his ſon, and the flower of his army (2). With regard to Plutarch (3), he tells us, that the women worked only at the intrenchments, animated the ſoldiers, and performed ſuch other ſervices of the ſecond rank; and he does not ſuppoſe Ptolemy to be killed, till the King of Lacedæmonia charged the rear of Pyrrhus's army in the way to Argos, that is when Pyrrhus left Laconia. This Prince fully revenged the death of his ſon, by making a great ſlaughter of the Lacedæmonians. He is ſaid to have performed ſuch actions in this battle, as have a little the air of romance. This Ptolemy was ſo bold and intrepid, that when Pyrrhus heard of his death, he ſaid, that he had been killed a little later than his raſhneſs deſerved, or he (his father) expected (4).

(1) Calviſ. ad ann. Mundi 3677.

(2) Juſtin. lib. 25. cap. 4.

(3) Plut. in vita Pyrrhi.

(4) Aliquanto tardius cum quam timuerit ipſe, vel temeritas ejus meruerit, occiſum eſſe. Juſtin. lib. 25. cap. 4.

[C] The old men . . . . exhorted him in the ſtrongeſt terms to continue his warm careſſes to Chelidonis.] Here follows the tranſlation, according to Amiot. Go ſpruce Acrotatus; careſs warmly Chelidonis, and beget fine children for Sparta. The Greek is as follows: Ὄγχιτε Ἀκρότατε, καὶ οἵφι τὰν Χελιδονίδα (5). Theſe muſt have been downright blunt people, to make ſuch acclamations in the open ſtreets. See the margin (6).

(5) Plutarch, in Pyrrho, pag. 402, C.

(6) The Greek term employed by Plutarch is ſo vulgar, that our Clowns do not ſpeak more ſmutty ones at their weddings.

CLEOPATRA, ſiſter of Alexander the Great. See the Remark [A] of the Article DIONYSIUS.

☞CLERC (JOHN LE) was the ſon of Stephen Le Clerc, a learned and eminent Citizen of Geneva, who firſt practiſed Phyſic, but was afterwards made Greek Profeſſor in that Academy, and Senator of the Republic. Our Author's mother was Suſanna Gallatin, of an illuſtrious family; her father Marinus Gallatin being alſo a Senator at Geneva. John Le Clerc was born March the 19th 1657. He had two brothers, Daniel an eminent Phyſician and Senator at Geneva, who wrote the Hiſtory of Phyſic as far as Galen's time, a book highly valued amongſt the Profeſſors of that Science; and Francis, who ſettled at Leipſic in the condition of a Merchant. Their father took great care of their education, and ſent his ſon John, when about eight years old, to the grammar-ſchool, where he ſoon diſcovered a ſtrong inclination to reading, and a genius for Poetry which did not leave him even in the courſe of his more ſerious ſtudies, and more advanced years [A]. When

[A] He had a genius for Poetry, which did not leave him even . . . . in his more advanced years.] We are told in his Latin life, which was certainly written by himſelf, and is annexed to his Philoſophical Works, that he wrote verſes with ſo much readineſs, that when he was at ſchool, he performed not only his own taſk, but even that of his ſchool-fellows: It is added, that if he had cultivated his poetical talents, he would probably have gained a great reputation that way. But the more ſerious ſtudies to which he applied himſelf, made him entirely neglect Poetry, ſo that he never wrote any verſes but on ſome particular occaſions, and to be added to other men's Works: thus having tranſlated two Sermons of Biſhop Burnet, preached before King William, he ſubjoined to the one a ſmall Poem in heroic, and to the other an Epigram in Elegiac

When he was about ſixteen years old, he was removed from the grammar-ſchool, and placed under Mr. Chouët a very learned man, to ſtudy Philoſophy (a), and learned chiefly the principles of Carteſius, yet he did not admit afterwards all the conſequences which Carteſius drew from his principles (b), as appears from our Author's Philoſophical Works. He alſo applied himſelf under the ſame Profeſſor to Natural Philoſophy, and held a Theſis de Materiæ Natura; (concerning the Nature of Matter.) Having finiſhed his courſe of Philoſophy in two years time, he would not go immediately upon the ſtudy of Divinity, but thought it proper to ſpend a year longer in the ſtudy of the belles Lettres, and the principles of the Hebrew Tongue, which he learned from his uncle James Gallatin, there being then no Profeſſor of the Hebrew Tongue in the Academy of Geneva. From that time he read all the books that could any ways improve him in thoſe Sciences to which he applied himſelf, and it was this aſſiduity and conſtant application to which he inured himſelf in his youth, that enabled him afterwards to go through the uninterrupted fatigue of reading and writing, and to publiſh ſo many books as he has done. In the nineteenth year of his age he began to ſtudy Divinity under Philip Meſtrezat, Francis Turretin, and Lewis Tronchin, and he attended their Lectures for above two years. Some time before great diſputes had aroſe at Geneva concerning the Univerſality of Grace and the Extent of the Efficacy of Chriſt's death; ſeveral of the moſt eminent men both at Geneva and at Saumur favoured thoſe opinions, and our Author alſo embraced them afterwards. But as no perſon could be admitted into the holy Miniſtry, without ſubſcribing the Conſenſus Helveticus (c), which contained a contrary doctrine, few young men entered deep into this controverſy, for fear of falling into opinions that might exclude them from the ſacred function; nor could they well examine the opinions contrary to thoſe that were eſtabliſhed by Law, except perhaps in the Theſes Salmurienſes, which Mr. Le Clerc ſtudied with the utmoſt care, as well as ſome other books of Divinity. After he had gone through the uſual forms of ſtudy at Geneva, and had loſt his father in 1676, he reſolved to go for ſome time into France, whither he went in 1678; the next year he returned to Geneva, and was ordained with the general applauſe of all his Examiners. But upon reading the works of Curcellæus, which were publiſhed ſoon after, he was perſuaded, that in the Controverſies between the Remonſtrants, and the other Proteſtants, the former had much the better of the argument, and thereupon reſolved to leave both his own country and France, where the contrary principles were profeſſed, and, as he thought, too eagerly maintained. In the latter end of the year 1680 he went to Saumur, a Proteſtant Academy of great repute, but which was then ſunk and gone to decay: here it was that he firſt read the works of Epiſcopius, with whoſe learning and eloquence, and wonderful ſagacity he was greatly pleaſed. He alſo began to make Notes and Obſervations upon the Old Teſtament, which he read in the Polyglots. Theſe Notes were of great uſe to him, when he came afterwards to write the Commentaries which he has publiſhed. During his ſtay at Saumur there was publiſhed a book intitled, Liberii de Sancto Amore Epiſtolæ Theologicæ, in quibus varii Scholaſticorum errores caſtigantur; that is, "Theological "Letters, in which ſeveral errors of the Schoolmen are corrected." This book was aſcribed to Mr. Le Clerc, and though he did never poſitively own it, yet he ſpeaks of it in ſuch a manner as to make us believe he was really the Author of it. As it is become very ſcarce, we ſhall give ſome account of it below [B]. In the year 1682 our Author intending giac verſe, de Anglia Liberata, whereby the reader may perceive, that even at that time his poetic faculty had not deſerted him (1). Tho' Mr. le Clerc ſpoke thus of himſelf in the year 1711, yet he had had ſeveral years before but an indifferent opinion of thoſe Poets, who pretend to write Latin or Greek Verſes. "Moſt of the Moderns, ſays he (2), who wrote Greek "and Latin Verſes, have imitated the Antients as Apes "imitate Men; that is, by copying their faults rather than their beauties; ſo that it is dangerous to "follow either the ſtyle or the thoughts of the Moderns. For inſtead of noble and ſublime ſentences, "they offer us nothing but low and inſipid reflections, "inſtead of a pure and conciſe ſtyle, we only meet in "their verſes with indifferent phraſes, and tedious repetitions of ſynonymous expreſſions, borrowed indeed from the Ancients, but very ill-placed. Moſt "of the modern Greek and Latin Poets labour under theſe defects. . . . And if the Ancients ſhould "happen to riſe from the dead, they could not but "laugh at our Greek and Latin Poems, and would "be amazed that men ſhould loſe ſo much time to "write ſo indifferently." Mr. le Clerc had probably forgot, that he made this reflection in 1699, when he ſaid in 1711, that it appeared by his Latin Verſes, that if he had cultivated his genius for Poetry, he might have ſucceeded that way. Let us obſerve, that the paſſage we have juſt now tranſcribed, drew a very heavy cenſure upon him from a German Author, named George Lizelius, who undertook the defence of the modern Greek and Latin Poets (3).

(a) Joh. Cleric, Vita & Opera, pag. 7-14.

(b) Parrhaſiana, tom. 1. pag. 344, and 393, 394.

(c) The Confeſſion, or Articles of Faith amongſt the Swiſs.

(1) Joh. Clerici, Vita & Opera, printed at Amſterdam in 1711, pag. 10, 11.

(2) Parrhaſiana, tom. 1. pag. 4, 5. printed for the firſt time in 1699, and reprinted with the addition of a ſecond volume in 1701.

(3) See the Journal Literaire, tom. 16. Part 1. pag. 212.

[B] He was really the Author of the Epiſtolæ Theologicæ, of which we ſhall give an account below.] He tells us in his Life, that when the Profeſſors of Saumur heard that Henry Deſbordes a Bookſeller was printing that Book, they endeavoured to diſſuade him from it, but in vain; and the Work was ſoon finiſhed and ſent over to Holland. Some perſons aſcribed it immediately to Mr. le Clerc, thinking they obſerved his genius in it; others thought it was too learned to have been written by a young man of four and twenty. A famous Lutheran Divine publiſhed in print, that Mr. le Clerc had owned to him that he was the Author of that Book, but our Author ſays, that this Divine's memory failed him, or that he miſtook his meaning: tho' there be nothing in that Book, adds he, of which Mr. le Clerc ought to be aſhamed, eſpecially if it be conſidered at what age he muſt have wrote it. Now this ſeems to be a pretty plain confeſſion; but that the reader may the better judge of it, we ſhall tranſcribe Mr. le Clerc's own words; but it muſt be obſerved, that he ſpeaks as tho' a friend of his, and not himſelf had wrote his life. Scio non eſſe incelebrem Auguſtanæ Confeſſionis Theologum, qui poſtea ſcripſerit, faſſum ſibi eſſe Clericum, libellum a ſe ſcriptum: ſed & hoc certo ſcio memoriam eum Theologum fefelliſſe, aut Clerici verba male ab eo intellecta: quamvis alioqui nihil ſit, cur Clericum Libelli pudeat, præſertim ſi quâ ejus ætate ſcribi oportuerit reputes (4). Obſerve alſo that F. Simon having openly aſcribed (5) this

(4) Joh. Clerici, Vita & Opera, pag. 28.

(5) Réponſe aux Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande, chap. 2. pag. m. 9.

intending to go to England took his way through Paris and arrived in London about the latter end of May, with a design to learn the English Tongue. He preached several times in the French Churches at London, and visited several Bishops and other men of learning; but as the air of this country did not agree with his constitution, he went into Holland, and visited Philip Limborch at Amsterdam, from whom he learned the condition of the Remonstrants in the United Provinces; he also discovered his real sentiments to Limborch, with whom he entered into a particular friendship, which lasted till that great man's death. He had not been long in Holland before his friends and relations entreated him to return to Geneva, which he accordingly did. But as he could not dissemble his opinions [C], which were contrary to those established by Law, he was obliged to leave his native country again, and arrived in Holland the latter end of the year 1683. The next year he preached sometimes in French in the Church of the Remonstrants (d), but he was soon obliged to leave off preaching [D]; and the Remonstrants holding that same year (1684) a Synod at Rotterdam, he preached once before them, and was admitted Professor of Philosophy, the Hebrew Tongue, and Polite Literature in their school at Amsterdam (e). The remainder of his life offers nothing to us but the history of his works and the controversies in which he was engaged. The first year he lived at Amsterdam he published some books, which we shall mention below [E]: and the following year

(d) Taken from Mr. Le Clerc's Life written in Latin.

(e) Lettres de Mr. Bayle, tom. 1. pag. 212. Let. 47. à Mr. Lenfant du 9 May 1684. and Joh. Clerici, Vita & Opera, pag. 37.

this Book to Mr. le Clerc, the latter did not deny the charge, for he answered nothing to it; and we are told in another Work (6), that amongst his intimate friends, he used to call that Book his Romance. We must now give a short account of this Piece.

(6) Hist. de Mr. Bayle & de ses Ouvrages, pag. 123.

It was printed in 1679, probably at Saumur; it is said in the title-page. Irenopoli Typis Philathianis: It contains 320 pages in 8vo, and consists of eleven Epistles or Letters. 1. The first treats of the Hypostatical Union of the two Natures in the Person of Christ. The Author endeavours to prove in this Epistle, that the Hypostatical or Personal Union of God with Christ, consists only in a mutual consent or agreement between them, in such a manner, that they both make up but one whole (totum), so that the proprieties and actions of both, and the passions of the created or human nature may be ascribed to the whole compound. That the Reader may judge whether we have well expressed his meaning, we shall set down his own words. Deus non potest aliter uniri cum Spiritu creato quam consensu unicum totum componendi cum eo, adeo ut utriusque proprietates & actiones, & creaturæ passiones toti compositio tribui possint (7). As this union, which consists only in a mutual consent is easily understood, the Author observes, that it may be objected, there is no mystery according to him, in the hypostatical or personal union of the two Natures in Christ. To which he answers, that the word mystery (μυστήριον) does not signify in the Scriptures, a thing in its own nature unconceivable; but only a thing which was hidden and unknown, before it was revealed (8). 2. The second Epistle contains a story of two young men, who before they had received any instruction concerning the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, endeavoured to find out by themselves, what the Scripture teaches concerning them. The one by his enquiries found the Orthodox system in the Scripture, the other found the Unitarian or Socinian scheme. Whence the Author infers, that the Scripture does not teach any of these doctrines with such a clearness and evidence as is sufficient to make them articles of faith, and necessary to salvation (9); and that it is not easy to guess, whether the Socinians or the other Christians are in the right. Divinitas æterna Filii, & Spiritus Sancti Personalitas, ita æquivocè traditæ videntur, ut vix aut ne vix quidem divinare possis, utri verum dicant, Socinianine an cæteri Christiani (10). 3. In the third Epistle he endeavours to explain the Mystery of the Holy Trinity. He observes (11), that the Jews did not make the least objection against that Mystery, whence he concludes, either that his Mystery was easily understood, or that the Apostles did not teach such a Mystery, which is the opinion of the Socinians; and if we admit it, every thing in Scripture is plain, and there are no obscure Mysteries to explain. However, he endeavours to give us a clear and distinct notion of the Trinity even in the Orthodox System. Tho' God be but one, says he, yet as he is infinite, he can form several series of thought, so that there can be several persons in him. God thinking after a certain manner is stiled the Father, the same God thinking after another manner is stiled the Son, and after another manner the Holy Ghost. Deus certo modo cogitans Pater dicitur, alio Filius, alio Spiritus Sanctus (12). The Author endeavours afterwards to shew, that his opinion differs very much from that of Sabellius. 4. The fourth Epistle treats of the Creation of Man, and of his state before the Fall. 5. The fifth treats of the Fall. 6. The sixth of Original Sin; which our Author explains chiefly according to the Pelagian System. 7. The seventh Letter contains a method of studying Divinity. 8. In the eighth the Author undertakes to prove that the Miracles of the Wise Men were no illusions, and that the only method for distinguishing true Miracles from false ones, is to examine the doctrine of the performer. 9. In the ninth Epistle he explains the word περπερεύεται, which occurs 1 Cor. xiii. 4. which he thinks, signifies to boast; our Translators have rendered it, Charity vaunteth not itself, which is the same sense. 10, In the tenth he treats of the word κίφαλις Heb. x. 7. 11. In the eleventh and last Epistle, he shews that the writings of the ancient Heathens are of great use towards understanding the Bible.

(7) Liber. de Sto. Amore, Ep. Theol. Ep. 1. pag. 9.

(8) Ibid. pag. 10.

(9) Ibid. Ep. 2. pag. 87, 88, 89, &c.

(10) Ibid. pag. 94.

(11) Idem, Ep. 3. pag. 98, 99.

(12) Ibid. pag. 103.

[C] He could not dissemble his opinions.] He declared to his friends that he would return to Holland, where "he could fully enjoy the liberty of speaking his mind. "He said, that he did not condemn those who differ- "ed from him, and were sincere in the opinions they "had embraced: but that he looked upon it as a "great crime, to speak otherwise than he was per- "suaded from his heart. That it was intolerable for "a lover of truth, or what is the same thing, for one "who adheres to what seems true to him, to hear his "opinions publickly exclaimed against in Sermons and "conversations, as tho' they were dangerous and per- "nicious, and the contrary opinions eagerly main- "tained, at the same time that no person was allowed "the liberty of making the least objections against "them even in the most modest way. He added, "that this was to slight and betray the truth, which "would soon have been banished the world, if they who "first taught it had acted after the same manner. . . . "Since therefore he could not profess and maintain "what he took to be the truth, without finding mo- "lestation, he thought it was best for him to return "into Holland, that he might not bring his friends "and relations into any trouble on his account (13)."

(13) Joh. Clerici, Vit. & Oper. pag. 35, 36.

[D] He was obliged to leave off preaching.] He has not thought fit to tell us the reason of this; but we know that as a great many French resorted to the Church of the Remonstrants to hear him, this raised the jealousy of the Walloon Ministers; who finding their audience very thin, when Mr. le Clerc preached, prevailed upon the Magistrates to forbid him to preach any more. This is confirmed by Mr. Bayle, who says in the letter quoted above (14), that Mr. le Clere has not there (at Amsterdam) the liberty to preach. We forbear making any reflections upon this conduct of the Magistrates, which was not very consistent with their usual toleration.

(14) In the text, quotation (e).

[E] Some Books, which he published in 1684.] The first is intitled, Davidis Clerici, in Genevensi Academia olim Linguarum Orientalium Professoris, Quæstiones sacræ; in quibus multa Scripturæ loca, variaque Linguæ year he had a famous controverſy with Father Simon, of which we ſhall give an account in the remark [F]. This controverſy was carried on with great animoſity on both ſides; but

S. Ido-

S. Idiomata explicantur. Acceſſerunt ſimilis Argumenti Diatribæ Stephani Clerici. Edidit & Annotationes adjecit Joannes Clericus. Amſt. in 8vo, 1685 (15). This work contains critical Diſcourſes upon ſeveral ſubjects, for the moſt part taken from Scripture; to which he has added ſome Notes of his own, wherein he makes no ſcruple to differ from his father and uncle, wherever he thinks they are miſtaken; being of opinion, that truth is always to be preferred before the ſtricteſt ties of conſanguinity. He prefixed to this volume the Lives of the Authors. Two years after he publiſhed another volume of theſe two brothers, containing ſome Speeches and Poems, and a Computus Eccleſiaſticus of David Le Clerc, and ſome Philological Diſſertations by Stephen, to which our Author added a Preface (16), printed at Amſterdam, in 8vo. Mr. Le Clerc alſo publiſhed in 1684 a Book of his friend Charles le Cene a French Miniſter; it was intitled, Entretiens ſur Diverſes Matieres de Theologie: "Dialogues upon ſeveral Theological Subjects." And becauſe it was too ſmall a volume of itſelf, he added a ſecond part to it made up of five Dialogues. In the three firſt he treats of the extent of our metaphyſical knowledge, and of its uſe in Religion. He ſhews by ſeveral inſtances, that the Metaphyſicians have often obſcured Divinity, and ſtarted a thouſand difficulties, by reaſoning about things of which they had no ideas. The Author's opinion is, that we are in danger of being continually miſtaken, when we extend the uſe of our natural faculties, which we have received from God, beyond the bounds he has preſcribed them. He thinks, that as our ſenſes do not acquaint us with the properties of bodies, but ſo far as is neceſſary for the preſervation of our Lives, ſo our ſpiritual knowledge does not extend farther than is neceſſary to regulate our conduct according to the will of God, and to lead us to the ſupreme felicity. So that whenever we pretend to go beyond theſe bounds, we expoſe our ſelves to a thouſand errors, and do but raiſe doubts in our minds which it is impoſſible for us to clear. In the fourth Dialogue he examines ſeveral paſſages of the Holy Scripture, which have been miſapplied by the Metaphyſicians, in making them ſubſervient to their abſtruſe and ill-grounded notions. In theſe four Dialogues he often cenſures Father Mallebranche. His deſign in them is to ſhew, that in religious ſubjects, we ought to ſtick to Revelation, and muſt not think, that we have compleat and adequate notions of the things, which are mentioned there, and not pretend to draw inferences from what we know but imperfectly. If the Chriſtian Divines had always followed this rule, if they had not invented new words, as tho' they were more proper, than thoſe which the Holy Ghoſt made uſe of, we ſhould not have heard of that vaſt number of controverſies and hereſies, either real or pretended, which have diſturbed the Church ever ſince the time of the Apoſtles; and Chriſtian Divinity had been infinitely more beautiful than it is now, and more proper to perſuade men to a pious and holy life. The fifth Dialogue contains an expoſition of the IXth, Xth, XIth Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans, taken chiefly from Dr. Hammond's Paraphraſe.

(15) It is known, that when a Book is publiſhed towards the end of the year, the Bookſellers date it from the following year.

(16) Parrhaſiana, ubi ſupra, pag. 354. & Jo. Cleric. Vit. & Oper. pag. 43, 44.

* Mr. Le Clerc publiſhed a ſecond edition of it in 1711, with an Advertiſement in which he explained ſome paſſages of that work.

[F] An Account of his Controverſy with Father Simon.] Father Simon having publiſhed his Critical Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament, Mr. le Clerc read it with the utmoſt care and attention, and in 1685 he publiſhed a Criticiſm upon it, intitled, Sentimens de quelques Théologiens de Hollande ſur l'Hiſtoire Critique du Vieux Teſtament, compoſée par le Pere Richard Simon de l'Oratoire: Où, en remarquant les fautes de cet Auteur, on donne divers Principes utiles pour l'intelligence de l'ecriture Sainte. Printed at Amſterdam, in 8vo. This work contains twenty letters, in which Mr. le Clerc ſays (17), that he only relates the opinions, which ſeveral perſons had of F. Simon's work, and gave an account of ſome conferences, in which he repreſents ſome friends ſpeaking very freely of the critical Hiſtory, and of ſeveral other ſubjects, which have ſome affinity with thoſe, that Father had treated of. It would be too long to give a particular account of this Book, and of F. Simon's anſwer, and Mr. le Clerc's Reply. We ſhall therefore make only a few obſervations.

(17) Parrhaſiana, tom. 1. pag. 358.

Mr. le Clerc endeavours to prove in his ſixth Letter, that Moſes is not the Author of the Pentateuch; he pretends to ſhew this by obſerving, that thoſe five Books contain a great many things, which could not have been written by Moſes: he tells us afterwards (18), "that the Hiſtories we read in the Pentateuch have been "taken from ſome ancient Books, written by private "perſons.... and what renders this conjecture more "probable is, that we find in the Pentateuch a quotation from a Book, which if we may gueſs by the title, "contained an account of the firſt wars of the Iſraelites: I mean the Book of the Wars of the Lord, "which is mentioned Numb. xxi. 14. This and "other ſuch Books, which, might have been written "in Moſes's time, but in all likelihood were become "very ſcarce in after Ages, (ſince even the Law, of "which ſeveral copies had been taken, had been unknown a long while) theſe Books, I ſay, were the "Memoirs, which the Author of the Pentateuch made "uſe of, to write down the Hiſtory of thoſe times. "But he muſt have had more ancient Memoirs, in order to write the Hiſtory of the Creation, and the "Lives of the Patriarchs, wherein we find ſeveral "numbers, and a great many proper names, which "Tradition alone could not have long preſerved. "There are ſome paſſages, by which it clearly appears, that thoſe Memoirs were very imperfect, "ſince we find in thoſe Books ſome circumſtances, "which are not connected with the reſt of the Hiſtory; as for inſtance, what is ſaid of Lamech Gen. "iv, and of Hebron, Numb. xiii. There are ſeveral "other paſſages, in which the Author of the Pentateuch relates things very obſcurely, becauſe the Memoirs, whence he took his accounts, were imperfect (19)." Father Simon has not objected any thing material againſt this chapter; he even acknowledges, that the Pentateuch has been compoſed from ancient Memoirs; but he thinks that Moſes is the Author of thoſe five Books; and Mr. le Clerc himſelf has at laſt acknowledged it in a Diſſertation prefixed to his Commentary on Geneſis, in which he has anſwered the chief arguments, by which he pretended to prove, that Moſes was not the Author of the Pentateuch.

(18) Sentimens de quelques Theol. de Hol. Let. VI. pag. m. 122, &c.

(19) Ibid. pag. 123, 124.

But the moſt remarkable part of Mr. le Clerc's Book againſt Father Simon, is a Treatiſe of the Inſpiration of the Holy Scripture, in which the Author endeavours to prove, that the Writers of the old and New Teſtament were not inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, in the ſenſe in which it is generally underſtood. This Treatiſe, which takes up the eleventh and twelfth Letter, contains a great many bold obſervations. Let us tranſlate only what he ſays of the Inſpiration of the Prophets; that the reader may from thence have ſome notion of his whole Syſtem. "God made himſelf known to the "Prophets, ſays Mr. le Clerc (20), ſeveral ways, "which I think may be reduced to the three following. 1. They had viſions by day or by night; "2. They heard voices; 3. or They were inwardly "inſpired.... The Prophecies have been written by "God's expreſs command, by the Prophets themſelves, or by others; for it is not poſſible to know, "whether the Prophets always wrote or dictated them, "or whether their Diſciples collected them, and wrote "them down as exactly, as their memory would ſuffer it. However it be, we cannot doubt, but God "revealed to the Prophets thoſe things, which we "find now in their Books, and we ought to believe "St. Peter, who ſays, the Prophecy came not in "old time by the will of man &c (21). But in order "to relate what appeared to them in their viſions, "whether it was wrote down by themſelves, or by "others who heard them relate it, nothing was wanted but a good memory.....Hence it is, that every "Prophet has a peculiar ſtyle; whence it appears, "that they related what they had ſeen after the ſame "manner as they uſed to relate all other things..... "We may ſay the ſame with regard to the words, "which they heard: a good memory was ſufficient "to remember them. But we cannot be poſitive, that "they have always related the very words they heard, "and that ſometimes they did not content themſelves "with ſetting down the ſenſe only.... Their diffe-

(20) Ibid. Let. 11. pag. 222.

(21) 2 Pet. i. 21.

but Father Simon pretended, that Mr. Le Clerc had attacked him out of jealouſy and revenge, and Mr. Le Clerc did not think fit to reply any thing to this charge [G]. We ſhall give below Mr. Bayle's judgment of our Author's anſwer to Father Simon [H]. In the " rent ſtyle proves, that every Prophet expreſſed what " he heard, after his own manner. . . . It is commonly " ſuppoſed, that the Prophets relate the very words, " which they heard, becauſe they repreſent God ſpeak- " ing immediately, thus ſaith the Lord. But this is " not a good argument, for it is the cuſtom of the " Hebrew, and even of the Greek Writers to repre- " ſent thoſe, whoſe thoughts they relate, as ſpeaking " directly, tho' they do not ſet down their own words. " Here follows a convincing proof of this; it is the " manner in which the Decalogue is related in Exo- " dus, and in Deuteronomy; in both places God is " repreſented as ſpeaking himſelf immediately, and " yet there are conſiderable differences between the " Decalogues as we find them in theſe two places. . . .

" The third manner in which God revealed his will " to the Prophets, was by the way of inſpiration without " viſion or voice. We may conceive two ſorts of theſe in- " ſpirations; 1. God might inſpire the Prophecies and " Predictions word for word, as when the Prophet was to " mention ſome name unknown before; 2. God might " inſpire only the ſenſe of them, which they after- " wards expreſſed after their own manner . . . &c."

The reader may eaſily gueſs by this, what our Author's opinion was concerning the Inſpiration of the Apoſtles. He ſuppoſed that they wanted only a good memory, to relate the Hiſtory of our Saviour, and the doctrines they had learnt from him; and that they had no occaſion for an immediate and inward inſpiration.

Let us obſerve, that Mr. le Clerc endeavours to prove, that the Book of Job, the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, and the Song of Solomon were not inſpired by God, and he ſeems to look upon them as only the works of men (22).

(22) Ibid. Lett. 12. pag. 271, &c.

Father Simon anſwered at large theſe two Letters; but as his anſwer is grounded only upon common topicks, and contains nothing new, it is needleſs to give an account of it: nay, he even admits, that generally ſpeaking the ſenſe and not the words was revealed to the ſacred Writers: ſo that Mr. le Clerc had very little to reply on this ſubject; but as his opinion had given great offence, he endeavoured to vindicate himſelf, or his friend, who, he ſuppoſes, wrote the two Letters concerning Inſpiration. He makes a kind of declaration of his faith; which is to this purpoſe; That the Prophets of the Old and New Teſtament, ſaid nothing as from God, but what he really commanded them to ſay. That there are no facts of any conſequence related in Scripture, but what really happened: and ſuppoſing the Hiſtorians were miſtaken in ſome trifling circumſtances, yet we ought to look upon the ſacred Hiſtory as the moſt true, and moſt holy, that ever was. That all the Doctrines, which the ſacred Writers propoſed to the Jews or to the Chriſtians are really heavenly Doctrines, tho' it might be ſuppoſed that theſe Writers did not always receive them immediately from Heaven. That Chriſt was infallible, free from all errors, as well as from all ſins. That God often dictated to the Prophets and Apoſtles the very words they were to make uſe of (23). After ſuch a Declaration, it would be unfair and unjuſt to charge Mr. le Clerc with infidelity, notwithſtanding the great liberty, with which he delivered himſelf in his firſt Book againſt Father Simon. Mr. le Clerc's Reply to this Father is intitled: Defenſe des Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande, contre la Reponſe du Prieur de Bolleville. Amſterdam, 1686, 8vo. It contains ſeventeen Letters.

(23) Defenſe des Sentimens ſur l'Hiſtoire Critique, Lett. 9. pag. 223, 224.

[G] Father Simon pretended, that Mr. le Clerc had attacked him out of jealouſy . . . . . Mr. le Clerc did not reply any thing to this charge.] Some time before Mr. le Clerc undertook to write againſt Father Simon, there had been publiſhed a Letter under the name of Origenes Adamantius, containing a propoſal for printing a new Polyglot Bible, the undertaker of which deſired the learned Criticks to ſend him their advice in writing. Mr. le Clerc, who, ſays Father Simon (24), thinks he is perfectly acquainted with thoſe ſubjects, wrote a long Letter in Latin, which he ſent to a Bookſeller at Rotterdam, in order to have it conveyed to the Author of the Propoſal; and as he took Father Simon to be that Author (as he really was) he praiſed very much the Critical Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament, and ſaid he paſſionately longed to ſee that of the New, which had been promiſed a great while. But it happened that the perſon to whom he had written, ſhewing a very great deſire to have his Letter printed, adviſed him charitably not to publiſh it, till he had carefully corrected it. It was this, according to Father Simon, that exaſperated Mr. le Clerc againſt him. He gives us part of the Letter which our Author ſent him, and a tranſlation of the Anſwer that was ſent to Mr. le Clerc in Dutch. He aſſerts that he has Mr. le Clerc's Letter, written in his own hand, ſtill by him. It begins thus. Hiſtoriam Criticam Librorum Veteris Teſtamenti avidiſſime & cum ſumma voluptate jam dudum legi. Atque uti libenter me in eorum numero eſſe profiteor, quamvis cum auctore ubique non ſentiam, qui ea lectione multum ſe in ſacrarum Literarum cognitione profeciſſe agnoſcunt; ita quoſdam alios labores, quibus ſe inſudare teſtatus eſt vir doctiſſimus Richardus Simon, non ſine impatientia hactenus expectavi. Sperabam me brevi poſtea lecturum ſimilem Hiſtoriam Librorum Novi Teſtamenti, ... i. e. " I have read long ago the Critical Hiſtory of the " Old Teſtament with the utmoſt pleaſure and delight: " And though I do not approve all the Author's ſenti- " ments, yet I muſt own that I am one of thoſe, " who by reading his book, are very much improved " in the knowledge of the Bible: ſo that I expect im- " patiently the other works, in which that moſt learn- " ed man Richard Simon is employed, as he has told " us. I was in hopes, that I ſhould ſoon ſee ſuch an- " other Hiſtory of the Books of the New Teſtament, " &c." How could a man, who wrote thus, deſpiſe Father Simon afterwards, as Mr. le Clerc does in his Sentimens &c. where he pretends, that Father Simon's Book is proper only to inſtruct thoſe, who have but a ſmall ſtock of learning? And yet Mr. le Clerc has not taken the leaſt notice of all this in his Reply to Father Simon. What the conſequence is, that may be inferred from his ſilence, we leave the reader to judge.

(24) Reſponſe aux Sent. de quelques Theol. de Hol. chap. 1. pag. 1, 2.

[H] Mr. Bayle's judgment of our Author's Anſwer to Father Simon.] " Mr. le Clerc, ſays he to Mr. Len- " fant (25), has lately publiſhed a Book againſt F. " Simon; it contains very good things, but too bold. " You ſhould let him know, that inſtead of promot- " ing the intereſt of that party, which he follows, I " mean the Arminians, he will only render them more " odious: for he will confirm the world in the notion " they have already, that all the learned Arminians " are Socinians at leaſt. I ſay at leaſt, and not with- " out reaſon; theſe Gentlemen have no prudence nor " policy; for if they had ſhewed themſelves leſs pre- " poſſeſſed in favour of Socinianiſm, with which they " poiſon all their Books, it would not have been diffi- " cult to ſuppreſs the Schiſm, which the Synod of Dort " has occaſioned. But, to ſpeak the truth, our Cal- " viniſts think it glorious and praiſe-worthy, not to " join with a Sect, which is the common ſink of all " the Atheiſts, Deiſts and Socinians of Europe." In the firſt edition of Mr. Bayle's Letters, publiſhed in 1714, it was obſerved in a Note, that by the bold Things, Mr. Bayle meant the two Letters concerning Inſpiration, of which we have given an account above (26), and which it is believed were written by Mr. le Clerc himſelf. When Mr. le Clerc read this and the whole paſſage, which we have quoted, he thought he could do no leſs, than anſwer ſomething in his own vindication, and did it in the firſt volume of his Bibliotheque ancienne & moderne (27). He does neither own nor deny that he was the Author of the Letters concerning Inſpiration, but ſays, that he thought he might publiſh them becauſe they contain the opinion of Grotius; but he adds, that he did not approve thoſe Letters, tho' he publiſh'd them. He inveighs afterwards bitterly againſt Mr. Bayle, and does not ſcruple to call him a downright Atheiſt (28), as tho' he would confirm what Mr. Bayle ſays in another place (29): If you will continue to be Mr. le Clerc's friend, you muſt take a particular care, how you behave yourſelf towards him; for he is ſoon angry, and pardons nothing: he exclaims continually againſt the Odium Theologicum, and does not obſerve, (25) Lettres de Mr. Bayle, Lett. 58. du 6 Juillet, 1685, tom. 1. pag. 244, 245.

(26) In the Remark [F].

(27) Pag. 208, &c.

(28) Pag. 212.

(29) Lett. de Mr. Bayle, tom. 1. pag. 270. à Mr. Lenfant, du 9 Juillet, 1686.

the year 1686 Mr. Le Clerc undertook to write a journal in imitation of thoſe that were publiſhed in ſeveral parts of Europe. He entitled it, Bibliotheque Univerſelle & Hiſtorique. He wrote it firſt with Mr. De la Croſe, and afterwards alone [I]. In the year 1698 he took care of the new edition of Cotelerius's Collection of the Apoſtolic Fathers [K], and the next year he publiſhed the firſt volume of his Parrhaſiana (f), in which he undertook to anſwer, according to Origen's ſyſtem, the objections againſt the goodneſs of God, which Mr. Bayle had publiſhed in ſeveral Articles of his Dictionary. Mr. Bayle replied in the ſecond edition of his Dictionary (g), which occaſioned a long controverſy between them, of which we ſhall give ſome account below [L], as we have promiſed in Mr. Bayle's Article.

(f) See in the Notes quot. (2).

(g) Article ORIGEN.

obſerve, that he is all the while drawing his own picture. In a Letter to Mr. Minutoli Mr. Bayle has the following paſſage: Mr. le Clerc continues to diſtinguiſh himſelf more and more every day, by his boldneſs in printing hereſies, and in condemning abſolutely and with the utmoſt ſlander, in Bookſellers ſhops, all the Authors he does not like; and this is ſaying a vaſt number, and almoſt all the world; for if you except Epiſcopius, Curcellæus, and Dr. Hammond, and a few more, all the reſt are good for nothing, according to him (30). Upon which Mr. le Clerc obſerves (31), that "when Mr. Bayle "wrote this, the Bibliotheque Univerſelle was already "begun, two volumes of it having been publiſhed: "this work, which ſeveral people eſteemed more than "Mr. Bayle's Republique des Lettres, becauſe they were "better improved by it, exaſperated him againſt Mr. "le Clerc." Let thoſe who can compare the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres written by Mr. Bayle, with Mr. le Clerc's Journals, judge whether the latter had ſo much reaſon to boaſt, and whether the former could be jealous of him. We muſt not omit a circumſtance, which we meet with in the Hiſtory of Mr. Bayle and of his works, tho' we cannot aſſert the truth of it. We are told there, that Mr. Bayle's Letter to Mr. Lenfant, quoted above (32), fell firſt into Mr. le Clerc's hands, who opened it before he conveyed it to Mr. Lenfant; and it is pretended, that this Letter was the firſt ſpring of Mr. Le Clerc's hatred againſt Mr. Bayle (33).

(30) Ibid. pag. 266, 267. Let. 8 Juillet, 1686.

(31) Bibl. Anc. & Mod. tom. 1. pag. 215, &c.

(32) Quotation (25).

(33) Hiſt. de Mr. Bayle & de ſes Ouvrages, pag. 119, 120.

[I] He wrote his Bibliotheque firſt with Mr. de la Croſe, and afterwards alone.] He wrote the eight firſt volumes together with Mr. de la Croſe. They were alſo both concerned in the ninth, but as Mr. de la Croſe would not follow Mr. le Clerc's advice, they diſtinguiſhed their reſpective articles in that volume. The Xth is entirely Mr. le Clerc's, and the XIth Mr. de la Croſe's. The reſt to the nineteenth inclusive are Mr. le Clerc's. The remainder to the XVth, which is the laſt, were written by Mr. Bernard, as we have obſerved in his article.

[K] His new Edition of Cotelerius's Collection of the Apoſtolick Fathers.] It is intitled, S. S. Patrum, qui temporibus Apoſtolicis floruerunt, Barnabæ, Clementis, Hermæ, Ignatii, Polycarpi Opera edita & inedita, vera & ſuppoſititia, unà cum Clementis, Ignatii, & Polycarpi actis atque martyriis. J. Bapt. Cotelerius, Societatis Sorbonicæ Theologus, ex MSS. Codd. eruit ac correxit, verſionibuſque & notis illuſtravit. Acceſſerunt in hac nova Editione Notæ integræ aliorum virorum Doctorum, qui in ſingulos Patres memoratos ſcripſerunt, & quorum nomina in Præfatione habentur; item Gulielmi Beveregii Codex Canonum primitivæ Eccleſiæ vindicatus, Jacobi Uſſerii Diſſertationes Ignatianæ, & Johannis Pearſonii Vindiciæ Epiſtolarum S. Ignatii. Recenſuit, & notulas aliquot adſperſit Joannes Clericus. Amſterdam; 2 vol. folio, 1698. There are ſome copies of this Edition, the Preface of which differs very much, with regard to the Elogium of Mr. Cotelier. In ſome copies Mr. le Clerc ſays, that Mr. Baluze had beſtowed exorbitant praiſes upon Cotelier, that his Epiſtle concerning him is too flattering, and that he (Mr. le Clerc) thought it was neceſſary to give the readers notice of this, leſt ſuch a commendation might be prejudicial to Cotelier in the minds of thoſe, who upon reading his works ſhould find, that he did not deſerve ſuch praiſes. But in ſome other copies, Mr. le Clerc gives a ſummary but compleat account of all the praiſes, that have been beſtowed upon Cotelier, and ſays, that he deſerves them all (34). But Mr. le Clerc declared, that this difference between the copies of the Apoſtolic Fathers ought not to be aſcribed to him; he had beſtowed moderate praiſes upon Cotelier; and ſuch as he thought were ſufficient. But they, who ſent Cotelier's Life to the Bookſeller, tho' they had not been in the leaſt concerned in this Edition, were not ſatisfied with what Mr. le Clerc had ſaid; they gave the Bookſeller to underſtand, that the work would not ſell well at Paris, if he did not prefix that encomium to it, which Mr. le Clerc thought was exorbitant. The Bookſeller out of complaiſance cauſed the ſheet, which contained the Preface, to be reprinted, and added to it the encomium which had been ſent him, without acquainting Mr. le Clerc with it, till a long while after. Mr. le Clerc therefore diſowned thoſe words, which contained an exceſſive flattery, and which he never wrote (35). In the year 1724 Mr. le Clerc publiſhed a new edition of that work with ſeveral improvements; and gave a large account of it, in the volumes XXI and XXII of his Bibliotheque ancienne & moderne.

(34) Memoires de Mr. Ancillon, pag. 381, 382.

(35) Biblioth. Choiſie, tom. 18. pag. 426, 427.

[L] Some account of his controverſy with Mr. Bayle concerning the puniſhment of the wicked.] Mr. le Clerc had endeavoured in his Parrhaſiana to refute the objections of the Manichees, according to the ſyſtem of Origen: and Mr. Bayle anſwered Mr. le Clerc's arguments in the ſecond edition of his Dictionary, in the Remark [E] of the Article Origen: to which Mr. le Clerc replied in his Bibliotheque Choiſie (36). Mr. Bayle had aſſerted, that it is impoſſible in the ſyſtem of Origen, to reconcile the permiſſion and all the conſequences of ſin, with the notion of God's eſſential and perfect goodneſs. Upon which Mr. le Clerc obſerved; 1. That God was not obliged to create man ſo perfect, as that it ſhould be impoſſible for him to ſin; but that it is a great ſign of God's goodneſs that he furniſhed man with the means of obtaining happineſs, if he would but follow the rules that were preſcribed to him, and which he was not in the leaſt neceſſitated to tranſgreſs. 2. That Mr. Bayle exaggerated the evils which are a conſequence of man's free-will, and which he would have avoided, had he been created ſo, as not to have it in his power to ſin. 3. That to prevent the ill uſe which man might make of his liberty, God out of his infinite goodneſs, was pleaſed to propoſe to him in the Goſpel eternal rewards, and unlimited puniſhments: and that man may if he will, avoid the latter and obtain the former. 4. That God knew what would happen, but was not obliged to prevent by his infinite power the evil which he foreſaw would be occaſioned by the fault of man, becauſe that evil was not to laſt long either in itſelf, or with regard to its conſequences, and becauſe it occaſioned no diſorder in the Univerſe, but what God could reform in a moment, and what he will really reform at laſt for ever. 5. The inconveniency of man's ſuffering evil before he arrives to a ſtate of perfect happineſs, reſults from his very nature, which could not be in that imperfect ſtate in which it is, without being liable to what has really happened. 6. God, who foreſaw that man would fall, does not damn him merely becauſe he falls, but only becauſe he does not return to his duty, which it is in his power to do. 7. The duration of the evils which man ſuffers in this world, or will ſuffer in the next, is nothing if compared with eternity.

(36) Vol. 7. Art. 8. pag. 330, &c.

Mr. Bayle replied to all this at large, in the third volume of his Réponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial (37). The ſubſtance of his anſwer is, 1. That tho' man be naturally changeable, yet God could have furniſhed him with ſufficient or congruous Graces, which would have prevented his ſinning. Would you praiſe the goodneſs of a Prince, who ſhould ſuffer a great many diſorders to diſturb his Kingdom, becauſe it is in his power to ſuppreſs them when he pleaſes; and tho' he really ſhould ſuppreſs them, would he not have been a better Prince if he had prevented thoſe diſorders, as it was in his power to do? 2. The ſuppoſition that hell-torments will not be eternal, does not remove the difficulty entirely. Would a father who loves his children, and deſigns to raiſe them

(37) Chap. 17. &c. pag. m. 1146, &c.

(b) In the Remark (oo) and in the text, quotation (tt).

Article (b). We must also say something of their dispute concerning Dr. Cudworth's Plastic Natures [M], which we have also referred to this Article (i); and we shall give a catalogue of the rest of his works in the remark [N]. It appears by the vast number of them to high dignities, suffer them first to commit several faults and to be punished for them, if he could help it; and if it were in his power to make them equally happy without those previous faults and punishments? Since therefore God could make man happy the very moment he created him; how does it agree with his infinite goodness, to suffer them to pass first thro' a scene of sin and misery, since as he is infinitely powerful, he could easily have made them happy without all this?

(i) Ibid. quotation (ll).

Mr. le Clerc wrote an answer to this, and printed it in his Bibliotheque Choisie (38), with this title, A Defence of the Goodness and Holiness of God against Mr. Bayle's Objections. Mr. le Clerc did no longer personate an Origenist, but pretended to speak as an Orthodox Divine. Let the Reader judge how orthodox his opinion is. "I would answer, says he (39), that we do "not well know what is the nature of future punishments; we do not know whether there will not "be at first several very sharp sufferings, and yet diversified according to the greatness of men's sins; "and whether God will not afterwards put an end to "those sharp sufferings, and be content to leave those who "have constantly made an ill use of his favours, to "be tormented by their own conscience, which will "continually reproach them with their sins, and will "also torment them by this consideration, that they "lost by their own fault that happiness which they "will see others enjoy. This is perhaps the worm that "dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched (40). "There is nothing in this I think, but what is just. "The sinner might have avoided that misery by his "repentance; and since he did not repent, he deserves "some punishment." Mr. le Clerc does not determine how long this punishment will last, and he thinks that the damned will be in a suffering condition (41). Mr. Bayle replied to this in a Pamphlet intitled, Réponse pour Mr. Bayle à Mr. le Clerc (42), in which he observes, that Mr. le Clerc did in a manner give up the question, since he left off speaking in the character of an Origenist, and since he spoke doubtfully about the nature and duration of hell-torments; which was the same thing as to acknowledge that they were liable to unanswerable objections; and indeed Mr. le Clerc had been obliged to own that this is a subject, concerning which we ought to confess our ignorance (43). So that we think it needless to pursue this controversy any farther.

(38) Tom. 9. Art. 3. pag. 103, &c.

(39) Ibid. pag. 143.

(40) Mark ix. 44.

(41) Bib. Choif. tom. 9. pag. 144.

(42) It is annexed to Mr. Bayle's 4th volume of the Reponse aux Questions d'un Provincial.

(43) Réponse à Mr. Le Clerc, pag. 27, 28. Bibl. Choisie, tom. 9. pag. 148.

[M] We must say something of their dispute concerning Dr. Cudworth's Plastic Natures.] Mr. Bayle had observed (44), that "the Atheists are very much perplexed how to account for the formation of animals, "which they ascribed to a cause which was not conscious "of what it did, and yet followed a regular plan, "without knowing according to what laws it went to "work. But Dr. Cudworth's plastick form, and Dr. "Grew's vital principle are exactly in the same case, "and thus they take away the whole strength of this "objection against the Atheists. For if God could "communicate such a plastic power, it follows, that "it is not inconsistent with the nature of things that "there be such Agents; they may therefore exist of "themselves, will the adversary say; whence it would "also follow, that the regularity we observe in the "universe may be the effect of a blind cause, which "was not conscious of what it did." Mr. Bayle however observed, that these two learned Gentlemen were not aware of the consequence, which according to him followed from their system. Mr. le Clerc replied in his Bibliotheque Choisie (45); he said, that the vital or plastic natures which these Gentlemen admit, cannot in the least favour the Atheists, because these natures are but instruments in the hands of God, and have no power of efficacy, but what they receive from him who rules and directs all their actions: that they are but instrumental causes, produced and employed by the Chief and first Cause: and that it cannot be said, that a Palace has been built up without art, because not only the hammers, rules, saws &c. but even the arms of men which made use of these instruments, are destitute of knowledge. It is sufficient that the mind of the Builder directed all these things, and employed them according to his design. It is therefore plain, adds he, that the Atheists who deny the being of an intelligent Cause, cannot return our two Philosophers argument upon them.

(44) Continuation des Pensees Diverses, § 21. pag. m. 91.

(45) Tom. 5. pag. 283, &c.

Mr. Bayle endeavoured to shew in his answer (46), that if these Gentlemen had considered the Plastic Natures only as instruments in the hands of God, this system would have been exposed to all the difficulties to which the Cartesian hypothesis is liable, and which they intend to avoid: that therefore we must suppose their opinion was, that these natures are active principles, which do not want to be continually set on and directed, but that it is enough if God does but put them in a proper place, and overlook their actions to set them right if it be necessary. This being the case, Mr. Bayle pretends that the argument may be returned against these Gentlemen. For, says he, since when the order and regularity of this world is alledged as a proof of the Being of God, it is supposed that a Being cannot produce a regular work, without having an idea of it. And yet according to Dr. Cudworth, the Plastic Natures, which produce plants and animals, have not the least idea of what they do. If it be answered that they have been created by a Being who knows all, and whose ideas they only put in execution, the Stratonician will reply, that if they do it only as efficient Causes, this is as incomprehensible as that which is objected to him; since it is as difficult for any Being to perform a scheme which it does not understand, but which another understands, as it is to perform a scheme, which no Being at all has any notion of. Since you acknowledge, will the Stratonician say, that God could endow some creatures with a power of producing excellent works, tho' without any knowledge; you must also confess that there is no necessary connection between the faculty or power of producing excellent works, and the idea and knowledge of their essence, and of the manner of producing them; consequently, you ought not to assert, that these things cannot subsist separately in nature, and that nature cannot have of itself, what, according to you, the Plastic Beings received from God. In a word, Mr. Bayle asked, whether these Gentlemen maintained that the Plastic and Vital Natures are but instruments in the hands of God, as Mr. le Clerc seemed to suppose, by his comparison of an Architect.

(46) Hist. des Ouvr. des Savans, Août 1704 Art. 7. pag. 380, &c.

Mr. le Clerc answered (47), that according to Dr. Cudworth, the Plastic Natures were not passive instruments; but that they are under God's direction, who conducts them, tho' we cannot explain after what manner. Nor can the Atheists, added he, retort the argument, because God is the Author of the regularity and order, with which the Plastic Natures act; whereas, according to the Atheists, matter moves of itself without any cause to direct it, and to give it a power of moving regularly. This dispute was carried on still farther with some heat and a great many repetitions on both sides. But what we have said appears to us sufficient to give the Reader a notion of this controversy: they who desire to know more of it, may consult the Books to which we refer in the margin (48). We must acquaint the Reader, that both in this Remark and in the preceding, we have acted only the part of an Historian, without pretending to approve or to condemn either Mr. le Clerc's or Mr. Bayle's opinions.

(47) Bibl. Choif. tom. 6. Art. 7. pag. 422.

(48) Hist. des Ouvr. des Savans, Dec. 1704, Art. 12. Bibliot. Choisie, tom. 7. Art. 7. Repon. aux Quæst. d'un Provincial, tom. 3. chap. 179, &c. Biblioth. Choisie, tom. 9. Art. 10. Réponse pour Mr. Bayle à Mr. Le Clerc, pag. 31. annexed to the 4th vol. of the Rép. aux Quæst. d'un provincial.

[N] A Catalogue of the rest of his Works.] He hardly passed one year without publishing some Book. In 1690 he translated in Latin the last Book of Thomas Stanley's Philosophical History, which contains the History of the Eastern Philosophy, whereof our Author had published Extracts in the seventh volume of his Bibliotheque Universelle. In the year 1691 he printed his Logic, his Ontology, and Pneumatology, and to compleat his course of Philosophy, he published in the year 1695 his Natural Philosophy. He had dedicated his Logic to that great Philosopher Robert Boyle, but he dying before it came to his hand, in the next edition the Author addressed it to his friend Mr. Locke, as he had likewise done his Ontology and Pneumatology.

of books which Mr. Le Clerc publiſhed, that he was a very laborious and learned man; and though moſt of his works are uſeful, yet they would have been much more ſo, had he written leſs, and taken more pains with what he wrote. He enjoyed a very good health till about the year 1730, when he began viſibly to decay; his memory and attention failed him, and though what he ſaid in converſation was ſtill reaſonable and well connected, yet it was ſeldom to the purpoſe, and quite different from the ſubject of the converſation. He was almoſt childiſh the five laſt years of his life, and died January the 8th 1736, N. S. Though he often declared, that he firmly believed the Divinity of our Saviour, yet his enemies would abſolutely have him to be a Socinian. It is true that in his Epiſtolæ Liberii de Sancto Amore (k) he ſeems to favour the Socinians or Unitarians; but this is a book which he wrote when he was very young; and he has often declared ſince, that (k) See the Remark [B].

logy. Theſe Philoſophical Works were reprinted the fourth time at Amſterdam in 1710, in four volumes 8vo, with the life of Mr. le Clerc, which makes the fifth volume. They have been more than once printed here in England, and his Natural Philoſophy has even been tranſlated into Engliſh, and is of all his Works, that which this nation eſteemed moſt till the year 1705, if we may believe the Author who tells us this circumſtance (49). Our Author had alſo publiſhed in 1690, Lettre à Mr. Jurieu, ſur la maniere dont il a traité Epiſcopius dans ſon Tableau du Socinianiſme. i. e. "A letter to Mr. Jurieu concerning his "uſage of Epiſcopius, in his picture of Socinianiſm." 8vo. This letter has alſo been tranſlated into Dutch, and Mr. Bayle has given ſome extracts of it, with his reflections upon it in the Article EPISCOPIUS (50). In 1693, Mr. le Clerc publiſhed the firſt volume of his Commentaries on the Bible; it contained only Geneſis; and in 1695 he publiſhed his Commentary upon the four following Books, in which he inſerted a Commentary upon the firſt Chapter of St. John's Goſpel: it appears by this Commentary, that he was very far from admitting the opinion of the Unitarians. His Commentaries upon the Hiſtorical Books of the Old Teſtament were not publiſhed till the year 1708, and thoſe upon the Hagiographa and the Prophets, were publiſhed in 2 Vol. fol. in 1731. The Reader may find an account of them in the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée (51), and in the Hiſtoria Literaria (52). In 1696 he publiſhed the two firſt volumes of his Ars Critica, and in 1699 (53) he publiſhed his Epiſtolæ Criticæ & Eccleſiaſticæ, which make up the third volume of that Work. In theſe Epiſtles he maintains what he had aſſerted in the tenth volume of his Biblioth. Univerſ. viz. that Dr. Cave in his Hiſtoria Literaria of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, had concealed many things in the lives of Clement and Euſebius, in order to inhance their credit: and he treats of the uſe and authority of eccleſiaſtical antiquity, and fully expoſes the diſſimulations and pious frauds which ſo frequenly occur in Church-Hiſtory. He had publiſhed in 1694 the life of Cardinal de Richelieu in French, 2 volumes 12mo. This Hiſtory was univerſally approved as ſavouring of no kind of partiality, but repreſenting the actions of that great man in a true light. There was a ſecond impreſſion of it in the year 1696, and a third corrected and enlarged in 1714: to this laſt Mr. le Clerc prefixed his name. We had almoſt forgot to obſerve, that in 1693 he publiſhed at a Bookſeller's requeſt Hiſtoire d'Emeric Conte de Tekeli, ou, Mémoire pour ſervir à ſa vie; où l'on voit ce qui s'eſt paſſé de plus conſiderable en Hungrie, depuis ſa Naiſſance, juſqu' à préſent. But this being only compiled out of the Gazettes, and other public News, he never owned it as his Work, nor mentioned it in the catalogue of his Writings. He wrote a Work of more uſe and moment; it was his French Treatiſe de l' Incredulité, which was publiſhed in 1696. He inquires therein into the general reaſons and motives, which induce unbelievers to reject the Chriſtian Religion. The next year he publiſhed a ſhort account of Univerſal Hiſtory in Latin from the beginning of the world to the time of Charles the Great, with a brief expoſition of Chronology: but this Book is not much eſteemed, tho' it may be uſeful to young beginners. In the beginning of the year 1698 he publiſhed his Latin Tranſlation of Dr. Hammond's Annotations on the New Teſtament †, with ſome Notes of his own, wherein he either gently confutes the Doctor, or confirms his aſſertions, or ſupplies his omiſſions. Theſe Notes have been tranſlated into Engliſh, and make up one volume in 4to.

(49) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lett. 1705, Aout, pag. 227.

(50) Remark [H].

(51) Tom. 6. Part 2. pag. 362. and tom. 7. pag. 5.

(52) Num. 13. pag. 26. of the 3d vol. This is an Engliſh Journal.

(53) That ſame year the two firſt volumes were reprinted. They were alſo reprinted in England.

† It was reprinted at Francfort in 1714, corrected and enlarged by Mr. Le Clerc.

In 1699 was printed his Harmonia Evangelica in Greek and Latin, to which he added a Paraphraſe upon the whole, and at the end ſome diſſertations upon the ſubject, and ſhort notes on the Harmony itſelf. In 1700 he took care of a new edition of Dionyſius Petavius's Dogmata Theologica, together with ſome other Books in Divinity which were written by that learned Jeſuit at different times, and the ſame year he publiſhed his Quæſtiones Hieronymianæ, in anſwer to F. Martinai a Benedictine Monk, who not long before had publiſhed an edition of St. Jerom, and treated both our Author and his uncle with great ſeverity, becauſe they happened to diſagree with him in relation to that Father's character and Writings: and therefore Mr. le Clerc plainly ſhews that St. Jerom was not that critick in the Greek and Hebrew tongues, as is pretended, nor his Editor any ways competent for the Work, ſince almoſt in every page he makes egregious blunders. In 1701 when the Bookſellers in Holland deſigned to print all the Works of Heſiod in two volumes, our Author took care of the whole impreſſion, both in Latin and Greek, added the Notes of Joſeph Scaliger, Daniel Heinſius, Francis Guietus, and Stephen le Clerc. J. Geo. Grævius's various readings and editions; Daniel Heinſius's introduction to the Book Operum & Dierum, and his own Animadverſions upon the Theogonia. In the ſame year he wrote an Etymological Diſſertation by way of Preface to Mat. Martinius's Philological Lexicon. In 1702 he publiſhed Pedo Albinovanus's Elogies and fragments, and P. Cornelius Severus's Ætna and fragments, with the Notes and Interpretations of Joſeph Scaliger, Nic. Heinſius and others; to which he prefixed a Preface, wherein he lays down the right manner of interpreting an Author. In 1703 a Bookſeller of Amſterdam intending to publiſh St. Auguſtin's Works according to the Paris Edition, was adviſed by our Author to ſubjoin the Diſſertation of John Garnier relating to the Pelagian Hiſtory, Pelagius's Commentaries on the Epiſtles of St. Paul, the Cenſures, Prefaces, Notes and Diſſertations, which Eraſmus and other learned men had made upon that Father; and himſelf at the ſame time, under the name of Joannes Phereponus, wrote critical and theological Animadverſions upon St. Auguſtin, wherein he illuſtrates many places, and commends others; tho' he is not afraid to cenſure ſome wherein he conceived that this father had deviated from the rules both of reaſon and revelation, which ought to guide him as well as any other Author; and accordingly we find him refuting ſeveral of his Expoſitions of Scripture, the falſe Miracles he relates, the perſecution of Hereticks which he maintains, and the Doctrine of Predeſtination as he expounds it. Nor can we ſee why errors ſhould not be condemned in the Ancients as well as in the Moderns: nay, in the Ancients the rather, becauſe as their authority is greater, the contagion of their Doctrine is more dangerous. That ſame year (1703) our Author publiſhed a French tranſlation of the New Teſtament, with explanatory Notes. This Work made a great noiſe, and ſeveral French Miniſters exclaimed loudly againſt it, and amongſt others the Reverend Mr. Philip Meſnard Preacher at the French Chapel in St. James's Palace, charged him openly with Socinianiſm, in a Book publiſhed in 1709, and intitled Eſſai ſur le Socinianiſme (54). But Mr. Bernard, in the account he gave of this Work of Mr. le Clerc had the following paſſage. "As to "Socinianiſm, with which Mr. Le Clerc has been charged, it is true that we do not find in his Notes the words "Perſon, Incarnation, Trinity, Satisfaction, which have "been conſecrated by the Church, and which might it "ſeems, (54) See Bibl. Choiſie, tom. 18. pag. 401, &c.

that he was of the ſame opinion with all the Chriſtians as to the doctrine of the holy Trinity, and that he was of the opinion of Remonſtrants concerning Chriſt's ſacrifice (l). However the leaſt charge of Socinianiſm exaſperated him exceedingly, as has been obſerved by ſeveral perſons, and appears by his paſſionate anſwer to ſome paſſages in Mr. Bayle's Letters (m).

(l) See Bibliotb. Choiſie, tom. 8. pag. 403.

(m) See the Remark [H].

" ſeems, be employed very innocently and even uſe-
" fully, tho' we do not find them in the Scriptures;
" It is alſo true, that Mr. le Clerc does not explain
" ſome paſſages as we uſe to do; but it is certain, that " he often ſpeaks of Chriſt's Divinity, and that he " finds it in ſeveral paſſages, and even in ſome in which
" all the Orthodox Divines do not find that Doctrine (55)." Some Miniſters of Amſterdam did all that lay in their power to prevail upon the Magiſtrates to prohibit this tranſlation of the New Teſtament; the Walloon Synods alſo endeavoured to have it ſuppreſſed, but none of them could ſucceed in their attempts (56). That ſame year 1703 Mr. le Clerc began his Bibliotheque Choiſie, which he continued to the year 1714, when the death of the Bookſeller obliged him to diſcontinue that Journal which was ſwelled up to twenty ſeven volumes. He then began another upon the ſame plan, intitled, Bibliotheque Ancienne & Moderne, which he wrote till it made up twenty eight volumes. In 1705 he digeſted into a proper order, and amended from ſeveral groſs faults the Copper Plates of the Atlas antiquus &c. publiſhed by a famous Map-ſeller at Amſterdam; but thro' his negligence and parſimony, who would not be at the expence of correcting the Plates, the Maps are ſtill full of errors and miſtakes. In 1707 were publiſhed all the Works of Eraſmus in ten volumes in folio, to which our Author, in conjunction with ſome other learned men, added ſhort Notes and diſtinct Prefaces before each volume, in which he endeavoured to give that learned and ingenious writer his juſt commendation, and the Reader a proper character of all his Works. In the year 1709 he reviſed and added ſome Notes to the new edition of Sulpitius Severus (57). In the ſame year he reviſed and added large Notes to the new edition of Grotius's Book, de Veritate Chriſtianæ Religionis, and joined a treatiſe to it, intitled, De eligenda inter Chriſtianos diſſentientes Sententia. That ſame year he publiſhed Menandri & Philemonis Reliquiæ, quotquot reperiri potuerunt, Græcè & Latinè, cum Notis Hug. Grotii, & Joan. Clerici, qui etiam novam omnium Verſionem adornavit, indiceſque adjecit. 8vo. Amſterdam, 1709. This Work was vigorouſly attacked by Dr. Bentley under the name of Phileleutherus Lipſienſis, and it is ſaid that his cenſure vexed Mr. le Clerc to ſuch a degree, that it made him fall into a fit of ſickneſs, which laſted ſeveral days. He wrote a Defence of himſelf in 1711, in 8vo. In 1710 he publiſhed a new edition of Livy, in ten volumes 8vo, with Notes of his own, and all the Supplements of Freinſhemius corrected and amended. The ſame year when Mr. Joſeph Waſſe intended to publiſh a beautiful edition of Salluſt, our Author ſent the Editor a ſhort life of that Roman Hiſtorian, which he had chiefly collected out of the Writings of the Ancients. In 1711 Mr. le Clerc publiſhed three Epiſtles which are found at the end of Plato's Works, and are commonly aſcribed to Æſchines, Socrates's ſcholar, in a ſmall volume, and with plain and eaſy Notes, to which he added a Piece of his, entitled, Sylvæ Philologicæ. The learned Mr. Limborch dying in 1712 Mr. le Clerc made his Funeral Oration, and printed it with this title. Oratio Funebris in Obitum Rever. & Clariſſ. Viri Philippi a Limborch S. Theologiæ apud Remonſtrantes Profeſſoris, defuncti die 30 Aprilis, Anno 1712. Habita a Joanne Clerico die ſexto Maii, quo ſepultus eſt, in 4*to*. In 1716 he publiſhed Hiſtoria Eccleſiaſtica duorum primorum à Chriſto nato Sæculorum, è veteribus Monumentis deprompta. This Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory is very valuable, and the Prolegomena which the Author has prefixed to it are not the leaſt conſiderable and uſeful part of the Work. Some great men on the Arminian ſide prevailed upon our Author to write the Hiſtory of the United Provinces, and he publiſhed the firſt volume in the year 1723, with this title, Hiſtoire des Provinces Unies depuis la naiſſance de la Republique, juſqu' a' la Paix d'Utretcht, & le Traitè de Barrière conclu en 1716. Folio. The ſecond and third Volume came out in 1724.

(55) Nouvell. de la Rep. des Lett. 1703, Juillet 43.

(56) Let. de Mr. Boyle, tom. 3. pag. 939, 394, and not. 2. Let. à Mr. Minutoli. du 16 Dec. 1703.

(57) See the Bibl. Choiſie, vol. 20. Part 2. Art. 6.

Beſides theſe Books, there are ſome others of our Author, as a French tranſlation of Biſhop Burnet's criticiſm on the IXth Book of Varillas's Hiſtory, wherein he treats of the Revolutions of Religion in England; of the Biſhop's defence of that criticiſm; of three Sermons of the ſame Prelate. There is alſo a Book, which our Author publiſhed in 1696, intitled du Bonheur & du Malheur en matiere de Lotteries. " Of good " and bad luck in Lotteries." He has alſo reviſed Moreri's Dictionary, and written ſeveral Diſſertations, Prefaces, and Notes, upon great and valuable Works reprinted in Holland.

Mr. le Clerc having made ſome Remarks againſt Dr. Mill's New Teſtament in the account he gave of it in his Bibliotheque Choiſie (58); Dr. Wotton wrote a pretty ſevere anſwer, which may be ſeen in a Book, intitled, Remarks on ſome Books lately publiſhed. Printed at London in 1709. See page 174, &c. P.

(58) See tom. 14. Art. 10. and tom. 16. Art. 6.

COCHLEUS (JOHN) Doctor of Divinity, Canon of Mentz and of Worms, and Dean of our Lady in Francfort, was born in Wendelſtein near Nuremberg, about the year ... (a) .., Though he employed himſelf very much in controverſial writings, he nevertheleſs compoſed ſome pieces of another kind, he drawing up an hiſtory of Theodoric King of the Oſtrogoths [A], printed at Ingolſtad in 1544; and an hiſtory of Totila that was never publiſhed (b).

(a) In the Nova Maris Baltbici, Feb. 1699, pag. 41, it is ſaid to be anno 1502.

(b) He mentions this in the Preface to the Hiſtory of Theodoric.

[A] He drawing up an Hiſtory of Theodorick King of the Ostrogoths.] The Author of the Journal of the Baltick, for February 1699, ſays, that the following Book was printed at Stockholm. Vita Theodorici Regis Oſtrogothorum & Italiæ, Auctore Joanne Cochlæo, Germano, cum additamentis & annotationibus, quæ Sueo-Gothorum ex Scandia expeditiones & commercia illuſtrant, operâ Johannis Peringſkioldi. This work of Cochlæus was become very ſcarce. The perſon who has undertaken to give a new edition of, and add notes to it, has compared that of Ingolſtad with a copy taken from the manuſcript of Prague, and collated with that in the Hamburg Library (1). The ſame Author informs us in his Journal for November 1699, that the new edition in queſtion was finiſhed.

(1) Extracted from Nova Literaria maris Baltbici, & Septentrionis, Mens, Feb. 1699, pag. 41.

(a) So his name is written in a great many manuſcript papers of his own time. Leigh in his Fœlix Conſortium, or a fit Conjuncture of Religion and Learning, B. 3. cap. 13. pag. 170. and David Lloyd, in his State-Worthies, pag. 820. 2d edit. London 1670 call him Cook.

☞ COKE or COOKE (a) (EDWARD), Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench in the reign of King James I, was deſcended from an antient family in the county of Norfolk (b), and ſon of Robert Coke of Mileham in that county Eſq; by Winifrid, daughter and one of the heirs of William Knightley of Morgrave-Knightley in Norfolk (c). He was born at Mileham (d) about the year 1549, and at ten years of age ſent to the grammar-ſchool at Norwich, from whence he was removed to Trinity-College in Cambridge, where he ſtudied four years, and went from thence to Cliffords-Inn in London (e), and the year after was entered a Student in the Inner-Temple (f). The firſt occaſion of his diſtinguiſhing himſelf was his ſtating of the caſe of the Cook belonging to the Temple ſo exactly, that all the (b) Peerage of England. By Arthur Collins Eſq; vol. 3. pag. 507, 508. edit. London 1735.

(c) Idem, ibid. pag. 508.
(d) Fuller's Worthies in Norfolk, and Lloyd, ubi ſupra.
(e) Lloyd, ubi ſupra.
(f) Collins, pag. 509.

the Houſe, who were puzzled with it, admired him; and his pleading it ſo, that the whole Bench took notice of him (g). Here he made ſo great a progreſs in the Study of the Law, that at the end of ſix years, (which was exceedingly early in that ſtrict age,) he was called to the Bar [A], and ſoon after, for three ſucceſſive years, choſen Reader of Lyon's-Inn, where his learned Lectures procured him ſo great a reputation, that crouds of clients came to him for counſel (h), and the report of his more than ordinary gains in his practice gave him opportunity of paying his addreſſes with ſucceſs to Bridget, daughter and coheir of John Paſton of Huntingfield-Hall in Suffolk Eſq; [B], whoſe portion amounted to thirty thouſand pounds (i). After his marriage with her preferments flowed in upon him, the Cities of Coventry (k) and Norwich (l) chooſing him for their Recorder, the County of Norfolk one of their Knights in Parliament, and the Houſe of Commons their Speaker (m), in the thirty fifth year of Queen Elizabeth (n). The Queen likewiſe appointed him Sollicitor-General in 1592, and Attorney-General the year following (o). Several of his Letters written, while he was in this poſt, to the Lord Treaſurer Burghley are ſtill extant [C]. In 1598 he married for his ſecond wife Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Lord Burghley, afterwards Earl of Exeter, and Relict of Sir William Hatton, at a private Houſe without Bans or Licence; upon which they, together with Mr. Henry Bothwell, Rector of Oakeover, who married them, and Thomas Lord Burghley, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, who were preſent, were proſecuted in Archbiſhop Whitgift's Court, and upon their ſubmiſſion by their proxies abſolved from the cenſures incurred [D]. In 1603 he was knighted by King James I (p); and in November the ſame year, upon the trial of Sir Walter Raleigh &c. at Wincheſter, he treated that Gentleman with a fury and ſcurrility of Language hardly to be parallel'd [E]. On Monday January the 27th 160⅘ at the trial of the Gun-powder Conſpirators, and on Friday March the 28th following at the trial

(g) Lloyd, pag. 820.

(h) Idem, ibid.

(i) Idem, ibid. and Fuller, ubi ſupra.

(k) Collins, pag. 510.

(l) Lloyd, ubi ſupra, and Fuller, ubi ſupra.

(m) Lloyd and Fuller, ubi ſupra.

(n) Collins, pag. 510.

(o) Idem, ibid.

(p) Idem, ibid.

[A] Called to the Bar.] The firſt cauſe that he moved in the King's Bench was in Trinity-Term in the 20th year of Elizabeth when he was Council for Denny Vicar of Northlinham in the County of Norfolk, in an action of Scandalum Magnatum brought againſt him by Henry Lord Cromwell (1).

(1) Coke's Reports, Part 4. 12, b; and 14, b.

[B] Paying his addreſſes with ſucceſs to Bridget, daughter and coheir of John Paſton of Huntingfield-Hall in Suffolk Eſq;] This Lady was related to many noble families, her aunt Eleanor, ſiſter to her father, being married to Thomas Earl of Rutland, by whom ſhe had Henry Earl of Rutland; Gertrude married to George Talbot Earl of Shrewſbury; Anne, to Henry Nevil Earl of Weſtmorland; and Frances, wife to Henry Nevil Lord Abergavenny (2).

(2) Peerage of England. By Arthur Collins Eſq; vol. 3. pag. 509. edit. London 1735.

[C] Several of his Letters, written while he was in this poſt, to the Lord Treaſurer Burghley, are ſtill extant.] There are ſome of them amongſt the valuable collections of the very learned and ingenious James Weſt of the Middle-Temple Eſq; particularly one dated October the 27th 1593 concerning Mr. Swynerton's Leaſe of Wines; another dated May 20th, which from the Endorſement appears to be written in 1596, relating to the Spreader of the ſlanders againſt the Lord Admiral; another dated from his houſe in Holborne April 7th 1597, concerning the State of Mr. John Stanhope's Manor of Barleburgh and Kynnoldmarſhe in the County of Derby, and the lands in Ratcliff upon Trent in the County of Nottingham; another dated the laſt of June 1597, relating to his drawing of Mr. Pagett's Book; another dated from the Temple Octob. 21ſt 1597 concerning Mr. Peter Tuke's Petition for diſcharge of 1200 l. 4 s. 8 d. charged upon Sir Brian Tuke's account; and another dated from Godwike Auguſt 3d 1597; which is as follows:

" Right Honorable, My dutie moſt humbly remem-
" bred, I thought it my dutie to offer my humble ſer-
" vice to your Lordſhip, wherein it ſhall pleaſe your
" Lordſhip to commaunde me, and to give your Lord-
" ſhip moſt humble thankes (amongſt many other fa-
" voures) for this preſent libertie. I would to God,
" your Lordſhip's Bodye (whereof your Lordſhip ſome-
" what complayned when I laſt attended on you) were
" of ſuch ſtrength and vivacitie as the admirable me-
" morie and other inward guifts be, wherewith God
" hath moſt abundauntly bleſſed your Lordſhip with " all. This unſeaſonable Wynde and Rayne (which " our Countrie hath taſted in ſo great abundance) is " to be feared will continue this preſent dearth, where-
" with our Countrie (which is exceedingly repleniſhed
" with poore) is grievouſlie afflicted, unles God of his " mercy do ſend a more ſeaſonable tyme to ripen, and
" inne corne and other commodities. And thus I moſt
" humblie take my leave and reſt in all things at your " Lordſhip's commaundment with all thankful readi-
" neſs. From Godwike this 3d of Auguſt 1597.
" Your Lo. moſt humble at comaundment,
" Edw. Coke."

[D] Proſecuted in Archbiſhop Whitgift's Court, and upon their ſubmiſſion by their proxies abſolved from the cenſures incurred.] The Inſtrument dated Novemb. 7th 1598 is preſerved among the Records in the Regiſtry at Lambeth (3), and ſets forth that by their overlooking the authority of the Church they had all fallen under the greater excommunications and the conſequent penalties, but that they were abſolved, becauſe they had offended not out of contumacy, but through ignorance of the Law in that point. Nos igitur conſiderantes quod errore tantum, ac jurium in eâ parte ignorantiâ, animo minimè obdurato, nec contemptui dedito, in diverſas pœnas incidiſtis, quodque in veræ veſtræ recipiſcentiæ Teſtimonium nobis in hac parte vos ſubmiſiſtis, ac unuſquiſque veſtrum per Procuratorem ſuum ſupraſcript. ſe ſubmiſit &c. Mr. Collier obſerves (4), that there is another abſolution in the ſame form granted to Sir Thomas Egerton Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and Alice Counteſs of Derby; and another to the Earl of Hertford, not to mention the reſt in the ſame Regiſter; and that the regiſters of the ſucceeding Archbiſhops have likewiſe inſtances of the ſame kind.

(3) Regiſt. Whitgift, Part 3. fol. 108. A. D. 1598. See Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great Britain, Part 2. B. 7. pag. 662. and Collection of Records, pag. 102.

(4) Ubi ſupra, pag. 662.

[E] He treated that Gentleman with a fury and ſcurrility of language hardly to be paralleled.] This raiſed ſo general a reſentment againſt him, that he was expoſed for it upon the public Theatre (5). He was likewiſe reproached with this kind of behaviour, after his own fall by Sir Francis Bacon, who in a Letter Admonitory to the Lord Coke, M. S. ſigned A. B. in a volume of State-Letters among the Collections of the Lord Coleraine (6), and printed in the Cabala with Sir Francis Bacon's name prefixed to it, and an Extract of it in Arthur Wilſon's Hiſtory of King James (7), writes as follows: As your pleadings were wont to inſult over miſery, and inveigh bitterly againſt the perſon, ſo are you ſtill careleſs in this point, to praiſe and diſgrace upon ſlight grounds, and that ſuddenly; ſo that your reproofs or commendations are for the moſt part neglected and contemned, when the cenſure of a Judge coming ſlow, but ſure, ſhould be a brand to the guilty, and a crown to the virtuous. You will jeſt at any man in publick, without any reſpect to the perſon's dignity or your own. This diſgraces your gravity more than it can advance the opinion of your wit; and ſo do all actions, which we ſee you do directly with a touch of vain-glory. You make the Laws too much lean to your opinion; whereby you ſhew your ſelf to be a legal Tyrant &c. The Author of the Life of Sir Walter Raleigh in Lives Engliſh and Foreign (8), having ſhewn with what temper Sir Walter behaved under all the ſcurrilities of the Attor-

(5) See Mr. Theobald's edition of Shakeſpear, 8vo 1733, vol. 2. in the Comedy called, The Twelfth-Night, Act. 3. pag. 503.

(6) Fol. 772. See Mr. Oldys's Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, pag. 153. Note (c).

(7) Pag. 96, 97. edit. London 1653, in fol.

(8) Vol. 1. pag. 124. edit. 1704, in 8vo.

neytrial of Henry Garnet, Superior of the Jeſuits, at Guildhall in the City of London, he made two very elaborate ſpeeches, which were ſoon after publiſhed [F]. Cecil, Earl of Saliſbury, obſerved in his ſpeech upon the latter trial, that the Evidence had been ſo well diſtributed and opened by the Attorney-General, that he had never heard ſuch a maſs of matter better contracted, nor made more intelligible to the jury. June 27th the ſame year he was appointed Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas (q); and October the 25th 1613 he was made Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench (r), and November the 4th was ſworn of his Majeſty's Privy-Council (s). In 1615, the King deliberating upon the choice of a Lord Chancellor, when that poſt ſhould become vacant by the death or reſignation of Egerton, Lord Elleſmere, Sir Francis Bacon wrote to his Majeſty a letter dated February the 12th 1615 † upon that ſubject, wherein he has the following paſſage relating to the Lord Chief Juſtice: "If you take my Lord Coke, this will follow. Firſt your "Majeſty ſhall put an over-ruling Nature into an over-ruling place, which may breed an "extreme. Next, you ſhall blunt his induſtries in matter of Finances, which ſeemeth "to aim at another place. And laſtly, popular men are no ſure mounters for your "Majeſty's ſaddle." In the latter end of the ſame year he was very vigorous in the diſcovery and proſecution of the perſons employed in poiſoning Sir Thomas Overbury in the Tower in September 1612 [G]. His conteſt not long after with the Lord Chancellor Egerton, (q) Camden's Annals of King James I, ad ann. 1608. printed at the end of Guil. Camdeni & illuſtr. Viror. ad G. Camden. Epiſt. edit. Lond. 1691 in 4to.

(r) Idem 1613.

(s) Idem, ibid.

† Publiſhed in the Cabala, ſive Scrinia ſacra, pag. 29. edit. London 1663, in fol.

ney-General, proceeds thus: "We have given the rea- "der a taſte of the eloquence of the Bar in that reign, "to ſhew how far the hopes of places and preferment "will ſometimes carry men of ſenſe and learning from "reaſon and juſtice. This Billingſgate-way of ar- "guing is the more remarkable in a perſon of the "Lord Coke's character, whoſe writings are ſtill Ora- "cles in Weſtminſter Hall, &c." The Author of the Preface to the Collection of State-Trials in ſix volumes in folio, having ſpoken of ſuch Council as are wont to preſs nothing illegal or unreaſonable againſt the priſoner, nor uſe any artifices to deprive him of his juſt defence, adds; Theſe will appear in a different light from thoſe; who with rude and boiſterous language abuſe and revile the unfortunate priſoner; who ſtick not to take all advantages of him, however hard and unjuſt, which either his ignorance or the ſtrict rigour of the law may give them; who by force or ſtratagem endeavour to diſable him from making his defence; who brow-beat his witneſſes as ſoon as they appear, tho' ever ſo willing to declare the whole truth; and do all they can to put them out of countenance, and confound them in delivering their evidence, as if it were the duty of their place to convict all who are brought to trial, right or wrong, guilty or not guilty; and as if they, above all others, had a peculiar diſpenſation from the obligations of truth and juſtice. Such methods as theſe ſhould be below men of honour, not to ſay men of conſcience; yet in the peruſal of this work ſuch perſons will too often ariſe to view; and I could wiſh, for the credit of the Law, that that great Oracle of it, the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke had given leſs reaſon to be numbered among this ſort. The Author then refers us to the Trial of Sir Walter Raleigh, as a moſt flagrant example of this.

[F] Made two very elaborate Speeches, which were ſoon after publiſhed.] They are printed in a Book, entitled, A true and perfect Relation of the whole proceedings againſt the late moſt barbarous Traitors, Garnet a Jeſuit, and his Confederats: Contayning ſundry Speeches delivered by the Lords Commiſſioners at their Arraignments, for the better ſatisfaction of thoſe, that were hearers, as occaſion was offered; the Earl of Northampton's Speech having bene enlarged upon thoſe grounds, which are ſet downe. And laſtly, all that paſſed at Garnet's execution (9).

(9) Imprinted at London by Robert Barker, Printer to the King's moſt excellent Majeſtie 1606, in 4to.

[G] In the latter end of the year 1615 he was very vigorous in the diſcovery and proſecution of the perſons employed in poiſoning Sir Thomas Overbury in the Tower in September 1612.] Sir Francis Bacon, then Attorney-General, in his Speech in the Star-Chamber againſt Mr. Lumſden, Sir John Hollis, Sir John Wentworth, has the following paſſage: "Mr. Lumſden plays his part "firſt, who in the time between Weſton's ſtanding "mute and his trial, frames a moſt odious and libel- "lous relation, containing as many untruths as lines, "ſets it down in writing with his own hand, and de- "livers it to one of the Bed-Chamber to be put into "the King's hands, falſifying all that was done the "firſt day of Weſton's arraignment, turning the pike "and point of his imputations upon the Lord Chief "Juſtice of England, whoſe name thus occurring, I "cannot paſs by, and yet I cannot ſkill of this ſame "flattery or vulgar attribute; but this I will ſay of "him, and I would ſay as much to Ages, That never "man's perſon and his place were better met in a buſi- "neſs, than my Lord Cook and my Lord Chief Juſtice in the "cauſe of Overbury (10)." Sir Anthony Weldon introduces his account of this affair with theſe words (11). And now begins the game to be plaid, in which Somerſet muſt be the loſer, the cards being ſhuffled, cut, and dealt between the King and Sir Edward Coke, Chief Juſtice (whoſe daughter Purbeck, Villiers his brother had married, or was to marry, and therefore a fit Inſtrument to ruin Somerſet,) and Secretary Winwood. Theſe all play'd: the ſtake Somerſet's life and his Lady's, and their fortunes, and the Family of Suffolk. Some of them play'd booty; and in truth the game was not played above-board. Having afterwards obſerved (12), that Franklin upon his arraigment confeſſed, that Overbury was ſmothered to death, not poiſoned to death, tho' he had poiſon given him, he proceeds thus (13): "Here was "Cooke glad how to caſt about to bring both ends to- "gether, Mrs. Turner and Weſton being already hang- "ed for killing Overbury with poiſon. But he being "the very quinteſſence of Law, preſently informs "the Jury, that if a man be done to death with pi- "ſtols, poniards, ſwords, halter, poiſons, &c. ſo he "be done to death, the Indictment is good, if but in- "dicted for any of thoſe ways. But the good Lawyers "of thoſe times were not of that opinion, but did be- "lieve, that Mrs. Turner was directly murthered by "my Lord Cooke's Law, as Overbury was without "any Law." The ſame Writer likewiſe informs us (14), that it was verily believed, that when the King made thoſe terrible imprecations upon himſelf, and deprecations of the Judges at Royſton (15), when the proſecution was firſt ſet on foot, it was intended the Law ſhould run in its proper channel, but was ſtopt and put out of courſe by the folly of that great Clerk, though no wiſe man, Sir Edward Cooke, who in a vain-glorious ſpeech, to ſhew his vigilancy, enters into a rapture as he then ſat on the Bench, ſaying, God knows what became of that ſweet Babe Prince Henry, but I know ſomewhat. And ſurely in ſearching the Cabinets he lighted on ſome papers, that ſpoke plain in that, which was ever whiſper'd; which had he gone on in a gentle way, would have fallen in of themſelves, not to have been prevented; but this folly of his tongue ſtopt the breath of that diſcovery of that ſo foul a murder, which, I fear, cries ſtill for vengeance. Arthur Wilſon alſo having obſerved, that Sir Thomas Monſon, one of the Agents of the Counteſs of Somerſet, had paſt one day's trial at Guildhall, tells us (16), that the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke in his rhetorical flouriſhes at the arraignment of Sir Thomas vented ſome expreſſions, (which he either deduced from the Earl of Northampton's aſſuring Sir Gerwas Elways, the Lieutenant of the Tower, that the making away of Overbury would be acceptable to the King, or from ſome other ſecret hint received,) as if he could diſcover more than the death of a private perſon; intimating, tho' not plainly, that Overbury's untimely remove had ſomething in it of Retaliation, as if he had been guilty of the ſame crime againſt Prince Henry, bleſſing himſelf with admiration at the horror of ſuch actions. In which he flew to ſo high a pitch, that he was taken down by a Court-Lure, Sir Thomas Monſon's Trial laid aſide, and he ſoon after ſet at liberty, and

(10) Hiſtory of Great Britain, being the Life and Reign of King James the Firſt, relating to what paſſed from his firſt acceſs to the Crown till his Death. By Arthur Wilſon, Eſq; pag. 87. edit. London 1653, in fol.

(11) Court and Character of King James: whereunto now is added the Court of King Charles: continued unto the beginning of theſe unhappy times. With ſome Obſervations upon him inſtead of a Character. Collected and perfected by Sir A. W. Publiſhed by Authority. pag. 91, 92. edit. London 1651.

(12) Ibid. pag. 100.

(13) Ibid. pag. 100, 101.

(14) Pag. 113, 114.

(15) See pag. 92, 93.

(16) Ubi ſupra, pag. 89.

Egerton, with ſome other cauſes, haſtened the ruin of his intereſt with the Court [H]; ſo that he was brought upon his knees before the Council at Whitehall June the 26th 1616, and his offences charged upon him by Yelverton, the Sollicitor-General [I], and on June the 30th following he was ſequeſtered from the Council-Table, and the Office of Lord Chief and the Lord Chief Juſtice's wings were clipt for it ever after. And it was rumoured, that the King, heightened to ſo much paſſion by this eruption of Sir Edward Cook's, went to the Council-Table, and kneeling down there, deſired God to lay a curſe upon him and his poſterity for ever, if he were conſenting to Overbury's death. But this cannot be aſſerted, being above our ſphere; yet as Mathematicians do propoſe to themſelves imaginary circles, for the ſeveral motions in the heavens, and though there be none diſcovered, yet they find the effects of what they apprehend; ſo the ſudden ſtopping of Monſon's Trial put ſtrange imaginations into men's heads, and thoſe ſeconded by reports too high for private diſcovery, their operation only falling under the common notion. But the Lord Chief Juſtice was blamed for flying out of his way; that having enough to proſecute the buſineſs, he would graſp after more, till he loſt all (16).

(16) Pag. 90.

[H] His conteſt with the Lord Chancellor Egerton, with ſome other cauſes, haſtened the ruin of his intereſt with the Court.] Arthur Wilſon tells us (17), that Sir Edward had heard and determined a cauſe at the Common Law; and ſome report there was jugling in the buſineſs. The witneſs that knew and ſhould have related the truth, was wrought upon to be abſent, if any man would undertake to excuſe his non-appearance. A pragmatical fellow of the party undertook it, went with the witneſs to a Tavern, called for a gallon-pot full of ſack, bid him drink, and ſo leaving him went into the Court. This witneſs is called for as the prop of the cauſe; the undertaker anſwers upon oath, that he left him in ſuch a condition, that if he continues in it but a quarter of an hour, he is a dead man. This evidencing the man's incapability to come deaded the matter ſo, that it loſt the cauſe. The plaintiffs, who had received the injury, bring the buſineſs into Chancery. The defendants having had judgment at Common Law refuſe to obey the orders of that Court; whereupon the Lord Chancellor for contempt of the Court commits them to priſon. They petition againſt him in the Star-Chamber; the Lord Chief Juſtice joins with them, foments the difference, threatening the Lord Chancellor with a Præmunire. The Chancellor makes the King acquainted with the buſineſs, who ſent to Sir Francis Bacon his Attorney-General, Sir Henry Montagu, and Sir Randolph Crew his Serjeants at Law, and Sir Henry Yelverton his Sollicitor, commanding them to ſearch what precedents there have been of late years, wherein ſuch as complained in Chancery were relieved according to equity and conſcience after judgment at Common Law. Theſe being men well verſed in their profeſſion, after canvaſſing the matter throughly, returned anſwer to the King, that "there hath been a "ſtrong current of practice and proceeding in Chan"cery after judgment at Common Law, and many "times after execution, continued ſince Henry VII's "time to the Lord Chancellor that now is, both in "the reigns (ſeriatim) of the ſeveral Kings, and the "times of the ſeveral Chancellors, whereof divers "were great learned men in the Law; it being in "caſes, where there is no remedy for the ſubject by "the ſtrict courſe of the Common Law, unto which "the Judges are ſworn." This, ſays Wilſon (18), ſatisfied the King, juſtified the Lord Chancellor, and the Chief Juſtice received the foil; which was a bitter potion to his ſpirit, but not ſtrong enough to work on him as his enemies wiſhed. Therefore to humble him the more, he is brought on his knees at the Council-Table; and three other ingredients added to the doſe of a more active operation. Among Sir Francis Bacon's Letters printed in the Cabala *, we have ſeveral relating to this affair; and particularly one to the King, dated February 15th 1615, relating to the difference begun between the Chancery and the King's-Bench; another to Sir George Villiers, dated Feb. 19th, upon the ſame ſubject; and another to the King, dated Feb. 21ſt, in which he has this paſſage: My opinion plainly is, that my Lord Coke at this time is not to be diſgraced, both becauſe he is ſo well habituate for that which remaineth of theſe capital cauſes, as alſo for that which I find is in his breaſt touching your finances and matters of repair of your eſtate. And (if I might ſpeak it) as I think it were good his hopes were at an end in ſome kind; ſo I could wiſh they were raiſed in ſome other †. Roger Coke (19) gives us a different account of the occaſion of the Chief Juſtice's being in diſgrace, and informs us, that he was one of the firſt, who felt the effects of the power of the riſing favourite, Sir George Villiers, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, and at this time (20) ſat very looſe and uneaſy. He had highly diſguſted the Court and High-Church Party in oppoſing Bancroft's Articles againſt granting prohibitions at Common Law (21). He oppoſed the Chancellor's taking notice of a cauſe in the Bench after judgment given, contrary to the Act 4, Henry 4, 28. and refuſed to give any opinion in the caſe of Commendams, being a Judge, before it came judicially before him. And however, ſays Mr. Coke, Egerton, upon the ſwearing Sir Henry Montague, when he ſucceeded Sir Edward Coke in the office of Chief Juſtice, declared Sir Edward's depoſing was for being ſo popular; yet I have it from one of Sir Edward's ſons, that the cauſe of his removal was this. Sir Nicholas Tufton, being very aged, and having a Patent for life of the Green-Wax Office in the King's Bench, Villiers by his Agents dealt with Sir Nicholas, that if he would ſurrender his Patent, the King would make him Earl of Thanet, and in the mean time Sir Francis Bacon treated with Sir Edward to know whether in caſe Sir Nicholas ſurrendred his Patent the Viſcount ſhould prefer another to the Office. Sir Edward would give Sir Francis no other anſwer, than this, that he was old, and could not wreſtle with my Lord. However after Sir Nicholas had ſurrendred, Sir Edward refuſed to admit of a Clerk by Villiers's nomination, but ſtood upon his right, and thought the Judges of the King's-Bench ſerved the King to their loſs, and therefore he would ſo diſpoſe of the office, that the ſalaries of the other Judges of the King's-Bench ſhould be advanced. Upon this he was removed from his poſt, and Montague put in, who diſpoſed of the office as the Favourite pleaſed. But tho' the Favourite's diſpleaſure, ſays Mr. Coke, began here with Sir Edward, it did not end ſo... However Sir Edward might have been reſtored again to his place, if he would have given a bribe; but he anſwered, "A Judge ought not to take a bribe, nor give "a bribe." The Author of the Notes on Wilſon's Life of King James, publiſhed in the ſecond volume of Kennet's Complete Hiſtory of England, tells us *, that Sir Edward loſt the King's favour, and ſome time after his place, for letting words fall upon one of the Trials, "importing his ſuſpicion that Overbury had been poi"ſoned to prevent the diſcovery of another crime of "the ſame nature, committed upon one of the high"eſt rank, whom he termed a ſweet Prince; which "was taken to be meant of Prince Henry."

(17) Ubi ſupra, pag. 94, 95.

(18) Ibid, pag. 95.

* Pag. 30, & ſeqq.

† Ibid. pag. 32.

(19) Detection of the Court and State of England, vol. 1. pag. 91, 92. edit. London 1719, in 8vo.

(20) In the year 1616.

(21) This happened in Michaelmas-Term, 1605. See Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great Britain, Part 2. B. 8. pag. 688, 689.

* Pag. 689. edit. London 1706.

[I] Brought upon his knees before the Council... and his offences charged upon him by Yelverton, the Sollicitor-General.] The Letter of the Lords of the Council as publiſhed by Mr. Francis Peck (22) from the MS. Collections of the Reverend Mr. Thomas Baker, is as follows: "It may pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſtie, "the Lord Chief Juſtice preſenting himſelf on his "knees at the Board, your Sollicitor ſignifyed, that "he was by your commandement to charge him for "certen Acts and Speeches, wherein your Majeſtie "was much unſatisfied, which were in number three: "I. An Act done. II. Speeches of high contempt ut"tered in the Seat of Juſtice. III. Uncomely and un"dutiful carriage in the preſence of your Majeſtie, the "Privye Councell, and Judges. Concerning the firſt, "which was the Act, it was done when he was in a "place of truſt, and concealed a Statute of 12000 l. "taken of Sir Chr. Hatton, to the uſe of Sir Ed. Cooke, "when he was your Majeſtie's Attorney General, not "to pay a debt of good value due unto your Majeſtie, "nor to accept of a diſcharge for the ſame. And for "the better ſtrengthening of the Stat. there was like"wiſe a Bond taken of 6000 l. with ſuerties to the "ſame effect. So that Sir Chr. Hatton lay charged "under the penalty of 18000 l. not to pay the debt, "nor agree to no Surrender, Diſchar[illegible], or Releaſe, "nor

(22) Deſiderata Curioſa; or a Collection of divers ſcarce and curious pieces relating chiefly to Matters of Engliſh Hiſtory, vol. 1. lib. 6. Num. 6. pag. 18, 19, 20. edit. London 1732 in fol.

Chief Juſtice [K]. October the 3d he was called before the Chancellor, and forbid Weſtminſter-Hall, and ordered to anſwer ſeveral exceptions againſt his Reports (t). In the beginning of November the King removed him from the Office of Lord Chief Juſtice (u), in which he was ſucceeded by Sir Henry Montague. Upon his diſgrace, Sir Francis Bacon wrote an admonitory Letter to him, in which he remonſtrates to him the errors of (t) Idem, ad ann. 1616.

(u) Idem, ibid.

" nor any wayes to aſſent thereunto. That this offence " was aggravated by the denial and proteſtation made " of late by the Lord Chief Juſtice, that he was not " privye to the condition of the Defeaſance; whereas " the Stat. was taken to himſelf by Indenture, where- " of Sir Chr. Hatton's part was found, but the other " was not found. That he was privye to the penning " of it, incerted wordes with his own handes; and " that Mr. Walter and Mr. Bridgman his own Coun- " cell were witneſſes unto. The ſecond, wordes " ſpoken in the King's-Bench the laſt day of Hillarie- " Terme laſt, at a caſe of Glanvill and Allen, where- " of the Sollicitor made a narrative relation, and " charged the Lord Chief Juſtice to have given too " much hart and encouragement to that cauſe; and " that he had too conſtantly directed the Jury, turning " them thrice from the Barre, that if they ſett their " hand to a Bill after Judgment, he would foreclоſe " them the Court. And further, in another cawſe the " ſame day, ſaid, that the Common Lawe of England " would be overthrown without, the light of the Law " would be obſcured. And that all this was confirm- " ed by good witneſſes. The third and laſt point was " his undecent behaviour before your Majeſtie, your " Councell, and your Judges. And that conſiſted of " two points. Firſt, the exception that he tooke at " your learned Counſell in your preſence, for ſpeak- " ing at your commandment. The ſecond, that your " Majeſtie having open'd your ſelf in the caſe of Com- " mendams, and ſatisfied the Judges, that your Maje- " ſties ſending to them had no intent to delay juſtice, " and the queſtion being put to the reſt of the Judges, " whether they did not hold it for a delay of juſtice, " that your Majeſtie had ſent in the caſe; or if your " Majeſtie ſhould ſend hereafter in a like caſe, where- " in your Majeſties Progenitors were intereſted? the " reſt of the Judges ſubmitting themſelves, he only " diſcented from all the reſt. This being the effect of " your Sollicitors charge, your Lord Chief Juſtice " made anſwere, that he would by your Lordſhip's " favour begin with the laſt. And ſaid, for the part " of challange and taking exception at your Majeſties " Councell learned ſpeaking in the caſe by your Ma- " jeſties commandement, he acknowledged it for an " error, and ſubmitted himſelf. To the part, that " upon the queſtion aſked the Judges touching Stay of " Proceedings, he denied, when all the reſt did yield: " his anſwere was, that the queſtion yielded many par- " ticulars, which ſuddenly occurred to his mind, and " cawſed him to make his anſwere, that when the " tyme ſhould be, he would doe that which ſhould " become an honeſt and juſt Judge. For the Bond he " ſaith, that that aſſurance was in hammering a yeare " and a half; they were Elephanti Libelli; and now, " twelve years being paſt, it was no great marvaile if " his memory were ſhort. Eſpecially ſince about that " time he was imployed, firſt in the great ſervice of " the Prieſt Treaſon, and Cobham, and in the next " yeare in the Powder Treaſon. And that if any " things have ſlipped in the multitude of buiſineſs, " that theis ſervices blott out his errors. Secondly, " ab impoſſibili, which was, that the debt remayninge " at the tyme was 33000 l. and that young Mr. Hat- " ton's men were very meane, and not above 100 " markes a year. And as ſoon as it came to the poſ- " ſibilitie, when he firſt heard of Sir Robert Riches " offer, he then ſubmitted it, before ſuch tyme as he " remembred the Stat. or Defeaſance. Thirdly, Cui " Bono? He ſaid, he had never any profit by it, but " the preſentation to a Benefice, and all the reſt was " his wife's. Fourthly, that the Crowne was content " with the eſtabliſhment, and he did but take Bond " to continue it. And throughout all this he did ſub- " mit himſelf to your Majeſtie and the Board, ſaying, " Actus non facit reum, niſi mens ſit rea. For his " Speech in the King's-Bench, &c. he ſaith, that firſt, " whatſoever was done, was by the common conſent. " And for thoſe Speeches, many of them were ſpoken, " and he knew by whom they were ſpoken, but not " by himſelf. And then offered four conſiderations. " I. That the Court, unto which nevertheleſs he did " except, was ad informandum, non ad convincendum. " II. They were witneſſes but on one ſide. III. That " the Interrogatories might be drawne too ſhort. IV. " That it was concerning words ſpoken four months " agoe; which being ſpoken amongſt many, may " be diverſly reported. And thereupon produced a " paper written by himſelf, conteyninge, as he ſaith, " the true paſſage of the day: (which paper we pre- " ſent unto your Majeſtie herewithall;) being, as he " ſaith, ſet down by himſelf the day after, ſedato a- " nimo. And touching thes words, that the Common " Lawe would be overthrowne, and the Judges would " have but little to do at the Aſſiſes, becauſe the Light " of the Lawe would be obſcured: he confeſſeth the " wordes, but ſaith, they were not ſpoken the ſame " day, but at another tyme in the caſe of Sir An- " thony Mildmaies. And added, that he would not " maynteine a difference between the two Courts, nor " bring it into queſtion, yet, if it were an error, he " may ſay, Erravimus cum Patribus. And thereupon " alledged the examples. Firſt, the article againſt " Cardinal Wolſey, 20 H. 8. wherein the ſame wordes " are uſed, viz. that ſuch proceedings in the Chan- " cery tended to the ſubverſion of the Common Lawe. " Art. 20. Secondly, the Booke intituled, The Doc- " tor and Student. Thirdly, an opinion of the Judges " in Throgmorton's caſe in Q. Eliz. tyme. And ad- " ded alſo further, that for the tyme to come noe man " ſhould ever make any oppoſition. Soe that the " Judges having received your Majeſties commande- " ment by the Atturny Generall, that noe Bill of that " Nature ſhould be hereafter received, hee and his " brethren have cauſed the ſame to be entered as an " order in the ſame Court, which ſhall be obſerved. " Which being the effect of his Anſwere, we have " thought to add withall, that before us, as well in " ſpeech as in action he behaved himſelf modeſtly and " ſubmiſſively."

[K] On June 30th following he was ſequeſtered from the Council-Table, and the office of Lord Chief Juſtice.] We have the following account of this affair publiſhed by Mr. Peck (23) from Mr. Baker's MS. Collections. Sir Edward Coke preſenting himſelf that day at the Council Table upon his knees, Secretary Winwood ſignified unto him, that the Lords had made their report unto his Majeſty of that which paſſed on Wedneſday before at Whitehall, for which he was charged by his Majeſty's Sollicitor with certain things, wherein his Majeſty was much diſſatisfied; which report contained a juſt and true relation, as well of thoſe things, which were objected againſt him, as of his anſwer thereunto in particular, and that rather to his advantage than otherwiſe. Which being delivered in writing, and duely weighed and conſidered of by the King, his Majeſty was no way ſatisfied with his anſwer to the parts or any of them, wherewith he ſtood charged; viz. neither in that, which he made concerning the bond and defeaſance upon the extalment of a debt of Sir Chr. Hatton's late Lord Chancellor of England; neither in that which he maketh concerning his ſpeeches of high contempt, uttered as he ſat in the Seat of Juſtice, concerning the overthrow of the Common-Law; nor laſtly in the anſwer he offereth to excuſe uncivil and undiſcrete carriage before his Majeſty being aſſiſted with his Privy Council and his Judges. But the charge lieth ſtill upon him, notwithſtanding any thing contained in his ſaid anſwer. Nevertheleſs ſuch was his Majeſty's clemency and goodneſs, that he was pleaſed not to proceed heavily againſt him, but rather to look upon the merit of his former ſervices, and accordingly decreed: I. That he be ſequeſtered from the Council-Table, until his Majeſty's pleaſure be further known. II. That he forbear to ride his ſummer-circuit, as

(23) Ibid. num. 7. pag. 21, 22.

Juſtice

of his former conduct [L]. In 1617 there happened a prodigious diſpute between him and his wife, the Lady Hatton, about marrying their daughter Frances to Sir John Villiers, brother to the Earl of Buckingham [M]. September the 15th the ſame year he was readmitted into the Privy Council (w), the King being unwilling to loſe his abilities (x), and was afterwards employed in ſeveral commiſſions (y). February the 6th 1621 he vigorouſly (w) Idem, ibid. ad ann. 1617.

(y) Collins, pag. 512.

(x) Hiſtory of Great Britain, being the Life and Reign of K. James the Firſt &c. By Arthur Wilſon, Eſq; pag. 97. edit. London 1653, in fol.

Juſtice of Aſſiſe. III. That during this vacation, while he had time to live privately, and diſpoſe himſelf at home, he take into his conſideration, and renew his Books of Reports, wherein, as his Majeſty is informed, be many extravagant and exorbitant opinions ſet down and publiſhed for poſitive and good Laws. And if in reviewing and reading thereof, he find any thing fit to be altered and amended, the correction is left to his diſcretion. Amongſt other things the King was not well pleaſed with the title of thoſe Books, wherein he ſtiled himſelf Lord Chief-Juſtice of England, wherein he could challenge no more but Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench. And having corrected what in his diſcretion he found meet in theſe reports, his Majeſty's pleaſure was, he ſhould bring the ſame privately to himſelf, that he might conſider thereof, as in his Princely judgment ſhould be found expedient. Hereunto Mr. Secretary adviſed him to conform himſelf in all duty and obedience as he ought; whereby he might hope, that his Majeſty in time would receive him again to his gracious and princely favour. Thereunto the Lord Chief Juſtice made anſwer, that he did in all humility proſtrate himſelf to his Majeſty's good pleaſure; that he acknowledged that decree to be juſt, and proceeded rather from his Majeſty's exceeding mercy, than from his juſtice; gave humble thanks to their Lordſhips for their favours and goodneſs towards him, and hoped that his behaviour for the future time ſhall be ſuch as ſhould deſerve their Lordſhip's favours. The Lords having thus far proceeded, the Lord Treaſurer told him, that he had one thing more to let him know, which belonged to the Earl Marſhal to take notice of; which was that his Coachman uſed to ride bare-headed before him; which was more than any ways he could aſſume or challenge to himſelf; and required him to forbear it for the future. To which the Lord Chief Juſtice anſwered, that his Coachman did it only for his own eaſe, and not by his commandment. And ſo with the like ſubmiſſion and acknowledgment of favour departed.

[L] Upon his diſgrace, Sir Francis Bacon wrote an admonitory Letter to him, in which he remonſtrates to him the errors of his former conduct.] We have given a paſſage from this Letter in the Note [E]; and it is aſcribed to Bacon in the Cabala *, where it is printed, and by Lloyd in his State-Worthies †. In this Letter he adviſes Sir Edward to be humbled for this viſitation, and obſerves, that affliction only levels the mole-hills of pride in us, ploughs up the heart, and makes it fit for wiſdom to ſow her ſeed, and grace to bring forth her increaſe. He afterwards ſhews him the errors in his conduct. In diſcourſe, ſays he, you delight to ſpeak too much, not to hear other men. This ſome ſay, becomes a Pleader, not a Judge. For by this ſometimes your affections are entangled with a love of your own arguments, though they be the weaker, and rejecting of thoſe, which, when your affections were ſettled, your own judgment would allow for ſtrongeſt. Thus while you ſpeak in your element, the Law, no man ordinarily equals you; but when you wander (as you often delight to do,) you then wander indeed, and give never ſuch ſatisfaction as the curious time requires. This is not cauſed by any natural defect, but firſt for want of election, when you having a large and fruitful mind, ſhould not ſo much labour what to ſpeak, as to find what to leave unſpoken. Rich ſoils are often to be weeded. Secondly, you cloy your auditory. When you would be obſerved, ſpeech muſt either be ſweet or ſhort. " Thirdly, you converſe " with books, not men, and books ſpecially humane, " and have no excellent choice with men, who are " the beſt books. For a man of action and employ- " ment you ſeldom converſe with, and then but with " underlings, not freely, but as a Schoolmaſter, ever " to teach, never to learn. But if ſometimes you " would in your familiar diſcourſe hear others, and " make election of ſuch as know what they ſpeak, " you ſhould know many of thoſe tales, which you " tell to be but ordinary, and many other things " which you delight to repeat and ſerve in for no- " velties, to be but ſtale. As in your pleadings you " were wont to inſult even miſery, and inveigh bit- " terly againſt the perſon; ſo are you ſtill careleſs " in this point &c. *." Your too much love of the world is too much ſeen, when having the living of 10,000 l, you relieve few or none. The hand that hath taken ſo much, can it give ſo little? Herein you ſhew no bowels of compaſſion, as if you thought all too little for yourſelf, or that God had given you all that you have (if you think wealth to be his gift, I mean, that you get well; for I know ſure the reſt is not) only to that end you ſhould ſtill gather more, and never be ſatisfied, but try how much you could gather, to account for all at the great and general audit-day. We deſire you to amend this, and let your poor tenants in Norfolk find ſome comfort, where nothing of your eſtate is ſpent towards their relief, but all brought up hither, to the impoveriſhing of your country. He then tells him, that in the caſe of Overbury he uſed too many delays, till the delinquents hands were looſe, and his own bound; and that he was too open in his proceedings, and ſo taught them how to defend themſelves. " But that, continues " he, which we commend you for are thoſe excellent " parts of nature and knowledge in the Law, which " you are indued withall. But theſe are only good " in their good uſe. Wherefore we thank you heartily for ſtanding ſtoutly in the Commonwealth-behalf, " hoping it proceedeth not from a diſpoſition to op- " poſe greatneſs, (as your enemies ſay,) but to do juſtice, " and deliver truth indifferently without reſpect of " perſons."

* See the reſt of this Paragraph above in the note [E].

* Cabala ſive Scrinia ſacra, Myſteries of State and Government, in Letters, &c. pag. 219. edit. London 1663, in fol.

† Pag. 825.

[M] In 1617 there happened a prodigious diſpute between him and his wife, the Lady Hatton, about marrying their daughter Frances to Sir John Villiers, brother to the Earl of Buckingham.] We have given ſome account of this affair, in the Article of BACON (Francis) (24), to which we ſhall refer the Reader; and ſhall here preſent him with ſome original papers amongſt the collections of James Weſt of the Middle-Temple Eſq; The firſt is a paper of Sir Edward Coke's dated the 15th of June 1617, and is as follows,

(24) Note [H], vol. 2. pag. 553.

Brief Articles to be performed on my part.

1. During my life two thouſand markes by the yeare for the preſent maintenance of Sir John and my daughter Frances.

2. There is allready conveyed of mannors and Landes of myn own inheritance after the deceaſe of me and my wife fifteen hundred pounds per annum to the uſe of my daughter. And I am to convey three hundred pounds more per annum of like eſtate, in toto 1800 l. per annum.

3. I will give ten thouſand pound to be layed out in Lands to the uſe of Sir John and my daughter Frances.

15 Junii 1617

EDW. COKE.

On my Wives part.

My wife hath lands of inheritance, which ſhe hath purchaſed ſince ſhe was my wife, as followeth.

1. The Caſtle and Iſle of Purbeck in the countie of Dorſet.

2. The Mannor of Croſt in the county of Lincolne.

3. The Mannor of Wittleſea in the countie of Cambridge.

4. Hatton-Houſe in Holborne, and land in Middleſex.

Alſo all the plate, houſhold ſtuffe, leaſes, goods, and chattels, which my wife brought with her, ſhall after our deceaſes be devided between them, and in the meane [time] they ſhall not be ſold, given, or diminiſhed.

EDW. COKE.

July the 15th 1617 he wrote a Letter, which is addreſſed, To the Right Honorable his ſingular good Lord the Earl of Buckingham of his Majeſties moſt Honorable Privye Counſell, theis; and is as follows; vigorouſly maintained in the Houſe of Commons, that no proclamation is of any force againſt the Parliament (aa). In July a reconciliation was made between him and his wife, the Lady Hatton, by means of his Majeſty (bb). The ſame year being looked upon as one of the great incendiaries in the Houſe of Commons, he was removed from the Council-Table with diſgrace, the King ſaying, that he was the fitteſt inſtrument for a Tyrant, that ever was in England. "And yet, ſays Wilſon (cc), in the Houſe he called the "King's prerogative a great over-grown Monſter. And how can theſe agree; unleſs "becauſe the King would not take his counſel, he hanged himſelf on the other ſide? "But whether the King had cauſe to ſay the one, I know not; but he, it ſeems, "means found enough to ſay the other." December the 27th he was committed to the (aa) Camden, ad ann. 1621.

(bb) Idem, ibid.

(cc) Ubi ſupra, pag. 191.

"Right Honourable,

"After my wife, Sir Edmond Withipole, and the "Lady his wife, and other their confederates to pre-"vent this match betwene Sir John Villiers and my "daughter Frances (whereunto his Majeſtie had given "his conſent and bleſſynge) had conveyed away my "dereſt daughter out of my houſe in moſt ſecret man-"ner to a houſe near Oatland, which Sir Edmond "Withipole had taken for this ſommer of the Lord "of Arguile; I, by God's wonderful Providence, find-"inge where ſhe was, together with my ſonnes and "our ordinary attendants, did breake open two dores, "and recovered my daughter; which I did for theſe "cauſes: Firſt and principally leaſt his Majeſtie might "thinke that I was of confederacy with my wife in "conveying her away, or charge me with want of "government of my houſholde in ſuffering her to "be carried awaye, after I had engaged myſelf to his "Majeſtie for the furtherance of this match. 2. For "that I demaunded my childe of Sir Edmond and his "wife, and they denied to deliver hir to me. And "yet for this, warrant is given to ſue me in his Ma-"jeſtie's name in the Starre-Chamber with all expe-"dition, which tho' I feare not well to defend, yet "it wil be a great vexation. But I have juſt cauſe "to bring all the confederats into the Starre-Chamber "for conveyinge away my childe out of my houſe. "If I had not recovered my daughter when I did, "the match could never have proceeded; but nowe "(noble Lord) protect me from the mallice of men, "and I make no doubt of it. She is nowe ſequeſtred "by the Lords to Mr. Attornie's houſe for a time, "and after to my Lord Knevett's houſe, whereas by "Lawe the cuſtody and government of my childe be-"longeth to me; which I muſt obey until other order "be taken. And ſo reſtinge under the protection of "your honourable favour and ſupportation, I ſhall "ever remayne, your devoted ſervant

July 15, 1617. EDW. COKE."

The Lady Hatton's papers are without date. We ſhall firſt give three of her letters to the Earl of Buckingham. The firſt is directed To the Right Honourable the Earle of Bokingham Maſter of the Hors and Prevey Counſelor to the Kinge, and is as follows:

"My Lord,

"If your Lordſhip had not wrytt, by which I was "ſeurly engaged to a retorne, I had not bin ſo bolld "witth your leaſur. I had paſyently ſitten doune "witth thes violenſes ofred me, thou I be the firſt "Motther from whome a doufter hath bene poled out "of her fatther's hous, and by her fatther mayd a "preſoner in her halfe brothers. Neyther ſeeke I "the honour of this trety, and therefore controdictt "beecaus I ame nott wood, as your Lordſhip toucheth "in your letter. For if I had bene to bin treatted "withall, I ſhould as the laſt winter haue anſwered "clerely, a faror delyng then ſome now haue aforded "your Lordſhip's mother and brother, who breaking "the firſt, as you know, now meane as lytill truth, "thou to thir ends beetor diſgiſed. But I ame a wo-"man, and muſt ſofer, and les then a woman in be-"ing his wife. I will eaus my beſt paſiens and joy, "that thes violenſes I ſofer is for no other fault then "for obaying the Kinge in making good thatt bar-"gin the King hatth receued 10,000 l. I haue euer "reſpected your Lordſhip, and in all occaſyons haue "ſo expreſt my ſelfe, and dooe as much as any, "ſo evor deteſt thatt defamaſion layd upon Sir "John Velors your brother; which I only ſpeake from "the reſpectt I cary to your ſattisfaccion and my one "honor, beeing of a famyly thatt can acnowlege "your reſpectts to me, and would be aſhamed of ſuch "unworthynes in me. Your Lordſhip therefore vouch-"ſafe me plaſe in your good thofts, till I ſhall deſerue "the contrary, and judge me by your knolege, not "by others report; for I am,

"Your Lordſhip's reſpettfull Frend

Elizabeth Hatton."

The ſecond is addreſſed, To the Right Honourable the Earlle of Bukingam Maſter of the Kinges Horſe: and is as follows:

"My Lord,

"According to the reſolufion taken before your Lo: "your motther and brother demaunded the paper men-"tifioned. Sir E. C. anſwered thatt eyther Secretary "Winwood hade it, or itt was caſt by hee knew nott "where, witth ſome cuaſion beeſides. We are now "att a ſtand, I not daring to truſt my bade memory "doe now wryt my conſeauings. What ſeutts witth "the Kings menyng and yours, I pray may bee writ-"ten in a letter by the King's commaund to the King's "Attorney. I conſeaued by the Kinge's words that "Sir Edwarde Couke was aſked whatt he did or would "dooe more in this mach for the Kinges favor. Sir "E. C. anſevered thatt hee would aſſuer all the land "with this doufter, and give his elldor dofter an ho-"norable porſion in mony. The Kinge bad him "wryte it. Sir E. C. writt a paper, and putt in both "the doufters. The Kinge aſked whatt he had to "dooe witth the otther doufter; ſo as Sir E. C. "mended it; the ſame as wee remember was botth "repeted and avoued by your Lordſhip to myſelfe, "your mother, and brother; whos reſpectte I fynd ſo "to my contentte as I ſhall deſyer to bee enabled to "make demonſtraſion thereof, and euer to avow my-"ſelfe

"Your afeccionatt and loving Frend

"Elizabeth Hatton."

The third is ſign'd, tho' not written with her own hand, and is directed, To the Right Honourable the Earle of Buckingham, Maſter of the Horſe, and one of his Majeſties moſt honourable Prevey Counſellors.

"My Lord,

"I preſume to preſent this incloſed to your Lord-"ſhip, deſiereing you will pleaſe to deliuer it to "his Majeſtie, who, howſoever in my regard might "leſs reſpect it, yett cominge from you will vouchſafe "it the better acceptance: and I hope your Lordſhip "will leſſe blame mee hearin, if craveinge my hap-"pie returne into his Majeſties good opinion, I take "this the neareſt way, and intereſt you in an office "of no diſhonour to you, to her, who will acknow-"ledge the returne from you, and reſt your Lord-"ſhip's friend, if ſo you pleaſe to account mee

"Eliz. Hatton."

Her petition, addreſſed, To the King's moſt excellent Majeſtie, is as follows.

"Moſt gratious Soueraigne,

"Pleaſe to caſt downe your ſacred eye uppon the "greeſe which neareſt toucheth the afflicted minde of "your humble ſubject, which is, that I heare your "Majeſtie is offended with ſome errours comitted "by mee, a woman, and a mother, whoſe ſexe and "qualitie, as too weake to wraſtle with ſtronge ap-"prehenſions, whatſoever the cauſe bee, will I truſt "with the mercy of a juſt Kinge, receave a more "fauorable interpretation, and the rather in regarde "of my contricion and ſence I have of my fault, and

"of the Towĕr, and the next day examined; and Sir Robert Cotton and Mr. Thomas Wilſon ſent to ſearch his papers (dd). Orders were likewiſe given for ſealing up the locks and doors of his chambers in London and in the Temple, and for ſeizing of his papers; and it (dd) Camden, ad ann. 1621.

" of the loſſe of your Majeſties good opinion, which " as I value before all priuate reſpects, ſo ſhall I bee " moſt happy in recouering the ſame, which with " my uttermoſt I will indeavoure. God whoſe ſub- " ſtitute you are, requireth for the greateſt offences " but repentance, confeſſion, and a harte to amend, " all which I humbly preſent to your Majeſtie, and " lye at your royall foote for grace to her that is,

" Your Majeſtie's moſt humble and dutiful ſubject.
Eliz. Hatton."

Another Petition of hers to the King is as follows. To the King's moſt excellent Majeſtie the humble Petition of the Ladie Elizabeth Hatton.

That your Majeſtie would be pleaſed amongſt your many other buſſineſſes of greater importance to have in remembraunce her laſt petitions; wherein is conteyned in effect the ſumme of what ſhee deſireth. And that your Majeſtie would alſo vouchſafe to thinke upon the miſery of a poore woman; who for her obedience to your commandement is both left by her huſband, and deprived of her former allowaunce ſhee then enjoyed to mainteyne her familye: which now wantinge ſhee liveth in ſome neceſſitye, and alſo in contynuall feare of her life, being credibly informed that the ſame ſervant of his that putt a quarrell upon hers, hath uſed to weare a ſtiletto in his pockett, contrary to your Majeſties commandment: which ſaid ſervaunt he ſtill continueth and keepeth in his ſervice.

That in conſideration heereof your Majeſtie would be pleaſed ſome ſpeedye courſe may be taken to ſettle an eſtate upon her daughtere Villers, according to his promiſe made unto your Majeſtie, and alſoe to releeve and ſupply the neceſſitye of her owvne preſent wamts, and alſo to ſecure her from the feare and danger of thoſe, that ſeeke after her (I feare) life.

There is likewiſe a long repreſentation of hers to the King in anſwer to one of Sir Edward Coke's, from which we ſhall extract ſome paſſages. She anſwers firſt to Sir Edward Coke's allegation relating to the aſſignment of Hatton-Houſe: and ſecondly to his reaſons for detaining her allowance of 2000 l, a year. The firſt of the reaſons alledged by Sir Edward was, that ſhe had denied him acceſs to Hatton-Houſe; the ſecond, that when he was at New-Market with the King, ſhe had conveyed away all his goods and plate; to which, ſays ſhe, my memory ſerves mee not; but ſuer I am, that it was when I hadd notice that there were certaine bills preferred againſt him in the Starre-Chamber that conteyned ſome foule miſdemeanour he hadd committed in his circuits; and that I was credibly informed by ſome of the late Lord Chauncellor's howſe, that inſteede of the Premunire Sir Edward Cooke pretended to bringe upon the ſaid Chauncellor, the ſaid Lord Chauncellor was confident to make good againſt Sir Edward Cooke in the like kynde. Therefore let him not blame me, if I meant to keepe ſomethinge for myſelf, who hadd brought it all unto him; wherein if I did offend, I humbly craue pardon of your Majeſtie, againſt whome the offence was committed, &c. She then vindicates herſelf from the charge of having detained from him indentures and other writings of great value. With regard to her refuſing to be called by his name, ſhe ſays thus: "Sir William Cornewallis was the mann " that came from Sir Edward Cooke, by whome I " retourned this anſwere: that if Sir Edward Cooke " would bury my firſt huſband accordinge to his ownne " directions, and alſo paie ſuch ſmale legacyes as he " gave to divers of his friends, in all comminge not " to above 7 or 900 l at the moſt, that was left un- " performed, he having all Sir William Hatton's goods " and lands to a large proportion; then would I wil- " lingly ſtile myſelf by his name. But he never yield- " ed to the one; ſo I conſented not to the other. " The like anſwer I made to my Lorde of Exeter " and Lorde Burghley, when they ſpake to mee of " anie ſuch buſines. And whereas he accuſeth mee " to have called him baſe, treacherous fellowe, the " wordes I cannot deny, but when the cauſe is knowen, " I hope a little paſſion may be excuſed. It was when " he had ſigned awaye all my Livinge by my firſt " huſband, and ſold his daughter whoe was left to my " care and truſte by Sir William Hatton, and after- " warde he deceiued my children I hadd by himſelf of " their inheritance." His ſixth accuſation of mee is the number of attempts I made the laſt ſommer againſt your Majeſtie's commaunde concerning this late marriadge of my ſonne Villers and my daughter. I muſt confeſs I ignorantly did many; for which I humbly crave pardonn for all ſuch offences as were by mee committed after your Majeſtie's pleaſure knowenn; and I give myſelf the happines to beleeve that your Majeſtie hath fully forgiven all thoſe whatſoever. Were it not to make this writinge too tedious for your Majeſties readinge, I could much leſſenn myne offences by the uncivill proceeding of Sir Edw. Cooke and Mr. Secretarie Winwoode; but the one being dead, I will forbeare, and the other out of the acknowledgment of that duety I owe unto a huſbaund will let ſlipp as many of his inhumane proceedinges as I cann, except ſuch wherein he calleth mee by a writinge of Mr. Sollicitor to the Marquis of Buckingham; wherein I finde how deſirous he is to rubb upp anie thing to make ill bloode betwixt my ſonne Villers and myſelfe, in that I ſhould be obſtinate againſt this marriadge; wherein I crave your Majeſtie's patience to heare my willingnes and unwillingnes thereto. " Firſt for my " willingneſs, I call to witneſs my Lorde Haughton, " whome I ſent twyce to moove the matter to my " Ladie Compton, ſo as by mee ſhe would take it. " This was after he hadd ſo fondly broke of with " my Lorde of Buckingham, when he rated your Ma- " jeſtie's fauour ſcarſe at the valewe of a 1000 l. " After that my brother and ſiſter of Burghley offered " in the Gallerie-Chamber at Whitehall theire ſeruice " unto my Ladie Compton to further this marriadge " ſo as from mee ſhe would take it. Thirdly myſelf " cominge from Kingſtone in a coach with my Ladie " Compton, I then offered her that if ſhee would " leave Sir Edward Cooke, I would proceed with her " in this marriadge. But let me intreate that a favo- " rable conſtruction may be made of this, that I be not " adjudged an alien from Sir Edward Cookes will and " pleaſure, which I hold fitt and am ready to obey. " For the cauſe that made mee thus auerſe from him, " was when he had ſigned away my livinge himſelf; " yet would not by anie meanes give conſent to mee " to obey your Majeſtie; for neither myſelf nor any " of my friends could euer obteyne his allowaunce " thereto. But if I did ſigne it, he would (as he ſayed) " be revenged double and treble of mee. And when " he was tolde, that I ſhould but ſigne what he ſigned " before; his anſwer was, that what hee hadd donne " was woorth nothinge; for if he once came upon his " winge againe he would blowe all that awaye. Soe " longe I ſtayed in due reſpect to have obteyned " Sir Edward Cooke's leave till my brother of Burgh- " ley and myſelf had committed two contempts againſt " the Court of Chauncery, and that warrants were " reddy to committ us both. Neither durſt I haue " donne any thinge at all, hadd your Majeſtie's letters " not giuen me the aſſurance I ſhould not be toaren in " pieces by this man, as nowe I am. Secondly for " Mr. Sollicitor's Lattin ſentence from Sr. Edward " Cooke, I muſt lett paſſe as being altogether unlearn- " ed in that language; but I preſume it will not boe " thought fitt, that a huſbaund whoſe pleaſure it is to " leaue a wife, ſhould alſo take away all maintenance " from her and make her lyve of theſe poor gather- " ings that ſhee in her younger yeares hath ſpared " from her pleaſures for the good of her childrenn; " but your Majeſtie I preſume will be a juſt judge of " that yourſelf. Neither doe I thinke it will be " thought fitt that though he have five ſonnes to main- " teyne (as he alleadgeth in his writing) that a wife " ſhould therefore be thought unfitt to have mainte- " nance accordinge to her birth and fortune. And " concerninge the diſcourſe that ſeemeth to haue " paſſed betweene your Majeſtie and him, I dare not " preſume to meddle with: only I beſeeche your " Majeſtie to conceaue howe hee hath adventured to " deal indirectly with me in all my occaſions, that " dares preſume ſo to abuſe your Majeſtie in his pro- " miſes to yourſelf &c."

This Threate was approued at the Counſayle Table by witneſſes without any exception.

it was debated in Council, how he might be excluded from the benefit of the general pardon, that ſhould have paſſed this laſt Parliament (ee). January the 6th 1622 he was accuſed of having acted diſhoneſtly in the caſe of the Earl of Somerſet, by ſuppreſſing ſome true confeſſions, and obtruding falſe ones (ff). Upon the calling of a Parliament in 1625, the Court-party being jealous of his activity againſt them, to prevent his election as a Member, he was appointed Sheriff of Buckinghamſhire. To avoid this office, if poſſible, he drew up exceptions againſt the oath of a Sheriff, and ſent them to the Attorney-General, who by order of the Council attended the Judges, and received their opinion, that of the four articles objected by Sir Edward Coke, they found no reaſonable cauſe to make any alteration, except in one of the ſaid articles, viz. "You ſhall do all your pain "and diligence to deſtroy and make to ceaſe all manner of hereſies and errors commonly "called Lollaries within your Bailywick from time to time, to all your power, and be "helping to all Ordinaries and Commiſſioners of the holy Church, and favour and "maintain them as oftentimes as you ſhall be required." This part of the oath, as obſolete and irreligious, they agree ſhould be left out of the oath to be adminiſtred to Sir Edward Coke, and all other Sheriffs for the future. And an order of Council was accordingly made to that effect, which reformed the oath, but did not excuſe the perſons, ſo that Sir Edward was obliged to undertake the office (gg). This affair is related ſomewhat differently in Lloyd's State-Worthies [N]. In the Parliament in 1628, he ſpoke vigorouſly upon the grievances relating to the perſon of the ſubject (hh); and in April the ſame year was one of the managers in the conference with the Lords relating to liberty and property (ii); and upon a meſſage ſent from the King on the tenth of that month to deſire the Houſe of Commons not to make any receſs during the Eaſter-Holy-days, he declared, that the King makes a prorogation, but the Houſe adjourns itſelf (kk). On Thurſday June the 5th following he made a ſpeech, in which he affirmed that "the Duke of Buckingham is the cauſe of all our miſeries, and till the King be informed thereof we ſhall never go out with honour, or ſit with honour here. That man is the grievance of grievances &c. (kk)." However the Lord Clarendon aſſures us (ll), that he had before blaſphemouſly ſtiled the Duke our Saviour. While he lay upon his death-bed, his papers and laſt will were ſeized by an order of Council [O]. He died at Stoke-Poges on Wedneſday September the 3d (mm) 1634 (nn), in the eighty ſixth year of his age (oo), and was interred at Titleſhall in Norfolk, where he hath a monument erected to him (pp). His laſt words were, Thy Kingdom come, thy will be done. He publiſhed a great many works [P]. He was ſo excellent at improving a diſgrace, that King James uſed to compare him to a cat, that (ee) Ruſhworth's Collections, tom. 1. pag. 55. and Franklin's Annals of K. James I. pag. 66.

(ff) Camden, ad ann. 1622.

(gg) Kennet's Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 3. pag. 12. edit. London 1708.

(hh) Idem, ibid. pag. 39.

(ii) Idem, pag. 40.

(kk) Idem, pag. 43.

(ll) Hiſtory of the Rebellion, B. 1. pag. 7. edit. Oxon. 1704, in fol.

(mm) Lloyd, pag. 825.

(nn) Deſiderata Curioſa. By Francis Peck, M. A. vol. 2. B. 14. pag. 15. edit. London 1735 in fol.

(oo) Collections relating to the Life of Lord Bacon, pag. 63. vol. 1. edit. of his Works at London 1730, in fol.

(pp) Le Neve's Monument. Angl. vol. 5. pag. 151.

[N] This affair is related ſomewhat differently in that part, publiſh'd at St. Omers 1606 in 4to, under the following title, An Anſwer to the fifth Part of Reports lately ſet forth by Sir Edward Coke Knight, the King's Attorney General, by a Catholick Divine. The firſt part of his Inſtitutes of the Laws of England is only a Tranſlation and Comment upon the Tenures of Sir Thomas Littleton, one of the Juſtices of the Common Pleas in the reign of Edward IV; wherein all the corruptions and Additions, which were in the former prints, are ſaid to be removed. "I do not doubt, "ſays Archdeacon Nicholſon (28), but effectual care was "taken in that matter; and yet there have ſeveral "miſtakes (eſpecially in proper names) eſcaped the "Commentator himſelf in his own part, which will be "more troubleſome to the Hiſtorian than the Lawyer." The ſecond part of the Inſtitutes gives us Magna Charta and ſeveral other ſelect Statutes in the Original Languages, wherein they were firſt enacted, much more correctly than we have them in any other printed copies. Upon theſe he continually gives us his own Commentaries, very full of excellent learning; wherein he ſhews how the Common Law ſtood before the making of ſuch Statutes, whether they are introductory to any new Law, or only declaratory of the old; what were the cauſes and ends of their being enacted, what branches of them are now altered or repealed &c (29). The third part treats of the Pleas of the Crown, and in it the Author propoſes the ſame end, which he had in the ſecond, the comparing Statute-Law with Common, ſo as to diſcover, which Acts are only declaratory of former Laws, and which are new. Having run over all criminal matters and their legal puniſhments, he concludes with the nature of pardons and reſtitutions, ſhowing how far in each of theſe our Kings can proceed alone, and where they want the aſſiſtance and joint power of their Parliaments (30). The fourth part gives us an Account of the Inſtitution, Rules, Juriſdiction, &c. of all the Courts of England, from the Parliament down to a Court-Baron. The Author confeſſes, that in this work he amaſſed together every thing, that ſeemed ever ſo remotely to belong

(25) Pag. 822.

(28) Ibid. pag. 172.

(29) Idem, pag. 37.

(30) Idem, pag. 79, 80.

[O] While he lay upon his death-bed, his Papers and laſt Will were ſeized by an order of Council.] This we are informed of by Roger Coke (26), who writes, that Sir Francis Windebank, Laud's old friend, by an order of Council, came to ſearch for ſeditious and dangerous papers; by vertue whereof he took Sir Edward Coke's Commentary upon Littleton, and the Hiſtory of his Life before it, written with his own hand; his Commentary upon Magna Charta, &c. the Pleas of the Crown, and Juriſdiction of Courts, and his XI and XII Reports, in manuſcript, and fifty one other manuſcripts, with the laſt Will of Sir Edward, wherein he had for ſeveral years been making proviſions for his younger grand-children. The Books and Papers were kept till ſeven years after, when one of Sir Edward's ſons in 1641 moved the Houſe of Commons, that the Books and Papers taken by Sir Francis Windebank might be delivered to Sir Robert Coke, heir of Sir Edward, which the King was pleaſed to grant, and ſuch as could be found, were delivered. But Sir Edward's Will was never heard of more to this day.

(26) Detection, &c. ad ann. 1634.

[P] He publiſh'd a great many works.] His Reports have had ſeveral Editions. The firſt part of them contains caſes relating to Eccleſiaſtical Power and Juriſdiction; and the falſe Grounds, ſays Archdeacon Nicholſon (27), whereon many of the Judgments are there given, have been ſhewn by Parſons in his Anſwer to

(27) Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, Part 3. pag. 185. edit. London 1699, in 8vo.

(qq) Lloyd, pag. 826.

that whatever happened, would always light upon his legs (qq). When he was under a cloud at Court, and removed from his Judge's place, the lands of the Church of Norwich, which he had formerly recovered and ſettled thereon, being begged by a Peer, Sir Edward deſired him to deſiſt, telling him, that otherwiſe he would put on his gown and cap, and come into Weſtminſter-Hall once again, and plead there in Court in juſtification of what he had done (rr). The Reader may ſee his character in the note [Q].

(rr) Idem, pag. 825.

The foundation of Sutton's Hoſpital had been cruſhed by ſome Courtiers, if his care had not prevented it. The Free-School at Thetford in Norfolk owed its ſupport to him; and he founded another at Godwick in the ſame county at his own expence (ſſ). The many benefices in his own Patronage he freely gave to men of merit, declaring in his Law Language, that he would have Church-Livings paſs by Livery and Seiſin, and not by Bargain and Sale (tt). Five ſorts of people he uſed to fore-deſign to miſery and poverty, Chymiſts, Monopolizers, Concealers, Promoters, and Rhyming Poets (uu). He uſed to give ſolemn thanks to God, that he never gave his body to phyſic, his heart to cruelty, or his hand to corruption; and applauded his own ſucceſs in his fair fortune with his wife, his happy ſtudy of the Laws, and his obtaining all his offices, nec prece nec pretio, neither by ſollicitation nor bribe (xx). We ſhall give ſome account of his deſcendants in the note [R].

(ſſ) Idem, pag. 824.

(tt) Idem, pag. 822.

(uu) Idem, ibid.

(xx) Idem, pag. 822, 823.

COLLATIUS

long to any of the heads, under which he had firſt ranked the whole of his matter; ſo that if there be ſome repetitions and tautologies, 'tis but what uſually happens in the prime draughts of all Common-Place Books. His great age, when he came to lick theſe papers over for the preſs, would not admit of nicety and exactneſs, and he died before they were publiſhed (31). In William Prynne's Animadverſions upon this part of the Inſtitutes, printed at London 1669 in fol. a great many miſquotations of Records are noted, "and the learned Au-" thor is more ſeverely reflected on than he ought to " have been in a poſthumous work, wherein we know " not what injuſtice might be done him by the Pub-" liſhers of his Orphan-Labours." His Speech and Charge at Norwich-Aſſizes, was printed at London 1607 in 4to; and his Book of Entries, containing Precedents of all Proceedings concerning the practique part of the Laws of England, at London 1614. He wrote likewiſe the Juriſdiction of Courts, in fol. the Compleat Copy-Holder, in 8vo; the Pleas of the Crown, in fol. Declarations and Pleadings, in fol. 1659; Pleadings in French, 8vo, 1601; Readings on Fines, in 4to; on Magna Charta, in fol. on Bail and Mainpriſe, in 4to.

(31) Idem, pag. 74, 75.

(32) Idem, pag. 75.

[Q] The reader may ſee his character in the Note.] Camden (33) tells us, that he was a perſon of admirable parts; than whom, as none ever applied himſelf cloſer to the ſtudy of the Common Law, ſo never did any one underſtand it better; of which he fully convinced England by his excellent adminiſtration for many years together, whilſt Attorney-General, and by executing the office of Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas with the greateſt wiſdom and prudence; nor did he give leſs proof of his abilities in his excellent Reports and Commentaries upon our Laws, whereby he has highly obliged both his own age and poſterity. My Lord Bacon remarks (34), that if it had not been for our Author's Reports, the Law by that time had been almoſt like a ſhip without ballaſt, for that the caſes of modern experience are fled from thoſe that are adjudged and ruled in former time. Wilſon obſerves (55), that "he was a man of excellent parts, " but not without his frailties; for as he was a ſtore-" houſe and magazine of Common Law for the preſent " times, and laid ſuch a foundation for the future, " that poſterity may for ever build on; ſo his paſſions " and pride were predominant, that boiling over, he " loſt by them much of his own fulneſs, which ex-" tinguiſhed not only the valuation, but reſpect to his " merit; ſo often is that heat, that gives life to noble " parts, by a circular motion the ruin of them." Mr. Edward Leigh (36) obſerves, that he was "very ex-" pert in the municipal Laws of our Land, as his Re-" ports, Commentary on Littleton's Inſtitutes, and other " learned works in the Law ſhew." Lloyd informs us (37), that his parts were admirable, and that he had a deep judgment, a faithful memory, an active fancy, and a comely perſon.

(33) In his Britannia in Norfolk.

(34) In his Propoſition to his Majeſty for the Compiling and Amendment of our Laws, printed in the fourth vol. of his works, edit. London 1730 in fol.

(35) Ubi ſupra, pag. 97.

(36) Fœlix Conſortium, or a fit Conjuncture of Learning and Religion, lib. 3. cap. 13. pag. 170. edit. London 1663.

(57) State-Worthies, pag. 823.

[R] We ſhall give ſome account of his deſcendants in the Note.] His two daughters by his laſt wife, the Lady Elizabeth Hatton, were Elizabeth, who died unmarried, and Frances, wife to Sir John Villiers, Viſcount Purbeck. His three daughters by his firſt Lady, Bridget, were Elizabeth, who died young, Anne, wife of Ralph Sadler Eſq; ſon and heir of Sir Thomas Sadler; and Bridget, married 22 James I, to William Skinner Eſq; This Gentleman, who was ſon and heir of Sir Vincent Skinner, had by that Lady Mr. Cyriack Skinner, an intimate friend of Milton, and to whom that Poet has addreſſed one of his Sonnets, in the beginning of which he pays the following compliment to the memory of Sir Edward Coke (38).

> Cyriack, whoſe grandſire on the Royal Bench
> Of Britiſh Themis, with no mean applauſe,
> Pronounc't, and in his volumes taught our lawes,
> Which others at their Barr ſo often wrench.

(38) See Poems upon ſeveral Occaſions. By John Milton. Both Engliſh and Latin, &c. compoſed at ſeveral times. With a ſmall Tractate of Education to Mr. Hartlib. pag. 60. edit. London 1673.

Of Sir Edward Coke's ſeven ſons, Edward the eldeſt died an infant; Robert, the ſecond, was knighted, and married Theophila, only daughter of Thomas Lord Berkeley, Anceſtor of the preſent Earl of Berkeley, and died aged 67 on July the 19th 1653, leaving no iſſue, and was buried at Epſom. Arthur, the third ſon, married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir George Walgrave of Hitcham in Norfolk Knt. and died at St. Edmundſbury Decem. 6th 1629, leaving four daughters his heirs. John, the fourth ſon, was of Holkham, and married Moriel, daughter and heir of Anthony Wheatley, ſon of William Wheatley, Prothonotary of the Court of Common-Pleas, by whom he had iſſue ſeven ſons and ſeven daughters, whereof Edward, his heir apparent, died before him, leaving no iſſue by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of George Lord Berkley; whereby the inheritance devolved at length on John Coke of Holkham Eſq; his youngeſt ſon, who dying unmarried, the eſtate came to the heirs of Henry Coke, fifth ſon of the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke. But before we treat of the ſaid Henry, who is anceſtor of the preſent Lord Lovel, we ſhall give an account of Clement, the ſixth ſon of the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke; Thomas, the ſeventh and youngeſt ſon, dying an infant. The ſaid Clement Coke Eſq; married Sarah, daughter and coheir of Alexander Redich of Redich in Lancaſhire Eſq; by a daughter and coheir of Sir Robert Langley of Agecroft in the ſame County, whereby he made a great addition to the inheritance left him by his father, which was the ſeat and eſtate of Longford in Derbyſhire. He was bred to the Law in the Society of the Inner Temple, where he died May 23d 1619, leaving iſſue, as the inſcription on the monument erected for him in the Temple-Church ſhews, Edward, Robert, Bridget and Avice. Edward, his eldeſt ſon, born at Chelſea in March 1617, was created a Baronet December 30th 1641, being written of Longford in Derbyſhire. He married Catherine, daughter and coheir to Sir Lodowick Dyer of Great Stoughton in Huntingdonſhire Knt. by whom he had iſſue two ſons, Robert and Edward, and three daughters, Catherine, married to Cornelius Clarke of Norton in Scarſdale Eſq; Anne, who died unmarried, and Theophila, who died an infant. His eldeſt ſon, Sir Robert Coke Bart. ſucceeded to the title and eſtate, and ſerved in Parliament as one of the Knights of the Shire for the County of Derby 1 James II, and married Sarah, daughter and coheir to .... Barker of Abrightlee in Salop Eſq; and dying without iſſue in January 1687, the honour and eſtate devolved on Edward his only brother

(a) Moreri mentions him under Apollonius Collatius, pag. 294; after which, pag. 296. he juſt gives his name, and refers to Collatius.

COLLATIUS (a) (PETER APOLLONIUS) Prieſt of Novarra †, lived about the end of the fifteenth Century. This cannot be any longer doubted, ſince the journey which Father Mabillon made into Italy in 1686 [A]. Collatius compoſed Latin Poems, and one among the reſt on the deſcription of Jeruſalem, inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum by Margarinus de la Bigne. It had already been printed at Paris [B] by the care of John Gagney Doctor of Divinity; and another edition was publiſhed at Leyden in 1586, under the direction of Adrian vander Burch, who corrected and reviſed the Text. This ſhews that Collatius was looked upon as a very antient Author. The elder Scaliger was not in this error; for he has ranked him (b) among the modern Poets, lower than Andrew Alciat, and Balthaſar Caſtiglione; and above Lancinus Curtius, Fauſtinus Andrelinus, and Eraſmus. We find that he did not intend to rank theſe writers in an exact chronological order; however, he has ſhewn evidently enough, that Collatius was a modern Poet. He declares him Author of a book of Faſti, of which he does not give a very good character [C]. Many learned men have taken ſo little notice of this paſſage in Scaliger

† [A City of Italy, eight leagues from Milan.] Addit. by the Tranſlator.

(b) Jul. Cæſ. Scaliger, Poet. lib. 6.

brother and heir, who reſided at Longford; but dying Auguſt 25th 1727 unmarried, the title of Baronet became extinct, and he left his eſtate to Edward Coke Eſq; brother to Thomas, now Lord Lovell, lineally deſcended from Henry Coke, fifth ſon of the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke. Which Henry was ſeated at Thurrington in Suffolk, and having married Margaret, daughter and heir of Richard Lovelace of Kingſdown in Kent Eſq; had iſſue four ſons; whereof only Richard the eldeſt, and Cyriac Coke were married; but from Cyriac no iſſue is remaining. Richard Coke Eſq; was of Thurrington and by Mary his wife, daughter of Sir John Rous of Henham-Hall in Suffolk Bart. loſt an only ſon, Robert Coke of Holkham Eſq; who married Anne, daughter of Thomas Oſborn Earl of Danby, and afterwards Duke of Leeds, and died January 16th 167⅞ in the 29th year of his age, and was buried in the Church of Tittleſhall in Norfolk. By his Lady he had iſſue Elizabeth, a daughter, who died in her infancy, and a ſon, Edward, who married Carey, daughter of Sir John Newton of Barrows Court in Glouceſterſhire Bart. He died April 13th 1707, and ſhe ſurvived him but a ſhort time, deceaſing on the 4th of Auguſt following, and were both buried in Tittleſhall in Norfolk. They had iſſue three ſons and two daughters; Thomas, now Lord Lovell, Edward Coke of Longford in Derbyſhire Eſq; who dying at his ſeat at Longford in Auguſt 1733 unmarried, left his eſtate to his youngeſt brother Robert Coke, late Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen, who in June 1733 married the Lady Jane, eldeſt ſiſter and coheir of Philip late Duke of Wharton, and Relict of John Holt of Redgrave in Suffolk Eſq; The two daughters were Carey, wife of Sir Marmaduke Wyvil of Conſtable-Burton in Yorkſhire Bart. and Anne, married to Philip Roberts Eſq; Major in the ſecond Troop of Horſe-guards. Thomas, the eldeſt ſon, May 27th 1725 was elected Knight of the Bath, and May 28th 1728 advanced to the dignity of a Peer of Great Britain by the ſtile and title of Baron Lovell of Minſted Lovell in Oxfordſhire. In 1733 he was conſtituted Poſtmaſter-General of Great Britain and Ireland, jointly with the honourable Edward Carteret Eſq; His Lordſhip married the Lady Margaret Tufton, fourth daughter and coheir of Thomas Earl of Thanet, and by her has an only ſon named Edward. His Arms are Party per Pale, Gules and Azure, three Eagles diſplay'd, Argent, Creſt, on a Chapeau, Gules turn'd up Ermine, an Oſtrich with an Horſe-ſhoe in its beak, all Argent, Supporters, two Oſtriches, Argent, each gorg'd with a ducal Coronet Party per Pale, Azure and Gules, and a Line thereto of the latter. Motto, Prudens qui patiens (39). T.

(39) Peerage of England. By Arthur Collins Eſq; vol. 3. pag. 513, &c.

[A] He lived about the end of the XVth Century. This cannot be any longer doubted, ſince the journey which Father Mabillon made into Italy.] Magliabecchi preſented to Father Mabillon a Poem of Apollonius, in Epick Verſe, on David and Goliah; and ſhewed him that this Poem is dedicated to Lawrence of Medicis, and that there are added to it ſome Epigrams of the ſame Author; one of which is the Epitaph of Paul II, and the other of Sixtus IV. Father Mabillon inſerting this particular in the relation of his journey, obſerves very juſtly that it cannot be any longer doubted, but that Peter Apollonius lived about the end of the XVth Century. But what he relates concerning Voſſius, is not ſo juſt as I could wiſh. Here follow his words. Quo ex carmine diſcimus ætatem hujuſce auctoris, quem alii ad ſæculum ſeptimum, alii ad decimum, alii ad alia tempora referunt, ut videre licet apud Gerardum Voſſium de Hiſtoricis Latinis, ubi Petrus Apollonius Collutius appellatur (1). i. e. "Which Poem informs us "of the age of this Author, which ſome Writers "place in the VIIth Century, ſome in the Xth, and "others again in other periods, as may be ſeen in "Gerard Voſſius, where he is called Petrus Apollonius "Collutius." In the firſt place, Voſſius does not call him Collutius but Collatius (2); and ſecondly, he does not ſay that ſome Authors declare Collatius to have lived in the VIIth Century; others in the Xth, and others again in different periods. He only ſays, that Margarinus de la Bigne (3) has placed Collatius towards the cloſe of the VIIth Century, about the year 690; and that ſome very learned men of our age cite him as an antient Author. He adds, that in his opinion Apollonius is a modern Writer, cotemporary, and lower than the year 1490, and that Barthius (4) alſo believes him to be a modern. Voſſius's reaſon is grounded on his thinking that Collatius ſhould not be diſtinguiſhed from the Apollonius Collatius mentioned by Scaliger in his Poeticks. It is therefore evident, that Father Mabillon has cited Voſſius erroneouſly.

(1) Mabillon, Muſæ Ital. tom. 1. pag. 194.

(2) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 811.

(3) In Indice Chronologico veterum Eccleſiæ Scriptorum, in tom. 1. Bibliath. Patrum.

(4) Adverſar. lib. 23. cap. 27.

[B] His Poem . . . . on the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, as it had already been printed at Paris.] I have not ſet down the year of this edition, becauſe I find that Mr. de Launoi (5) and Daumius (6) vary from one another; the latter, who believes it was but the ſecond, and that the firſt had been publiſhed in Italy, fixes it to 1546; the former dates it at 1540 (7). Daumius looks upon Margarinus's de la Bigne's edition as the third (8); and as the fourth, that of Hadrian Vander Burch, whom he cenſures for having declared that his Leyden Edition of 1586 was the ſecond. Daumius pretends, that he ſhould have ſaid the fourth. But even this would have been an error, becauſe of the edition of 1540, mentioned by de Launoi, and that of Paris printed in 1575, inſerted in the catalogue of the Bodleian Library. I do not allude to the Edition which Voſſius took to be the firſt (9); which according to him is the edition that was publiſhed at Paris in 1516 by the care of John Gagney; for it is manifeſt, that he is miſtaken with regard to the time. Gagney did not begin to ſtudy Divinity, till the year 1524 (10), and therefore it is not probable, that he ſhould have undertaken to publiſh Collatius in 1516. Voſſius ſpeaks of an Edition printed at Antwerp by Chriſtopher Plantin, and reviſed by Vander Burch: this doubtleſs is the ſame with that printed at Leyden in 1586; and if Voſſius ſaw Antwerp in the title of his copy, this muſt be aſcribed to the cuſtom which Bookſellers have of printing ſeveral titles; and of making them vary as much as they pleaſe in the dates of the year, and the names of the cities where they are ſaid to be printed. How many times have they by this method, made Bibliographers increaſe the number of the editions of a Book? Daumius had reaſon to believe that the Paris Edition was preceded by an Italian one; for the Work in queſtion had been printed at Milan in 1481 (11).

(5) Hiſtor. Colleg. Navarr. pag. 685.

(6) Epiſt. ad Reineſium, pag. 27.

(7) The Authors of Acta Eruditorum, 1692, pag. 558. put the ſame date as de Launoi.

(8) In the Bibliotheque des Peres.

(9) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 811.

(10) Launoius, Hiſt. Gym. Navar. pag. 681.

(11) Acta Erud. Lipſienſ. 1692, pag. 558.

[C] He declares him Author of a Book of Faſti, of which he does not give a very good character.] Here follows what he ſays of it. Apollonius Collatius Faſtos edidit, in quibus pietatem laudes, frigidiuſculus tamen poëta eſt; & cum diſcedit ab elegiaco etiam infelix (12). i. e. "Apollonius Collatius publiſhed a Book of Faſti, "in which he diſcovers a piety that is laudable, but "his verſification is flat; and when he leaves the ele"giac meaſure his poetry alſo very bad."

(12) Jul. Cæſar. Scalig. Poetic. lib. 6.

Scaliger, that they cite Collatius as an antient Author [D]. Voſſius (c) is ſurpriſed, that Gyraldi has not mentioned this Prieſt of Novarra. Father Briet ſpeaks of him in ſuch a manner, as will oblige me to take notice of his errors [E]. Not long ſince there was printed in Milan a Poem of our Apollonius on the combat between David and Goliah, together with ſome Elegies and Epigrams [F].

(c) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 812.

[D] Many learned Men . . . cite Collatius as an antient Author.] Voſſius without quoting any one, ſays only, that the learned men of this age, generally cite Collatius as ſuch (13). But Barthius is not ſo cautious; he aſſerts, that Collatius had been cited, as an ancient Chriſtian Poet by Joſeph Scaliger in his notes on Euſebius; by Caſaubon in his Commentary on Suetonius; by Francis Juret in his Notes on Paullinus; by Chriſtopher Colerus in his obſervations on Tacitus; by Thomas Dempſterus in his Notes on Coripppus; by Meurſius in his Gloſſary; by John Savaron in his Commentary on Sidonuis Apollinaris; by Bulengerus in his Treatiſe de Imperatore, and elſewhere (14). The learned Reineſius, who was not ſorry to meet with an opportunity of cenſuring Barthius ſays (15), that there was no reaſon to cenſure theſe learned men, ſince they did not mention the age of Collatius; and that they might very well have cited a perſon, who in their opinion was a modern Author; that it was particularly abſurd to introduce in this criticiſm Joſeph Scaliger, who could not have forgot what his father had told him, concerning the age in which Collatius lived. If the Reader conſult Daumius's anſwer to theſe objections of Reineſius (16), I am certain he will find that Barthius was in the right.

(13) Ut antiquus à ſummis ſeculi hujus viris paſſim laudatur. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 811.

(14) Barth. Commentar. ad Claudian. pag. 795. In his Commentary on Statius, tom. 2. pag. 436. he cites the laſt Commentators of Petronius, I am of opinion that he means Galdaſius.

(15) Epiſt. ad Daumium, pag. 15, 16.

(16) Ibid. pag. 27.

A Carmelite, called Daniel of the Virgin Mary, has alſo taken Collatius to be an antient Chriſtian Poet (17), and even ſeems to have ſupported himſelf on the authority of Caſaubon. The Marquis of Agropoli cenſures him on this account, and at the ſame time invalidates what the Carmelites would infer from a paſſage of this Poet.

(17) Daniel à Virgine Maria, Vinea Carmeli, Part 3. cap. 16. num. 358. apud Marchionem Agropolitanum, in Examine Divinit. in Carmelo conſultæ, Art. 12. pag. m. 11.

[E] Father Briet ſpeaks of him in ſuch a manner, as will oblige me to take notice of his errors.] He does not determine with regard to the age in which Collatius lived, but he has committed ſome miſtakes. In the 1ſt place, he ſays that Margarinus de la Bigne fixes him under Charlemagne &c. that he is made to flouriſh about the year 690 (18). It is Margarinus de la Bigne who fixes him to that year: for what reaſon then does Father Briet charge him with declaring that Collatius lived under Charlemagne, whoſe reign did not begin till the 786 year, and the Empire till 800, or 801? It is evident that this Jeſuit (Briet) ſuppoſed the year 690, and the æra of Charlemagne's reign, to be the ſame, which is a miſtake. II. He ſays, that Voſſius rejects the opinion of Margarinus de la Bigne, and fixes Collatius to the beginning of the XVth Century; which is making him cotemporary with Politian. Voſſius ſets down expreſly the year 1490, which is about the cloſe, and not the beginning of the XVth Century; and it would be a Chronological error, to aſſert that an Author who lived in the beginning of the XVth Century, had been of the ſame age with Politian. IIIdly, Father Briet rejects the opinion of Voſſius, becauſe he does not think that Collatius's ſtyle is ſtrong and elegant enough for the age Politian lived in, at which period polite literature was revived. He finds ſome faults relating to the quantity in Collatius's verſes, and ſuch an ignorance of the Greek tongue as does not ſuit the age in which Politian flouriſhed. This reaſon is of no force; for all the Authors of the XVth Century, did not improve equally, by the great advances which had been made in polite Literature in Italy. Some of thoſe Writers who ſtudied the refinement of their Diction, either in proſe or verſe, made a very inconſiderable improvement, and learnt the Greek Tongue but very imperfectly. IVthly. This Jeſuit thinks that the ſtile of Collatius is a little more noble and polite than that of the Writers under Charlemagne, from whence he infers, that Voſſius and Barthius fix him too far back, eum nimis deprimunt. If he means, that they have him in too great contempt, he is in an error; for they only take him to be a modern Poet. If he ſuppoſes that they bring him a little too low, he refutes himſelf; for according to his way of reaſoning, in our third obſervation, the higher a Poet has raiſed himſelf above the ignorance of the eighth Century, the more he deſerves to be placed in the age in which Politian lived.

(18) Briet. de Poet. Latin. lib. 5. pag. 63.

[F] There was printed at Milan a Poem . . . on the combat between David and Goliah together with ſome Elegies &c.] I have already mentioned, what Father Mabillon had heard concerning this Poem, from the illuſtrious Magliabecchi, I ſhall here inſert what the Authors of the Acta Eruditorum relate on this head (19). We there find, that Magliabecchi made a preſent of ſome Poems of Apollonius to Puſterla, Keeper of the Ambroſian Library at Milan; and that the latter gave them to Lazarus Auguſtin Catta, a Civilian of Novarra, who got them printed at Milan, anno 1692 in 8vo. This Collection contains the combat between David and Goliah, and a complaint of our Saviour againſt the Jews in epick verſe; an Elegy on the pleaſures of the Country, and ſeveral Epigrams; but the Epitaphs of Paul II, and Sixtus IV, which were in Father Mabillon's copy, are ſuppreſſed. Our Apollonius is called Collatinus in the Edition made by Catta. We muſt rank Ricciolus, among thoſe who ſuppoſed Collatius to be an antient Chriſtian Poet; for he has placed him in the eighth Century (20).

(19) Menſ. Dec. 1692, pag. 558, 559.

(20) Ibid.

☞COLLIER (JEREMY) (a) ſon of Jeremy Collier, was born at Stow Qui in Cambridgeſhire September the 23d 1650. His father was a Divine, and conſiderable Linguiſt, and ſometime Maſter of the Free-ſchool at Ipſwich in the County of Suffolk. His grandfather likewiſe was a Clergyman, ſettled at Bradford in Yorkſhire, where he lived in eſteem for his function. He was born at Yeadon near Bradford, and deſcended from a Gentleman's family of that name ſeated at Thruſk in the ſame county in the reign of Henry the Eighth. His mother was Elizabeth Smith of Qui in Cambridgeſhire, where her family were poſſeſſed of a conſiderable intereſt, and related to the Sterne's of that town, being by her mother deſcended from the Keys or Cays of Yorkſhire and Lincolnſhire. He was educated under his father at Ipſwich, from whence he was ſent to Cambridge, and admitted a poor ſcholar of Caius College under the tuition of Mr. John Ellys. His admiſſion bears date April the 10th 1669 in the 18th year of his age. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the year 167$\frac{2}{3}$, and that of Maſter of Arts in 1676, being ordained Deacon on September the 24th of the ſame year by Dr. Peter Gunning Biſhop of Ely, and Prieſt February the 24th 1677, by Dr. Henry Compton Biſhop of London. Having entred into Prieſt's Orders he officiated for ſome time at the Counteſs Dowager of Dorſet's at Knowle in Kent, from whence he removed to a ſmall Rectory at Ampton near St. Edmond's Bury in Suffolk, to which he was preſented by James Calthorpe Eſq; and inſtituted by Dr. Anthony Sparrow Biſhop of Norwich, September the 25th 1679. After he had held this benefice ſix years, he reſigned it, and came to reſide in London in 1685, and was ſome little time after made Lecturer at Gray's-Inn. But the Revolution coming on, the public exerciſe of his function became impracticable,

(a) This Article was communicated to us by a very ingenious and learned Gentleman.

ticable †, for he could not be perſuaded either by the arguments of ſome of his brethren or the example of others, to take the new oaths. On the contrary he not only refuſed to comply with the government, but wrote [A] ſeveral times in defence of his ſentiments, though † Thus far is Mr. Collier's own drawing up excepting ſome few dates.

[A] Wrote.] The Catalogue of his works is as follows: 1. The Deſertion diſcuſſed in a Letter to a Country Gentleman. 1688, 4to. This is written againſt Dr. Burnet's Enquiry into the preſent ſtate of affairs, and is ſaid to be the firſt pamphlet publiſhed on that ſide the queſtion after the Prince of Orange's arrival. It gave ſuch offence, that Mr. Collier was committed to Newgate for it in the March following the Revolution, but after ſome months confinement he was diſcharged without any tryal. 2. A Tranſlation of the 9, 10, 11 and 12 Books of Sleidan's Commentaries, 1689. 3. Vindiciæ juris Regii: or Remarks upon a Paper, entitled, An enquiry into the meaſures of Submiſſion to the ſupream Authority. Lond. 1689, 4to. The Author of this Enquiry was alſo Dr. Burnet, afterwards Biſhop of Saliſbury. 4. Animadverſions upon the modern explanation of 11. Hen. 7. cap. 1. or a King de facto. 1689, 4to. 5. A caution againſt inconſiſtency; or the connexion between praying and ſwearing, in relation to the civil powers, 1690, 4to. This diſcourſe is a diſſuaſive from joining in the publick aſſemblies. 6. A Dialogue concerning the times between Philobelgus and Sempronius. 1690, 4to. There was another Dialogue with much the ſame title printed in 1692, and called a ſecond part, but it is not Mr. Collier's, being a narrative of the Revolution, whereas Mr. Collier's relates chiefly to the authority of the Convention. 7. To the Right Honourable the Lords, and to the Gentlemen convened at Weſtminſter October 1690, half ſheet. It is a petition for an Enquiry into the Birth of the Prince of Wales. 8. Dr. Sherlock's caſe of Allegiance conſidered, with ſome remarks upon his Vindication. Lond. 1691, 4to. 9. A brief Eſſay concerning the Independency of Church Power, 1692, 4to. The deſign of this Eſſay is to prove the publick Aſſemblies guilty of ſchiſm, upon account of their being held under ſuch Biſhops as had aſſumed, or owned ſuch as had aſſumed the Sees of thoſe, that were deprived for not complying with the Government &c. 10. The caſe of giving Bail to a pretended authority examined, dated from the King's Bench Nov. 23, 1692; with a Preface dated Dec. 1692, and a Letter to Sir John Holt dat. Nov. 30, 1692, and alſo a Reply to ſome Remarks upon the Caſe of giving Bail &c. Dat. April 1693. In relation to this diſcourſe, we are to take notice, that Mr. Collier and one Mr. Newton another Nonjuring Clergyman were in the year 1692 ſeized at Romney Marſh in Kent, and brought up to London upon ſuſpicion of ſome deſign againſt the Government, where after examination they were by my Lord Nottingham impriſoned in the Gatehouſe. But no evidence appearing againſt them, they were admitted to Bail. However it was not long before Mr. Collier threw up his Bail, upon which he was committed to the King's Bench, where he lay, till by the application of ſome of his friends, he was diſcharged by warrant from the Lord Chief Juſtice Holt. That which moved him to throw up his Bail was a ſcruple he had entertained concerning the lawfulneſs of applying under the ſtated forms of Law to a power he did not acknowledge; and this ſcruple ſat ſo [cloſe upon him, that he thought it neceſſary even while he was in priſon, to commit the reaſons upon which he grounded his opinion to writing, and after he was ſet at liberty, ſent the famous Letter abovementioned to Sir John Holt, the Chief Juſtice at that time, to clear himſelf from having any hand in the application made for his diſcharge. Of this piece there were but five copies printed. 11. A perſuaſive to conſideration tendered to the Royaliſts, particularly thoſe of the Church of England. Lond. 1693, 4to. It was afterwards reprinted in 8vo, together with his Vindication of it againſt a piece entitled, The loyal Layman's Apology &c. written in confutation of that part of the Perſuaſive, which relates to the controverſy about the frequenting the public aſſemblies. 12. Remarks upon the London Gazette, relating to the Streights fleet and the battle of Landen in Flanders 1693, 4to. 13. A Defence of the Abſolution given to Sir William Parkins at the place of execution, April 3*d*; with a farther Vindication thereof, occaſioned by a paper, entitled, a Declaration of the Senſe of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops &c. The firſt dated April 9, 1696; the other April 21, 1696. To which is added a Poſtſcript in relation to a paper called An Anſwer to his Defence &c. dated April 25. Alſo a Reply to the Abſolution of a penitent according to the directions of the Church of England &c. dated May 20, 1696: and An Anſwer to the Animadverſions on two Pamphlets lately publiſhed by Mr. Collier &c. dated July 1, 1696, 4to. The Declaration mentioned above was directed againſt Mr. Collier, Mr. Cooke and Mr. Snatt, of which the firſt pronounced the abſolution over Sir William Parkins, the ſecond over Sir John Friend, and all three joined in a ſolemn impoſition of hands upon them both. It was ſigned by the two Archbiſhops and twelve of their ſuffragans; but Dr. Grove Biſhop of Chicheſter, one of thoſe that ſubſcribed the Declaration, confeſſed, as it was ſaid, that he had not read it, when he ſet his hand to it, but ſigned it implicitly. Be that as it will, they were not only cenſured by the eccleſiaſtical power for what they had done upon that occaſion, but proſecuted alſo in the ſecular Courts as enemies to the Government &c. and Mr. Cooke and Mr. Snatt were committed to Newgate, but diſcharged afterwards without any penalty. But Mr. Collier, in purſuance of his ſentiment againſt giving Bail &c. refuſing to appear upon Summons, was outlawed, and ſo continued to his death. 14. Eſſays upon ſeveral moral Subjects, in four parts and three volumes. The firſt Volume printed 1697, the ſecond 1705, and the laſt in 1709, 8vo. The firſt five Eſſays came out in the year 1691, with the title of Miſcellanies in five Eſſays, and the ſeventeen following in 1695 under the title of Miſcellanies upon Moral Subjects, the ſecond part. The laſt Eſſay alſo, which is upon the reſurrection, had been publiſhed before in a Sermon, tho' now altered and moulded into a different form. For I have ſeen an edition of it in 1686, with the following title: The Difference between the preſent and future ſtate of our Bodies conſidered in a Sermon, 4°. Beſides this the Eſſays on the Office of a Chaplain, and that concerning Pride, had both of them appeared ſeparately ſome years before the Collection paſſed the preſs, the firſt being printed at Cambridge 1688 with this title, The Office of a Chaplain enquired into, and vindicated from ſervility and contempt, 4to, and the other at London 1689 by the title of A Moral Eſſay concerning the nature and unreaſonableneſs of pride; in which the moſt plauſible pretences of this vice are examined, in a conference between Philotimus and Philalethes, 8vo. Theſe Eſſays have had ſeveral editions, being much eſteemed by the polite and underſtanding part of mankind; and Father Courbeville a judicious French Writer places them in the ſame claſs with the works of Montagne, la Hoguette, St. Evremont, the Author of the Moral Reflections, the Chevalier de Mero, and la Bruyere See the Preface to Le Heros duit de l'Eſpagnol de Baltazar Gracien &c. a Paris 1725. 15. A ſhort view of the immorality and profaneneſs of the Engliſh Stage &c. London, 1698, 8vo, frequently reprinted. 16. A defence of the Short View &c. being a reply to Mr. Congreve's Amendments &c. and to the Vindication of the Author of the Relapſe. Lond. 1699, 8vo. 17. A ſecond Defence of the Short View &c. Being a reply to a Book, entitled, The ancient and modern Stages ſurveyed &c. London, 1700, 8vo. The Book here replied to was written by Dr. Drake. 18. Mr. Collier's Diſſuaſive from the Play-Houſe; in a Letter to a perſon of quality, occaſioned by the late calamity of the Tempeſt. London, 1703, 8vo. 19. A farther Vindication of the Short View &c. in which the objections of a late Book, entitled, A Defence of Plays, are conſidered. London, 1708, 8vo. The Defence of Plays has Dr. Filmer for its Author. In this controverſy with the Stage Mr. Collier exerted himſelf to the utmoſt advantage. He baffled his adverſaries at their own weapons, and ſhewed that it was poſſible for a Clergyman to have more wit as well as more learning and religion than the Poets; and though they treated him with much rudeneſs, and endeavoured to aſperſe his character with ill-natured and groundleſs inſinuations, yet he had the pleaſure to ſee his labours were not ſo wholly void of ſucceſs, though upon ſome occaſions it expoſed him to the cenſure and reſentment of thoſe in power. In the reign of Queen Anne ſome overtures were made to engage him to a compliance, and he was promiſed conſiderable preferment, if he would acknowledge and ſubmit to the government. But as he became a Nonjuror upon no other motive but to ſatisfy his conſcience, no offers of advantage could make the leaſt impreſſion upon him. We are well informed that he was conſecrated a Biſhop by Doctor Hickes [B] and ſome others on Aſcenſion-day 1713. After ſuch a numerous catalogue of his works, the evidence (as we have ſeen in the note [A]) of a long and conſtant application, it will not be ſurprizing to hear that he was afflicted with the ſtone, which at length carried him off. He died on the 26th of April 1726, and was buried on the 29th of the ſame month in the Churchyard of St. Pancras London, being then in the ſeventy ſixth year of his age. He was a perſon of great integrity and a moſt exemplary life, chearful and inoffenſive in converſation, and with all the reſerve of a Chriſtian had the affableneſs and complaiſance of a Gentleman. He was well acquainted with the learned Languages, underſtood both ſacred and profane antiquity, and was no ſtranger to the Common Law. In a word he was a great maſter of Style and Language, had a genius for polite Letters as well as the abſtruſer Studies, and was a thorough Philoſopher, Orator and Divine.

COLLINS

ſucceſs, but that they thought it neceſſary to excuſe themſelves for writing ſome of the Plays he finds fault with, and owned that they might have been guilty of fooliſh miſtakes (as Mr. Vanbrug in his Short Vindication) and that they had received advantages from his Book (as Mr. Congreve in his Amendments.) Nay the celebrated Mr. Dryden (and to his honour be it ſpoken) ingenuouſly acknowledged that Mr. Collier had in many things taxed him juſtly, publickly retracted all thoughts and expreſſions of his, that could be truly argued of obſcenity, profaneneſs or immorality, and declared it did not become him to draw his pen in the defence of a bad cauſe, when he had ſo often drawn it for a good one. Preface to Fables ancient and modern. The View was tranſlated into French by Pere Courbeville abovementioned, who elſewhere calls him an illuſtrious and celebrated Author, and one of the greateſt genius's in England (Pref. to Maximes de Baltazar Gracien &c. a Paris 1730.) 20. The Great Hiſtorical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary &c. Four Vol. fol. The two firſt volumes were printed in 1701, the third of which is called a Supplement in 1705, and again in 1727, the laſt, which is an appendix to the other three, in 1721. This Dictionary is chiefly taken from Moreri, but very much improved by Mr. Collier. The two firſt volumes he found tranſlated to his hand, but with the diſadvantage of many miſtakes, and a great diverſity of ſtile (which muſt always be the caſe where many different hands are employed in the ſame work), ſo that he was oblig'd to correct the whole; and the rather becauſe there had been two purged and enlarged Editions of the French ſince the publiſhing of that Engliſh Tranſlation. After theſe two Volumes came out, there were ſome objections ſtarted againſt his management, which he clears up in his Preface to the Supplement; and tho' it is poſſible that in ſo great a variety of matter ſeveral errors may ſtill be diſcovered, (as many of the two firſt volumes are corrected in the Appendix) yet with regard to the choice of proper ſubjects, and the manner of handling them, to the uſefulneſs of the work and the uniformity of the ſtyle, it will juſtify the good opinion the publick have had of it, and be always the model or the reproach of thoſe that write Dictionaries after him. 21. The Emperor Marcus Antoninus his converſation with himſelf. Together with the preliminary Diſcourſe of the learned Gataker &c. to which is added the mythological Picture of Cebes the Theban &c. Tranſlated into Engliſh from the reſpective originals. London, 1701, 8vo. 22. An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great Britain, chiefly of England, from the firſt planting of Chriſtianity to the end of the reign of King Charles the ſecond. With a brief account of the affairs of Religion in Ireland. Collected from the beſt ancient Hiſtorians, Councils and Records, 2 vol. folio. The firſt 1708, the ſecond 1714. This Hiſtory, which is written with great judgment, and contains beſides a relation of facts, many curious diſcourſes upon eccleſiaſtical and religious ſubjects, was taken to taſk by Biſhop Burnet, Biſhop Nicholſon, and Dr. Kennet afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough, each of whom publiſhed a few Animadverſions upon ſome paſſages in it; but was defended by Mr. Collier in two pieces, the firſt entitled, 23. An Anſwer to ſome exceptions in Biſhop Burnet's third part of the Hiſtory of the Reformation &c. againſt Mr. Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; together with a Reply to ſome Remarks in Biſhop Nicholſon's Engliſh Hiſtorical Library &c. upon the ſame ſubject, fol. London 1715. The other, 24. Some Remarks on Dr. Kennet's Second and third Letters; wherein his miſrepreſentations of Mr. Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory are laid open, and his calumnies diſproved. Lond. 1717, fol. and 8vo. But in the 8vo it is called, Some Conſiderations &c. 25. An Eſſay upon Gaming in a Dialogue between Callimachus and Dolomades. Lond. 1713, 8vo. afterwards annexed to the Tranſlation of St. Gregory Nazianzen's Panegyrick upon the Maccabees &c. 26. A Panegyrick upon the Maccabees by St. Gregory Nazianzen. Of unreaſonable Diverſions, by Salvian; a Deſcription of the Manners of the Pagan World; a conſolatory Diſcourſe to the Chriſtians of Carthage viſited by mortality; of the Advantage of Patience: theſe three by St. Cyprian. Done into Engliſh. Together with two Eſſays, viz. of Diſcontent and of Gaming. London, 1716, 8vo. 27. Several Diſcourſes upon practical Subjects, London, 1725, 8vo. The laſt Diſcourſe of this Collection had been printed ſeparately in 1723, with the following title: The compariſon between Giving and Receiving, with the reaſons for preference ſtated: in a Sermon preached at Whitehall April 19th, 1687, 4to. 28. God not the Origin of Evil; being an additional Sermon to a Collection of Mr. Collier's Diſcourſes &c. Lond. 1726, 8vo. He publiſhed alſo an Advertiſement againſt Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time, which was printed on a ſlip of paper and diſperſed in the London Coffee-houſes in 1724, and is to be ſeen in the Evening-Poſt Numb. 2254. Beſides this he wrote ſeveral Prefaces &c. as 1ſt, An Advertiſement concerning the Author and the Tranſlation of Maxims and Reflections upon Plays (in anſwer to a Diſcourſe of the Lawfulneſs and Unlawfulneſs of Plays, printed before a late Play entitled, Beauty in Diſtreſs) written in French by the Biſhop of Meaux, Lond. 1699. 2d, A Recommendatory Preface to Tully's five Books de Finibus &c. Done into Engliſh by S. P. (Sam. Parker) Gent. Together with an Apology for the philoſophical writings of Cicero in a Letter to the Tranſlator by Mr. Henry Dodwell. Lond. 1702. 3d, A Recommendatory Preface to human Souls naturally immortal. Tranſlated from a Latin Manuſcript by S. E. Lond. 1707. Of this Preface Mr. Norris makes honourable mention in his Letter to Mr. Dodwell concerning the Immortality of the Soul of Man, and ſays that Mr. Collier's ſingle remark againſt Mr. Locke is in his opinion worth all the Book beſides, p. 107. I have been informed moreover, that he was concerned among others in collecting the paſſages referred to by Dr. Henry Sacheverell in his Anſwer to the Articles of his Impeachment, printed at London 1710.

[B] Was conſecrated a Biſhop by Dr. Hickes, &c.] We have been informed that Dr. George Hickes was conſecrated Suffragan of Thetford on St. Matthias's Eve, Feb. 23d, 1693-4. by the deprived Biſhops, Dr. William Lloyd Biſhop of Norwich, Dr. Francis Turner Biſhop of Ely, and Dr. Thomas White Biſhop of Peterborough. P.

COLLINS (ANTHONY), an eminent Writer of the eighteenth Century, was born at Heſton near Hounſlow in the County of Middleſex June the 21ſt 1676, and was ſon of Henry Collins Eſq; a Gentleman, whoſe eſtate was computed at eighteen hundred pounds per annum. Our Author received his firſt education at Eaton-College, from whence he was removed to King's-College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he had for his Tutor Mr. Francis Hare, the preſent Biſhop of Chicheſter. He afterwards came up to London, and was admitted a Student of the Temple, but not reliſhing the ſtudy of the Law, ſoon abandoned it. July 22d 1698 he married Martha, the daughter of Sir Francis Child, who was the year following Lord Mayor of the City of London; and by her had two ſons and two daughters, Elizabeth and Martha. Henry, the elder of the ſons, died in his infancy. Anthony, the younger, was born in October 1701, and was a Gentleman of good Learning, of great ſweetneſs of temper, and of a fine underſtanding: he was educated at Bennet College in Cambridge, and died univerſally lamented by all that knew him, December the 20th 1723. In 1700 our Author publiſhed a Tract intitled, Several of the London Caſes conſidered (a). In the years 1703 and 1704 he held a correſpondence by letters with Mr. Locke, who had a prodigious eſteem for him, as appears from the letters of that great man to him, publiſhed by Mr. Des Maizeaux in his Collection of ſeveral pieces of Mr. John Locke, never before printed or not extant in his Works. Publiſhed by the Author of the Life of the ever-memorable Mr. John Hales (b) [A]. In 1707 he publiſhed without his name (as he did all his other writings) an Eſſay concerning the Uſe of Reaſon in propoſitions, the evidence whereof depends upon human teſtimony (c) [B]. Dr. Francis Gaſtrell, afterwards Biſhop of

(a) This appears from the Catalogue of his Library written all with his own hand.

(b) London 1720, in 8vo.

(c) London, Printed in the year 1707, pagg. 56. in 8vo. It was publiſhed in Feb. 1707, as appears from the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, for Feb. 1707, vol. 9. pag. 127.

[A] Mr. Locke had a prodigious eſteem for him, as appears from the letters of that great man to him, publiſhed by Mr. Des Maizeaux in his Collection of ſeveral Pieces of Mr. John Locke &c.] In his Letter dated from Oates in Eſſex 29 October 1703 he writes as follows (1). You complain of a great many defects; and that very complaint is the higheſt recommendation I could deſire to make me love and eſteem you, and deſire your friendſhip. And if I were now ſetting out in the world, I ſhould think it my great happineſs to have ſuch a companion as you, who had a true reliſh of truth, would in earneſt ſeek it with me, from whom I might receive it undiſguiſed, and to whom I might communicate what I thought true, freely. Believe it, my good friend, to love truth for truth's ſake, is the principal part of human perfection in this world, and the ſeed-plot of all other virtues; and if I miſtake not, you have as much of it, as ever I met with in any body. What then is there wanting to make you equal to the beſt, a friend for any one to be proud of? . . . . Now methinks, (and theſe are often old men's dreams) I ſee openings to truth, and direct paths leading to it; wherein a little induſtry and application would ſettle one's mind with ſatisfaction even in thoſe matters which you mention, and leave no darkneſs or doubt even with the moſt ſcrupulous. But this is at the end of my day, when my ſun is ſetting. And tho' the proſpect it has given me be what I would not for any thing be without, there is ſo much irreſiſtable truth, beauty, and conſiſtency in it; yet it is for one of your age, I think I ought to ſay for you yourſelf, to ſet about it, as a work you would put into order, and oblige the world with. In another letter, dated from Oates 11 September 1704 he writes thus: "Dear Sir, "He that has any thing to do with you, muſt own "that friendſhip is the natural product of your con"ſtitution; and your ſoul, a noble ſoil, is enriched "with the two moſt valuable qualities of human na"ture, truth and friendſhip. What a treaſure have I "then in ſuch a friend, with whom I can converſe, "and be enlightened about the higheſt ſpeculations?" In his letter dated, 1 October 1704 he writes thus: My infirmities prevail ſo faſt on me, that unleſs you make haſte hither, I may loſe the ſatisfaction of ever ſeeing again a man, that I value in the firſt rank of thoſe, that I leave behind me (2). We have another remarkable letter of Mr. Locke's to him (3), which is as follows.

(1) Collection of ſeveral Pieces of Mr. John Locke, never before printed, or not extant in his Works. Publiſhed by the Author of the Life of the ever-memorable Mr. John Hales, pag. 271, & ſeqq. edit. London 1720.

(2) Mr. Locke died on the 28th of October 1704, that is, 27 days after the writing of this Letter.

(3) Collection of ſeveral pieces, pag. 328, 329.

"For Anthony Collins Eſq;
"To be delivered after my deceaſe.
Oates 23 Auguſt 1704.

"Dear Sir,

"By my will, you will ſee that I had ſome kind"neſs for . And I knew no better way to take "care of him, than to put him, and what I deſigned "for him, into your hands and management. The "knowledge I have of your virtue of all kinds ſe"cures the truſt, which by your permiſſion, I have "placed in you; and the peculiar eſteem and love I "have obſerved in the young man for you, will diſpoſe him to be ruled and influenced by you, ſo that "of that I need ſay nothing. But there is one thing "which it is neceſſary for me to recommend to your "eſpecial care and memory *. May you "live long and happy, in the enjoyment of health, "freedom, content, and all thoſe bleſſings, which "Providence has beſtowed on you, and your virtue "intitles you to. I know you loved me living, and "will preſerve my memory, now I am dead. All "the uſe to be made of it is, that this life is a ſcene "of vanity, that ſoon paſſes away, and affords no "ſolid ſatisfaction, but in the conſciouſneſs of doing "well, and in the hopes of another life. This is, "what I can ſay, upon experience, and what you will "find to be true, when you come to make up the "account. Adieu. I leave my beſt wiſhes with you.
"John Locke."

The latter part of this letter, beginning at [May you live long and happy, &c.] was printed by Mr. Whiſton in the Poſtſcript to his Reflections on an anonymous Pamphlet, entitled, A diſcourſe of Free-Thinking, London 1713 in 8vo; and at the end of his Liſt of Suppoſitions or Aſſertions in the late Diſcourſe of the grounds and reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion, which are not therein ſupported by any real or authentick evidence: for which ſome ſuch evidence is expected to be produced. London 1724 in 8vo.

[B] His Eſſay concerning the Uſe of Reaſon in Propoſitions, the evidence whereof depends upon Human Teſtimony.] There was a 2d edition of it printed at London in 1709 in 8°. He defines Reaſon to be that faculty of the mind, whereby it perceives the truth, falſhood, probability, or improbability of propoſitions (4). He then conſiders the nature of a propoſition, and the various exerciſe of the mind with relation to all kinds of propoſitions (5), and endeavours to ſhew (6), that Reaſon does its part in all kind of propoſitions, and that the aſſent is proportioned according to the degree of evidence, that each propoſition has. He obſerves (7), that "Teſti"mony of itſelf is not ſufficient to procure faith or "aſſent, unleſs accompanied with theſe two circum"ſtances, credibility of perſons, and credibility of "the things related." By credibility of perſons, he underſtands (8) "men's having the means of infor"mation, capacity to underſtand, honeſty and diſin"tereſtedneſs." By credibility of things related he underſtands, 1. That the words made uſe of in the relation ſtand for known ideas, or ideas, that we are capable of forming; for if they ſtand for ideas that we know not, or want faculties to perceive, there are then no objects for the mind to exert itſelf upon. Nothing remains but mere ſounds, which without ſignifications are no more to it than the ſounds of a trumpet or an hautboy. 2. "That words muſt ſtand for thoſe ideas, "which the uſe of language has appropriated them "to, or for what the author or relator ſays he under"ſtands by them, or for what the viſible deſign of "the

(4) Sect. 1, pag. 3.

(5) Pag. 3, 4, 5, 6.

(6) Pag. 7.

(7) Pag. 8.

(8) Ibid.

of Cheſter, being animadverted upon in this Eſſay, with relation to ſome paſſages in his Some Conſiderations concerning the Trinity and the way of managing that Controverſy, printed at London 1702, he ſubjoined to the third edition of it in 1707 a Vindication of it in anſwer to Mr. Collins's Eſſay. The ſame year our Author entered into the Controverſy between Mr. Dodwell and Mr. Samuel Clarke concerning the Natural Immortality of the Soul, upon which ſubject he publiſhed ſeveral pieces [C]. In December 1709 (d) his Pamphlet, intitled, Prieſtcraft in perfection, or a Detection of the Fraud of inſerting and continuing this Clauſe [The Church hath power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Authority in Controverſies

(d) See Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, for Dec. 1709, vol. 11. pag. 753.

" the author or relator determines them to ſignify. " Theſe are all the ways of knowing the meaning " of words; and if we cannot find the meaning " of a man's words by comparing him with himſelf, " by the uſe of the language, in which he writes, or " by his particular definitions, it is all one to the rea- " der or hearer, as if the words ſtood for ideas he " knew nothing of (9). 3. I muſt not only have ideas to the words, but the ideas muſt not be repugnant to one another, when put into propoſitions, nor to what we know to be true by the uſe of our faculties. By knowing a thing to be true, I underſtand knowing ſtrictly ſo called; for let a propoſition be ever ſo improbable, if it amounts not to a repugnancy to another propoſition in the hiſtorical relation, or to one which is ſelf-evident, or whoſe ideas I perceive neceſſarily to agree by the intervention of an intermediate idea, it may be received as a truth from a credible Author (10). Theſe three qualifications are neceſſary to make a matter of fact credible upon any teſtimony whatever (11); " but there is ſtill a " further uſe of reaſon in things, which merely by the " teſtimony of men are ſuppoſed to come from God, " as diſtinguiſhed from other facts; and that is, to en- " deavour to find out ſuch a ſenſe of a ſuppoſed re- " velation as is agreeable to the diſcoveries of our " reaſon, if the words under any kind of conſtruction " will bear it, tho' at firſt view they may ſeem repug- " nant to reaſon, and to one another. This is cer- " tainly a great piece of juſtice, and what is due to " words, which upon the leaſt evidence can be ſup- " poſed to come from God, eſpecially ſince expreſſions, " which do not literally quadrate with the maxims of " Reaſon and Philoſophy, are neceſſary to make a " Revelation have any effect upon common people's " minds. For was not God to be repreſented by ex- " preſſions, which literally underſtood attribute to him " human paſſions and actions, they who by their oc- " cupations in the world are incapable of thoſe more " juſt ideas which men of thought know to belong " to that Being, would perhaps think him incapable " of taking cognizance of their actions; and there- " fore to make a Revelation uſeful and credible in it- " ſelf, it muſt conſiſt of words, whoſe literal meaning " is falſe, but whoſe real meaning is conſiſtent with " the juſteſt notions of Reaſon and Philoſophy. And " therefore we ought to examine whether the words " under any conſtruction will bear a reaſonable ſenſe (12)." Mr. Collins then applies this obſervation to the Revelation which we acknowledge, and conſiders thoſe paſſages of Scripture, where God is ſaid to reſt (13), repent (14), be angry (15), ignorant of the State of Adam (16), cheered with wine (17), &c. and obſerves (18), that beſides endeavouring to put a true ſenſe on words, which literally underſtood imply what is falſe, " there is ſtill this further reſpect due to writ- " ings, which upon human teſtimony are ſuppoſed " to come from God, not to reject the whole for the " ſake of ſome paſſages, which cannot be ſuppoſed " to proceed from God, but rather to preſume they " have been added to the texts out of ſome particular " views and deſigns. Whereas merely human writ- " ings may be fairly rejected or denied to proceed " from the Author, whoſe name they bear if there " are ſeveral paſſages contained in them inconſiſtent " with the character of the Authors or the times " wherein they lived; becauſe there is not that reaſon " for either zealous or deſigning men to make addi- " tions to Books, that are not ſuppoſed neceſſary for " the direction of our theory and practice, as to thoſe " that have or are likely to have any influence on " our lives and opinions. And this reſpect due to " writings, which upon human teſtimony are ſup- " poſed to come from God, is acknowledged neceſſary " by ſeveral (if not all) interpreters of the Scriptures, " to prevent the imputation of falſhood, which other- " wiſe would neceſſarily be fixed on them by the beſt " diſpoſed minds (19)." Mr. Collins afterwards conſiders the principal objections that may be urged againſt what he had delivered; and I cannot, ſays he (20), do that more effectually than by examining the ſeveral ſenſes put on the famous diſtinction of things above, and things contrary to reaſon; for it is chiefly by virtue of that diſtinction the Divines militate in behalf of myſteries and contradictions againſt thoſe, who ſay they can only believe that, which they can underſtand. But before I proceed, I ſhall briefly lay down the diſtinction of propoſitions one from another, as they are the objects of our aſſent or diſſent. Propoſitions however offered to us conſiſting of terms, which ſtand for ideas and their relations, we aſſent when the relations between the ideas joined are agreeable to reaſon, and diſſent when they are contrary to reaſon. As for inſtance, I am aſſured by proper evidence of Jeſus Chriſt's reſurrection. His reſurrection containing no repugnancy to any truth that I know of, becomes by the evidence of teſtimony agreeable to my reaſon, as much as any propoſition in Mathematicks does by the mere uſe of my own faculties, or the aſſiſtance of others. But the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation containing a manifeſt repugnancy to ſeveral propoſitions, which I know to be true, is contrary to reaſon, as any propoſition is in any ſcience whatever, that conſiſts of repugnant ideas. Theſe two propoſitions do indeed become objects of aſſent or diſſent by means of teſtimony; but the different manner of their becoming objects of my underſtanding from other propoſitions, diſtinguiſhes them not from any other propoſitions, conſidered as objects of aſſent or diſſent. In all caſes the aſſent ſhould follow the perception of the agreement of ideas, as the diſſent ſhould the repugnancy of ideas. He remarks likewiſe (21), that " ſuppoſing man is really reduced to this ſtate, as to " perceive demonſtration on the one ſide for the truth " of a propoſition, and at the ſame time perceive ab- " ſurdities and paradoxes flow from the thing demonſtra- " ted; he ought not to aſſent or diſſent, becauſe there is " a ballance of evidence; for any propoſition involv- " ing an abſurdity or contradiction is as much a de- " monſtration of the falſhood of that propoſition, as " any grounds a priori can be of its truth, becauſe " the perception of the diſagreement of our ideas is " as plain as is the perception of the agreement." He denies alſo (22), that if we examine carefully any contradiction or abſurdity follows from a demonſtrated propoſition, and affirms, " that wherever we have capa- " city enough to perceive the truth of a propoſition, we " have capacity enough to perceive that there is no repug- " nancy between that and another true propoſition." He then examines (23) the ſeeming inconſiſtence between the divine preſcience with the liberty of man; and our notion or idea of eternity; " both which, ſays he " (24), I doubt not to clear up from all abſurdities, " which in our way of conceiving are thought to fol- " low from them." Dr. Clarke (25) has quoted a paſſage from this Eſſay (26), which he calls upon Mr. Collins to reconcile with another paſſage in his Anſwer to Mr. Clarke's Third Defence (27), ſince he had affirmed in that Anſwer (28), that all the difficulties, that may be urged againſt the immenſity and eternity of God, &c. which Mr. Clarke ſays cannot be clearly anſwered, are to be clearly anſwered.

[C] Entered into the controverſy between Mr. Dodwell and Mr. Samuel Clarke concerning the Natural Immortality of the Soul.] Mr. Collins's pieces upon this ſubject are as follow; I. A Letter to Mr. Dodwell, containing ſome remarks on a (pretended) demonſtration of the Immateriality and Natural Immortality of the Soul, in Mr. Clarke's Anſwer to his late Epiſtolary Diſcourſe &c. London 1707 in 8vo. There was a 2d Edition in 1709 in 8vo. II. A Defence of the Argument made uſe of in a Letter to Mr. Dodwell. London 1707 in 8vo. III. A Reply to Mr. Clarke's Defence

(9) Pag. 8, 9.

(10) Pag. 11.

(11) Pag. 16.

(12) Pag. 17, 18.

(13) Gen. ii. 3.

(14) Gen. vi. 6. Exod. xxxii. 14.

(15) Ex. xxxii. 10.

(16) Gen. xviii. 21, 26, 28, 30.

(17) Judg. ix. 13.

(18) Pag. 20.

(19) Pag. 20, 21.

(20) Pag. 23.

(21) Pag. 42.

(22) Pag. 43, 44.

(23) Pag. 45, & ſeqq.

(24) Pag. 45.

(25) Fourth Defence of an Argument made uſe of in a Letter to Mr. Dodwell to prove the Immateriality and Natural Immortality of the Soul, &c. pag. 17, 18, 19. edit. London 1708, in 8vo.

(26) Pag. 53, 54.

(27) Pag. 33, 34.

(28) Pag. 14.

troverſies of Faith] in the twentieth Article of the Articles of the Church of England (e) [D], was publiſhed, as his Reflections on a late Pamphlet, entitled, Prieſtcraft in Perfection, were in February the year following (*). The ſame year (1710) he publiſhed his Vindication of the divine Attributes: in ſome Remarks on the Archbiſhop of Dublin's Sermon, intitled, Divine Predeſtination and Foreknowledge conſiſting with the Freedom of Man's Will (f) [E]. In March 1711 he went into Holland, and became acquainted with Mr. Le Clerc, and other learned men there, and returned to London in November following, to take care of his private affairs, with a promiſe to his friends in Holland, that he would pay them a ſecond viſit in a ſhort time. In 1713 he publiſhed his Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking, occaſion'd by the Riſe and Growth of a Sect called Free-Thinkers (g) [F]. It

(e) London printed for B. Bragg in Pater-Noſter Row, 1710, in 8vo.

(*) See Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, for Feb. 1710, vol. 12. pag. 126.

(f) London 1710 in 8vo.

(g) London, printed in the year 1713, in 8vo, pagg. 178.

fence of his Letter to Mr. Dodwell: With a Poſtſcript to Mr. Milles's Anſwer to Mr. Dodwell's Epiſtolary Diſcourſe. London 1707 in 8vo. There was a ſecond edition of this piece corrected, printed at London 1709 in 8vo. IV. Reflections on Mr. Clark's ſecond Defence of his Letter to Mr. Dodwell. London 1707 in 8vo. There was a ſecond Edition in 1711 in 8vo. V. An Anſwer to Mr. Clark's third Defence of his Letter to Mr. Dodwell. London 1708 in 8vo. There was a ſecond Edition corrected, London 1711 in 8vo.

[D] His Pamphlet, intitled, Prieſtcraft in perfection &c.] The Preface to it is dated at London January 1, 1709. The ſecond and third Editions corrected were printed at London 1710 in 8vo; and at the end of the third Edition is ſubjoined the following advertiſement: Whereas in the two former impreſſions of Prieſtcraft, &c. a Letter from Oxford is cited, giving an account of an Engliſh Edition of the Articles being cut out from a volume of Miſcellanies in the Bodleian Library; I have omitted that paſſage in this Edition, upon the ſight of a Letter from Oxford, which aſſures the Gentleman to whom it was wrote, that my friend was miſtaken. I do not know at preſent in what part of England he is; and therefore I cannot as yet give the reader and myſelf that ſatisfaction in the matter, which I hope to do when I hear of his return to Oxford. The authority of the clauſe in the XXth article of the Church of England had been called in queſtion in 1709 in a Book intitled, (29) The peril of being zealouſly affected, but not well: or Reflections on Dr. Sacheverel's Sermon preached at St. Paul's Nov. 5, 1709. But ſoon afterwards in the ſame year its authority was ex profeſſo attacked in Mr. Collins's Pamphlet abovementioned; which occaſioned great and diligent inquiries into the ſubject, and was anſwered or reflected on in divers Pamphlets, Sermons, and Books. Among which there are two chief works, "which ſeem, ſays "our Author (30), to be written by choſen Champions, "who have been ſupplied with materials from all "quarters, and have taken great pains themſelves to "put their materials in the moſt artful light." The firſt was publiſhed in 1710, and is intitled, A Vindication of the Church of England from the aſperſions of a late libel, entitled, Prieſtcraft in Perfection, &c. Wherein the controverted clauſe of the Church's power in the twentieth Article is ſhewn to be of equal authority with all the reſt of the articles, and the fraud and forgery charged upon the Clergy upon the account of that clauſe, are retorted upon their accuſers. With a Preface containing ſome Remarks upon the Reflections on that Pamphlet. By a Prieſt of the Church of England (31). Mr. Collier (32) ſtiles the Author a learned and judicious Writer: and has given us an Abridgment of this Book in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory *. The ſecond Book againſt Mr. Collins's Pamphlet was publiſhed at London 1715; "and ſeems, ſays our Author †, delayed "ſo long on purpoſe to have the benefit of the utmoſt "inquiries which could be made." It is a Book of near 500 pages in 8vo, and is entitled, An Eſſay on the Thirty Nine Articles of Religion, agreed on in 1562, and reviſed in 1571 &c. By Thomas Bennet, D. D. ‡. In anſwer to theſe two Books Mr. Collins publiſhed in 1724 his Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay on the Thirty Nine Articles of the Church of England, which we ſhall mention below in the Note [K].

[E] His Vindication of the Divine Attributes; in ſome remarks on the Archbiſhop of Dublin's Sermon intitled, Divine Predeſtination and Foreknowledge conſiſting with the Freedom of Man's Will.] Mr. Thomas Emlyn is ſaid to have written and inſerted ſeveral pages in this Pamphlet relating to the Doctrine of the Trinity, while the manuſcript of Mr. Collins lay at Mr. John Darby's the Printer.

[F] His Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking, occaſioned by the riſe and growth of a Sect called Free-Thinkers.] It was immediately attacked by ſeveral Writers, and particularly by Mr. Whiſton in his Reflections on an Anonymous Pamphlet, entitled, A Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking. By William Whiſton, M. A. London, 1713, in 8vo, pagg. 55. It is dated January 29th 1712. There have been three editions of it. He obſerves (33), that tho' this pamphlet be commonly ſo worded as to ſeem rather meant againſt the Heathen Idolatry, Popiſh ſuperſtition, real prieſtcraft, and tyranny over conſcience, than againſt Chriſtianity itſelf with its ſacred Books; yet do I perceive, ſays he, there are every where ſuch ill characters given of the Clergy or Chriſtian Prieſthood in general, and ſuch oblique reproaches caſt upon Revealed Religion; ſuch a viſible ſlight put upon the whole Jewiſh Nation and the Moſaick Law; ſuch a plain diſregard of the great foundation of Religion, the Immortality of the Soul; and ſuch inſinuations viſibly tending to render the ſacred Books both Jewiſh and Chriſtian contemptible and uncertain, that it is very fit and reaſonable to make ſome reply to it. He then remarks (34), that tho' this pamphlet is capable of doing miſchief with the unthinking and prejudiced part of mankind, yet, ſays he, I am in no concern for the truly ſober, the learned and judicious, who, I am ſure, will make deeper enquiries and ſolider reflections, e'er they make ſuch concluſions about matters of ſuch mighty conſequence. There was publiſhed likewiſe an anonymous Pamphlet, intitled, Free Thoughts upon the Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking. London 1713 in 8vo, pagg. 68. Mr. Benjamin Hoadly, now Lord Biſhop of Wincheſter, wrote alſo Queries recommended to the Authors of the late Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking. By a Chriſtian. London 1713 in 8vo, pagg. 31. This piece is highly commended by the Writer of the Free Thoughts (35) abovementioned, and by Dr. Hare in his Clergyman's Thanks to Phileleutherus, who tells us (36), that "not a few "have wrote againſt Free-Thinking with very good "ſucceſs, particularly the ingenious Chriſtian Queriſt, "who, for his honour, was the firſt that appeared in "ſo good a cauſe." This pamphlet of Mr. Hoadly was reprinted by him in his Collection of Several Tracts (37). He aſks, Whether that can be juſtly called Free-Thinking, which is manifeſtly Thinking with the utmoſt ſlavery and the ſtrongeſt prejudices againſt every branch, and the very foundation of all religion (38). "Whether the falſe money, that is put upon men "ſometimes, hinders them from believing, that there "is any good coin, or from accepting it, when it is "good. Whether therefore the feigned miracles and "falſe pretences of many to inſpiration and divine "commiſſion, be an argument againſt the truth of any "ſuch thing (39)." Whether the follies, and inconſiſtencies, and ridiculous opinions of many Chriſtians or Divines, picked up in the courſe of 1600 years, can in juſtice be produced, as arguments againſt all religion, any more than the differences among Philoſophers can be an argument againſt reaſon itſelf and every thing in Philoſophy, or than the differences amongſt Atheiſts, and particularly the abſurdities in Epicurus's Syſtem, will be allowed by theſe authors to conclude againſt Atheiſm itſelf. Whether ſuch repreſentations of Chriſtianity and ſuch poſitive aſſertions, as run through this treatiſe, to the prejudice and condemnation of all religion, and particularly of the belief of a future ſtate, do not too evidently ſhew, that the deſign of it was not to incite men to an impartial examination, but to influence men to the utter condemnation of all religion (40). "Whether it be a ſign "of

(29) Pag. 20, 21.

(30) Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay on the thirty nine Articles of the Church of England, Introduct. pag. 46. edit. London 1724 in 8vo.

(31) London 1710 in 8vo, pagg. 218. beſides the Preface.

(32) Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great Britain, Part 2. B. 6. pag. 487.

* Pag. 487, & ſeqq.

† Hiſt. and Critical Eſſay &c. Introduct. pag. 46.

‡ See the Article of BENNET (Thomas) vol. 3. pag. 208, 209.

(33) Pag. 3, 4.

(34) Pag. 4.

(35) Pag. 65.

(36) Pag. 15.

(37) Printed at London 1715, in 8vo.

(38) Pag. 3. edit. London 1713.

(39) Ibid. pag. 3, 4.

(40) Ibid. pag. 4, 5.

It was reprinted at the Hague with ſome Additions and Corrections in 1713 in 12mo,

" of that integrity, which infidelity produceth, to " repreſent that fear of God, which hath nothing " ſervile nor terrifying in it, which is nothing but " ſuch a reverence as directs and ſecures men's obedi- " ence to his Laws, upon the ſame foot with that " fear of the Gods amongſt the Heathen, which was " indeed Superſtition, and which taught men to have " no other notion of their ſuperior Beings, but that " of tyrannical, cruel, barbarous Lords, delighted " with the blood, miſery, and torments of their Vo- (41) Ibid. pag. 6. " taries (41). . . . . Whether it be not ridiculous, as " well as abſurd to paſs by the noble beneficence " and univerſal love and friendſhip, recommended " and required by the Chriſtian Religion, and practiſ- " ed by the firſt Chriſtians; and to extol Epicurus as " carrying Morality to an higher pitch in the caſe of " friendſhip, under pretence that the word Friendſhip " in a particular reſtrained ſenſe, is not in the New " Teſtament; in order to magnify this abſurd Philo- " ſopher, to paſs by the Life and Death of Jeſus " Chriſt, the greateſt inſtance of friendſhip (were he " conſider'd only as a Philoſopher,) and not to ſay " a word here in favour of his doctrine, though it " was chiefly deſigned to introduce an univerſal friend- " ſhip and beneficence, and in general every thing of " good repute, or every thing juſtly eſteemed amongſt (42) Ibid. pag. 11, 12. " men (42). . . Whether, upon the whole, conſidering " the unfair treatment Religion hath met with from " theſe Authors; the falſe repreſentations made uſe of " to its diſadvantage; the little idle ſtories pick'd up " and vented; the great ſcandal ſuch Treatiſes muſt " give to all ſerious perſons; the great handle they " afford to all the enemies of true liberty of conſci- " ence for their unchriſtian treatment of thoſe, who " differ from them: conſidering (I ſay) all this, whe- " ther there may not be ſome ground for ſuſpicion, " that there are amongſt theſe Authors ſome of the " enemies to true liberty and impartial examination; " than whom no perſons are more rejoiced at ſuch (43) Ibid. pag. 23, 24. " performances as this (43). Suppoſing Atheiſm to " be better than that Superſtition, which tortures a " man's own breaſt, and ſets the world about him in " flames; whether, nevertheleſs, a thorough belief of " an over-ruling Providence, and a State to come, and " of the Truth of Chriſtianity, and a Conqueſt of our " Paſſions founded upon this Belief, and a Practice " of all the lovely virtues of the Goſpel, be not vaſtly " preferable to both; full of the ſupports, which A- " theiſm explodes, and void of the torments, which " ſuperſtition feels. Laſt of all, whether there can be " any thing in Atheiſm, (as there certainly is in true " Religion,) to hinder any man from acting the part " of the moſt ſuperſtitious and fiery zealot upon earth (44) Ibid. pag. 24, 25. " (44)." In the Poſtſcript (45) Mr. Hoadly confeſſes, that ſome of the particulars mentioned in his Queries, (45) Pag. 28. " as deſigned plainly againſt the Belief of Chriſtianity, " are produced in the Treatiſe of Free-Thinking under " the ſpecious pretence of their being good reaſons " and occaſions for a free and impartial Examination, " and not expreſly declared to be intended againſt the " Goſpel in the ſame paſſages, in which the Au- " thors of that Treatiſe produce them." But Mr. Hoadly verily believes, that theſe Authors themſelves would inwardly laugh at any, who ſhould ſuppoſe them to have had any other view in that performance; and having placed ſeveral particulars from the Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking in one view, he concludes with theſe words (46): " After this let any one doubt, if he can, (46) Pag. 31. " what ſort of Free-Thinking all that is produced in " the firſt part of this Treatiſe is deſigned to promote; " or ſuppoſe it poſſible, that the chief view of theſe " Authors could be any other, than the promoting " that Free-Thinking, which they themſelves con- " tend to be Atheiſm and Infidelity." Dr. Richard Bentley ſoon after publiſhed Remarks upon a late Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking: in a Letter to F. H. D. D. By Philelcutherus Lipſienſis. London 1713 in 8vo. This Letter, which is addreſſed to Dr. Francis Hare, now Lord Biſhop of Chicheſter, is dated January 26, New Stile. The ſecond part, dated Sept. 18, 1713, ſtilo novo, was printed the ſame year, in 8vo; and ſoon after a ſheet or two of the third part were printed at Cambridge (where indeed the two firſt parts were really printed, tho' the titles ſay at London;) but the learned Author never proceeded further. The Firſt Part of theſe Remarks occaſioned a Pamphlet, intitled, The Clergyman's Thanks to Philelcutherus, for his Remarks on the late Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking. In a Letter to Dr. Bentley. London 1713 in 8vo, pagg. 48. It is dated from London March 28th 1713, and is ſaid to be written by Dr. Hare. He obſerves, that had the aſſerting a juſt Liberty of Thinking been the real aim of the Authors of the Diſcourſe, " there could " not have been a more uſeleſs deſign, nor could it " have been worſe executed. For what they affirm, " no body among us, that I know of, now at leaſt " denies, viz. That all men have a Right to think " freely upon ſubjects they are qualified to think about, " and that it is the duty of all men to think freely " (that is fairly and impartially) of the things they " are required to believe. Theſe are principles evi- " dently founded in reaſon and nature; Chriſtianity is " built on them, which is an appeal to the reaſon and " conſciences of men; and the Reformation is con- " feſſedly founded on no other bottom (47). . . 'Tis (47) Pag. 18. " not Liberty of Thought they contend for, but Licen- " tiouſneſs, an unbounded liberty to propagate their " crude abſurd notions, which don't deſerve the name " of Thoughts. . . But if a juſt liberty were wanted, " which I have ſhewn, with us it is not, theſe Gen- " tlemen of all men living have the leaſt right to it; " not only becauſe they would make the worſt uſe of it, " but becauſe they give up the principle, on which the " Liberty of Thinking for ourſelves in matters of Re- " ligion is ſolely founded, that is conſcience. 'Tis con- " ſcience ties the hands of the Magiſtrate from forcing " a particular Religion on the ſubject. But if all Re- " ligion be falſe, all pleas of conſcience are at an end, " and the Magiſtrate is at liberty without any other " view or regard to eſtabliſh that Religion, that he " thinks will conduce moſt to the happineſs and quiet " of his Government. The truth or falſhood of their " doctrine will not, on this ſuppoſition, be a point in " queſtion, but its influence on the State; and of that " the Magiſtrate will be the judge; and no body, " who is an unbeliever, has a right to plead for an ex- " emption in matters relating to Religion, any more " than in any other whatſoever (48)." He afterwards (48) Pag. 22, 23. tells us (49), that the reputed Author of Free-Thinking is, for all I ever heard, a ſober man, thanks to his na- (49) Pag. 28. tural averſion to intemperance, and that is more than can be ſaid of ſome others of the Club; but as for any other virtue, he has told us (50), 'tis ſuch as he intends (50) See the Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking, pag. 178. edit. 1713, in 8vo. and Dr. Bentley's Remarks, Part 1. pag. 10. and Clergyman's Thanks, pag. 18. ſhall never hurt him. And it can't be thought uncharitable, if I ſay it riſes from no higher origin than fear; for he has himſelf diſclaimed all nobler principles. He concludes with remarking (51), that if we have gained by Dr. Bentley's Remarks in one reſpect, we are on the other hand " in danger of loſing no leſs than an E- (51) Pag. 47, 48. " dition of all Tully, and, what is of more conſequence, " a new Goſpel; with both which, for the advance- " ment of Learning and Religion, their Learning and " their Religion, the Free-Thinking Club were prepar- " ing to oblige the World. And the laſt of theſe " was, I have been told, quite finiſhed, and juſt ready " to be publiſhed, when your Remarks unluckily came " out to ſhew, that they are neither Chriſtians nor " Scholars. And this has ſuppreſſed at leaſt for ſome " time, if not totally ſunk, both theſe undertakings." The Author of the Guardian treated Mr. Collins with the utmoſt ſeverity on account of this Pamphlet *, * See vol. 1. and particularly in Numb. III for Saturday March 14, num. 3, 9, 27, 1713, where he tells us, that " he that ſhould burn a 55, 62, 70, 77. " houſe, and juſtify the action by aſſerting he is a " Free-Agent, would be more excuſable than this Au- " thor in uttering what he has from the right of a " Free-Thinker. But they are a ſett of dry, joyleſs, " dull fellows, who want capacities and talents to " make a figure amongſt mankind upon benevolent " and generous principles, that think to ſurmount " their own natural meanneſs, by laying offences in " the way of ſuch, as make it their beſt endeavour to " excel upon the received maxims and honeſt arts of life. " This Gentleman may be aſſured he has not a taſte " for what he pretends to decry, and the poor man " is certainly more a blockhead than an Atheiſt. . . .

" Theſe

12mo [G], and was tranſlated into French, and printed at the ſame place; and a ſecond edition of the French Tranſlation corrected was afterwards publiſhed. This Pamphlet occaſioning a prodigious noiſe, and our Author being diſcovered by his Printer Mr. John Darby, he went from London to Holland [H] January the 2d 1712, from thence to Flanders, where he received great civilities from the Prieſts, Jeſuits, &c. From thence he wrote to one of his ſervants at London to meet him at Calais in order to attend him to Paris; but in the mean time the death of his near relation Mr. Trolope happened, which obliged him to return to London, where he arrived the 18th of October 1713, full of grief for the loſs of ſo great a friend, and the diſappointment of not ſeeing France, Italy, &c. In 1715 he retired into the County of Eſſex, and acted as a Juſtice of the Peace and Deputy-Lieutenant for the ſame County, as he had done before in the County of Middleſex and Liberty of Weſtminſter. The ſame year he publiſhed at London in 8vo A Philoſophical Enquiry concerning human Liberty, which was reprinted with Corrections in 1717 in 8vo I. It was afterwards tranſlated into French by the Reverend Mr. D, and printed in the firſt volume of Recueil de diverſes Pieces ſur la Philoſophie, la Religion (*) Pagg. 115, beſides the Preface.

" Theſe Free-Thinkers, who lead the lives of recluſe Stu" dents for no other purpoſe but to diſturb the ſentiments
" of other men, put me in mind of the monſtrous recre" ation of thoſe late wild youths, who, without provo-
" cation, had a wantonneſs in ſtabbing and defacing
" thoſe they met with. When ſuch Writers as this, who " have no ſpirit but that of malice, pretend to inform " the Age, mohocks and cut-throats may well ſet up
" for wits and men of pleaſure. . . . If ever any man
" deſerved to be denied the common benefits of air
" and water, it is the Author of a Diſcourſe of
" Free-Thinking."

[G] Reprinted at the Hague by Tho. Johnſon, with ſome Additions and Corrections, in 1713, in 12*mo*.] In the title-page it is ſaid to be printed at London. Beſides ſeveral conſiderable Additions, the Tranſlations in ſeveral places are corrected from Dr. Bentley's Remarks; and ſome references are made to thoſe Remarks and to Dr. Hare's Clergyman's Thanks. And whereas in the former edition the diſcourſe concluded with theſe words: For I think it virtue enough to endeavour to do good, only within the bounds of doing yourſelf no harm; in the Hague Edition it is expreſſed thus: For I think it virtue enough, in a Country ſo ignorant, ſtupid, ſuperſtitious, and deſtitute of all private and publick virtue, as ours, to endeavour to do good, only within the bounds of doing yourſelf no harm.

[H] He went from London to Holland.] This is taken notice of by Dr. Hare (52), who having obſerved, that the leaſt appearance of danger is able to damp in a moment all the zeal of the Free-Thinkers, tells us, that " a bare inquiry after the Printer of their " wicked Book has frightened them, and obliged the " reputed Author to take a ſecond trip into Holland;
" ſo great is his courage to defend upon the firſt ap" pearance of an oppoſition. And are not theſe rare
" Champions for Free-Thinking? Is not their book a " demonſtration, that we are in poſſeſſion of the liber" ty they pretend to plead for, which otherwiſe they " durſt ne'er have writ? And that they would have " been as mute as fiſhes, had they not thought they " could have opened with impunity?"

(52) Clergyman's Thanks, pag. 18.

[I] His Philoſophical Inquiry concerning human Liberty.] In the Preface he tells us, I. That tho' he denies the Liberty in a certain meaning of that word, yet he contends for Liberty, as it ſignifies a power in man to do as he wills, or pleaſes, which he obſerves to be the notion of Liberty maintained by Ariſtotle, Cicero, Mr. Locke, and ſeveral other Philoſophers antient and modern. II. That when he affirms Neceſſity, he contends only for what is called Moral Neceſſity, meaning thereby, that man, who is an intelligent and ſenſible being, is determined by his reaſon and his ſenſes; and he denies man to be ſubject to ſuch a Neceſſity, as is in clocks, watches, and ſuch other beings, which, for want of ſenſation and intelligence, are ſubject to an abſolute, phyſical, or mechanical Neceſſity. And here he remarks, that he has the concurrence of almoſt all the greateſt aſſertors of Liberty, who either expreſly maintain moral Neceſſity, or the thing ſignified by thoſe words. III. That he has undertaken to ſhew, that the notions he advances are ſo far from being inconſiſtent with, that they are the ſole foundations of, Morality and Laws, and of rewards and puniſhments in Society; and that the notions, which he explodes, are ſubverſive of them. This he judged neceſſary to make out in treating a ſubject, which has relation to Morality, becauſe nothing can be true, which ſubverts thoſe things; and all diſcourſe muſt be defective, wherein the reader perceives any diſagreement to moral Truth, which is as evident as any ſpeculative Truth, and much more neceſſary to be render'd clear to the reader's mind, than truth in all other ſciences. IV. That he has intitled his diſcourſe a Philoſophical Inquiry &c. becauſe he propoſes only to prove his point by experience and by reaſon, omitting all conſiderations ſtrictly Theological. In the Inquiry he ſtates the queſtion whether man be a neceſſary or a free Agent by obſerving (53) that " man
" is a neceſſary Agent, if all his actions are ſo deter" mined by the cauſes preceding each action, that not " one paſt action could poſſibly not have come to " paſs, or have been otherwiſe than it was; nor
" one future action can poſſibly not come to paſs, or
" be otherwiſe than it ſhall be. Man is a free Agent,
" if he is able at any time under the circumſtances
" and cauſes he then is, to do different things: or, in " other words, if he is not ever unavoidably deter" mined in every point of time by the circumſtances
" he is in, and cauſes he is under, to do that one thing
" he does, and not poſſibly to do any other." He proceeds then to ſhew that man is a neceſſary Agent 1, from our Experience; 2, the Impoſſibility of Liberty; 3, the Imperfection of Liberty, and the Perfection of Neceſſity; 4, from the conſideration of the Divine Preſcience; 5, from the Nature and Uſe of Rewards and Puniſhments; 6, from the Nature of Morality. He afterwards conſiders the following objections to his Scheme, viz. that if men are neceſſary agents, puniſhments are unjuſt and uſeleſs; reaſoning, intreaties, admonitions, blame, and praiſe uſeleſs; that if the period of man's life be fixed, Phyſick, &c. is uſeleſs. In anſwer to the queſtion, How can a man act againſt his conſcience, and how can his conſcience accuſe him, if he knows he acts neceſſarily, and alſo does what he thinks beſt when he commits any ſin? he replies (54), " That conſcience being a man's own opinion of " his actions, with relation to ſome rule, he may
" at the time of doing an action contrary to that " rule, know that he breaks that rule, and conſequently
" acts with a reluctance, tho' not ſufficient to hinder
" the action. But after the action is over, he may " not only judge his action to be contrary to that rule,
" but by the abſence of the pleaſure of the ſin, and
" by finding himſelf obnoxious to ſhame, or by be" lieving himſelf liable to puniſhment, he may really
" accuſe himſelf; that is, he may condemn himſelf
" for having done it, be ſorry he has done it, and " wiſh it undone, becauſe of the conſequences that " attend it." He then anſwers the objection, that if all events are neceſſary, it was as impoſſible (for example) for Julius Cæſar not to have died in the Senate, as it is impoſſible for two and two to make ſix. But who will ſay the former was as impoſſible as the latter is, when we can conceive it poſſible for Julius Cæſar to have died any where elſe as well as in the Senate, and impoſſible to conceive two and two ever to make ſix? To this he replies, that he does allow, " that if all events
" are neceſſary, it was as impoſſible for Julius Cæſar
" not to have died in the Senate, as it is impoſſible for
" two and two to make ſix." He then quotes ſome authorities for what he has advanced upon this ſubject; and concludes with declaring, that tho' he has contended that Liberty from Neceſſity is contrary to experience, impoſſible, and if poſſible, an imperfection,

(53) Pag. 11. edit. London 1717.

(54) Pag. 103, 104.

Religion Naturelle, l'Hiſtoire, les Mathematiques, &c. par Meſſieurs Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, & autres Autheurs célebres; publiſhed by Mr. Des Maizeaux at Amſterdam 1720, 2 vol. in 12mo. Dr. Samuel Clarke wrote Remarks upon this Inquiry, ſubjoined to the Collection of Papers, which paſſed between the late learned Mr. Leibnitz and Dr. Clarke, relating to the Principles of Natural Philoſophy and Religion, London 1717 in 8vo. Which Remarks were likewiſe printed in French in the Recueil de diverſes Pieces &c. abovementioned. Mr. Collins did not publiſh any Reply to Dr. Clarke upon this ſubject; for though he did not think the Doctor had the advantage over him in the diſpute, yet as he had repreſented Mr. Collins's opinion as dangerous in its conſequences, and very improper to be inſiſted upon, the latter, after ſuch an inſinuation, found he could not proceed in the diſpute upon equal terms (b). In 1718 he was choſen Treaſurer of the County of Eſſex, to the great joy of ſeveral tradeſmen and others, who had large ſums of money due to them from the ſaid County, but could not get it paid them, it having been ſpent and embezzled by their former Treaſurer. The pooreſt of them he ſupported with his own private caſh; others he promiſed intereſt for their money till it could be raiſed to pay them. In 1722 the debts were all diſcharged, and by his care and management in that affair, the ſeveral ſums which that County was indebted to its workmen, &c. were diſcharged every three months, and with almoſt half the money, which had been raiſed annually for upwards of twenty years before he was choſen. December the 20th 1723 he loſt his ſon; and in 1724 he married Elizabeth the daughter of Sir Walter Wrotteſley Bart; by whom he had no children. In 1724 he publiſhed at London in 8vo his Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay on the Thirty Nine Articles of the Church of England. Wherein it is demonſtrated, that this Clauſe, The Church has Power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Autority in Controverſies of Faith, inſerted in the 20th Article, is not a part of the Articles, as they were eſtabliſhed by Act of Parliament in the 13th of Eliz. or agreed on by the Convocations of 1562 and 1571 [K]. This was deſigned as an Anſwer to the Vindication of the Church of England &c. and Dr. Bennet's Eſſay on the Thirty Nine Articles, which had been publiſhed againſt his Prieſtcraft in Perfection (i). In the Preface (k) he tells us, that he was engaged in writing this work by a worthy Miniſter of the Goſpel, who knew, that he had made ſome Enquiries into the Modern Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England, and that he was preparing an Hiſtory of the Variations of the Church of England and its Clergy from the Reformation down to this time, with an Anſwer to the Cavils of the Papiſts made on occaſion of the ſaid Variations. At the end of this Book was printed an advertiſement, though without Mr. Collins's knowledge, that ſpeedily would be publiſhed, "Cicero's Treatiſes of "the Nature of the Gods and of Divination. Tranſlated into Engliſh with Annotations. In "two volumes." But theſe works, though finiſhed by our Author, were never printed. The ſame year he publiſhed his Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion in two Parts: The firſt containing ſome Conſiderations on the Quotations made from the Old in the New Teſtament, and particularly on the Prophecies cited from the former, and ſaid to be fulfilled in the latter. The ſecond containing an Examination of the Scheme advanced by Mr. Whiſton in his Eſſay towards reſtoring the true Text of the Old Teſtament, and for vindicating the citations thence made in the New Teſtament. To which is prefixed an Apology for free Debate and Liberty of writing [L]. London 1724 in 8vo. In this Diſcourſe

(b) Des Maizeaux's Preface to the Recueil de diverſes Pieces, pag. 10.

(i) See Note [D].

(k) Pag. iv, v.

and ſubverſive of laws and morality; yet he takes "man to have a truly valuable liberty of another kind. "He has a power to do as he wills or pleaſes. Thus "if he wills or pleaſes to ſpeak or be ſilent, to ſit or "ſtand, to ride or walk, to go this way or that way, "to move faſt or ſlow, or in fine, if his will changes "like a weather-cock, he is able to do as he wills or "pleaſes, unleſs prevented by ſome reſtraint or compulſion, as by being gagg'd, being under an acute "pain, being forced out of his place, being confined, "having convulſive motions, having loſt the uſe of his "limbs, or ſuch like cauſes. He has alſo the ſame "power in relation to the actions of his mind, as to "thoſe of his body. If he wills or pleaſes, he can "think on this or that ſubject, ſtop ſhort or purſue his "thoughts, deliberate or defer deliberation as he "pleaſes, reſolve or ſuſpend his reſolution as he "pleaſes, and in fine can every moment change his "object when he pleaſes, unleſs prevented by pain, "or a fit of an apoplexy, or ſome ſuch intervening reſtraint and compulſion. And is it not a great perfection in man to be able, in relation both to his "thoughts and actions, to do as he wills or pleaſes "in all thoſe caſes of pleaſure or intereſt? Nay, can "a greater and more beneficial power in man be conceived, than to be able to do as he wills or pleaſes? "And can any other Liberty be conceived beneficial "to him? Had he this power or liberty in all things, "the would be omnipotent!"

[K] His Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay on the Thirty Nine Articles &c.] Having given an account of the whole controverſy concerning the Authority of the controverted Clauſe, he concludes with drawing up in brief that demonſtration, which he promiſes in his title-page, and has given in his Book, and which is as follows (55): "The Articles of the Church of England "are ſuppoſed to have their convocational Autority "from the Convocation of 1562, which firſt agreed "on them; and from the Convocation of 1571, "which after having reviſed, and made alterations in, "and additions to them, agreed on them again. The "way of paſſing Acts of Convocation is by the ſubſcription of the majority of the Members of each "Houſe by themſelves. The MS. Articles, which "paſſed the Convocation of 1562, and were ſubſcribed by the majority of both Houſes, are yet extant, "as are the MS. Articles of 1571, with the ſubſcriptions of the Upper Houſe. And both theſe MSS. "are without the clauſe. The Parliament in 1571 "did by a Statute, intitled, An Act for the Miniſters "of the Church to be of ſound Religion, confirm Articles of Religion, comprized in an imprinted Engliſh "book, intitled, Articles, &c. put forth by the Queen's "Autority. All the Engliſh printed Books of the Articles extant before 1571, and while the Parliament "were making this Statute, bore the title recited in "he Statute, and were without the Clauſe. Wherefore "it follows that the Clauſe has neither the Autority of the Convocation nor Parliament."

(55) Pag. 277, 278, 279.

[L] His Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion &c. To which is prefixed an Apology for free debate and liberty of writing.] This Diſcourſe he endeavours to ſhew, that Chriſtianity is founded on Judaiſm, or the New Teſtament on the Old; that the Apoſtles ground and prove Chriſtianity from the Old Teſtament, which is the Canon of Chriſtians; that the chief Proofs of Chriſtianity from the Old Teſtament are urged by the Apoſtles in the New Teſtament; that if thoſe proofs are valid, Chriſtianity is invincibly eſtabliſhed on its true foundation; if invalid, then Chriſtianity is falſe; and that thoſe proofs are typical or allegorical proofs. It was immediately attacked by a great number of writings [M], and particularly by Mr. Whiſton, who in his Liſt of Suppoſitions or Aſſertions in the late Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons

Apology is likewiſe intitled by him A Preface to the Reader; containing an Apology for Mr. Whiſton's liberty of writing. Mr. Thomas Bullock has ſubjoined to the Preface to his Book, intitled, The Reaſoning of Chriſt and his Apoſtles in their Defence of Chriſtianity conſidered: in ſeven Sermons preached at Hackney in Middleſex &c. the following Queries to the Author of the Apology for free Debate. "Qu. Whether any man "of underſtanding and honeſty would be glad, that ſuch "men as HOOKER, HALES, CHILLINGWORTH, &c. "inſtead of endeavouring to eſtabliſh any one impor- "tant truth, and giving their own moſt intimate "thoughts thereupon, ſhould have laboured to puzzle "every thing of importance, that came in their way "with the little arts, the quibbles, and ſophiſtry of "a wrangling diſputant? Whether it had been a good "uſe of their learning and penetration (in which they "had not many ſuperiors) if inſtead of ſpeaking their "own minds freely on all important Queſtions in Philo- "ſophy and Theology, like Mr. Whiſton, they had em- "ployed themſelves in making large collections of all "the weak unguarded expreſſions of Philoſophers "and Divines, publiſhing them to the world in the "moſt ludicrous manner, with deſign only to expoſe "thoſe Writers and their ſubjects, and not to improve "their Readers thereby? Whether ſuch great men "would not more virtuouſly and religiouſly as well as "more honourably have employed their time, if they had "turned themſelves intirely to the Heathen Hiſtorians, "Poets, Orators, and Philoſophers, ſpent ten or twelve "years upon HORACE or TERENCE; than in ſtudying "to burleſque the Scriptures, by coining abſurd ridi- "culous interpretations for every paſſage capable of "miſconſtruction, picking out ſcraps of ſentences, "broken unconnected paſſages, half expreſſions, and "putting them together to give the reader a falſe idea "of Religion and the Scriptures whereon it is found- "ed? Or if they had thus applied their ſagacity and "labour, whether a juſt apology for Mr. Whiſton, "for free Debate, for free Profeſſion and Communica- "tion of Notions, for teaching others what a man is "perſuaded of himſelf, could be reckoned an apology "for ſuch men and ſuch Writings?

[M] This was immediately attacked by a great number of Writings.] Mr. Collins has given a catalogue of them, at the end of the Preface to his Scheme of Literal Prophecy, which is as follows. I. A Letter in the Univerſal Journal, Dec. the 18th 1723. II. An Examination of a late Diſcourſe of the grounds and reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion, with the Apology for Mr. Whiſton's liberty of Writing, 8vo. 1724. III. The Chriſtian Religion not founded on Allegory: Or a Vindication of our Faith from the falſhood objected to it in a late Diſcourſe of the Grounds &c. 8vo. 1724. IV. A liſt of ſuppoſitions or aſſertions in the late Diſcourſe of the Grounds &c. which are not therein ſupported by any real or authentick evidence; for which ſome ſuch evidence is expected to be produced. By William Whiſton, M. A. 8vo. 1724. V. Two London Journals, April the 4th and 11th, 1724. VI. The nature and uſe of a Type; being the ſubſtance of two Sermons &c. By George Lavington, L. L. B. with a Preface concerning a late Treatiſe, intitled, a Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. 8vo. 1725. VII. The ſure word of Prophecy: a Sermon before the Univerſity of Cambridge at St. Mary's Church &c. By John Newcome, B. D. Fellow of St. John's College. Publiſhed at the requeſt of the Vice-Chancellor and other Heads of the Houſes. 8vo. 1724. VIII. Jeſus Chriſt the Prophet, whom Moſes foretold: a Sermon preached at Norwich, by Thomas Bullock, M. A. and Chaplain to the Biſhop of Norwich. To which is added a Poſtſcript explaining a paſſage in St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Galatians. 8vo. 1724. IX. Prophetiæ de Meſſiâ, præſertim vero illa de Immanuele, in Jeſu ad literam adimpletæ: Concio habita &c. Oxon. contra anonymum libellum, cui titulus, A Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. A Carew Reynel. S. T. B. & C. C. C. Oxon. Socio. 4to. 1724. X. Concio habita in Eccleſia Sanctæ Mariæ Cantabrigiæ pro Gradu Doctoratus, per Tho. Manningham, S. T. P. & nuper Coll. Regal. Socium, Rogatu Procancellarii & Capitum Collegiorum, in lucem edita. 4to. 1724. XI. The Literal Accompliſhment of Scripture Prophecies, being a full Anſwer to a late Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. By William Whiſton, M. A. 8vo. 1724. XII. The Nature of the Prophecies of the old Teſtament relating to the Meſſias: An Anſwer to the firſt part of a late Author's Book, intitled, a Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. in a Letter to a Perſon of Honour. By a Miniſter of the Church of England. 8vo. 1724. XIII. A Letter to the Author of the Grounds and Reaſons of Chriſtianity. By a Divine of the Church of England. 8vo. 1724. XIV. A Defence of Chriſtianity from the Prophecies of the Old Teſtament, wherein are conſidered all the objections againſt this kind of proof, advanced in a late Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. By the Right Reverend Father in God Edward [Chandler] Lord Biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield. 8vo, 1725. There have been ſeveral Editions of this Book. XV. A Diſcourſe of the Connection of the Prophecies in the Old Teſtament and Application of them to Chriſt. By Samuel Clarke D. D. Rector of St. James's Weſtminſter. 8vo. 1725. XVI. The true Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion, in oppoſition to the falſe ones, ſet forth in a late Book, intitled, The Grounds &c. 8vo, 1725. XVII. The Moderator between an Infidel and an Apoſtate: Or the controverſy between the Author of the Diſcourſe of the Grounds &c. and his Reverend Eccleſiaſtical Opponents ſet in a clear light. With an Exhortation to a zealous debate about it. By Thomas Woolſton, ſome time Fellow of Sidney College Cambridge. 8vo. 1725. XVIII. An Anſwer to a Letter concerning the Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion; with a Poſtſcript, wherein the Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay on the Thirty Nine Articles is briefly and impartially conſidered. By a Divine of North Britain. 8vo. 1725. XIX. A Preſervative againſt a late Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. 8vo, 1725. XX. The Reaſoning of Chriſt and his Apoſtles in their Defence of Chriſtianity conſidered. In ſeven Sermons preached at Hackney in Middleſex, 1724. To which is prefixed a Preface taking notice of the falſe repreſentations of Chriſtianity, and of the Apoſtles reaſoning in defence of it, in a Book, intitled, The Grounds, &c. By Thomas Bullock, M. A. Publiſhed at the requeſt of the Gentlemen of Hackney. 8vo. 1725. XXI. An Eſſay upon the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion, wherein its real foundation upon the Old Teſtament is ſhewn. Occaſioned by the Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. By Arthur Aſhley Sykes. M. A. Rector of Rayleigh in Eſſex. 8vo. 1725. Mr. Collins (56) is of opinion, that in this Eſſay Mr. Sykes alone of all the Writers againſt the Grounds and Reaſons "has advanced a conſiſtent "ſcheme of things, which he has propoſed with "great clearneſs, politeneſs, and moderation. XXII. The uſe and intent of Prophecy in the ſeveral ages of the Church. In ſix Diſcourſes delivered at the Temple Church 1724. Publiſhed at the deſire of the Maſters of the Bench of the two Honourable Societies. To which are added Three Diſſertations &c. By Thomas Sherlock, D. D. Dean of Chicheſter, and Maſter of the Temple, 8vo. 1725. XXIII. A Chronological Treatiſe upon the Seventy Weeks of Daniel; wherein is evidently ſhewn the accompliſhment of the predicted events, as eſpecially of the cutting off the Meſſiah after the predicted ſeven weeks and ſixty two weeks, according to the expreſs letter of the Prophecy, and in moſt exact agreement with Ptolemy's Canon: ſo alſo of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by ſons &c. which are not therein ſupported by any real or authentic Evidence: for which ſome ſuch Evidence is expected to be produced, ſubjoined to his Propoſals for printing by ſubſcription Authentick Records concerning the Jewiſh and Chriſtian Religion (l), and given away to all the Members of Parliaments, treated our Author, together with Mr. Toland, in very ſevere terms as guilty of impious Frauds and Lay-craft [N]; and application was ſaid to have been made by him to the Lord Chancellor King to remove Mr. Collins from the Commiſſion of Peace, but without ſucceſs. In 1726 he wrote A Letter to the Author of the Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons &c. In Anſwer to Mr. Green's Letters, &c. With a Poſtſcript occaſioned by Dr. Lobb's Brief Defence &c. [O]. London 1726 in 8vo. This piece was not publiſhed, and but very few of the copies were diſperſed. The ſame year appeared his Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered; in a View of the Controverſy occaſioned by a late by the Romans in the ſeventieth or ſeparate Week in the literal, obvious and primary ſenſe; however this be groundleſly called in queſtion by a late Writer in a Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. In a particular Diſquiſition upon the three lateſt Hypotheſes of theſe Weeks publiſhed among us, viz. That of the late learned Biſhop Loyd; that of the late learned Dr. Prideaux; and that of the Reverend Mr. Lancaſter. All which Hypotheſes are here fully conſidered, and the late Biſhop Loyd's is generally ſuppoſed and eſtabliſhed. With Chronological Tables ſuited to the whole. By Benjamin Marſhall, M. A. Rector of Naunton in Gloceſterſhire, 8vo, 1725. XXIV. A Vindication of the Chriſtian Religion. In two parts. I. A Diſcourſe of the Nature and Uſe of Miracles. II. An Anſwer to a late Book intitled, A Diſcourſe of the Grounds &c. By Samuel Chandler. 8vo, 1725. XXV. A Diſſertation on the unreaſonableneſs, folly and danger of Infidelity, occaſioned by a late virulent Book intitled, A Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion. By Theotimus Philalethes. 8vo. 1725. XXVI. A Supplement to the literal Accompliſhment of Scripture Prophecies; containing Obſervations on Dr. Clarke's and Biſhop Chandler's late Diſcourſes of the Prophecies of the Old Teſtament; with four Diſſertations &c. By William Whiſton M. A. 8vo. 1725. XXVII. A Supplement to the Moderator between an Infidel and an Apoſtate; being a Diſſertation on Daniel's Weeks, from the authority of the Fathers. By Thomas Woolſton &c. 8vo. 1725. XXVIII. A ſecond Supplement to the Moderator between an Infidel and an Apoſtate; or a Diſſertation on ſome other Prophecies cited by the Biſhop of Lichfield againſt the Author of the Grounds. By Thomas Woolſton &c. 8vo. 1725. XXIX. Letters to the Author of the Diſcourſe of the Grounds &c. ſhewing that Chriſtianity is ſupported by facts well atteſted: that the words of Iſaiah, Chap. vii. 14. Behold a virgin ſhall conceive and bear a ſon, in their literal and only ſenſe, are a Prophecy of the conception and birth of the Meſſias, fulfilled in Jeſus; and that the Goſpel Application of ſeveral other paſſages in the Old Teſtament is juſt. By John Greene. 8vo. 1726. XXX. Remarks on the various Interpretations of the more ſure word of Prophecy. 2 Peter i. 19. which have lately been publiſhed by the Dean of Chicheſter, and the Author of Miſcellanea Sacra. In vindication of that paſſage from the objections of the Grounds &c. With a different account of the place deſigned, in vindication of it againſt the mentioned Author. 8vo. 1726. XXXI. A brief Defence of the Chriſtian Religion: or the teſtimony of God to the truth of the Chriſtian Religion. By Theophilus Lobb M. D. 8vo. 1726. XXXII. An Eſſay towards a ſummary of Chriſtianity by a Gentleman. 8vo. 1726. XXXIII. A Review of the Controverſy between the Author of the Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion and his adverſaries, in a Letter to the Author. 8vo. 1726. This was written by Mr. Thomas Jeffery, a Diſſenting Miniſter. Mr. Collins (57) tells us, that whoever reads this Author, "will be improved "in his Morals by converſing with ſo polite a perſon, "and in his notions of things by attending to the "many judicious obſervations, which occur through-"out his Book." XXXIV. A Diſcourſe proving the Reſurrection of Chriſt, and ſhewing that it is a ſufficient demonſtration of Chriſtianity. By John Greene. 8vo. 1726. XXXV. A Literal Expoſition of two Prophecies by St. Matthew out of the Old Teſtament, and ſaid by him to be fulfilled in the perſon of Jeſus Chriſt. The firſt in the VIIth of Iſaiah, verſe 14. The ſecond in the XIth of Hoſeah, verſe 1.

(56) Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered, p. 12.

(l) Theſe propoſals are dated Jan. 17, 1723-4.

(57) Letter to the Author of the Grounds &c. in anſwer to Mr. Greene's Letters &c. pag. 80. edit. London 1726, in 8vo.

[N] Treated our Author, together with Mr. Toland, in very ſevere Terms, as guilty of impious Frauds and Laycraft.] Mr. Whiſton having obſerved (58), "that "tho' we are perpetually told of the Pious Fraud and "Prieſtcraft of the Primitive Chriſtians, he can at "preſent call to mind but one ſuch example, that "was ever proved, and that was the forgery or groſs "interpolation of the Acts of Paul and Thecla (59), "made by a certain nameleſs Preſbyter at the end of "the firſt, or beginning of the ſecond Century, for "which he was degraded;" tells us, that inſtead of this one ancient believer, he ſhall out of a greater number, ſelect two modern unbelievers, as notoriouſly guilty of the like Impious Frauds and Laycraft. "A firſt "ſhall be Mr. Toland. . . . . A ſecond inſtance muſt "be Mr. Antony Collins, a Gentleman who has many "years taken ſuperabundant care not to be ſuſpected "of believing ſo much as the Apoſtles Creed, or the "Books of either the Old or New Teſtament, or in-"deed any Divine Providence at all. Yet does he "claim a right to be admitted to take an oath upon "the Bible, and to receive the Holy Communion it-"ſelf; and he is at this day admitted to do both, "and in vertue thereof is in Commiſſion of the Peace, "as a good Churchman: i. e. notwithſtanding his open "and profeſſed Infidelity he ventures in the moſt pub-"lick and ſolemn manner to declare his unfeigned "acknowledgment of the Divine Providence, of the "truth of the Chriſtian Religion, and of the Books of "Holy Scripture, that is poſſible to be done among "men. It is with great regret I add this example of "an old friend, and one whom I ſtill love better than "he loves himſelf; but it is too flagrant to be omit-"ted. This I call groſs Immorality, impious Fraud, "and Laycraft." Mr. Armand de la Chapelle having tranſlated this paſſage into French in his Bibliotheque Angloiſe (60) obſerves, that theſe expreſſions of Mr. Whiſton's are a little too choleric, and that his antagoniſt will be highly pleaſed with this inſtance of paſſion, and have ſome ſecret motive to triumph upon that account. The publication of this paſſage in that Journal occaſioned a letter to be ſent to Mr. de la Chapelle, printed in the firſt Part of the XIIth Volume (61), in which the Writer of it obſerves, that "Mr. Whiſ-"ton having accuſed Mr. Collins of Irreligion, but "being ſenſible, that this accuſation being deſtitute "of proof was ridiculous, he has artfully pretended, "that the latter had been his friend, inſinuating "thereby that Mr. Collins had made him a confident "of his moſt ſecret ſentiments. And yet, continues "the Writer, I have been aſſured by perſons, who "are very well informed, that Mr. Collins never had "any intercourſe of friendſhip with him; that he ne-"ver ſpoke to him above eight or ten times, in his "life, in the Coffee-houſe or elſewhere, and always "in other company, and that he has not ſeen him "for above five years. Is this ſufficient for Mr. "Whiſton to claim the character of a friend?"

(58) Liſts of Suppoſitions and Aſſertions &c. pag. 15.

(59) Still extant apud Grabe Spicileg. Sect. 1. pag. 87-128.

(60) Tom. xi. Part 1. pag. 282, 283, 284. edit. Amſterd. 1724.

(61) Pag. 244, 245, 246.

[O] His Letter to the Author of the Diſcourſe of the Grounds &c.] This Letter is dated April the 23d 1726, and the Poſtſcript April the 30th 1726. In the Preface (62) he remarks, that Mr. Green in his Diſcourſe proving the Reſurrection of Chriſt, and ſhewing that it is a ſufficient demonſtration of the Truth of Chriſtianity (63), after having obſerved, that "the Reader will "find a reflection or two on ſome paſſages in a "Diſcourſe of the Grounds &c." adds, "that his "taking notice of this Book, after having lately "made ſome Remarks upon it in five Letters to the "Author, does not proceed from any diſreſpect to "that Gentleman, but a regard to truth. And there-"fore having been told that I (64) inſinuate, continues "Mr.

(62) Pag. 1.

(63) Octavo 1726.

(64) Letter, pag. 26.

a late Book, intitled, A Diſcourſe of the Grounds &c. [P]. It was printed at the Hague by Tho. Johnſon 1726 in 2 volumes in 12mo, and reprinted at London with Corrections 1727 in 8vo. It is dated at London November the 13th 1725, and addreſſed to the Right Honourable ; and concludes with theſe words. "As to your Lordſhip's "requeſt, that I would ſend you my thoughts on divers other Theological ſubjects, which "you name to me, I ſhall obey you, as ſoon as I can; and I ſhall begin with a Diſcourſe "upon the Miracles recorded in the Old and New Teſtament; which is almoſt tranſcribed "for your uſe." In this work (m) he mentions a manuſcript Diſſertation of his, written on the occaſion of and againſt Mr. Whiſton's Vindication of the Sybilline Oracles; in which Diſſertation Mr. Collins endeavoured to ſhew thoſe Oracles "to be a forgery made in "the times of the Primitive Chriſtians, who, for forging and receiving them, were cal-"led Sybilliſts by the Pagans." But this Diſſertation never appeared in print. His Scheme of Literal Prophecy was replied to by ſeveral Writers [2], and particularly by Dr. John Rogers in his Neceſſity of Divine Revelation, and the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion (m) Chap. 2. pag. 61. edit. 1726 in 12mo.

"Mr. Green, that the ſaid Author is an Enemy to "Natural Religion, I freely own, that had I been ſen-"ſible, that my words would have born ſuch a con-"ſtruction, I ſhould have expreſſed myſelf in a dif "ferent manner." Upon this paſſage Mr. Collins makes ſeveral Obſervations, and then conſiders Mr. Green's Reflections upon the Diſcourſe of the Grounds in his Diſcourſe proving the Reſurrection of Chriſt, and obſerves (65), that his whole Book may be conceived a Reflection on or Argument againſt the Diſcourſe of the Grounds, upon which Mr. Collins makes an obſerſervation or two in his Preface, reſerving the full conſideration of Mr. Green's Book to another occaſion (66). He tells us (67), that the ſecond part of his Book, wherein Mr. Green attempts to ſhew, that "the Re-"ſurrection of Chriſt [as before proved by him,] is a "ſufficient demonſtration of the truth of Chriſtianity, "is weakneſs itſelf. For in the firſt place, he has not "proved to the Deiſts the truth of the Reſurrection in "a way proper for them. In the next place, if he "had proved it in a proper way, that is, had made "it out by all the proper topicks to be very probably "true, [for that is all the matter will admit of, and "what is only required to be done in matters of "Faith;] yet that would not be ſufficient to prove the "truth of Chriſtianity, which is a Religion conſiſting "of many particulars, and all built on the Books of "the Old and New Teſtament. The antiquity, au-"thority, and inſpiration of thoſe Books are there-"fore to be proved; in doing which their morality is "to be cleared; their doctrines ſhewn not to be incon-"ſiſtent with reaſon; the dependency of the New or "the Old Teſtament manifeſted, and in particular the "fundamental Article of Chriſtianity, that Jeſus of "Nazareth is the Meſſias, [or perſon foretold in the "Old Teſtament] is the perſon there foretold; the "harmony of all their parts with one another de-"fended; and all ſhewn to tend to the Glory of "God, and good of men. For if theſe things can-"not be made out; or if any objections upon theſe "heads cannot be anſwered; here is not only want "of proof for ſome eſſential parts of Chriſtianity, but "objections ſtarted, which not only deſtroy that con-"ſiſtency and reaſonableneſs, which are neceſſary cha-"racters of a Religion, that comes from God, but, "as not being to be anſwered, are demonſtrations "of the falſhood of what can only be grounded on "probability."

(65) Preface, pag. 8, 9.

(66) Ibid. pag. 9.

(67) Ibid.

[P] His Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered; &c.] In his Preface he tells us, that he has advanced ſuch a Scheme of things, as will account for all matters in the preſent diſpute. And tho' that Scheme, ſays he, when conſidered together, may perhaps appear to many new and ſurprizing, yet it ſeems to be the true old Scheme, and grounded on the right rules of Criticiſm and Judgment in the caſe; and its parts are proved by the moſt commonly received Theological Topicks and Reaſonings; which, as the Author himſelf deems true and juſt in themſelves, ſo to engage the Reader to the greater attention, and to induce him to give them their due weight, he urges them in the words of the greateſt Divines, without whom he ſcarce preſumes to ſtir a ſtep. At the end of this Treatiſe (68) he declares, that "the true and only Scheme, by which the world ought "to be regulated and would be regulated, lies in theſe "two particulars. I. That univerſal liberty be eſta-"bliſhed in reſpect to opinion and practices not pre-"judicial to the peace and welfare of Society: by "which eſtabliſhment, Truth muſt needs have the "advantage over Error and Falſhood, the Law of God, "over the Will of Man, and true Chriſtianity tolerated; "private Judgment would be really exerciſed; and "men would be allowed to have, and ſuffered to fol-"low their conſciences, over which God only is Su-"preme. . . . II. Secondly, that nothing but the Law "of Nature, (the obſervance whereof is abſolutely ne-"ceſſary to Society) and what can be built thereon, "ſhould be enforced by the civil ſanctions of the "Magiſtrate, which law will be then beſt underſtood, "beſt eſtabliſhed, and beſt executed, when it is not "propoſed to eſtabliſh any thing elſe to puniſh men "for the breach of any thing elſe, and when men's "fury and zeal are taken off from other matters, "about which their duty is wholly perſonal, and con-"ſiſts in getting the beſt information they can, and in "aſſenting only to opinions according to the degree of "evidence they have for them, and in practiſing ſuch "(indifferent) things, which they are convinced to be "their duty, leaving other men in like manner to con-"duct themſelves. O what Piety or true Honour of God, "(which conſiſts in every man's worſhipping God ac-"cording to the dictates of his own conſcience,) what "Virtue, order, and peace would prevail in the world, "if men had a direct view only to piety, virtue, "order, and peace, nothing elſe being of any value, "but as it is a means to thoſe ends!" With reſpect to his own religious notions he declares (69), that "he paying no regard to the authority of Jews, "Heathens or Mahometans, or of Papiſts, Lutherans, "Calviniſts, Arminians, Anabaptiſts, or Quakers, "has uſed the means and faculties God has beſtowed "upon him in inquiring after truth, and particularly "in endeavouring to find out God's will, after the beſt "manner he was able, and has a Creed of his own, "which he is ſo far from impoſing on others, that "he is ready to renounce every article of it himſelf "upon better information, to which he hopes to be "always open."

(68) Chap. 13. pag. 413, & ſeqq. edit. 1726, in 12mo.

(69) Pag. 418, 419.

[2] His Scheme of Literal Prophecy was replied to by ſeveral Writers.] We ſhall give the Reader an account of ſome of them. I. The Neceſſity of Divine Revelation, and the Truth of the Chriſtian Revelation aſſerted, in eight Sermons. To which is prefixed a Preface, with ſome Remarks on a late Book, intitled, The Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered &c. By John Rogers, D. D. London 1727 in 8vo. This occaſioned Mr. Collins's Letter to the Reverend Dr. Rogers, on occaſion of his eight Sermons &c. mentioned in the text of this article. II. A Letter to the Author of the London Journal, Saturday April 1, 1727. This Letter was written by Dr. Arthur Aſhley Sykes, now Dean of St. Burien. Mr. Collins wrote an Anſwer to it, publiſhed at the end of his Letter to Dr. Rogers. Upon this Dr. Sykes wrote a ſecond Letter in defence of his former, dated June the 24th, 1727, and printed in a Pamphlet, intitled, The true Grounds of the Expectation of the Meſſiah. In two Letters. The one printed in the London Journal April the firſt, 1727. The other in Vindication of it. Being a Reply to the Anſwer publiſhed at the end of a late Letter to Dr. Rogers. By Philalethes. London 1727 in 8vo, pagg. 68. III. A Vindication of the Antiquity and Authority of Daniel's Prophecies, and their application to Jeſus Chriſt: in anſwer to the Objections of the Author of the ligion asserted, in eight Sermons. To which is prefixed a Preface, with some Remarks on a late book, intitled, The Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered. London 1727 in 8vo. In answer to which Mr. Collins wrote, A Letter to the Reverend Dr. Rogers on occasion of his eight Sermons, concerning the Necessity of Divine Revelation, and the Preface prefixed to them. To which is added, A Letter printed in the London Journal April 1, 1727. With an Answer to the same [R]. London 1727 in 8vo, pagg. 143. His health began to decline several years before his death, and he was extremely afflicted with the stone, which at last put an end to his life at his house in Harley-Square December the 13th 1729. He was interred at Oxford Chapel, where a monument was erected to him with an epitaph in Latin [S]. It is remarkable, that notwithstanding all the reproaches cast upon him as an enemy to all Religion, just before his last minutes he declared, "That as he had always endeavoured to the best of his abilities to serve "God, his King, and his Country, so he was persuaded he was going to that place, "which God had designed for them that love him;" and presently afterwards, "The "Catholic Religion is to love God, and to love man;" and he advised such as were about him to have a constant regard to those principles. His Library, which was a very large and curious one, was open to all Men of Letters, to whom he readily communicated all the lights and assistance in his power, and even furnished his antagonists with books the Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered. By Samuel Chandler. London 1728 in 8vo. IV. Christianity the Perfection of all Religion Natural and Revealed. Wherein some of the principal Prophecies relating to the Messiah in the Old Testament are shewn to belong to him in the Literal Sense. In opposition to the attempts of the Literal Scheme &c. By Thomas Jeffery. London 1728 in 8vo. The Dedication to John Lord Viscount Barrington is dated from Little-Baddow May the 10th 1728. V. A Vindication of the Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, In Answer to the Scheme of the Literal Prophecy considered. By the Right Reverend Father in God, Edward, Lord Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield. In two Volumes. With a Letter from the Reverend Mr. Masson, concerning the Religion of Macrobius, and his testimony touching the slaughter of the Infants at Bethlehem, with a Postscript upon Virgil's IVth Eclogue. London 1728. in 8vo. The Bishop solemnly declares (70), that after going over the Scheme with some attention, he sees no cause from any thing the Author hath there said, to change his mind in any point of his Defence, "except in relation to the Writer's sincerity, of which, "says he, I once thought perhaps too favourably. "This I have made appear in the course of this "Vindication, which might have been reduced into "much narrower bounds, had it not been thought "necessary to shew how little this Writer is to be "trusted on his bare word, or even citations throughout his whole Book, who is wont to speak with "most assurance where he is most in the wrong, and "by questions and flirts and cavils, and the authorities of modern Authors, to decline a direct answer "where-ever he is pinched: some of which authorities "are taken from men of his own principles, or from "those, whose judgment as little weighs with others, "as with himself at other times; and are often detached sentences wrested contrary to the intention of "the Authors, which, taken with their context, speak "directly contrary to what he would have them say. "So much I take the liberty to affirm beforehand, having given undeniable instances in the following "pages to prove it; and have more in reserve at the "Author's service, if he force me by a denial to "draw them together into a separate sheet." VI. The Reasoning of Christ and his Apostles vindicated. In two Parts. I. Being a Defence of the Argument from Miracles, proving the argument from Prophecy not necessary to a rational Defence of our Religion. II. Being a Defence of the Argument from Prophecy, proving the Christian Scheme to have a rational foundation upon the Prophecies of the Old Testament. In Answer to a Book intitled, The Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered. By Thomas Bullock. M. A. Rector of North-Creak in Norfolk. London 1728 in 8vo. pagg. 288. Mr. Bullock observes (71), that the Author of the Scheme "pretends to attack Christianity with its own "weapons, and to propagate Infidelity by expressing "himself in the words of Christian Writers; to which "end he has not only raked together the unguarded "expressions of ingenious men, but by altering, adding to, and curtailing passages referred to, and by "other disingenuous methods unbecoming a man of "honour and sincerity, has wrested them to purposes "apparently opposite to their true import."

(70) Introduction, pag. 3, 4.

(71) Introduct. pag. 2.

[R] His Letter to the Reverend Dr. Rogers on occasion of his Eight Sermons &c.] In this Letter he observes (72), that Dr. Rogers had invited the Author of the Scheme to Martyrdom in these words (73): "A "Confessor or two would be a mighty ornament to "his cause. If he expects to convince us that he is "in earnest, and believes himself, he should not decline giving us this proof of his sincerity. What "will not abide this trial, we shall suspect to have "but a poor foundation." These sentiments Mr. Collins tells us (74), are in his opinion, false, wicked, inhuman, irreligious, and inconsistent with the peace of Society, and personally injurious to the Author of the Scheme, &c. He remarks (75) that it is a degree of virtue to speak what a man thinks, tho' he may do it in such a way, as to avoid destruction of life and fortune: and I humbly conceive, says he, that it has as great a face of virtue for a man to speak his thoughts on one side of a question in matters of speculation and notion, and that without prospect of reward, and under apprehensions of ill usage; as it is for another to speak what he is hired to speak on the other side of a question, and not content with that, to be urging and soliciting the temporal powers to use force to maintain his interested side of the question, &c. And he declares (76), that the cause of liberty, which he defends, is "the cause of Virtue, "Learning, Truth, God, Religion, and Christianity; "that it is the political interest of all countries; and "that the degree of it we enjoy in England, is the "strength, ornament, and glory of our country, ... "that if I can contribute, by my poor abilities, to "the defence of so excellent a cause, I shall think I "have acted a good part in life; ... and in fine, "that it is a cause, in which, if your influence and interest were equal to your inclination to procure Martyrdom for me, I would rather suffer than in any "cause whatsoever, tho' (77) sorry that Christians "should be so weak and inconsistent with themselves, "as to be your instruments to take my life from me." He acknowledges (78), that it may be, and is undoubtedly, the case of many, who reject the Gospel, to be influenced therein by their Vices and Immoralities. It would be very strange, if Christianity, which teaches so much good morality, and so justly condemns divers vices, to which men are prone, was not rejected by some Libertines on that account; as the several pretended Revelations, which are established throughout the world, are by Libertines on that very account also. But this cannot be the case of all who reject the Gospel. Some of them, who reject the Gospel, lead as good lives as those who receive it. And I suppose there is no difference to the advantage of Christians in point of morality, between them and the Jews, Mahometans, Heathens, or others, who reject Christianity.

(72) Pag. 6.

(73) Dr. Rogers's Preface, pag. 46.

(74) Letter § 11. pag. 6.

(75) Sect. 1. pag. 17, 18.

(76) Sect. 14. pag. 112, 113.

(77) Chillingworth's Religion of Protestants, chap. 6. Sect. 56.

(78) Sect. 12. pag. 103, 104.

[S] With an Epitaph in Latin.] It is as follows.

H. S. E.
ANTONIUS COLLINS, Armiger:
Egregiis animi dotibus ornatus, books to confute himſelf, and directed them how to give their arguments all the force, of which they were capable. He carefully avoided all the indecencies of converſation, and was extremely averſe to the leaſt tendency towards obſcenity of diſcourſe. We are told (n) that "the corruption among Chriſtians and the perſecuting ſpirit of the Clergy "had given him a prejudice againſt the Chriſtian Religion, and at laſt induced him to "think, that upon the foot on which it is at preſent, it is pernicious to mankind. As he "had a great fund of humanity, ſweetneſs of temper, and moderation, he ſaw with "grief, that theſe virtues were baniſhed from ſociety, and that Religion was made uſe of, "as a cloke, to authorize all kinds of violence and injuſtice."
Præstanti

(n) See the Extract of a Letter from London in the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée des Ouvrages des Savans de l'Europe, tom. 4. Part 1. pag. 235. edit. Amſterdam 1730 in 12mo. See likewiſe Critique deſintereſſée des Journaux Litteraires, tom. 1. pag. 247. edit. a la Haye 1730 in 12mo.

Præſtanti Ingenio,
Acri Judicio,
Tenaci Memoria.
A Puero uſque mirificâ virtutis indole præditus:
Spectatiſſimum ſemper vitæ morumque exemplar.
Veritatis amicus & indagator ſedulus;
Quam neque ex ſententiis hominum pendere,
Neque Magiſtratus gladio vindicandam eſſe exiſtimavit:
In Libris (quorum opulenta ei copia) evolvendis
Aſſiduus & indefeſſus:
Quantum inde profecerit,
Ex ſcriptis ipſius editis judicet Lector idoneus.
Erga Reges optimos, utrumque Georgium,
Libertatis utpote Civilis & Eccleſiaſticæ
Tutores & Patronos,
Fide (ſi quis alius) conſtans.
Gratam ſui
Erga Conjuges Amoris,
Erga Liberos Charitatis,
Erga Servos Lenitatis,
Erga omnes Benevolentiæ,
Memoriam reliquit.

Calculorum valetudine diu conflictatus,
Demum fractus; obiit XIII Dec. M.DCCXXIX.
Amicorum nuper Deliciæ, nunc eheu! Deſiderium.

Natus eſt XXI Junii MDCLXXVI.
HENRICO Patre Armigero.
In matrimonio habuit
MARTHAM, FRANCISCI CHILD Equitis filiam:
Atque, eâ defunctâ,
ELIZABETHAM, GUALTERI WROTTESLY Baronetti:
Ex alterâ quatuor Liberos ſuſcepit;
Quorum
Duos Filios, HENRICUM infantem,
ANTONIUM vero ad virilem ætatem jam provectum,
Summâ virtute & humanitate adoleſcentem,
Extulerat:
Duas itidem Filias, ELIZABETH & MARTHAM,
Innuptas reliquit.
Altera chariſſimo Viro,
Quocum conjunctiſſimè vixerat,
Monumentum hoc mœrens poſuit. T.

☞COLLINS (JOHN), a perſon of conſiderable note among the learned in the ſeventeenth Century, and Author of ſeveral Works, was ſon of a Divine, and born March the 5th 1624 at Wood-Eaton near Oxford (a). His education was ſuch as diſpoſed his mind to the full purſuit of truth, and formed and directed his thoughts to diſtinguiſh rightly, and to reaſon juſtly. He employed ſome part of his younger years as Clerk under Mr. John Mar (b), one of the Clerks of the Kitchin to Prince Charles, afterwards King Charles II. But the civil wars and diſorders coming on, he went to ſea, to which he kept for ſeven years, where he made himſelf ſufficiently acquainted with all the parts of Navigation, as being then his buſineſs; and at his leiſure hours applied himſelf to accounts, and ſome parts of the Mathematics, to which he had a natural genius. Upon his return he took to the profeſſion of an Accomptant, and compoſed ſeveral uſeful Treatiſes upon practical ſubjects, which were publiſhed [A], and highly eſteemed. October the 12th 1667 he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society of London. While Anthony Earl

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 116. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) This Gentleman was eminent for his skill in the Mathematics, and famous for his excellent Dyals, with which the Gardens of King Charles I were adorned. Idem, ibid.

[A] Compoſed ſeveral Treatiſes upon practical Subjects, which were publiſhed.] In the year 1652 he publiſhed at London a Treatiſe in fol. intitled, An Introduction to Merchants Accompts; which was reprinted in the year 1665 with an additional part, intitled, Supplements to Accomptantſhip and Arithmetick; wherein is contained variety of uſeful inſtructions for the ſtating intricate accounts, as, A Queſtion of Mortgage ſtated according to ſimple intereſt, ſuch as the Courts of Equity do allow; and ſeveral other familiar inſtances in the way of Merchants and Traders. Here he gives in a ſhort but very plain manner the Rules of Decimal Arithmetic, Simple Intereſt, and Rebate; of Equation of Payment, Compound Intereſt, and Annuities; wherein he ſhews, that a Table made for the forbearance of 1 l. at compound intereſt at any rate with the time thereof is a Table of Logarithms, to be continued with eaſe; and that thereby all queſtions concerning Compound Intereſt and Annuities may be reſolved for all rates of Intereſt and for any terms of payment. This part relating to Intereſt was reprinted in 1685, in a ſmall octavo volume. In 1658 he publiſhed at London in 4to a Treatiſe called, The Sector on a Quadrant; containing the Deſcription and Uſe of four ſeveral Quadrants, each accommodated for the making of Sun-Dyals, for the reſolving of Proportions, and for the ready finding the Hour of the Day and Sun's Azimuth univerſally; with an Appendix concerning Reflected Dyalling, from a Glaſs placed at any Reclination. He has here treated fully of the Affections of Plain and Spherical Triangles, and given all the caſes of thoſe Triangles with their Solutions, and that by various ways. In 1659 he publiſhed in 4to his Geometrical Dyalling; wherein he gives ſeveral methods of finding the Requiſites, and drawing the Hour-lines upon all kinds of Plains, by the help only of a line of chords. He ſhews likewiſe the way of drawing a Meridian Line, and of making any Sun-Dyal by the means of three Shadows of a Gnomon. The ſame year appeared his Mariners Plain Scale new plained, wherein he gives the beſt manner of keeping of an account of the Ships-way, and of correcting the dead-reckoning, and rectifies many of the errors in the Charts commonly uſed. He reſolves the proportions relating to plain and ſpherical Triangles by means of the Line of Chords only; and all the caſes of Spherical Triangles, by projecting the Sphere either orthographically or ſtereographically, by the help of the ſame Line of Chords. In the Philoſophical Tranſactions of the Royal Society of London, Numb. 30, for Dec. 1667, he fully explains and demonſtrates the Rule given by the learned Jeſuit De Billy for finding the number of the Julian Period for any year aſſigned, the Cycles of the Sun and Moon with the Roman Indiction for the year being given. To this he has added ſome very neatly contrived Rules for the ready finding on what day of the week any day of the month falls for ever; and other the moſt uſeful and neceſſary Kalendar Rules. In the ſame Tranſactions, Numb. 46 for April 1669, he has a curious Diſſertation concerning the Reſolution of Equations in Numbers; wherein there are not a few hints towards ſome of the moſt conſiderable advancements, which

Earl of Shaftſbury was Lord Chancellor, he nominated Mr. Collins in divers References concerning ſuits depending in Chancery about intricate accounts, to aſſiſt in the ſtating thereof; "which was ſome emolument to him, and to the ſhortning of the charge of "the parties concerned; from which time eſpecially his aſſiſtance was often uſed in other "places and by other perſons; whereby he not only obtained ſome wealth, but a great "name, and became accounted in matters of that nature the moſt uſeful and neceſſary "perſon of his time (c)." In the latter part of his life he was appointed Accomptant to the Royal Fiſhery Company. In the year 1682, after the Act at Oxford was finiſhed, riding in a hot day from thence to Malmeſbury in Wiltſhire, in order to view the ground to be cut for a river between the Iſis and Avon, and drinking too large a quantity of Cyder, he fell into a conſumption, of which he died on Saturday November the 10th 1683 at his houſe on Garlick-Hill London, and was interred on the Tueſday following in the Church of St. James Garlick-hithe in the South-Iſle juſt behind the Pulpit (d). About five and twenty years after his death, all his papers, and moſt of his books came into the hands of the learned and ingenious William Jones Eſq; (e), Fellow of the Royal Society; among which were found manuſcripts upon Mathematical Subjects of Mr. Briggs, Mr. Oughtred, Dr. Pell, Dr. Scarborough, Dr. Barrow, and Mr. Iſaac Newton, with a multitude of Letters received from, and copies of Letters ſent to many learned perſons, particularly Dr. Pell, Dr. Wallis, Dr. Barrow, Mr. Iſaac Newton, Mr. James Gregory, Mr. Flamſteed, Mr. Townley, Mr. Baker, Mr. Branker, Dr. Bernard, Mr. Sluſius, Mr. Leibnitz, Mr. Tſchirnhaus, Father Bertet, and others. From theſe papers it is evident, that Mr. Collins was ſo ſollicitous in his ſearch after uſeful truths, ſo indefatigably induſtrious in proſecuting thoſe enquiries, and of ſo generouſly communicative a diſpoſition, that he held a conſtant correſpondence for many years with all the eminent Mathematicians of his time, and ſpared neither pains nor coſt to procure what was requiſite to promote real ſcience. In ſhort the world is obliged to him for the greateſt part of the late diſcoveries in all uſeful knowledge [B]. He was the chief, if not the only promoter of the publication of moſt of the valuable Mathematical Books in his time [C]. He was likewiſe the Regiſter of all the new improvements made in that Science; the magazine, to which all the curious had recourſe; and the common Repoſitory, where every (c) Idem, col. 317.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) To this Gentleman we are obliged for ſeveral particulars in this Article.

which have been made ſince in the refined parts of the Mathematics, particularly with reſpect to the Doctrine of Differences. Here Mr. Oldenburg, then Secretary of the Royal Society, takes notice, that "the Author "(Mr. Collins) having explained Mercator's Logarithmotechnia in Engliſh, and illuſtrated the elegant "doctrine thereof with examples, hath handled this "work of Interpolation, and makes the Logarithms to "25 and 30 places of figures by mere diviſion, having herein advanced that Author's doctrine thereof "by diviſion; which (as it is there illuſtrated) did not "ſeem to extend far enough. This hath already been "communicated ſome months ſince to ſome of the "Members of the Royal Society, and may be expect-"ed hereafter." In the Philoſophical Tranſactions, Numb. 69 for March 1671, Mr. Collins has given a moſt elegant conſtruction of that chronographical problem; The diſtances of three objects in the ſame plane, and the angles made at a fourth place in that plane, by obſerving each object, being given; to find the diſtances of thoſe objects from the place of obſervation. In 1680 he publiſhed at London a ſmall Treatiſe in 4to, intitled, A Plea for the bringing in of Iriſh cattel, and keeping out the fiſh caught by foreigners; together with an Addreſs to the Members of Parliament of the counties of Cornwal and Devon, about the Advancement of Tin, Fiſhery, and divers Manufactures. In 1682 he publiſhed at London in 4to his Diſcourſe of Salt and Fiſhery, upon theſe heads: I. The ſeveral ways of making Salts in England and foreign parts. II. The characters and qualities of good and bad of theſe ſeveral ſorts of Salts; Engliſh refined aſſerted to be much better than any foreign. III. The catching and curing or ſalting of the moſt eminent or ſtaple ſorts of Fiſh for long or ſhort keeping. IV. The ſalting of Fleſh. V. The cookery of Fiſh and Fleſh. VI. Extraordinary Experiments in preſerving Butter, Fleſh, Fiſh, Fowl, Fruits and Roots, freſh and ſweet for long keeping. VII. The Caſe and Sufferings of the Salt-workers. VIII. Propoſals for their Relief and for the Advancement of the Fiſhery, Woolen, Tin, and divers other manufactures. In the Philoſophical Tranſactions, Numb. 159 for May 1684, there is publiſhed a Letter from our Author to the learned Dr. John Wallis, giving his thoughts about ſome defects in Algebra; wherein he propoſes the genuine method of deſcribing the Loci of Equations, and of determining the Limits and Number of their Roots, with variety of other matters not leſs curious.

[B] The World is obliged to him for the greateſt part of the late diſcoveries in all uſeful knowledge.] In the year 1666 he had under conſideration the manner of dividing the Meridian Line on the true Nautical Chart, a problem of the utmoſt conſequence in Navigation; and ſome time after he engaged Mr. Nicholas Mercator, Mr. Gregory, Dr. Barrow, Mr. Iſaac Newton, and Dr. Wallis, ſeverally, to explain and find an eaſy practical method of doing it, which excited Mr. Leibnitz, Dr. Halley, Mr. Bernoulli, and all who had capacity to think upon ſuch a ſubject, to give their ſolutions of it. And by this means the practice of that moſt uſeful propoſition is reduced to the greateſt ſimplicity imaginable. The Tables of Logarithms are ſo very uſeful in moſt computations, that nothing that way can well be done without them; but the making of theſe Logarithms was look'd upon as inſuperably difficult and tedious, and the Tables already made not always to be depended upon. Our Author being ſufficiently aware of this, laboured much to find expedients for the ſhortening and facilitating the work; in which he engaged Mr. Mercator, Mr. Gregory, and Mr. Newton, ſeverally to try to render the operation eaſy and expeditious in the practice; which each of them performed, and ſome time after the whole of that affair was compleated by Dr. Halley's finiſhing hand. It was Mr. Collins, who engaged all that were able to make any advances in the ſciences, in a ſtrict enquiry into the ſeveral parts of learning, which each had a peculiar talent for. He made uſe of all the inſtruments, which he found proper for thoſe ends, and which would perhaps have been uſeleſs, or employed to ſome very trifling purpoſes, if his good judgment and ſkill had not diſcovered the ſeveral uſes of them. He ſet them all to work, by ſhewing where the defect was in any uſeful branch of knowledge, by pointing out the difficulties attending ſuch an enquiry; by ſetting forth the benefit of compleating that ſubject; and by keeping up a ſpirit, and a warm deſire of making further diſcoveries and improvements.

[C] The chief, if not only promoter, of the publication of moſt of the valuable mathematical Books in his time.] It is to him the World is indebted for the publication of Dr. Barrow's Optical and Geometrical Lectures, his Abridgment of Archimedes's Works, and of Apollonius's Conics; Mr. Branker's Tranſlation of Rhonius's Algebra, with Dr. Pell's Additions; Mr. Kerſey's Algebra; Dr. Wallis's Hiſtory of Algebra; Mr. Strode of Combinations; and many other excellent works, which were procured by his unwearied ſollicitations. T every part of useful knowledge was found. It was upon this account that the Learned stiled him the English Mersennus (f). If all his correspondents had been so generous in their communications, as not to have obliged him to keep some things too private, there would have been no manner of pretence to dispute the priority of the invention of a method of Analysis, the most admirable that was ever thought of, the honour of which appears evidently to belong to Sir Isaac Newton from Mr. Collins's papers printed in the Commercium Epistolicum D. Joannis Collins & aliorum de Analysi promota: jussu Societatis Regiæ in lucem editum. London 1712 in 4to.

(f) See Mr. Des Maizeaux's Preface, pag. xl. to Recueil de diverses Pieces, sur la Philosophie, la Religion Naturelle, l'Histoire, les Mathematiques &c. Par Messieurs Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, & autres Autheurs célebres. In 2 vol. Amsterdam 1720, in 12mo.

COLOGNE (PETER of) in Dutch Van Ceulen [A], Pastor of Mets in the sixteenth Century, had a great share in Calvin's friendship, and that of Theodore Beza. He was a native of Ghent. I shall observe elsewhere (a) that Robert Stephens, with whom he was familiarly acquainted at Paris, was the occasion of his going to Geneva, where Calvin having compleated his instruction, persuaded him to devote himself to the Ministry. He first performed the functions of it in Mets, anno 1558, whither Clervant had brought him from Geneva for this purpose (b). That Church was dispersed under Francis II. Clervant, who was a Gentleman of great merit, and very zealous for the cause, withdrew to Strasburg with his family. Peter de Cologne retired to Heidelberg (c), where he was recalled to Mets by the Protestants, in the beginning of Charles IXth's reign (d). He preached privately from house to house, till the 4th of May 1561, when he was seized as he was preaching. He was obliged to leave the City a little after, but he returned to it in a few days; for May the 25th of that same year, the Protestants began to preach publickly, by permission from the Court. Senneterre, indeed, who commanded in the City being resolved not to let this Minister return to it, he was forced to be conducted back by a strong guard to the village of Grixi, after his Sermon was over. It lasted no longer than till the return of Vieilleville Governor of Mets (e); for he brought Cologne thither again. The King having received in Mets, anno 1569, news of the battle of Jarnac, in which the Prince of Conde was killed, suffered the Protestant Church to be pulled down, and it was with the utmost difficulties and dangers that the Ministers had an opportunity of getting out of the City (f). Peter de Cologne withdrew to the Palatinate, and was Pastor in Heidelberg. He died in the flower of his age. He had wrote some books [B] during his stay in Mets. DANIEL COLONIUS, his son, was Principal of the Walloon College in Leyden (g). He published verses on the Institutions of Calvin, anno 1628. Heinsius dedicated the Aristarchus sacer to him.

(a) In the remark [A] of the Article DIEU (Lewis de).

(b) Beze, Hist. Eccles. lib. 16. pag. 444.

(c) Ibid. pag. 446.

(d) Ibid. pag. 449.

(e) Ibid. pag. 432.

(f) Ibid. pag. 464.

(g) Orat. funebris Ludov. de Dieu.

[A] In Dutch van Ceulen.] He was the first person of his family who latinized this name by that of Colonius (1). His Schoolmaster made him alter it in this manner, but in France he was called de Cologne.

(1) Vide Orationem funebrem Ludovici de Dieu.

[B] He had writ some Books.] La Croix du Maine durst not venture to give the titles of them. He writ, says he, several treatises printed at Lyons in 1564 for John d'Ogerolles, the titles of which I will not specify for certain reasons. Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who was not as la Croix du Maine a Protestant had more resolution; for not being suspected, he did not think himself obliged to be so cautious. He therefore says, that Peter de Cologne, translated out of the German into French, Conformité & accord tant de l'Escripture Saincte, que des anciens & purs Docteurs de l'Eglise, & de la confession d'Ausbourg bien entendue touchant la doctrine de la S. Cene de nostre Seigneur, par les Theologiens de l'Université de Heidelberg; i. e. "The conformity and "harmony between the Holy Scripture, as well as the "ancient and uncorrupt Fathers of the Church; and "of the confession of Ausburg righly understood, con- "cerning the last Supper of our Lord, by the Divines "of the University of Heidelberg," printed at Geneva 1566, 8vo. He also translated from the German of Thomas Erastus; Vraie & droicte intelligence de ces paroles de la saincte Cene de Jesus-Christ, cecy est mon corps. i. e. "The true and natural meaning of the "following words of Christ's last supper, this is my "body," printed at Lyons 1564, 8vo (2). As these books are not now to be found, I do not believe that tho' I had access to very great Libraries, it would be possible for me to tell which of these two are hinted at by Mr. Ancillon in the life of Farel. Peter de Cologne, says he, translated a treatise on the Lord's Supper, and dedicated it to Monsieur de Clervant. None of these three Authors speak of the answer, made by Peter de Cologne to Francis de Beaucaire de Peguillon, Bishop of Mets, printed at Geneva anno 1566 (3).

(2) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 1001.

(3) See the Remark [A] of the Article DIEU (Lewis de).

COLOMIES (PAUL) in Latin Colomesius, cultivated the Study of Polite Learning with great application, and has communicated to the public several curious enquiries [A]. He † His Italia & Hispania Orientalis were published by J. Christ. Wolfius, at Hamburgh, in the year 1730.

(2) 1. A Collection of Observations, in Latin.
2. A Collection of curious Particulars, in French.
3. Clavis Epistolarum Scaligeri, Casauboni, Salmasii, & aliorum.
4. A Key to the French Letters written to Scaliger.
5. Notæ ad Quinctilianum.

(3) Or rather at Roan, tho' London be put in the Title-page.

[A] He has communicated to the Public several curious enquiries.] It would be to flatter Mr. Colomiés, to say he made discoveries by the penetration of his genius. Certainly this was not his talent; but he knew how to make good use of what he read, and to pick up many singular things of which most readers take no notice, tho' they are extremely well pleased to find them when any one has made little collections of them. He made such collections his principal study: and in this respect he was a very ferret. The first Book which he presented the public with is intitled Gallia Orientalis: he therein treats of the French who have understood the Hebrew tongue (1). This work is much quoted, and sold well: it is not easy to be met with; and was printed at the Hague, in the year 1665, in 4to. The Author had prepared a second Edition, enlarged and corrected; and had compiled a like Work concerning the Italians and Spaniards who were acquainted with Hebrew; he had even delivered his Manuscript to a Bookseller of Rochelle who was settled at Amsterdam, and had promised to print it: but three things have hitherto hindred the impression of those Manuscripts. 1. The death of the Bookseller. 2. The death of the Author. 3. The depraved taste of the Public, who buy scarce any other Books than Libels, or Romances. I hope, notwithstanding, that something of these Works of Colomiés will be printed †. The second Book he published is intitled KEIMHAIA LITERARIA, and contains several small pieces (2). It was printed at Paris in the year 1668, and at Utrecht in 1669, in 12mo. His other works are, Epigrams and Madrigals, in French, at Rochelle, in 12mo. Remarks on the second Scaligerana, at Groningen, 1669, in 12mo. The Life of Father James Sirmond, at Rochelle, 1671, in 12mo. Tertullian's Exhortation to the Martyrs, translated into Freneh, at Rochelle, 1673, in 12mo. Rome Protestante, at London (3), 1675, in 12mo. Mélanges Historiques, at Orange, 1675, in 24mo.

(1) He has been reproached for having omitted some of them, and Casaubon in particular. See Ancillon, Mêlange de Litterat. tom 2. pag. 95.

(a) Named John Colomiés: he had a fine Library.

He was of Rochelle, and the ſon of a good Phyſician (a). Among the learned men whom he frequented, there was none with whom he had a greater intimacy than Iſaac Voſſius; and I believe that if he retired betimes to England, and before the Proteſtants of France felt the moſt furious ſhocks of the ſtorm which ſwallowed up the Edict of Nantes, it was becauſe Iſaac Voſſius was become a Canon of Windſor. The praiſes he has beſtowed on that learned man expoſed him to an inſult which he bore with the utmoſt good temper [B]. He was not long in England before he ſhewed his diſlike of the Preſbyterian party, and his inclination to the Epiſcopal Communion. The ſmall Collection of certain ſelect paſſages, which he intitled Theologorum Preſbyterianorum Icon, procured him a great many enemies. He was doubtleſs to blame for publiſhing that little Book; and there was even a great deal of imprudence in writing againſt people, a part of whoſe character he made ſo impatient, ſo ſuſpicious, and ſo obſtinate a humour. Should not this have obliged him not to ſay any thing which might expoſe him to their anger? The beſt way to refute him was to ſay nothing; for ſo extraordinary a patience would have convinced the whole world that they were not at all like the picture which he had drawn of them. And indeed it muſt be acknowledged, to the glory of thoſe Gentlemen, that they deſpiſed the inſult; but as it is hard, among ſuch a body of men, that not one ſhould get looſe, there happened to be a Preſbyterian Miniſter in Holland who wrote ſo violent an Invective againſt poor Mr. Colomiés (b), that if we were to judge of a whole party by the imperfections of a particular perſon, no more would be wanting to make us conclude that the Icon Theologorum Preſbyterianorum was drawn from the life. The Author of the Icon ſwallowed the affront without ſaying a word: not but that he might very eaſily have repelled the outrages of his Adverſary [C]; but probably he was afraid of making his condition

(b) See l'Eſprit de Monſ. Arnaud, tom. 2. pag. 297, &c.

24mo. Obſervationes ſacræ, with a Letter which the Author wrote to Monſr. Claude concerning the French Verſion of the Geneva Bibles; at Amſterdam, 1679, in 12mo (4). Theologorum Preſbyterianorum Icon, ex Proteſtantium ſcriptis ad vivum expreſſa, and A Parallel between the practice of the ancient Church and that of the Proteſtants of France in the exerciſe of their Religion, 1682, in 12mo. Bibliotheque Choiſie, at Rochelle, 1682, in 8vo. It was reprinted at Amſterdam 1669 with additions. Ad Gulielmi Cave Canonici Windeſorienſis Chartophylacem Eccleſiaſticum Paralipomena, Londini, 1686, in 8vo. A Letter to Mr. Juſtel, concerning Father Simon's Critical Hiſtory. This Letter was printed at London, in the year 1686, in 4to, with a Book of Iſaac Voſſius's (5). As Mr. Colomiés took extraordinary pains to collect the Letters of illuſtrious men, he publiſhed ſeveral of them at London, in the year 1687, in 8vo, which he joined to the two Epiſtles of St. Clement, &c. The title of the volume at length is S. Clementis Epiſtolæ duæ ad Corinthios, Interpretibus Patricio Junio, Gottifredo Vendelino, & Joh. Bapt. Cotelerio. Recenſuit & Notarum Spicilegium adjecit Paulus Colomeſius Bibliothecæ Lambethanæ Curator. Accedit Thomæ Brunonis Canonici Windeſorienſis Diſſertatio de Therapeutis Philonis. His ſubnexæ ſunt Epiſtolæ aliquot ſingulares vel nunc primum editæ, vel non ita facile obviæ. The ſame year he publiſhed ſome Letters of the Queen of Sweden (6), and in 1690 a Collection of Voſſius's Letters, in folio. He conſtantly regulated himſelf by this maxim of Callimachus, That a great volume is always a great evil: all the Books he has compoſed are of a very ſmall ſize, whereupon Mr. Baillet has made the following reflection (7): The Author of l'Eſprit de M. A. ſays he, thought he could not put a greater affront on Monſr. Colomiés his brother Proteſtant, than by pretending to deſpiſe him, and rallying him very coldly about his little books of a few ſheets. He calls him the great Author of little Books, adding that a volume of a ſingle ſheet was enough to make him rank himſelf among Authors of the firſt and ſecond ſize.

(4) See in the 13th volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, pag. 337, an Extract of this Book under the Title of Pauli Colomeſii Obſervationes ſacræ, Editio ſecunda auctior & emendatior. Accedunt ejuſdem Paralipomena de Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis, & Paſſio S. Victoris Maſſilienſis ab eodem emendata, Editio IV & ultima, prioribus longe auctior & emendatior. Londini, 1689, in 12mo, pag. 34.

(5) It is the Appendix Obſervationum ad Pomponium Melam. Accedit ad tertias P. Simonii Objectiones Reſponſio.

(6) The Bibliotheque Univerſelle informs me of this, tom. 13. pag. 356.

(7) Jugem. des Savans, tom. 1. pag. 448.

[B] The praiſes he has beſtowed on Voſſius expoſed him to an inſult which he bore with the utmoſt good temper.] "I ſhall not however be determined by "the judgment of Mr. Colomiés, who may be ſaid "to be an Author of juſt price, and retained by Mr. "Voſſius to write little books, in which he ſpeaks "ſcarce of any thing elſe but the great Voſſius (8)." Mr. Colomiés, after he had read this, was not the leſs diſpoſed to commend Father Simon in a Letter which he wrote to Mr. Juſtel. Let us hear what a Journaliſt ſays on this occaſion (9). The Letter of Mr. Colomiés . . . . contains very curious Remarks on ſome paſſages of Father Simon's Critical Hiſtory, and has nothing in it but what beſpeaks a man of great moderation; tho' Mr. Colomiés was not ignorant that Father Simon is the Author of the Preface and Notes which have appeared in the new Edition of his Critical Hiſtory.

(8) Preface to the new Edition of the Critical Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament.

(9) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for the month of May 1686, pag. 595 of the 2d edition.

[C] A Preſbyterian Miniſter wrote a violent invective againſt him. . . . He might very eaſily have repelled the outrages of his adverſary.] I have already blamed Mr. Colomiés for having publiſhed this Icon. He would have done better to have let the paſſages he has collected remain ſcattered up and down; and beſides he choſe a very ill time to do it in. The weak places of the land ought not to have been expoſed on ſuch an occaſion: ſo that if the Author of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud had contented himſelf with reproaching him on that head, and refuting him as to the main point, without going into perſonal reflections, he would have deſerved commendation; but having given a looſe to his paſſion, like one in a violent fit of madneſs, he has made himſelf inexcuſable, and hurt his cauſe. His diſputation diverts the readers with a kind of theatrical entertainment; but whereas, when we go to the play, we firſt hear the high-raiſed paſſions of the tragic part, and afterwards the drollery of the comic; here, on the contrary, we find the airs of a buffoon, before we meet with tranſports of anger, and ſerious invective. The paſſages wherein the Author has endeavoured to rally are ſo ridiculous, that he might have been irretrievably mortified on that head, had Mr. Colomiés attacked him with the leaſt vigour. I do not deſire my word ſhould be taken, and therefore produce the proofs to juſtify what I ſay.

I. Mr. Colomiés prefixed his name to his Work, PER PAULUM COLOMESIUM Rupellenſem. Upon this the Author of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud makes a jeſt as cold as ice. It is eaſily ſeen by the grandeur of the name of this great man, that heaven deſtined him to be an Author. For among all the Ancients and Moderns no name can be found ſo fit to make a figure at the head of a work, or in the title-page of a book (10). . . . It muſt be allowed that this fills the mouth and the eyes; and tho' a man had nothing elſe to ſhew the public, he would deſerve however to appear in print (11). This ſeems to come from a man who, for fear he ſhould be too brief, cannot prevail on himſelf to diſmiſs any thought which offers. Perhaps it would be better to ſay that this ſhews a great want of diſcernment, and a quite dull taſte with regard to raillery. However it be, a man cannot ſhew his ill taſte better, than by pretending to find one grain of wit in this paſſage; and were I to anſwer ſo ſorry a piece of banter, I ſhould take no other method than very gravely to open the firſt Books which came to hand in a Library; and I ſhould have very ill luck if I did not ſoon find names full as proper to fill the mouth and the eyes, as that of Paulus Colomeſius Rupellenſis. I ſhould find ſuch yet more eaſily among thoſe perſons who have no learning at all; after which, preſerving a very ſerious air, I would thus addreſs my Adverſary: You ſay that among all the ancients and moderns condition worſe by a Reply [D]. He acted as the other perſons did who had been abuſed in the ſame Book; he held his peace and imitated their patience, which was moſt certainly a miſtaken and an ill-timed virtue [E]. I have heard ſay, I. That when the French Church, of which Mr. Allix was Miniſter, was firſt eſtabliſhed at London, Mr. Colomiés moderns no name can be found ſo fit to make a fine figure at the head of a Work . . . ; and tho' a man had nothing elſe to ſhew the public he would deſerve however to appear in print. You would not talk in this manner, if you were acquainted with many Authors, and it very plainly appears that neither the ancients nor the moderns have been much the objects of your ſight or meditation. Go and lament the fate of an infinite number of peaſants, who ſet not their names at the head of any Work, tho' they deſerve to appear in print; tho' they deſerve it, I ſay, becauſe they are compoſed of ſeveral letters. This is your principle. Thoſe who rally well never found their raillery on a fact which is evidently falſe; they never turn an Author to ridicule on account of things which are common to him with illuſtrious men, and have nothing peculiar with regard to him. Now, pray, do David Blondellus Catalaunenſis, Dionyſius Petavius Aurelianenſis, Dionyſius Lambinus Monſtrolienſis, and a hundred other names I could produce, give leſs handle for banter than Paulus Colomeſius Rupellenſis?

(10) The Author inſerts here in three lines, and in large characters, per Paulum Colomeſium Rupellenſem. This laſt word is in ſmall Characters in the Title page of the Icon.

(11) Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, tom. 2. pag. 298, 299.

II. The railleries which the Author founds on Mr. Colomiés having taken the ſurname of Rupellenſis are not a whit better. To make a jeſt a good one, he who is jeſted on muſt deſerve it: but this is what cannot be ſaid of a man who only follows the cuſtom. When we rally a man on account of his dreſs, we make our ſelves very ridiculous, unleſs there be ſomething in that dreſs which tranſgreſſes the common rules and the faſhion. Therefore to make the banter thrown at the word Rupellenſis good, it muſt not have been the ordinary practice of Authors, who write in Latin, to add the name of the town they were born in to that of their family; but it is certain that this is their practice, and conſequently Mr. Colomiés has only followed an eſtabliſhed cuſtom (12). Let us conclude that the whole raillery falls back on its Author, and renders him ſuſpected of being a ſtranger in the Republic of Letters.

III. We are now coming to the dulleſt of all his jeſts. After having ſet down the names and ſurnames of his adverſary in capitals, he compares them with others. AURELIUS AUGUSTINUS HIPPONENSIS, ſays he (13), & SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS CLAROMONTANUS (14), come not near them. I hope poſterity, who will not know Mr. Colomiés ſo well as we do, will be perſuaded that RUPELLENSIS ſignifies the Biſhop of Rochelle, as the HIPPONENSIS of St. Auguſtin ſignifies the Biſhop of Hippo. A piece of raillery muſt needs be a very wretched one, when it is ſupported by an abſurd foundation, and when it is more injurious to thoſe who are not intended to be rallied, than to thoſe who are. Such is the character of this. Nothing is more repugnant to probability, than to ſay that the epithet RUPELLENSIS may one day ſignify the Biſhop of Rochelle, and it is doing a very great wrong to our poſterity to believe them capable of ſo groſs a blunder. Readers in future ages muſt be a hundred times more barbarous than they were three or four Centuries ago, if they could imagine what the Author of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud hopes they will imagine. It will be told me, that he does not hope it, but makes uſe of an irony. I know it well enough; but ſtill he ought to have made his pretended and ironical hopes refer to a probable event. Otherwiſe it would be a witty piece of raillery on a Cit who ſets up for a Gentleman, to tell him, You have had your picture drawn with a ſword by your ſide; I hope our deſcendants will take you for a Duke and Peer. But it may be farther anſwered me in behalf of our ſorry jeſter, that ſince the Hipponenſis of St. Auguſtin ſignifies the Biſhop of Hippo, the Rupellenſis may very well ſignify the Biſhop of Rochelle. The conſequence I agree may be granted: but the principle from which it is drawn is falſe and abſurd; for the term Epiſcopi is perpetually joined with that of Hipponenſis in the title-page of S. Auguſtin, and that Father is taken for the Biſhop of Hippo not by virtue of the word Hipponenſis, but ſolely by virtue of the other word (15). The multiplication of Biſhops would be terribly to be feared in future ages, if our cenſurer's raillery may paſs for good; for, as I have ſaid before, it is a very common practice with Authors who write in Latin to add the name of their country in the titles of their Books. The Reformers have not neglected this cuſtom (16). A Profeſſor of Leyden very well known to our banterer, has conformed thereto (17), and the title of his Works is proper enough to fill the mouth and the eyes.

Was I not in the right to ſay that Mr. Colomiés might eaſily have confounded his adverſary as to matter of raillery? Might he not have ridiculed him as a man who affected to to be ſurprized and amazed at very common things (18), which is ſcarce to be pardoned in half ſcholars?

It would have been full as eaſy for him to confound his Antagoniſt as to another point more conſiderable than raillery is. He was accuſed of being the penſioner of Iſaac Voſſius, and his paraſite. This note was due to the great Iſaac to pay him for the board and lodging which he provides for Mr. Paulus Colomeſius Rupellenſis; for it is with him that our Author lives. We need not wonder that Mr. Colomiés is a little attached to the party of the Canons, who live quietly and at eaſe on the fat of God's houſe, ſince he gathers up the crums which fall from their table, and is an inhabitant of the land which flows with milk and honey . . (19). It is a baſe piece of complaiſance to ſacrifice his brethren to the paſſion of thoſe who afford him a meal's meat . . . . . (20). What religion this man is of I know not, only thus much I ſee for certain, that he is of the Paraſites religion, always for him who gives moſt (21). This Satire, ſo diſobliging to the Epiſcopal Clergy on the one hand, and ſo mortifying to Colomiés on the other, might eaſily have been refuted. Mr. Juſtel, about that time, wrote a Letter which I have read, wherein he ſaid it was very wrong to call Mr. Colomiés a Paraſite, whoſe behaviour and manner of ſubſiſting in England fully confuted this whole Accuſation of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud.

[D] . . . . But probably he was afraid of making his condition worſe by a Reply.] I never heard there were any ill reports abroad againſt the honour of Paul Colomiés, or againſt that of his parents; but after all, where are the people, whoſe youth and family are free from all blemiſh, little or great, or who may not fear the injurious Memoirs of an enemy? I imagine Colomiés conſidered that if he irritated the Author of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud any farther, he might oblige him to write for Memoirs to Rochelle, from whence he might be furniſhed with ſome for the ſake of defaming a man who had endeavoured to render the Preſbyterian Religion odious to all Europe. He held his peace therefore, that he might not expoſe himſelf afreſh to the teeth of ſo dangerous an enemy. See what has been ſaid above (22).

[E] He held his peace . . . which was a miſtaken and an ill-timed virtue.] Clemency, that ſo amiable, ſo uſeful, ſo neceſſary, and ſo divine a virtue, becomes pernicious on certain occaſions. There are evils which require the rigour of an exemplary chaſtiſement: to uſe gentleneſs then becomes unſeaſonable, and opens the door to new miſchiefs. If this be true in political States, it is ſo likewiſe in the Republic of Letters. Authors who dare to publiſh ſuch Books as l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud deſerve no mercy: they cannot be left unpuniſhed without expoſing peoples reputation to plunder. It is againſt ſuch Authors that Boccalini ought to have feigned that Apollo, holding his grand Seſſions, and ſitting on his bed of Juſtice, ſummons the Ban and Arriere-ban, or whole forces, of Parnaſſus. He ſhould at leaſt have feigned that Apollo ſends out againſt them the Prætorian Guards, or rather the Band of German Poets, with orders to apprehend and commit them to priſon (23). This is neceſſary for the ſecurity of the highways in the Republic of Letters. And yet among ſo many people who have been abuſed in l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, there has not been one who has

(12) I produce no proofs of this, becauſe the thing is too evident.

(13) L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, tom. 2. pag. 299.

(14) It is unfair dealing to give the names of this Biſhop of Auvergne in this manner. It is curtailing of them, that they may not ſurpaſs thoſe of Colomiés. They ought to have been written thus: CAIUS SOLLIUS APOLLINARIS SIDONIUS ARVERNORUM EPISCOPUS. Very few Authors ſay CLAROMONTANUS EPISCOPUS.

(15) The Author of la Cabale Chimerique repreſented this to the Author of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, in the year 1691, in pag. 186, and 187. of the Preface to la Chimére démontrée.

(16) Theodori Bezæ Vezelii Volumen primum Tractationum Theologicarum. This is the Title prefixed to the Works of Theodore Beza.

(17) ANDREÆ RIVETI PICTAVI SAMMAXENTINI SS. THEOLOGIÆ DOCTORIS, & SACRARUM LITERARUM . . . PROFESSORIS Opera.

(18) The ſame Author has been often reproached with this fault in the Writings concerning the Chimerical Cabal of Rotterdam.

(19) Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, tom. 2. pag. 302.

(20) Ibid. pag. 303.

(21) Ibid. pag. 304.

(22) Remark [G] of the Article ARNAULD, Doctor of the Sorbonne.

(23) See Mr. Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, tom. 4. pag. 9, citing the 28th Advice of the 1ſt Century of Boccalini.

Colomiés was made Reader there (c). This was a Church which conformed to the Epiſcopal Ritual. II. That having loſt the place he enjoyed in the family of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (d), when that Archbiſhop, who obſtinately refuſed to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary, was deprived of his temporalities in the year 1691, he grew melancholy and fell into a diſtemper of which he died ſoon after: unworthily deſerving to increaſe the Appendix of Pierius Valerianus de Infelicitate Literatorum. A Liſt of his Works may be ſeen in the firſt Remark. If any think I have ſpoken too well of him, I refer them to Writers more difficult than my ſelf, who have given him much greater commendations [F].

(c) He is called a Prieſt of the Church of England in the 13th Volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, pag. 338.

(d) It was that of Librarian: Bibliothecæ Lambethanæ Curator.

Finding himſelf ill at Lambeth, he came to London, where he died the 13th of January 1692 [G]. It was diſcovered, before he was interred, that he had contracted a marriage of conſcience with a girl of mean condition. He left her a Legacy of thirty pounds ſterling, which recovered her from the affliction ſhe had expreſſed with extraordinary lamentations the day of his funeral. A great many people ſuſpected he died a Socinian.

(e) See the Mercure Galant of July 1702, pag. 17.

He has been called a great man by a Writer who obſerves that it has been ſaid, with as much truth as wit, that he was the great Author of little Books (e). This is doing him honour by an expreſſion which was intended only to ridicule him (f).

(f) See above, Citation (7).

has opened his mouth; for a Letter which appears ten years after, or a few words inſerted in another Work, ought to go for nothing. That was the time to have cried out: thoſe who had received wounds ſhould have done it; and thoſe who had received none, ſhould have ſerved them as ſeconds in favour of the general intereſt; even the aſſiſtance of the Laws ought to have been implored: ſuch was the practice of Antiquity (24). Impunity has ſerved only to increaſe this Writer's boldneſs; and without doubt, if the Spons, the Allix's, and the Merlats, to ſay nothing of ſo many others who have imitated their patience, had vigorouſly repelled the inſults of this man, he would never have puſhed his Satires ſo far as to attempt the life of his Collegues, by accuſing them of having entred into a Cabal, of which he makes whomever he pleaſes a member. If thoſe who have had ſo much patience dreaded him as an Author, they have been greatly deceived; for nothing has been more eaſy than to reduce him to ſilence. The very firſt time they wrote againſt him on the ſubject of the Cabal, they humbled him to that degree that he ſaw himſelf conſtrained to petition the Magiſtrates that he might be permitted to write, and his Adverſary be forbidden to reply (25). But of this I ſhall ſpeak more amply in ſome other Article (26).

(24) Doluere cruento Dente laceſſiti, fuit intactis quoque cura Conditione ſuper communi: quin etiam lex Pœnaque lata malo quæ nollet carmine quenquam Deſcribi. Horat. Epiſt. 1. lib. 2. ver. 154.

(25) See the Preface to the Chimere démontrée, pag. 65.

(26) In the Remark [E] on the Article TAVERNIER.

[F] Writers more difficult than my ſelf . . . have given him much greater commendations.] It would be wrong in me to compare my ſelf to Mr. Baillet: I willingly, and with very good reaſon, yield the right of Cenſure to him. If he judges more freely than I, and if I ſhew more indulgence than he, it is becauſe I do not know ſo certainly as he does what is good, or what is beſt, the great defects, or the ſmall faults. He ſhall be my Witneſs in this Remark; he, I ſay, who has highly praiſed Colomiés, as will be ſeen by what follows. It is doing juſtice to this Author to allow him to be one of the moſt intelligent perſons at this day in the knowledge of Books. It even appears that his principal talent lies in diſcerning of good Books from bad ones, and whatever is rare and curious in polite Literature; and as moſt of his Books are only critical Pieces, I am obliged in gratitude to acknowledge that ſeveral of his Works have been of very great ſervice to me (27). Speaking, in another place (28) of his Gallia Orientalis, he ſays, Theſe are excellent materials collected with abundance of care, which may be of very great uſe to thoſe who ſhall undertake to compile an Univerſal Library of the Writers of France (28).

(27) Jugem. des Savans, tom. 2, num. 66. pag. 32.

(28) Ibid. num. 137. pag. 170.

(29) Add hereto the Elogies which are given him in the Journal des Savans.

[G] He died at London, the 13th of January 1692.] That is, New Style: for the Regiſter of St. Martin's Church, in the Churchyard of which he was buried, makes the funeral to have been on the 5th of January 1691. It is well known that in England the year begins, with reſpect to the dates of all public Records, on the 25th of March. So that the 5th of Jan. 1691, according to the Regiſter of St. Martin's Pariſh, is the 15th of Jan. 1692, according to the ſtyle of Holland. But as the dead are uſually buried at London two days after their deceaſe, I have conſequently made uſe of the date ſpecified above. I ſhould not have known this ſo preciſely, if Mr. de la Roque, a French Miniſter at London (30), had not taken the trouble to inform me of it.

(30) His capacity appears from the Sermon on the Peace, which he preached at London the 23d of September 1697, and was printed in the ſame City ſoon after.

COLONNA (POMPEY) Cardinal, Archbiſhop of Montreal in Sicily, and Biſhop of a very great number of places [A], made a conſpicuous figure in the world, with a great mixture of good and evil. He was equally qualified to wear the Cardinal's Hat and the Helmet; and he experienced more than once the reverſes of ill, and the return of good fortune. Julius II removed him from all his dignities; but Leo X reſtored him to them, created him Cardinal, and ſent him on ſeveral embaſſies. Clement VII diveſted him of the Purple, and afterwards reſtored him to it. It is pretended that he was obliged to him for his exaltation to the Papal Throne, and that he would not acknowledge this favour, by granting him all he aſked. The anſwer which it is ſuppoſed that Pope made him, deſerves to be cited [B]. Pompey Colonna died Viceroy of Naples anno 1532, and was buried without pomp, or even ſo much as an epitaph, in the Convent of the Monks of Mount Olivet. He wrote ſome Poems, in which he deſcribes the charms and beauty of Iſabella Filamarini, conſort to the Prince of Salerno. He declared himſelf to be her humble ſervant, but proteſted that he never had formed any looſe wiſhes with regard to that virtuous Princeſs. Poſſibly this is one of thoſe poetical proteſtations, to which no more regard ought to be had than to the falſe oaths of lovers. He compoſed another

[A] Biſhop of a very great number of places.] Here follow his titles from Oldoini and from Mandoſi: Archiepiſcopus Montis Regalis in Sicilia, & Roſſanenſis, Epiſcopus Reatinus, Sarſinenſis, Interamnenſis, Acerrenſis, Aquilanus, Polentinus, Averſanus, Montis Marrani, & Catanenſis. i. e. "Archbiſhop of Mount Royal "in Sicily and of Roſſa; Biſhop of Piete, Sarſina, Te"ronium, Accerra, Aquila, Polentia (Palanza) Aver"Mount Marno and Catana."

[B] The anſwer . . . that Pope made him, deſerves to be cited.] "Cardinal Pompey Colonna, (ſays my "Author) having raiſed Clement VII to the Holy See, "in oppoſition to Cardinal Franciotto Orſini, obtained "ſeveral favours from that Pope; but imagining that "he would be indulged in all he aſked for, he one "day requeſted ſomething which his Holineſs thought "unjuſt, and therefore could not in honour grant. "So that Colonna provoked at the denial reproached another work of a more ſerious kind, and more honourable to the fair-ſex, de Laudibus Mulierum [C]; and he devoted it chiefly to the glory of Victoria Colonna his relation. This article might have been made longer, but I was not willing to repeat what any one may find in Moreri.

" the Pope, ſaying, that it was by his intereſt he had " attained the Papal throne. His Holineſs owned " this to be true; but at the ſame time he deſired Co- " louna to let him be Pope, and not endeavour to be " ſo himſelf; ſince by acting as he did, he endeavoured " to diſpoſſeſs him of that to which he had been " raiſed by his means (1).

[C] He compoſed another work . . . more honourable to the fair ſex de Laudibus Mulierum.] The manuſcript is in the French King's Library, if Father Oldoini may be credited (2). See Profper Mandoſius's Bibliotheca Romana.

(1) Meynier, Reponſes libres aux Demandes curieuſes, pag. 279, 280.

(2) In Athenæo Romano.

COLONNA (VICTORIA) a learned and illuſtrious Lady. See VICTORIA COLONNA.

COLUMNA or COLONNA (JOHN) a native of Rome and a Dominican, was raiſed to the Archiepiſcopal See of Meſſina (a), and appointed Legate and Governor of Taurominium by Alexander IV, anno 1255 (b). It is therefore an error to place him after 1325 (c), or under the year 1313 (d). He wrote a Chronicle which he entitled Mare Hiſtoriarum, i. e. The Sea of Hiſtories [A], and which extended from Adam to 1250 (e). Antonini, Archbiſhop of Florence, has quoted it ſometimes. Poſſevinus ſpeaks of one JAMES COLUMNA, a Dominican and an Hiſtorian; and pretends that the Archbiſhop of Florence in queſtion, has copied him in ſeveral places, which Voſſius does not believe [B]. We

(a) Leand. Albert. lib. 3. de Viris illuſt. Ord. Prædic. apud Voſſium, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 480.

(b) Thomas Fazellus, lib. 8. Decadis Poſter. Rerum Sicular. apud eund. ibid.

(c) As John Rioche does, apud Voſſium, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 480.

(d) As Philip. Bergamenſ. does, lib. 13. Supplem. Chronic. apud eund. ibid.

(e) Spondan. ad ann. 1255, num. 10.

[A] He wrote a Chronicle which is entitled, Mare Hiſtoriarum.] There is an error in the following words of Gaultier the Jeſuit. Johannes de Columna; author Matris Hiſtoriarum (1). He expreſſes himſelf thus in his table of the XIVth Century, which ſhews that he did not very well know the age when our Columna lived. His French Tranſlator did not ſuſpect that Matris was printed inſtead of Maris, and therefore he rendered it thus; Author of the Mother of Hiſtories. Father Gualtier has copied both theſe miſtakes from Genebrard. Joannes de Columna auctor Libri, cujus titulus eſt Mater Hiſtoriarum (2), i. e. " John of " Columna Author of a Book entitled the Mother of " Hiſtories." This Work was tranſlated into French, in the Reign of Charles VIII. The Tranſlator tells us, that he has added to it whatever relates to the Kings of France; and that he formed this deſign, becauſe he had carried on his verſion to the foundation of the French Monarchy, when Charles VIII aſcended the Throne. He ſtiles himſelf a Frenchman, a native of Beauvoiſin. He adds, that he was confirmed in his reſolution, by the virtuous exhortations and eminent reaſons of the noble Andrew de la Haye, Lord of Chaumont, Receiver of the Court of Aids, and payments for the Forces, and of the towns and election of Sans. I here tranſcribe from the Lyons Edition, printed for John du Pré, anno 1496 in 2 Volumes, folio, which extends to the death of Lewis XI in 1483. I have ſeen a copy of it that had belonged to a Canon of Antwerp (3). Some perſon had writ the following words in it; Borchardus auctor hujus operis, ut patet ex 120 capite hujus voluminis, folio 702. i. e. " Bor- " chard is Author of this Work, as appears from the " 120th chapter of this volume, pag. 702." And indeed we find the following words in the page, in queſtion: And in as much as I Borchard Doctor and Profeſſor of Holy Divinity, being deſirous to gratify the deſire of thoſe who croſs the ſeas out of pure zeal and devotion, to viſit the Holy Land; which I myſelf have gone thro' ſeveral times on foot; and deſcribed it according to the beſt of my abilities, without omitting or adding one ſingle particular, except what I myſelf ſaw on the ſpot, or on the mountains, whence I could view and contemplate thoſe Holy Places. But this proves only that either the Tranſlator, or ſome Continuator has inſerted in this ſea of Hiſtories, the deſcription which Bonaventure Brocard made of the Holy Land, whither he travelled about the year 1280 (4). Several other particulars have been introduced into it (5), and the order and diſpoſition of the Hiſtory has been changed. John Columna divided this Work into ten Books (6); but in the French tranſlation, it is divided into ſix ages, each of which includes ſeveral Chapters. Andrew du Cheſne, who does not take notice of the Edition I here make uſe of, mentions three others. The great Sea and Flower of Hiſtories, ſays he (7), printed in the beginning of the reign of Charles the VIIIth, King of France, in two Volumes in Folio; and afterwards carried on to the year 1543. Printed at Paris, for Am- broſe Girault. And laſtly, augmented with a third Book, down to MDLI, by John le Gendre Aurelianois, Folio.

(1) Gualter, Tabul. Chron. pag. m. 799.

(2) Genebrard, Chronogr. lib. 4. circa ann. 1327.

(3) Called William Van Hamme.

(4) And not in 1533, as La Croix du Maine aſſerts, pag. 36.

(5) Sammarthani, ſub 75. Epiſc. Conſtant. Normann. allegant Vitam Caroli VII Reg. Franc. per Joannem Quadrigarium Monachum S. Dionyſii lib. 4. Matis Hiſt. & in Patriarchio Bituricenſi, cap. 16. allegatur Joannis du Cortils, Mare Hiſtoriarum, capitulum 24. § 3. libri primi de origine Francorum. Sandius, Animadv. in Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 170, 171.

(6) Trithem. de Scriptor. Eccleſ. pag. 226. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 480.

(7) Du Cheſne, Biblioth. des Hiſt. de France, pag. m. 57.

This Sea of Hiſtories has been cited by a numberleſs multitude of Authors, and particularly by John Couſin (8), who eſteemed it very much.

(8) In his Hiſtoire de Tournai.

Voſſius obſerves, that an anonymous Author, who writ in Italy, in 1381, a Treatiſe de Hierarchia ſubcœleſti, has ranked John Columna among thoſe who have writ the Hiſtory of the Popes (9). This however does not neceſſarily imply, that he compoſed a Book profeſſedly on the ſubject in queſtion; it might only ſignify what he has introduced, concerning the Popes, in his Mare Hiſtoriarum. He had publiſhed a volume of Letters (10), it is alſo ſaid that he compoſed a Treatiſe de Viris Illuſtribus & Chriſtianis (11). Had he written a particular hiſtory of the Popes, I am perſuaded Volaterranus would not have omitted him in his Catalogue (12), in which he gives a place to LANDULFUS COLUMNA, who dedicated his Work to Pope John the XXIId.

(9) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 481.

(10) Trithem. de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 226. See the Bibliotheque de Geſner, folio 408 verſo.

(11) Sandius, Animadv. in Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 172.

(12) Volater. lib. 22. initio.

[B] Poſſevinus ſpeaks of one James Columna . . . . and pretends that the Archbiſhop of Florence in queſtion has copied him . . . . which Voſſius does not believe.] Here follows Voſſius's words, Poſſevinus diverſa facit, Joannem & Jacobum, Columnas, utrumque Ord. Præd. utrumque Hiſtoricum: atque addit, B. Antoninum plura ex Jacobo derivaſſe in Hiſtoriam ſuam. Puto falli ſane Antoninus Joannem Columnam teſtem advocat, cum alibi, tum Tit. XIX, Cap. I, ubi Sermo, ei de Innocentio III, qui prius Lotharius vocabatur. At Jacobum Columnam Hiſtoricum, quantum meminiſſe poſſum plane neſcit; nec fuiſſe ejus nominis Hiſtoricum cenſeo (13). i. e. " Poſſevinus makes two Columna's, John and " James, both Dominicans and both his hiſtorical " Writers: and adds, that Antoninus tranſcribed into " his Hiſtory many particulars from James. But I " believe he is miſtaken, for Antoninus cites the teſti- " mony of John Columna on ſeveral occaſions, and " particularly in Title XIX, Chap. I, where he treats " of Innocent III, who before was called Lotharius. " But he knew no ſuch Hiſtorian, if my memory " deceives me not, as James Columna; nor do I be- " lieve there was any Hiſtorical Writer of that name." Sandius objects to him, that Nauclerus has related ſome particulars on the teſtimony of James de Columna (14). He might have added, to confirm his criticiſm, that the incident for which Nauclerus cites James Columna, is not found in the Mare Hiſtoriarum (15); and it is to be obſerved, that ſeveral Authors have ſpoken of this James. JACOBUS COLUMNA. Ordinis Sancti Dominici Hiſtoricus eruditus, quem pluries citat Sanctus Antoninus in ſuis Hiſtoriis. Scriptis mandavit Chronicon à creatione Mundi, uſque ad ſua tempora 1340. Eſt Jacobi mentio apud Luſitanum, Plodium, Fernandez, Fontanam de Romana Provincia, & Ambroſium de Altamura in Bibliotheca Ordinis Prædicatorum (16). i. e. " James Columna, a Dominican Friar and learned Hi- " ſtorian, whom St. Antoninus cites often in his Hiſ- " tory

(13) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 480.

(14) Sandius, Animadv. in Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 172.

(15) The thing is this, viz. that Nicholas Biſhop of Myrra gave Arius a box of the ear in the Council of Nice. See Nauclerus vol. 2. Generat. 11. pag. m. 469.

(16) Proſper Mandoſius, Biblioth. Romanæ Cent. 1. num. 2. pag. 14, 15.

We ſhall take notice of a ſmall miſtake of Andrew Rivetus (f).

(f) At the cloſe of the Rem. [B].

" tory, He wrote a Chronicle, from the creation of " the world to his own time, viz. the year 1340. This " James is mentioned by Luſitanus, Plodius, Fernan- " dez, Fontana concerning the Roman Provinces, and " Ambroſius Altamara, in his Bibliotheca Ordinis Præ- " dicatorum." Theſe are the words of Proſper Mandoſius, who omitted our John Columna in his firſt five Centuries Bibliothecæ Romanæ.

Here follows a ſmall ſpecimen of the diſpute concerning Pope Joan. Du Pleſſis having cited Antoninus, who relates the ſtory of this female Pope, Coeffeteau charged him with diſguiſing the paſſage, and ſuppreſſing the following reſtriction, If what is aſſerted, and which Martinus relates be true. It is alſo added that a marble ſtatue hat been erected, to perpetuate this incident; but Vincent de Beauvais, and John Columna do not mention it (17). Rivet in his anſwer to Coeffeteau, employed the following words: With regard to the ſetting up of the Marble Satue, and Antonius oppoſes to the generality of thoſe who take notice of it, Vincent de Beauvais and John Coſumna who do not ſpeak of it. But this circumſtance ſhews, that they mention the other particulars (18). Rivet is in an error, for neither of thoſe Authors make the leaſt mention of this female Pope; and conſequently Antoninus did not mean, that they had only omitted thoſe particulars which relate to the ſtatue. He ſhould have conſulted them before he gave his opinion concerning the meaning of Antoninus's ambiguous expreſſions.

(17) Coeffet. Reponſe au Myſtere de Iniquité, pag. 508.

(18) Rivet, Remarq. ſur la Rep. au Myſt. d'Iniquit. Part 1. pag. 594.

COMANA. There were chiefly two Cities ſo called, the one in Cappadocia (a), and the other in the Kingdom of Pontus (b). Both were dedicated to Bellona, and obſerved very near the ſame ceremonies in the worſhip of that Goddeſs. The one had been copied from the other, viz. that of Pontus from the other of Cappadocia (c); and it was in the latter that Oreſtes eſtabliſhed this worſhip (d) [A]. In each of theſe Cities, the temple of the Goddeſs, endowed with a great many lands, was ſerved by a great number of Prieſts and others, under the authority of a High Prieſt, who was in very great credit, and had in ſuch veneration, that he was next in dignity to the King [B]. His office was for life (e). Several Dictionaries and other books aſcribe to Strabo the following aſſertion, viz. that, in his time, there were upwards of ſix thouſand perſons devoted to the ſervice of Bellona at Comana in Cappadocia; and that theſe perſons uſed to fight and wound one another

(a) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 359; and lib. 12. pag. 369.

(b) Idem, lib. 12. pag. 383.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Ibid. pag. 369.

(e) Ibid. pag. 370.

[A] It was in the latter that Oreſtes eſtabliſhed this worſhip.] Τὰ δ' ἱερὰ ταῦτα δοκεῖ Ὀρέστης μετὰ τῆς ἀδελφῆς Ἰφιγενείας κομίσαι δεῦρο ἀπὸ τῆς Ταυρικῆς Σκυθίας τὰ τῆς Ταυροπόλου Ἀρτέμιδος. These words of Strabo (1) ſignify that, it is thought Oreſtes and his ſiſter Iphigenia, brought thither this Religion from Scythia Taurica; and that this was the worſhip which was paid to Diana Tauropolos. He adds, that Oreſtes who had let his hair grow in token of mourning, left them on this very ſpot of Cappadocia, which for that reaſon was called Comana. Now as he ſays in another place (2), where he ſpeaks of Comana, a city of Pontus, that it was dedicated to the ſame Goddeſs as Comana in Cappadocia, and drew its original from it (3); he hints plainly enough, that he either did not know the competition which was between theſe two cities, or elſe that he rejected it, and looked upon the pretenſions of the people of Pontus as null. It is nevertheleſs certain, that they did not yield to the others, the quality of chief or head; and that they boaſted their being poſſeſſed of the true ſtatue of Diana, wherein they were rivalled, not only by the Cappadocians, but alſo by the Lydians; which ſhews that men began to quarrel about the poſſeſſion of a relick, before the eſtabliſhment of the Chriſtian Religion; for when the poſſeſſion of our Saviour's true ſhroud, or of St. John Baptiſt's head was challenged by the inhabitants of different places, many Heathen Cities had long before this conteſted the poſſeſſion of the ſtatue of Diana Taurica. The Lacedæmonians pretended it was among them; the Athenians affirmed, that Iphigenia had left it in their country (4). The people of Pontus, of Cappadocia, and Lydia diſputed with each other the poſſeſſion of this relick. Διαμεμίμηκεν ἔτι καὶ νῦν τηλικοῦτο ὄνομα τῇ Ταυρικῇ Θεῷ ὥστε ἀμφισβητοῦσι μὲν Καππάδοκες καὶ οἱ τὸν Εὔξεινον οἰκοῦντες τὸ ἄγαλμα εἶναι παρὰ σφίσιν. ἀμφισβητοῦσι δὲ καὶ Λυδῶν οἷς ἔστιν Ἀρτέμιδος ἱερὸν Ἀναΐτιδος (5). i. e. " The name of Diana of Tauris is ſo renowned " at this time, that the people of Cappadocia and " Pontus conteſted with one another which of them " has the poſſeſſion of her ſtatue; and the Lydians " alſo, in whoſe country the Temple of Diana Anaitis " ſtands, have the ſame diſpute." Dion aſcribes to Comana of Cappadocia, all the honour of the Statue of Diana; he takes no notice of the competition of the Lydians, nor that of the inhabitants of Pontus. He relates only, that there were two cities in Cappadocia which had the ſame name, and that they were not very far diſtant one from the other. Each of them boaſted the ſame things, told the like idle ſtories, and ſhewed the ſame nicknacks; each pretended to have Iphigenia's true knife or poniard. Μυθολογοῦσι καὶ δεικνύουσι τά τε ἄλλα πάντα ἐκ τοῦ ὁμοίου, καὶ τὸ ξίφος ὡς αὐτὸ ἐκεῖνο τὸ τῆς Ἰφιγενείας, ὃν ἀμφότεραι ἔχουσι (6). He doubtleſs means, that both theſe cities of Cappadocia were called Comana. Now as neither the Hiſtorians nor the Geographers take the leaſt notice of two Comana's ſtanding near one another in Cappadocia, Dion may probably have committed a miſtake in not placing (with Strabo) one of theſe two Comana's in Cappadocia, and the other in the Kingdom of Pontus. Ortelius is in an error when he aſſerts, that Dion ſpeaks of Comana Pontica, and Comana of Cappadocia (7). Dion has perhaps confounded together Comana and Caſtabala; for there really was a city in Cappadocia, called Caſtabala, which it is pretended, was the ſcene of the incidents related concerning Oreſtes and Diana Tauropolos. The Diana who had a Temple in this city was ſurnamed Perafia, which ſerved as a proof. By the way, the Prieſteſſes of Diana there boaſted, that they could walk unhurt over burning coals. Ἐν τοῖς Κασταβάλοις ἐστὶ τὸ τῆς Περασίας Ἀρτέμιδος ἱερὸν ὅπου φασὶ τὰς ἱερείας γυμνοὺς τοὺς ποσὶ δι' ἀνθρακιᾶς βαδίζειν ἀπαθεῖς, καὶ ταῦθα δέ τινες τὴν αὐτὴν θρυλλεῖσθαι ἱστορίαν τὴν περὶ τῆς Ὀρέστου καὶ τῆς Ταυροπόλου. Περασίαν κικλῆσθαι φάσκοντες διὰ τὸ πέραθεν κομισθῆναι (8). i. e. " In Caſtabala ſtands " the Temple of Diana Perafia, where we are told, " that Prieſteſſes of that Goddeſs walk on burning " coals without hurting their feet: and this country is " thought to be the ſame of the tranſactions which " are told of Oreſtes and Diana of Tauris, and who " was called Perafia, becauſe ſhe had croſſed the ſea " hither."

(1) Lib. 12. pag. 369.

(2) Pag. 383, ſub fin.

(3) Ἀφιδρυθέντα ἐκεῖθεν. Atque adeo inde imitata. This is the printed Tranſlation, which does not ſeem to convey all the force of the original.

(4) Pauſanias, lib. 3. pag. 98.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Dio, lib. 35.

(7) Abrah. Ortelius, in Theſaur. Geograp.

(8) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 370.

SEVERAL Heathen Cities boaſted their being poſſeſſed of the ſame RELICKS.

[B] The Temple of the Goddeſs . . . was ſerved . . . under the authority of a High Prieſt . . . ., he was next in dignity to the King.] The inhabitants of Comana were reputed as ſubjects to the King, but then they were obliged to obey the High Prieſt. Ἄλλως μὲν ὑπὸ τῷ βασιλεῖ τεταγμένοι, τῷ δ' ἱερεῖ ὑπακούοντες. This is what Strabo tells us, in page 639. He adds, that the High Prieſt was Lord of the greateſt part of the Temple and the Prieſts and over others belonging to it; that he received all the produce of the lands belonging to the Temple; in a word, that after the King no man in all Cappadocia, was had in ſuch honour as the High Prieſt, for which reaſon he was generally choſen out of the Royal Family. Ἐσὶν ὅτε διάδημα κατὰ τιμὴν τῇ Καππαδοκίᾳ μετὰ τὸν βασιλέα, ὡς δ' ἐπιτεθολὸ τῷ αὐτῷ γένους ἦσαν οἱ ἱερεῖς τοῖς βασιλεῦσι. Strabo ſays almoſt the ſame of the High Prieſt of Comana in Pontus. This High Prieſt was the next in dignity to the King, and uſed to wear the diadem twice a year, when the people ſolemnized the iſſuing out of the Goddeſs. Ἠίκα δὲς τοῦ ἔτους κατὰ τὰς ἐξόδους λεγομένας τῆς Θεοῦ διάδημα ἀτύγχανε φορῶν ὁ ἱερεὺς, καὶ ἦν διάδημα κατὰ τιμὴν μετὰ τὸν βασιλέα (9). I make theſe obſervations for two reaſons. (9) Ibid, pag. 384.

other every year, on certain feſtivals of the Goddeſs. In my opinion, Strabo ſays only this (f), that when he took a journey to that City, the Miniſters of Bellona conſiſted of upwards of ſix thouſand perſons both men and women. What is related concerning their fighting has another foundation [C]. This Author, ſpeaking of Comana Pontica ſays, that it was a very populous and trading City; that prodigious multitudes of people flocked thither, on the anniverſary of the iſſuing out of Bellona; and that, at all ſeaſons, great numbers of foreigners were ſeen there, who came either to fulfill their vows, or offer up ſacrifices; that great numbers of lewd women were alſo found in it, and that moſt of them were devoted to the Goddeſs of the Place (g). There is no doubt, but that this is one circumſtance which invited foreigners thither. After the war of Mithridates, the Romans ſecular̃iz'd, in ſome manner, this Pontificate [D], and made it a kind of Sovereignty, without diveſting it of the ſuperintendence over things relating to Religion. Pompey beſtowed it on Archelaus; Cæſar on Nicomedes; and Auguſtus on Dyteutus who had performed a very generous action (b) [E]. Appian has

(f) Ibid. pag. 370.

(g) Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 385.

(b) Ibid. pag. 384, 385.

I. To ſhew that the ſame ſpirit, which procured the Clergy ſo much honour and wealth under the Chriſtian diſpenſation, had already diſplayed itſelf under the Heathen Syſtem; ſo that how often ſoever the Precepts of Religion may change, ſtill nature recovers its rights; whatever is founded on the mechanical paſſions, is an inalienable and impreſcriptible domain, nature may be deprived of it for a time, when extraordinary changes happen in Religion; but one time or other ſhe again gets into poſſeſſion. This is my firſt reaſon. With regard to the 2d, I am of opinion that Father Noris is in an error, when he aſſerts in general and unlimited terms, that the ſame man was both King and High Prieſt of Comana (10). I believe indeed, that Pompey raiſed Archelaus to both theſe dignities, but non ſic erat ab initio, it was not ſo from the beginning. I ſhall cite two paſſages in the Remark [D], which will confirm all I have ſaid concerning the great power of theſe High Prieſts.

(10) Hunc Archelaum Pompeius Sacerdotem Bellonæ ac Comanorum principem (UTRAQUE enim dignitas UNI EIDEMQUE conferebatur) conſtituerat. Noris, Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 255. i. e. "Pompey appointed this Archelaus a Prieſt of Bellona, and King of Comana, for both dignities were beſtowed on one and the ſame perſon." See the Remark [C] of the Article ARCHELAUS King of Cappadocia.

[C] What is related concerning their fighting has another foundation.] The Prieſts of Bellona and thoſe of Cybele, had this in common, viz. that at certain times, they uſed to act as ſo many frantic Enthuſiaſts; and ſhew by their ſtrange geſtures and diſtortions a great diſtraction of mind. They did not ſpare their own bodies, but uſed to make the blood flow from them, and this was part of their Divine Service. Lactantius has reproached the Heathens with this cuſtom. Ab iſto genere ſacrorum non minoris inſaniæ judicanda ſunt publica illa ſacra; quorum alia ſunt matris Deûm; in quibus homines ſuis ipſi virilibus litant; amputati enim ſexu nec viros ſe, nec fœminas faciunt: alia Virtutis, quam eandem Bellonam vocant, in quibus ipſi ſacerdotes non alieno, ſed ſuo cruore ſacrificant. Sectis namque humeris, & utraque manu diſtrictos gladios exerentes, currunt, efferuntur, inſaniunt (11). i. e. "From theſe "rites we may judge that the other public ones are no "leſs frantic; as thoſe of Cybele, in which men ſacri"fice their virility to that Goddeſs, and by their ampu"tation become neither men nor women; and thoſe of "Fortitude, whom they likewiſe call Bellona, in which "the Prieſts ſacrifice only their own blood. For with "their ſhoulders gaſhed, and flouriſhing a ſword in "each hand, they fly up and down like ſo many "mad-men." The abovementioned ceremony was very probably obſerved in Comana, where Bellona was had in ſuch great veneration. However, Strabo takes no notice of this circumſtance; he ſays indeed, that at Comana in Cappadocia there were ſeveral Enthuſiaſtic People who believed themſelves inſpired; he does not add, that the Prieſts of Bellona were emaſculated (12), nor that they uſed to wound themſelves. Some Authors pretend, that Valerius Flaccus has taken notice of both theſe particulars; for they read Comanos inſtead of Comatos, in the VIIth Book, towards the end of it.

(11) Lactant. Inſtitut. Divinat. lib. 1. cap. 21.

(12) On the contrary, he ſpeaks of their wives. ἀνδρες ὁμοῦ γυναιξί. Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 369.

Qualis ubi attonitos mœſta Phrygas annuæ matris
Ira, vel exactos laterat Bellona Comanos.

That is,

"Like as when Cybele's fierce anger ſtrikes
"Th' aſtoniſhed Phrygians, or Bellona wounds
"Th' unman'd Comaans———

[D] The Romans ſecularized in ſome manner this Pontificate.] We have already proved that the High Prieſt of Comana did not enjoy the ſovereignty; that the King was ſuperior to him, and that the people of Comana were properly the King's ſubjects. But after that Pompey had ended the war againſt Mithridates, he beſtowed this Pontificate on Archelaus; without ſubjecting him to any other dependence, but that which the Romans reſerved to themſelves, when they made a preſent of the country (13). He only forbid him to ſell the inhabitants, and in all other reſpects, he ordered them to obey Archelaus. Προσέταξε τοῖς ἐνοικοῦσι πειθήρχειν αὐτῷ. τοῦτον μὲν οὖν ἐγκρατῆ τῶν τῆς πόλεως ἱερέων ἐποίησεν ἐκτὸς τῆς πράσεως (14). i. e. "He commanded the inhabitants of Comana to obey "Archelaus. He therefore was King over them, "and Lord of all the Prieſts living in the "city, except that he had not power to ſell them." He enlarged the lands which lay round the Temple by 60 ſtadia or furlongs (15). The following words of Strabo they were at leaſt ſix thouſand perſons (16) ſhew, that he ſpeaks of Comana Pontica, and not of the Cappadocian Comana; for ſome pages before (17), he had obſerved of the latter, that he himſelf had ſeen upwards of 6000 perſons in it. What he ſays afterwards confirms this circumſtance, viz. that he means that Pompey beſtowed on Archelaus the Pontificate of Comana in the Kingdom of Pontus. But Strabo does not agree in this particular with Hirtius, who relates, that the Pontificate which Pompey beſtowed was in Cappadocia. He indeed does not mention Pompey: but it is ſufficient that he informs us, that Cæſar beſtowed on Nicomedes the Pontificate of Comana; now we find by Appian (18), that Cæſar diveſted Archelaus of the Pontificate which he beſtow'd on Nicomedes. I ſhall cite Hirtius's words becauſe they confirm what I related above concerning the authority of Comana. Magnis itineribus per Cappadociam confectis, biduum Mazacæ commoratus (Cæſar) venit Comana vetuſtiſſimum in Cappadocia Bellonæ templum, quod tanta religione colitur, ut Sacerdos ejus Deæ majeſtate, imperio & potentia ſecundus à Rege conſenſu gentis illius habeatur. Id homini nobiliſſimo (19). i. e. "Cæſar going thro' Cappadocia, by long marches, "and after halting two days at Mazaca, came to Co"mana the moſt ancient Temple of Bellona, in all "Cappadocia. Such great veneration is paid to it, "that the Prieſt of that Goddeſs, is by the conſent "of that people, conſidered as next to the King in "majeſty, dignity and power &c." The Reader will find the ſequel of this in the Remark [D], Citation (3), of the Article ARCHELAUS King of Cappadocia.

(13) Appian in his Enumeration of the Kings and Princes who were raiſed to thrones by Pompey, in ſeveral parts of Aſia, does not omit Archelaus: Ejus etiam Deæ quæ à Comanis colitur, Archelaum fecit Flaminem, cuivis Dynaſtæ parem opibus. Appian. in Mithridat. pag. m. 168. i. e. "He appointed "Archelaus chief "Prieſt to the "Goddeſs wor"ſhipped by the "Comanians, "whoſe wealth "is equal to that "of any Prince."

(14) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 384.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Ἦσαν δὲ οὐκ ἐλάττους οὐδ' ἐνταῦθα τῶν ἑξακισχιλίων. Caſaubon ſays hereafter οὐδ' ἐνταῦθα, quia ſupra dixit in Cappadocis Comanis fuiſſe illorum Veneri devotorum ſex millia & amplius. But Caſaubon is miſtaken, they not being conſecrated to Venus.

(17) Pag. 369.

(18) In Mithridat. ſub fin.

(19) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandr.

Not long before this Cicero had prevented a dangerous Civil War from breaking out in that country. He had obliged the High-Prieſt who was exceedingly powerful in all reſpects, and able to make a ſtrong oppoſition to King Ariobarzanes, to leave Cappadocia. Quumque magnum bellum in Cappadocia concitaretur, ſi Sacerdos armis ſe, quod facturus putabatur, defenderet, adoleſcens & equitatu & peditatu & pecunia paratus, & toto, iis qui novari aliquid volebant: perfeci ut è regno ille diſcederet, rexque ſine tumultu, ac ſine armis, omni auctoritate aulæ communita, regnum cum dignitate obtineret (20). i. e. "At the time that a furious war "was going to break out in Cappadocia, if the High"Prieſt, a young man who was provided with men, "money &c. ſhould take up arms, as it was ſuppoſed "he would; I prevailed ſo far as to make him leave "the Kingdom and reſtored the King, without injur"ing his honour, without bloodſhed or tumult to "his authority and dominions."

(20) Cicero, Epiſt. 4. libri 15 ad Familiar. pag. 389, 399. edit. Græv.

[E] . . . And Auguſtus on Dyteutus who had performed has committed an error on this occaſion [F].

ed a very generous action.] Dyteutus was the eldeſt ſon of Adiatorix Tetrarch of Galatia. This Adiatorix having obtained from Mark Anthony, that part of the city and territory of Heraclea, granted by the inhabitants to the Colony which the Romans ſent thither, was ſo baſe and cowardly as to fall upon the Romans in the night and cut them to pieces. He afterwards declared that Mark Anthony had permitted him to act in that barbarous manner. This happened a little before the battle of Actium. After the defeat of Mark Anthony, Adiatorix was taken by Auguſtus, and ſentenced to die with his eldeſt ſon (21). Himſelf, his wife and children were carried in triumph; and as he was carrying to the place of execution, his younger ſon told the ſoldiers that he was the eldeſt; Dyteutus aſſerted the contrary, when a very ſurprizing conteſt enſued between the two brothers. Their father and mother put an end to it by perſuading Dyteutus to yield, ſince he, as he was older, would conſequently be more capable of protecting his mother and his other brother. So that Adiatorix was put to death with his younger ſon. Auguſtus, having been told theſe particulars, regretted their loſs; and in order to make ſome compenſation to thoſe who ſurvived, he raiſed Dyteutus to the Pontificate of Comana (22).

(21) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 374.

[F] Appian has committed an error on this occaſion.] He tells us that Cæſar confirmed the diſtributions which had been made by Pompey of ſeveral countries, the Pontificate of Comana excepted, of which he diveſted Archelaus; but that ſoon after the conqueſt of Egypt, all theſe States, and whatever Cæſar and Mark Anthony had beſtowed, were added to the Roman Provinces: the Romans, continues he, ſeizing eagerly every opportunity to aggrandize themſelves (23). But I had rather believe Strabo, who aſſerts, that in his time Dyteutus enjoyed the Pontificate of Comana (24).

(22) Idem, ibid. pag. 384, 385.

(23) Appian. in Mithrid. ſub fin.

(24) Νῦν ἔχει Δύτευτος υἱὸς Ἀδιατόριγος. Strabo lib. 12. pag. 384.

COMBABUS, a young Nobleman at the King of Syria's Court, was appointed by that Monarch to attend the Queen in a pretty long journey ſhe was to undertake. This Queen's name was Stratonice, and her deſign was to build a temple in honour of Juno, purſuant to the orders ſhe had received in a dream for that purpoſe. Combabus was a youth of exquiſite beauty, and being firmly perſuaded that the King would be jealous of him, he earneſtly beſought the Monarch not to give him that employment, but his intreaties not prevailing, he looked upon himſelf as a dead man, in caſe he did not behave in ſuch a manner as might not give the leaſt occaſion to detraction. He obtained only ſeven days to get ready for his journey, and his preparations were as follow. The inſtant he was got home, he bewailed the wretchedneſs of his condition, by which he was expoſed, either to loſe his life or his manhood, and after venting the deepeſt ſighs, he lopped off certain affairs which ſhall be nameleſs (a), and then embalming them, laid them in a box which he ſealed up. The time for his ſetting out being come, he gave the box to the King before a great number of people, and begged him to keep it for him till his return. He declared to his Majeſty, that he had treaſured up ſome things in it which he valued more than gold and ſilver, and that were as dear to him as his life. The King taking the box, put his ſeal upon it, and ordered the Maſters of his wardrobe to keep it. The Queen was three years in her journey, and the very circumſtance happened which Combabus had foreſeen. She fell diſtractedly in love with this young man, and did all that lay in her power to obſerve the decorum that became her quality; however her ſilence ſerved to no other purpoſe but to wrankle the wound, ſo that ſhe was forced to reveal her paſſion, firſt by ſigns, and afterwards by words. It is true indeed, that as ſhe would not make uſe of a confident, and was not bold enough to ſue for the remedy to her evil; ſhe had recourſes to the bottle, which inſpired her with a boldneſs ſhe before wanted [A]. Having therefore intoxicated herſelf with liquor, ſhe went to Combabus's apartment, where revealing her paſſion to the lovely youth, ſhe beſought him to pity her fond paſſion. He deſired the Queen to leave him, ſaying that ſhe was diſguiſed in liquor; but finding her obſtinate, and threatning to lay violent hands on her ſelf, he declared that it was abſolutely not in his power to ſatisfy her; and, leſt ſhe ſhould ſuppoſe this a meer evaſion, he made her an eye-witneſs of his impotency. Stratonice, after this ſight, was not ſo diſtractedly fond of Combabus; nevertheleſs, ſhe ſtill loved him [B], and would always be in his company: ſhe endeavoured, by ſeeing and converſing

(a) He is very juſtly compared to the Beaver. Imitatus Caſtora, qui ſe Eunuchum ipſe facit, cupiens evadere damno Teſticulorum. Juvenal. Sat. 12. ver. 34. Thus tranſlated, "Who, when "he's cloſe purſued, by furious hunters, "Bites off his "ſtones, and "ſaves his life by "flight."

[A] Stratonice fell diſtractedly in love with this young man . . . had recourſe to the Bottle, which inſpired her with a boldneſs ſhe before wanted.] Lucian ſuppoſes, that three reaſons prompted her to intoxicate herſelf (1). 1ſt, She hoped that it would inſpire her with ſo much boldneſs, as might enable her to diſcloſe her paſſion. 2ly, A denial would not then put her ſo much to the bluſh. 3dly, A woman ſoon forgets what ſhe does in that condition. He might have added a fourth, viz. that a man has not ſo great a contempt for a woman, who is prompted to ſuch an exceſs of immodeſty, by over-drinking, as for another, who in her ſober moments, ſhould make him the like declaration.

(1) Lucian, de Syria Dea, pag. 892, 893. vol. 2.

[B] He made her an eye-witneſs of his impotency . . . nevertheleſs ſhe ſtill loved him.] Let me obſerve, to the honour and glory of this Queen; that Lucian, who was a very bold Writer, declares, ſhe did but barely converſe with her Gallant; that theſe converſations were indeed frequent, but that they never exceeded the bounds of modeſty; Ἰδοῦσα δὲ ἡ Στρατονίκη τὸ ὕποπτον ἔλαβεν, μανίης μὲν ὅτο ἐκείνης ἔχετο, ἵμερος δὲ ἀδαμᾶ ἐληλύθεε, ἀλλὰ πάντα οἱ συνῆσαν ταύτην παραμυθίην ἐπρίατο ἵμερος ἀπρήκτοιο (2). i. e. "Stratonice having a "ſight of what ſhe never expected to ſee, her love "did not rage with ſo much violence as before, but "ſtill ſhe could not eraze the dear man from her mind, "and ſoothed her unaccompliſhed paſſion, by being "for ever in his company." And let it not be objected, that in the condition to which Combabus had reduced himſelf, he could oblige her with nothing but words: for the hiſtories of the Levant inform us of the contrary. The jealouſy of men, how extravagant ſoever it be, is yet not ſo inventive as the love of women. They thought, that by putting their wives under the guard of Eunuchs, I mean of certain men whoſe pudenda had been cut off, they might ſafely indulge themſelves in peaceable ſlumbers, and not be under the leaſt apprehenſion: however, they found they had been miſtaken. Theſe Eunuchs were not only fit for ſomething; but were even preferred to others on many accounts (3). Huſbands were therefore obliged to have recourſe to other expedients, and to quite lop the Eunuchs. They could not be truſted in Turkey, were the leaſt portion of the affair in queſtion left them (4). But this precaution is ſtill not ſecure enough; for notwithſtanding

(2) Lucian, de Syria Dea, vol. 2. pag. 893.

(3) Sunt quas Eunuchi imbelles ac mollia ſemper, Oſcula delectent & deſperatio barbæ, Et quod & abortivo non eſt opus. Juven. Sat. 6. ver. 364.

(4) Busbec, Letter 3. cited by La Mothe le Vayer, Letter 112. tom. 11. pag. 527.

verſing with him, to conſole herſelf for her unhappineſs, in not being able to indulge her fondeſt wiſhes. In the mean time the King being informed of what was doing, recalled Combabus, who was not terrified in any manner at this order, well knowing that his Majeſty had, in his own hand, wherewith to juſtify, in the ſtrongeſt manner, his (Combabus's) conduct; and for this reaſon, he returned to Court without the leaſt apprehenſions. He was thrown into priſon immediately upon his arrival; ſome time after which, the King had him brought into his apartment, where he accuſed him of adultery, treachery and impiety [C], in preſence of thoſe perſons who had ſeen him deliver up the box. There were ſome witneſſes who depoſed, that they had ſeen him lie with the Queen [D]. However, Combabus made no anſwer till he was carrying to execution, when he cried, that he ſhould be put to death, not for having defiled the King's bed, but becauſe his Majeſty would not return him the box which he had put into his hands at his leaving the Kingdom. His Majeſty hearing this, ordered the box to be brought, and the ſeal being broke up, the innocence of Combabus appeared, and he himſelf told the reaſons which had prompted him to emaſculate himſelf. But now the King embraced him, and ſeemed grieved at his misfortune, whereupon he puniſhed his accuſers, beſtowed mighty poſſeſſions on him, and granted him the privilege of coming and ſpeaking to him at all hours, not excepting thoſe when his Majeſty ſhould be claſped in amorous embraces, and that without withſtanding that they are † ſcraped cloſe to the belly (to uſe the expreſſion of the Embaſſador de Breves,) nevertheleſs, there are ſome who marry ſeveral wives, to foment their abominable luſt (5). St. Baſil knew, that the moſt complete mutilations are not to be truſted; they do not, ſays he, turn a man into a woman, he is ſtill a man; in like manner as a bull is ſtill a bull, tho' his horns are cut off, and he is not metamorphoſed into a horſe. He carries on this compariſon much farther; he ſays, that a bull whoſe horns are cut off, performs nevertheleſs the ſame motions as before, when his anger is rouzed; and even butts with that very part of the head on which his horns ſtood before. The reader will find the other part of this compariſon in the Latin paſſage following. Maſculina corpora, licet illa Eunuchorum ſint, cautè vitanda ſunt virgini. Sit enim ille licet Eunuchus, vir tamen per naturam eſt. Sicut enim cornutus bos, etſi illi præcidantur cornua, non tamen ſublatis cornibus equus efficitur; ſed abſint licet cornua, bos tamen eſt: ita & maſculus, abſciſſis genitalibus omnibus, ea tamen mutilatione ſua, mulier effectus non eſt, ſed maſculus (ut eſt natura conditus) permanet: ac ſicuti bos reciſis cornibus, ſic quoque, furore cornu petit, (cervicem quippe incurvans, & caput ad feriendi impetum formans, gaudet intentare minas;) ac ſæpius ea parte capitis ferit qua cornibus antea fuerat armatus; ſatisfacitque furori per actus imaginem; (ita enim afficitur, correptus iræ impetu, non ut caſſo feriens vulnere, ſed ut prius ictu cornuum ſcindens, ac dividens:) ita & maſculus quamvis abſciſſus genitalia, vitioſa tamen concupiſcentia maſculus eſt. Quocirca & ipſe ſe ad actum fœditatis ſimiliter formans, amorem ſpirat, incredibilemque veſaniam; imo & ad coïtum fervens, etiamſi ea parte non violet fœminæ turbulentus incumbens; ipſe tamen ac ſi corruperit ſatisfeceritque cupidini, ita ſceleris imagine affectus eſt. Eam verò ad peccatum vehementius irritans, totum quidem corrumpit animum, corpuſque ad corruptionis actum inclementer inſtigat (6). St. Baſil is not the only Father of the Church, who has admoniſhed women to be ſtrongly aware of Eunuchs; and to be perſuaded, that they are ſtill able to commit a thouſand impurities with them. I ſpeak of thoſe Eunuchs who had been cut cloſe. See the above cited work of Theophilus Raynaud. The inſtances and paſſages of the Fathers cited by this Jeſuit, make him laugh at the apology of Peter Abelard. I have already taken notice of this (7), and ſhall perhaps ſay ſomething more of it in the article HELOISE. But let us return to Stratonice and Combabus, to obſerve, that ſhe muſt have behaved in a very laudable manner (as ſhe had the criminal weakneſs to love another man, and not her huſband) if ſhe could reſtrain herſelf merely to converſation with her gallant. Dido would not have been ſo prudent, ſince, even in the abſence of her lover, ſhe wanted more real and ſolid amuſements than mere words; and this was, to take Æneas's ſon in her lap (8).

† Or cropp'd.

(5) La Mothe le Vayer, ibid.

(6) S. Baſilius, Libro de Sancta Virginitate, ad finem, apud Theophilum Raynaudum, in Tractatu de Eunuchis, cap. 5. Art. 2. num. 17. pag. m. 147.

(7) In the Remark [T] of the Article ABELARD.

(8) Illum abſens abſentem auditque videtque,
Aut gremio Aſcanium genitoris imagine capta
Detinet, infandum ſi fallere poſſit amorem.
Virg. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 83.
That is,
" Abſent, her
" abſent hero
" ſees and hears,
" Or, in her boſom, young
" Aſcanius bears,
" And ſeeks the
" father's image
" in the child,
" If love, by
" likeneſs, might
" be ſo beguil'd."
DRYDEN.

[C] The King accuſed him of adultery, treachery and impiety.] The firſt and ſecond crimes are eaſily known, when we call to mind, that the King had appointed Combabus to watch over the conduct of the Queen. The third crime may be ſoon gueſt, when we conſider, that the King had appointed Combabus to build a Temple in honour of Juno. This journey to the holy City (9), in order to build a Temple there, was a pious work, and a kind of pilgrimage. It was therefore profaning a holy thing, to make love at that time. Λέγων τριστὸν Κομβάβου ἀδίκημα μοιχᾶν τὰ ἱερὰ, καὶ εἰς θεὸν ἀσέβημα, καὶ εἰς θεὰν ἀσωτέρημα τῆς ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ τοιαύτῃ ὑπηρέτης (10). i. e. " Saying that Combabus had " committed a threefold crime, viz. was guilty of adul- " tery, of breach of faith, and impiety with regard " to the Goddeſs, while he was employed in her ſer- " vice having perpetrated ſuch impious crimes."

(9) So Lucian calls the City, in which Stratonice was going to build a Temple.

(10) Lucianus, de Syria Dea, tom. 2. pag. 894.

[D] There were ſome witneſſes who depoſed, that they had ſeen him lie with the Queen.] I have followed Benoit's (Benedict's) tranſlation, both here, and where he ſpeaks of the converſations of Stratonice and Combabus. Lucian employs the ſame verb in both places (11), παῦλα δὲ συνεῆσα, i. e. " perpetual converſations with her (12)." Ἤλεγχον ὅτι ἀναφανδὸν σφίας ἀλλήλοισι συνίοντας εἶδον. i. e. " They declared, that they had ſeen them, very " plainly, joined in the amorous congreſs." But this verb has not the ſame meaning in both thoſe paſſages; it ſignifies, in the firſt, to be together, and in the ſecond, to lie together. If we were to judge of things from outward appearance, the accuſers might be in the right; nevertheleſs, we muſt not pretend to affirm this, ſince Lucian does not aſſert it (13). A probable circumſtance is, that ſince the Queen did not ceaſe to love Combabus, but, on the contrary, uſed to ſee and ſpeak to him very often, in order to conſole herſelf, in ſome little meaſure, for being diſappointed in her wiſhes; ſhe therefore was not ſatisfied with mere words. And as Combabus was perfectly ſenſible, that he had a ready and ſure juſtification in the Prince's hands (be the malice of his accuſers ever ſo great) it is very probable, that he granted the Queen every thing that was in his little power to beſtow. The box ſecured them both from the ill offices of the accuſers; a circumſtance which doubtleſs made them not obſerve ſo ſtrictly, whether they were watched. So that the accuſers perhaps ſaw as much as was ſufficient to prove them guilty of the crime with which they charged Combabus. It may not be improper to call to mind the paſſage of St. Baſil, to which I ſhall add the following. Eunuchos quibus exſcinditur tota virilitas, negat S. Baſilius (14) impudicitiæ flamma liberari, ſed quamvis corpore nihil poſſint, tamen ait animo deſiderioque jugiter in cæno porcorum more, convolvi, & poſt abſciſſionem eſſe impudiciores ſervos voluptatis, qui liberi metu ne deprehendantur petulantiam licenter fœdis attactibus & amplexibus exſatiant, ut poſſunt, non ut volunt, laſcivientes. i. e. " Ac- " cording to St. Baſil, Eunuchs who are totally emaſ- " culated, are not able to do any thing, (corporally,) " yet, ſays he, in mind and deſires, they are conti- " nually wallowing in the mire, like ſo many ſwine; " and, after being caſtrated, abandon themſelves ſtill " more to luſt, and for this reaſon, becauſe as they are " now delivered from the fears of a diſcovery, they " ſatiate their looſe deſires by impure touches and em- " braces, not in the manner they would do, but to " the utmoſt of their abilities." And who can ſay, whether Stratonice never addreſſed him like the woman mentioned by Petronius? Languori tuo gratias ago, in umbra voluptatis diutius luſimus. i. e. " Thanks to " your impotence, but we really have ſported long " enough in the ſhadow of pleaſure."

(11) Pag. 893.

(12) Pag. 895.

(13) Theophile Raynaud, in Tractatu de Eunuchis, pag. 148, is in an error to ſay, Hoc Stratonicæ à Combabo exacto accidiſſe narrat Lucianus.

(14) Libr. de vera Virgin. ſub finem, apud Theoph. Raynaudum, de Eunuchis, num. 12. pag. 143.

without being ſent for [E]. Now, as Combabus was ordered, by his firſt commiſſion, to ſuperintend the building of the temple which Stratonice was ordered to raiſe in honour of Juno, he deſired leave to return back to complete the edifice. Leave was accordingly granted him, and he did not return any more to Court (b). A ſtatue of braſs, repreſenting Combabus, was placed in the temple, and that by the King's order, purely to do him honour. A female air was given to this ſtatue, but it had a male habit; and nevertheleſs, we are told that Combabus laid aſide the dreſs of his ſex, merely out of compaſſion to the women (c) [F]. The reader will find, in the remarks, the variations relating to this ſtory [G], and the error which thoſe have committed, who aſſert, that the Courtiers emaſculated themſelves, in order to ingratiate themſelves with Stratonice [H].

(b) That is, he continued the reſt of his life in the holy city where the temple was built. Lucian, de Syria Dea, pag. 896.

(c) Extracted from Lucian in the Treatiſe de Syria Dea, pag. 876, & ſeq. I am to obſerve, that this Tract which is aſcribed to Lucian, is not wrote in the Attic Dialect, as the reſt of that Author's pieces are, but in the Ionic Dialect.

COMENIUS

[E] The King granted him the privilege of coming and ſpeaking to him at all hours, not excepting thoſe when his Majeſty ſhould be claſped in amorous embraces, and that without being ſent for.] Thoſe who are acquainted with the ceremony obſerved with regard to the Eaſtern Princes both ancient or modern, know, that it is a very ſignal favour, to enjoy the privilege of entering the King's apartment at all times. Combabus's privilege extended ſtill farther, for all the King's Officers were ſtrictly forbid to ſend him away, tho' he ſhould interrupt the King and Queen in their dalliances. Ἀπίξιμι δὲ παρ' ἡμῖν ἄνευ ἐπαγγελίης· οὐδὲ τις ἀπόρξει ἐπ' ἡμεῖς τέρης ὄψιος· οὐδ' ἢν γυναικὶ ἅμα συνάζωμαι (15). Thoſe who aboliſhed the tyranny of the Magi, after the death of Cambyſes the ſon of Cyrus, were ſatisfied with a leſs privilege. It was agreed, that they ſhould be allowed to enter into the King's apartment without aſking leave, except when he ſhould be in bed with the Queen. Παριέναι ἐς τὰ βασιλήια πάντα τὸν βουλόμενον τῶν ἐπτὰ ἄνευ ἐπαγγελίης· ἢν μὴ τυγχάνῃ εὕδων μετὰ γυναικὸς βασιλεύς (16).

(15) Lucian, de Syria Dea, tom. 2. pag. 896.

(16) Herodot. lib. 3. cap. 84.

[F] We are told, that Combabus laid aſide the dreſs of his ſex, merely out of compaſſion to the women.] During the celebration of the great Feſtival, Combabus appeared ſo exquiſitely beautiful in the eyes of a certain foreign Lady, that ſhe fell diſtractedly in love with him; but hearing afterwards that he was an Eunuch, ſhe was ſo deeply afflicted at this diſappointment, that ſhe killed herſelf. Combabus reflecting on his unhappy impotency, no longer wore a male habit, to prevent any other woman from committing ſuch diſagreeable and fatal miſtakes for the future. This puts me in mind of a ſmart repartee mentioned in the Menagiana. "Madam Cornuel knew that Mr. de L.... was impotent, and had never ſeen him: He was a very handſome man. Happening to meet him at M. de Rambouillet's, ſhe aſked who he was; and being told that it was the Marquis de L..... Ah! ſays ſhe, who would not have been deceived (17)?"

(17) Menagiana, pag. m. 167.

[G] The reader will find.... the variations relating to this ſtory.] Some Authors ſaid, that it was Stratonice herſelf, who accuſed Combabus, and wrote to her royal Conſort, viz. that Combabus had urged her to violate her conjugal fidelity. But Lucian rejects this as fabulous (18), and does not even credit what is related of Stenobœa and Phedra. Ἐγὼ μὲν οὐδὲ Σθενεβοίην πείθομαι, οὐδὲ Φαίδρην τοιαῦτα ἐπιτελέσαι, εἰ τὸν Ἱππόλυτον ἀρρενίως ἐπόθεε Φαίδρη (19). i. e. "I do not believe that either Sthenobœa or Phædra (if the latter really wanted to enjoy Hippolytus) did ſuch things." It is related that theſe, in order to revenge themſelves for the ill ſucceſs they had met with in their firſt advances, complained to their huſbands, declaring that their virtue had been attacked, the former by Bellerophon, and the latter by Hippolytus. I do not ſee why Lucian ſhould doubt the truth of theſe incidents; for it is not only very poſſible that the love of theſe women, how violent ſoever, might have turned into hatred, upon their being refuſed their wiſhes, but is even very probable. Such a refuſal is the higheſt affront; it is a capital offence, to reject the firſt advances made by the fair ſex, who are uſed to be addreſſed, and not reduced to the neceſſity of courting the men. Such is the corrupt ſtate of our nature, that immediately upon their receiving ſuch an affront, they breathe nothing but revenge. The Scriptures inform us, that Potiphar's wife changed in like manner, her love into a very ſtrong and revengeful hatred againſt the Patriarch Joſeph (20). One of the Emperor Conſtantine's wives, conceived the like averſion to Criſpus, her huſband's ſon. It is therefore my opinion, that Lucian does not ſhew a good taſte in the affair in queſtion. But he ſeems more judicious with regard to the other: and is in the right in not believing, that Stratonice accuſed Combabus; ſhe having no reaſon, as Phædra had, to think herſelf deſpiſed. She might flatter herſelf with the thoughts of having appeared the moſt beautiful woman in the world in the eyes of her lover. What reaſon therefore ſhould ſhe have to be exaſperated againſt him? he could not have been kinder to the fineſt woman upon earth. But Stenobœa, Phædra, Potiphar's wife, and Fauſta could not ſay the ſame of the object of their loves, whoſe frozen indifference for them was not owing to an inſurmountable imperfection.

(18) Lucian, de Syria Dea, tom. 2. pag. 894.

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) Gen. chap. xxxix.

[H] .... And the error which thoſe have committed who aſſert, that the Courtiers emaſculated themſelves, in order to ingratiate themſelves with Stratonice.] The "love of ſeveral women for Eunuchs is ſo common, "that all hiſtories give inſtances of it. This paſſion "of Stratonice for Combabus, when an Eunuch, was "ſo much the more remarkable, in as much as all the "Courtiers of that Queen caſtrated themſelves alſo, "out of mere complaiſance, in order to ingratiate "themſelves with both." La Mothe le Vayer ſays this (21). But he here commits three miſtakes. Iſt, He ſuppoſes, that Stratonice's paſſion began after that ſhe knew Combabus was emaſculated; but this is a great miſtake. Had Stratonice known the execution which he had performed upon himſelf, ſhe would have made choice of ſome other object; and it is certain that the diſcovery of a certain imperfection is able to prevent the riſe of a paſſion, but not to extinguiſh it, when it is got to a great height. IIdly, He ſhould not have aſſerted, that all the Courtiers emaſculated themſelves; for Lucian ſays this only of Combabus's moſt intimate friends. IIIdly, Much leſs ſhould he have ſaid, that all the Courtiers emaſculated themſelves, in order to gain the favour of Stratonice; for Lucian does not ſay any thing like this; he only obſerves, that thoſe who had the greateſt affection for Combabus, caſtrated themſelves merely to conſole him for his misfortune. Λέγεται δὲ τῶν φίλων τοὺς μάλιστα οἱ ἐυνοίσαι ἐς παραμυθίην τῷ πάθει· κοινωνὸν ἑλέσθαι τῆς συμφορῆς ἑωυτοῖς ἐπὶ ἑωυτούς (22). It is a conſolation to the wretched to have companions in their miſery. We muſt take notice of two things; firſt, that Combabus, after his box had been opened, gained the King's favour in the higheſt degree; and ſecondly, that he deſired leave to return to the holy City, where he ſpent the remainder of his days. Add to this, that three years were to be employed in building the temple (23). It is probable, that Stratonice (after the expiration of this term) returned to her Conſort. She conſequently was ſeparated from Combabus; the perſons therefore who caſtrated themſelves out of complaiſance for Combabus, could not do this to pleaſe Stratonice. I confeſs that Lucian does not tell us, whether the friends of Combabus mutilated themſelves at the King's Court, or in the holy City; however, he hints plainly, that it was in the latter place; for he ſays, that their example gave riſe to a cuſtom which was obſerved annually, viz. the caſtrating of ſeveral perſons in the Temple built by Stratonice and Combabus (24). The Author of a French Dictionary (25), by copying the error of la Mothe le Vayer, had made it worſe. Here follow his words. "We find in hiſtories, that ſeveral women "have been diſtractedly in love with Eunuchs. Stra"tonice could not live a moment from Combabus who "was emaſculated; ſo that the Courtiers of this Queen "caſtrated themſelves, in order that they alſo might "ſhare in her favour. Cæſar Scaliger Exercitat. 277." This is encreaſing upon the error of la Mothe le Vayer; for he has not omitted Combabus, nor mentioned

(21) Lettre 192. tom. 11. pag. 525, 526.

(22) Lucian, de Syria Dea, tom. 2. pag. 897.

(23) Idem, ibid. pag. 892.

(24) Ibid. pag. 897.

(25) Ceſar de Rochefort: his Dictionary was printed at Lyons anno 1685, in folio. The paſſage I now cite, is from pag. 168.

COMENIUS (JOHN AMOS) a Grammarian and Proteſtant Divine in the ſeventeenth Century, was born in Moravia the 28th of March 1592. Having ſtudied in ſeveral places, and particularly in Herborn, he returned to his own country in 1614, and was made Rector of a College there (a). He was ordained Miniſter in 1616 (b), and was Paſtor of the Church of Fulnec in 1618 (c). At the ſame time he was appointed Maſter of the School which was lately ſet up in that little City. One of his greateſt deſigns at this time was, to introduce a new method for teaching the Languages. He publiſhed ſome Eſſays for this purpoſe in 1616, and he had prepared other pieces on that ſubject, which were deſtroyed in 1621, when the Spaniards plundered his Library, after having taken the City. The outlawry of all the Miniſters of Bohemia and Moravia, by an edict in 1624, interrupted his project, that he did not reſume it, but only at the requeſt of a Clergyman his friend, whom a Proteſtant Baron (d) had appointed Tutor to his three ſons in 1627. Some Miniſters, among whom was Comenius, were at that time concealed in the houſe of this Baron, in the mountains of Bohemia. However, the perſecution grew ſo hot the year following, that they were forced to leave the retreat abovementioned. Comenius fled to Leſna, a City of Poland, and taught Latin there. The book he publiſhed in 1631, under the title of Janua Linguarum reſerata, i. e. "the gate "of Languages unlocked," gained him prodigious reputation [A], inſomuch that thoſe who governed Sweden, wrote to him in 1638, and offered him a Commiſſion for new regulating all the Schools in that Kingdom. However, he did not think proper to accept of this offer, but only promiſed to aſſiſt, with his advice, thoſe who ſhould be appointed to execute that Commiſſion; and he then tranſlated into Latin the piece he had written in his native tongue, concerning the new method of inſtructing youth (e). A ſpecimen of this appeared under the title of Panſophiæ Prodromus (f), which made him be conſidered as one very capable of reforming the method of teaching. The Parliament of England deſired his aſſiſtance to reform the Schools of that Kingdom. Comenius arrived at London in September 1641, and would have been received by a Committee, in order for him to propoſe his plan, had not the Parliament been too much taken up with other matters. The civil wars which broke out in England, and the diſſentions which reigned in Ireland, ſhewed Comenius that this was not a juncture favourable to his deſigns. He therefore went to Sweden, whither he was invited by a perſon of merit (g), who had the public welfare very much at heart. He arrived there in Auguſt 1642. He diſcourſed

(a) Scholæ Præroviensi Præfectus. Præfat. Operum Didacticorum Comenii.

(b) Epiſt. Dedicat. Oper. Didact. Comenii.

(c) Præfat. Oper. Didact.

(d) George Sadowski de Slaupna.

(e) Ex Præfatione Operum Didacticorum.

(f) i. e. the forerunner of univerſal Learning.

(g) Lewis de Geer.

tioned Stratonice as the only motive of the Courtiers emaſculating themſelves; and farther, he does not cite Scaliger, who makes no mention of theſe particulars. In all other reſpects the tranſcriber is guilty of the ſame errors as la Mothe le Vayer. The example which he gives of Stratonice is not well choſen, becauſe ſhe did not fall in love with Combabus, after ſhe knew that he was an Eunuch. Since Lucian does not ſay, whether Combabus was imitated in his ſelf-caſtration, at the King's or Queen's Court; it is an inexcuſable raſhneſs in a modern Author, to preſume to determine, that it was in Stratonice's Court. We are to obſerve, particularly, that Combabus was the Minion in both theſe Courts; but that he was not at the King's and at the Queen's Court at the ſame time, ſince Stratonice's paſſion for him; for after this, he was either with the King in the Queen's abſence, or elſe with the Queen when the King was abſent. I ſhall add, that Lucian does not give the title of Courtiers to thoſe who conformed themſelves to Combabus: but ſays, on the contrary, that theſe were the trueſt and moſt intimate friends of Combabus; and that they followed his example, merely to conſole him. By what authority therefore ſhall a Writer, 1500 years after the incident happened, aſſert, that not only thoſe who emaſculated themſelves were Stratonice's Courtiers; but likewiſe, that the only motive of their doing this, was to inſpire this Queen with a paſſion for them. I own that my criticiſm on this head is a little too captious; and I do not offer it to the reader as a thing conſiderable in itſelf. The motive of my inſiſting upon it was, to cure if poſſible a diſtemper which reigns but too much among Authors. They cite, with a thouſand alterations and additions, whatever is related by the ancients. I am certain that, in our modern Writers there are an hundred paradoxes, accompanied with their citations in the margin, that have no better foundation than the abovementioned incident which la Mothe le Vayer relates, and makes others relate, with regard to the pretended method, which the Courtiers of Stratonice employed, in order to get into her good graces.

I ſhall conclude this article with the following note; it is related that Juno, out of friendſhip for Combabus, excited a great many perſons to caſtrate themſelves, in order that he might not be the only one who ſhould bewail the loſs of the affair in queſtion. Λέγουσις ὡς ἡ Ἥρη φιλέυσα Κομβάβον πολλοῖσι τὴν τομὴν ἐπὶ νόον ἔβαλλε ὅπως μὴ μοῦνος ἐπὶ τῇ ἀναιδείῃ λυπτέοιτο (26).

(26) Lucianus, de Syria Dea, tom. 2. pag. 897.

[A] The Book he publiſhed under the title of Janua Linguarum reſerata gained him prodigious reputation.] Had Comenius publiſhed only this Book, he would have immortalized himſelf. It has been printed a multitude of times; tranſlated into a great number of languages; and there are ſeveral polyglot Editions of it. I do not doubt but that Comenius is ſincere, when he owns, that the ſucceſs of this work exceeded infinitely his expectations; for who will not be ſurprized to hear, that ſuch a Book was tranſlated, not only into twelve European Languages, but alſo into Arabick, Turkiſh, Perſian, and Mogol. The moſt conceited Author would never have flattered him with the hopes of ſuch ſucceſs. Factum eſt, quod futurum imaginari non poteram, ut puerile iſtud opuſculum univerſali quodam eruditi Orbis applauſu fuerit exceptum. Teſtati ſunt id permulti variarum Gentium Viri, tum literis ad me datis, quibus inventioni novæ impenſe gratulabantur, tum tranſlationibus in Linguas vulgares quaſi certatim ſuſceptis. Non ſolum enim in omnes Europeæ linguas (1) (XII numero, quarum editiones publicas vidimus, nempe Latinam, Græcam, Bohemicam, Polonicam, Germanicam, Suedicam, Belgicam, Anglicam, Gallicam, Hiſpanicam, Italicam, Hungaricam,) ſed in Aſiaticas, Arabicam, Turcicam, Perſicam, adeoque Mogolicam, toti Orientali Indiæ familiarem (ut ex literis ad Jacobum Golium, Orientalium LL. Lugduni veſtræ Profeſſorem, à Petro Golio fratre, Alepo Syriæ Anno 1641 datis, patet) tranſlatus eſſet idem Libellus noſter (2). i. e. "A circumſtance has happened which I could never "have expected, viz. that this little Book, calculated "only for children, ſhould have met with uni-"verſal applauſe from the learned. This has been "teſtified by the Letters I received from a great number "of learned men of various Nations, in which they "congratulate me on the invention; as alſo by the "verſions which have been emulouſly made of it, in-"to ſeveral of the modern Tongues. For it has not "only been tranſlated and publiſhed in twelve Euro-"pean languages, viz. Latin, Greek, Bohemian, Poliſh, "German,

(1) Here follow the names of ſome Tranſlators of the Book in queſtion, ex Diario Biographico Henn. Witte. The German Tranſlation is by Johannes Mochingerus; the Poliſh by Andreas Wegierſcius; the Bohemian by Comenius; the Greek tranſlation by Theodorus Simonius; the Engliſh one, by John Ancoranus; the French by Samuel Hartlib; the Italian and Spaniſh, by Nathaniel Duez; the Flemiſh, by Seidelius.

(2) Comenius, Epiſt. Dedicator. Operum Didactic. ad Conſules Amſterdam. pag. 1.

diſcourſed with Oxenſtiern about his method; and the reſult of the affair was this, that he ſhould go and ſettle at Elbing in Pruſſia, and there compoſe his method. But I omit the beſt circumſtance of all. The Patron in queſtion was very generous; he ſettled a conſiderable ſtipend on him, by which means Comenius, now delivered from the fatigues of teaching [B], employed himſelf wholly in diſcovering ways and general methods, for thoſe who inſtructed youth. He applied himſelf in this ſtudy at Elbing, during four years; after which he returned to Sweden, to ſhew his compoſition. It was examined by three Commiſſioners, who declared it worthy of being made public, after that the Author ſhould have quite finiſhed it. To this Comenius employed himſelf, during the two following years, in the abovementioned City of Elbing; after which he was obliged to return to Leſna (b). We are now come to 1648. I find that, two years after, he took a journey to the Court of Sigiſmund Ragotſki, Prince of Tranſilvania, where a conference was deſired with him, in order for reforming the method of teaching in ſchools. He gave this Prince ſome pieces, containing inſtructions for regulating the College of Patak (i), purſuant to the maxims laid down in his Panſophia; and, during four years, he was allowed to propoſe whatever he pleaſed, with regard to the government of that College (k). After this he returned to Leſna, and did not leave it till April 1656, when it was burnt by the Poles [C]. He there loſt all his manuſcripts, except what he had written on Panſophia, and on the Revelations (l). He fled into Sileſia, thence to Brandenburg, afterwards to Hamburg, and laſtly to Amſterdam (m), where he met with extremely charitable people. The golden ſhower which came pouring upon him in this city, prevailed with him to reſide in it during the remainder of his days [D]. He there printed in 1657, at the expence of his chief Mecænas (n), the different parts of his new method of Teaching. This work, in folio, is divided into four parts; the whole coſt the Author prodigious pains; other people a great deal of money, and the Learned have not received any benefit by it; and, in my opinion, there is nothing practicably uſeful in the hints of that Author (o). However, he was not only bigotted with reſpect to the reformation of Schools; but he alſo filled his brain with Prophecies, Revolutions, the ruining of Antichriſt, the Millenium, and ſuch like ideas of a dangerous enthuſiaſm; I ſay dangerous, not only with regard to the Orthodox Faith, but alſo to Kings and Governments. He collected with prodigious care the chimeras of one Kotterus, thoſe of Chriſtina Poniatovia, and of Drabicius, and publiſhed them in Amſterdam. Theſe chimeras promiſed miracles to thoſe who ſhould attempt to extirpate the Houſe of Auſtria and the Pope. Guſtavus Adolphus, and Charles Guſtavus Kings of Sweden, Cromwell and Ragotſki, had been promiſed, as thoſe who ſhould put theſe ſplendid Prophecies in execution, to which however the event did not correſpond. We are told, that Comenius not knowing which way to turn himſelf, at laſt took it into his head to addreſs Lewis XIV of France [E]. He

(b) Ex Præfatione Partis II. Operum Didacticorum.

(i) Suſanna Lorantſi mother to Sigiſmund Ragotski, took this ſchool more immediately under her protection. See Comenius, Part 3. Operum Didactic. pag. 70.

(k) See Part 3. of his Opera Didactica.

(l) Hiſtoria Revelationum, pag. 181.

(m) Ibid. pag. 182.

(n) Laurence de Geer, ſon of Lewis.

(o) Sorbiere has drawn admirably well the character of this man, and of his Panſophia. See the Sorberiana, pag. 51.

" German, Swediſh, Dutch, Engliſh, French, Spaniſh, " Italian, Hungarian; but likewiſe into the Aſiatick " Languages, as Arabic, Turkiſh, Perſian, and even " the Mogul, which is ſpoke all over the Eaſt-Indies, " as appears from the Letter written from Aleppo, in " 1641, by Peter Golius, to his brother John Golius, " Profeſſor of the Oriental Languages at Leyden."

[B] Comenius was delivered from the fatigues of teaching.] Hitherto, his labours had been confined merely to the care of a ſingle School, but they now extended to all the Colleges. This is the ſame as if a Country Prieſt ſhould be made a Cardinal. Factis mihi, ſays he (3), a Mecænate meo beato otiis, conſtitutaque honeſta (ut particulari ſcholæ miniſtrandi functione exemptus, communioribus poſſem vacare ſtudiis) ſuſtentatione, elaboravi ſexennio. i. e. " Having, by the generoſity of " my kind Mecænas, got leiſure, and obtained a de- " cent competency (in order that being freed from the " care of teaching a private ſchool, I might devote myſelf " to a more general ſtudy) I have ſpent ſix years &c."

(3) Comen. Epiſt. Dedicator. Conſulibus Amſterdam.

[C] He returned to Leſna, and did not leave it .... till it was burnt by the Poles.] We ſhall ſee below (4), that Comenius has been reproached with having been the cauſe of this diſaſter (5); and that could he have followed his inclination, he would not have ſtaid in that City, tho' he adviſed others not to be afraid; and aſſured them that their deliverance was at hand.

(4) In the Remark [K].

(5) Poſt Leſnæ incendium quod ſua πολυπραγμοσύνη illi miſeræ urbi conciviſſet, ut etiam illi publicè exprobratum eſt. Mareſius, in Antirrhetico, pag. 8. i. e. " After the " burning of " Leſna, which " calamity (as " he was pub- " lickly re- " proached for " it) was brought " upon that un- " happy city by " his haughti- " neſs and pride."

[D] The golden ſhower which came pouring upon him in this city, prevailed with him to reſide in it during the remainder of his days.] Some perſons were offended at this, ſince his office of Superintendant of the Poliſh and Bohemian Churches required his preſence in thoſe Countries. There is ſome probability to think, that he would have continued his rambling way of life longer, had he not met with ſo plentiful a ſubſiſtence at Amſterdam. He there found charitable perſons, and rich merchants who were perſuaded that he would teach their children Latin after a ſhort and eaſy method; and therefore thought themſelves obliged to pay generouſly a perſon who ſaved youth their time, and ſmooth'd their progreſs in ſtudy. He doubtleſs ſaid to himſelf, It is good to live here, let us therefore pitch our tents in this place. Mercatoribus quibuſdam Amſterdamenſibus gratus vivit, qui delicatulis ſuis filiis, ejus opera habitum latinitatis nullo labore, & majore æris quam temporis diſpendio, infundi poſſe ſperant Et ſic ille auream apud eos meſſem metit; at vero ubi manet cura Eccleſiarum Polonicarum & Bohemicarum; quarum ſenior & ſuperintendens eſt, & quas in tam miſero ſtatu reliquit ſibi conſulens (6)? i. e. " He is generouſly befriended " by ſome Merchants of Amſterdam, who fancy that " by his aſſiſtance, their darling ſons may learn to " ſpeak Latin, without pains, and with a leſs expence " of time than money. In this manner Comenius " reaps a golden harveſt among them. But then, " where is his regard and care of the Churches of Po- " land and Bohemia, whoſe Elder and Superintendant " he is; and which he (when he was ſo careful of his " own ſafety) left in ſo calamitous a ſtate?" Arnoldus here gives, in few words, a lively deſcription of the paternal tenderneſs which the Dutch have for their children.

(6) See Nicholas Arnoldus, in Diſcurſu Theologico contra Comenium, in the laſt page.

[E] Not knowing which way to turn himſelf, he at laſt took it into his head, to addreſs Lewis XIVth of France.] I have heard ſeveral perſons affirm it, and this is all I can ſay of the matter. But with regard to the promiſe itſelf, I ſhall cite an Author, who is very converſant in Dabricius, and therefore to be credited with reſpect to the particulars which he declares were read by him in Dabricius. Here follow his words. The Spaniards may boaſt, if they pleaſe, the ſignal advantages, which the Houſe of Auſtria obtains over its enemies; with regard to us (he ſpeaks in the name of the Proteſtants) if we have not quite reaſon enough to be ſatisfied with the preſent ſtate of affairs, we yet may very juſtly conceive great hopes of the future. There is a prediction which promiſes the Empire to the King. It is by Dabricius, a Bohemian, who propheſied about twenty

He ſent him a copy of Drabicius's Prophecies; and inſinuated, that it was to this Monarch God promiſed the Empire of the world, by the downfal of thoſe who perſecuted Chriſt. He wrote ſome books in Amſterdam under an inauſpicious planet, which may be ſaid chiefly with regard to that which he publiſhed againſt Mr. Des Marets, concerning the Millenium. He drew a moſt furious anſwer on himſelf, in which the Author pretends that he has pulled off his maſk (p). He is there repreſented as a bite and a true ſharper [F], who reaped admirable advantage, by his character of a perſon who was a refugee for Religion; and by the pompous ideas of his method of teaching; who made, I ſay, a wonderful uſe of theſe ſprings, to empty the purſes of tender hearted perſons. He alſo was exhibited in other diſadvantageous lights [G]. Comenius was at laſt ſenſible of years ago, that the King ſhould be made Emperor, and the Houſe of Auſtria be deſtroyed; that Vienna ſhould be taken by the Turks, that theſe would make themſelves maſters of Carinthia and Styria; and would march, and deſtroy the Republic of Venice and the City of Rome; and that the King, being elected Emperor, will reſtore peace and the free exerciſe of Religion to all Europe. We find that for theſe fifteen or ſixteen years, heaven is preparing to perform its promiſes, and we'll certainly do whatever lies in our power to fulfil theſe prophecies. The Houſe of Auſtria is already humbled and almoſt deſtroyed. The King is poſſeſſed of the great City of Straſburgh, of all Alſatia, and of Friburg; and has under his command all the countries watered by the Rhine, and five Electors, three of whom are Eccleſiaſticks; and the other two, the Palatine of the Rhine, and the Elector of Brandenburgh; the war with the Grand Signior is not yet ended, and who knows what will be the reſult of all this (7). This Author has changed his ſyſtem very much ſince that time (8).

(p) Ita Deo diſpenſante evenit, ut tua importunitate coactus, larvam tibi detraxerim, & quam hactenus egeris perſonam in hac ſcena mundi toti mundo oſtenderim. Mareſius, in Antirrhetico, pag. 11. i. e. "Thus, "by the Providence of God, "and compelled "to it by your "importunity, I "have pulled off "your mask; "and ſhewed to "the whole "world, the part "you have hi-"therto acted in "it."

(7) Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld, tom. 2. pag. 290, 291. This Book was printed, ſoon after the raiſing the ſiege of Vienna.

(8) See La Cabale Chimerique, pag. 133, 134. of the 2d edition; where the Reader will find, among other particulars the following. "Oh how ſoon "his Syſtem "faced about; "and how much "ought he to be "aſhamed to "have rendered "us, as much as "lay in his pow-"er, the deteſta-"tion of the Chri-"ſtian name, and "of our faithful "Allies, in de-"claring, that "we would en-"deavour with "all our might, "to engage the "Turks to de-"ſtroy the Houſe "of Auſtria, the "Republic of "Venice, and "the City of "Rome; and to "raiſe Lewis the "XIVth to the "Imperial "Throne? Quantum mutatus ab illo!"

[F] He is there repreſented as a bite and a true ſharper.] Here follow the words of his antagoniſt. Agnoſco hominem eſſe ingenii eximii & admodum inventivi, ac, plane ei convenientis qui diceret, con l'arte l'inganno io vivi mezzo l'anno: con l'inganno e l'arte, io vivo l'altra parte. Nam ut nullum hoc ſæculum tulit myſticum æruſcatorem illo ſubtiliorem, ita nullum protulit ſcriptorem in trichotomiis excogitandis feliciorem (9). i. e. "I acknowledge Comenius to be poſſeſſed of a fine, "and very inventive genius, and ſuch a one as would "well ſuit a man who ſhould ſay, I ſubſiſt half the "year by tricking and artifice, and by artifice and tricking I ſubſiſt the other half: for as this Age has not "produced a more arch ſharper than Comenius, neither has it given birth to a Writer who has a happier knack at ſtarting of nice and uſeful diſtinctions." See what he relates concerning the craft, which Comenius employed with regard to Lewis de Geer, in order that he might be the only object of his liberality, and to make it laſt the longer. The Panſophia he promiſed, and which never appear'd in print, was always kept back, as he uſed to ſay, by ſome extraordinary occurrences; ſo that, by ſuch delays, Comenius made it quite uſeleſs according to his own principles; for he pretended that the reign of the millenium was to begin in 1672 (10). Now there would have been no occaſion, for Comenius's new method of teaching at that period. Mr. Des Marets obſerves (11), that Comenius put his Patron to four times more expence, every year, than his ſalary amounted to, Auſim dicere Comenium triplo vel quadruplo quotannis amplius conſtitiſſe uni familiæ Degerianæ, dum eam fraudulenter lactat ſpe Panſophica, & paſcit ſive faſcinat potius fumo Chiliaſtico, & revelationum Drabicianarum, quam ſoleo conſequi in meum ſtipendium annuum ex ærario publico. i. e. "I dare be ſo bold as to aſſert, that "Comenius coſt the ſingle family of de Geer, three "or four times as much annually, as I am paid yearly "out of the public treaſury, whilſt he fraudulently "cajoles them with his chiliaſtic ſmoke or dreams "of the Millenium, and with the revelations of Drabicius."

(9) Mareſius, in Antirrhetico, pag. 5.

(10) Idem, ibid. pag. 8.

(11) Ibid. pag. 55.

[G] He alſo was exhibited in other diſadvantageous lights.] In the firſt place, he is accuſed of being exceſſively proud; and it is obſerved, that this is the uſual defect of thoſe who pretend to be inſpired by heaven. And indeed this is ſo great a privilege, that we muſt not be ſurprized, when thoſe who imagine themſelves honoured from God with ſo extraordinary a mark of diſtinction, behave with the utmoſt contempt towards other Divines who are not intoxicated with ſuch chimæras. But this denotes at the ſame time, that they are in the wrong to boaſt their being inſpired; for were God to favour them in this ſignal manner, he would not refuſe them the ſpirit of Chriſtian Humility; they would not be ſo highly incenſed againſt all thoſe who will not give credit to their idle notions, Ut eſt ſui plenus (In this manner Des-Marets (12) ſpeaks of Comenius) & grandia ſentit de ſeipſo, prout ſolent omnes iſti Viſionarii qui ſpeciale cum numine commercium ſibi intercedere gloriantur eſſe ſuperbiſſimi, non poteſt æquo ferre animo ſuas non dicam ſolum nænias. & quiſquilias, ſed fanaticas, & enthuſiaſticas cogitationes improbari .i. e. "As he is very full "of himſelf and entertains the higheſt idea of his own "merit, as do all ſuch Enthuſiaſts who boaſt their "having an immediate correſpondence with the Di-"vine Being; he cannot bear to have his nonſenſe "and riffraff, or rather his fanatic and enthuſiaſtic "chimæras diſapproved." IIdly, Comenius is accuſed of having been angry, particularly becauſe it was proved that he had contradicted himſelf. He had writ againſt one Felgenhaverus who gave out Prophecies very like thoſe of Dabricius (13), Comenius oppoſed to him almoſt the ſame reaſons which refuted the chimæras of Dabricius, and conſequently he had refuted himſelf beforehand; and no other expedient was neceſſary, in order to make him the object of ridicule, but to oppoſe his own arguments one againſt the other. This exaſperated him to the higheſt degree. And ſuch is the fate of obſtinacy and ſelf conceit; and of thoſe who become fanaticks, by imbibing too eager a fondneſs for certain opinions. Their firſt works deſtroy their laſt; and if any man preſumes to reproach them with their contradictions, they immediately fly into a great paſſion. We have ſeen ſo extraordinary an inſtance of this ſince the death of Comenius, that it is not neceſſary to particularize it here. IIIdly, He is accuſed of want of judgment: but as for genius and memory, it is not denied but that he poſſeſſed both in an eminent degree; and to prove his want of judgment, it was objected to him that he undertook too many things; was reſtleſs and turbulent, that he could not come to any certainty with regard to his notions on Grammar. Non mirum eſt quod in Comenio ſumma ἀκρισία ſummæ ingenii dexteritati conjungatur. Illam comprobant ἀκρισίαν conſtans ejus πολυπραγμοσύνη genus vitæ deſultorium, & ἀκαταστασία perpetua, quæ maximè in ſuis Grammaticationibus fingendis & refingendis per totos 30 annos eluxit (14). IVthly, Comenius is accuſed of inconſtancy in matters of Religion. It was objected to him that he had long meditated a project concerning the pacification of the Church, in concert with the Socinians (15). Zwickerus who was of that Sect, reproached him with this publickly. It is added, that Comenius had a wonderful flexibility of temper whereby he could conform himſelf to the maxims of any Sect among whom he happened to live; but that if common fame ſaid true, he did not communicate with any party. He is reproached for his lukewarmneſs in not attempting to refute the Papiſts, he having never writ any thing againſt them, except a little Book in oppoſition to Valerian Magni a Capuchin, to which he even did not put his name till he had diſguiſed it according to the myſterious rules of the Cabala (16). He juſtified himſelf however in the ſecond Edition of this treatiſe, by ſaying that he had never loved diſputes. He intended to annex to this ſecond Edition, a plan for uniting the Proteſtants and Papiſts; but his friends obliged him to ſuppreſs it (17). His antagoniſts forgot to cite as a proof of his inconſtancy, the works he publiſhed againſt the Irenicon Irenicorum of Zwickerus the Socinian (18). But on the other ſide it was reproached to him, that whilſt his

(12) Ibid. pag. 5.

(13) Idem, ibid.

(14) Idem, ibid.

(15) Idem, ibid. pag. 6.

(16) Ita tepidus eſt in propugnanda Proteſtantium cauſa contra Pontificios, ut non niſi ſemel tale quid fecerit adverſus Valerianum Magnum Capucinum ſuo ordinario nomine diſſimulato, & aſſumpto Cabaliſtico Huldrici Newfeldii quod præfixit illi paucularum plagarum opuſculo. Mareſius, in Antirrhetico.

(17) This Book is intitled, Abſurditatum Echo. The 2d edition is of 1658.

(18) See the Remark [M].

of the vanity of his labours [H], and of the great trouble he had given himſelf, ever ſince the time that Providence had forced him to leave his native country. And indeed, it would have been more laudable in him, had he turned his eyes inward, and applied his whole thoughts to his ſalvation, during his exile, rather than to buſy himſelf ſo much about the tranſactions of Europe, in order to diſcover, in the intereſts of Princes, in their wars, alliances, &c. wherewithal to ſooth the hopes he entertained of being reſtored to his country, as well as revenged of his enemies: it was this threw him into enthuſiaſm. He died in Amſterdam the 15th of November 1671 (q). Had he lived but a very little longer, he himſelf would have been a witneſs of the falſity of his promiſes with regard to the Millenium [I]. He was in his eightieth year when he died. Some perſons were ſurpriſed how it was poſſible for him to live ſo long [K]; and that the grief, to find himſelf ſo unſucceſsful in his Prophecies, did not ſhorten his days. Meſſieurs Bourignon and Comenius his two Mecænas's were living he had always made honourable mention of Des Cartes; whereas after their death he publiſhed a libel againſt that famous Philoſopher. V. The chief defect reproached to Comenius is Enthuſiaſm. Sed præſertim eſt Comenius Fanaticus, Viſionarius, & Enthuſiaſta in folio (19). i. e. "But "eſpecially Comenius is a Fanatic, a Viſionary Crea- "ture and an Enthuſiaſt of the firſt claſs." He pretended that Dabricius's Propheſies would cut out work enough for all the Princes of Europe; for this reaſon he wrote letters to the Pope, to the Emperor, to Kings, and to Cardinals, in order to recommend this work to them, as the rule and ſtandard by which they were to conduct themſelves. Datis ad Papam, ad Imperatorem, ad Reges, ad Cardinales literis, has nænias illis de meliori nota commendare atque exinde quid facere, quid cavere, quid metuere debeant illis præſcribere (20). Comenius was always attentive to the events which happened in Europe, in order to reconcile them with the ſyſtem of his Chimeras! It is the cuſtom of ſuch perſons (as has been ſeen by late inſtances,) to ſquare and adjuſt ſome part of their predictions, to the articles of the News-Papers. Comenius being in doubt whether the Plenipotentiaries of England and Holland, who were to treat about a peace at Breda, in 1667, could conclude it; diſpatched one of his angels to tell them, that they muſt put an end to the war; and by this means facilitate the coming of the reign of Chriſt Jeſus, that reign of a thouſand years which would reſtore the golden age, and the ſtate of innocence (21). VIthly. It is reproached to him, that himſelf and ſuch other millenary Fanaticks have no other view but to ſpirit up people to rebellion; and that he omitted no endeavours to perſuade Cromwell to raiſe diſturbances in Bohemia. Ne objiciam Comenio quæ ipſe quondam per tertium molitus eſt apud Cromwellium ad reſturbandas in Bohemia (22). VIIthly and laſtly, Comenius is reproached with having choſe to expoſe the authority of the Scriptures, rather than own that he was in an error. He had long before concluded (23), that ſince the event did not anſwer the Prophecies of Felgenhaverus, they did not come from God; but with regard to thoſe of his three Seers (24), he protected them againſt all oppoſers, altho' their Prophecies had been contradicted by the event, and he even compared their idle predictions with thoſe of the Old Teſtament. Nunc verò ſuas propugnat etſi ab eventu fuerint deſtitutæ, imo eas impiè, profanè, & ſacrilegè cum prophetiis V. T. audet conferre (25).

(q) Epiſt. Danielis Comenii Joh. Amaſii Filii, apud Spizelium in Infel. Literat. pag. 1028. Konig is miſtaken, in fixing Comenius's death to 1670.

(19) Mareſius, in Antirrhetico, pag. 9.

(20) Idem, pag. 10.

(21) He publiſhed a Book intitled, Angelus pacis ad Legatos pacis Anglos & Belgas Bredam miſſus, indeque ad omnes Chriſtianos per Europam, & mox ad omnes Populos per Orbem totum mittendus, ut ſe ſiſtant, belligerare deſiſtant, paciſque Principi Chriſto pacem gentibus jam loquuturo locum faciant. He promiſed to publiſh two other Books, which were to be intitled, The double Aurora of the mighty Day that was going to riſe. Mareſ. in Antirrhetico, pag. 10.

(22) Ibid. pag. 58.

(23) In Epiſtola ad Stolcium, anno 1640.

24 Cotterus, Poniatovia, Drabicius.

(25) Mareſ. in Antirrhet. pag. 66.

(26) In Infelice Literato, pag. 1024, & ſeq.

(27) Mareſ. in Antirrhet. pag. 8.

[H] Comenius was at laſt ſenſible of the vanity of his labours.] See the Book he publiſhed at Amſterdam, entitled by him Unius neceſſarii anno 1668, and the applauſes which are beſtowed upon him by Spizelius (26) for this confeſſion; and the deſign he entertained of employing all his future thoughts wholly on his ſalvation.

[I] Had he lived but a very little longer, he himſelf would have been a witneſs to the falſity of his promiſes with regard to the Millenium.] He affirmed that it would begin in 1672 or 1673 (27). There is ſcarce any perſon but what thinks, that Comenius died in very a propos time, ſince he thereby avoided the ſhame and confuſion of being himſelf an eye-witneſs to the vanity of his predictions. But I am of opinion, that his death was not of much advantage to him; for he met ſo often with this kind of misfortunes, and was ſo much hardened againſt whatever people ſhould ſay, that he would have been quite inſenſible to this laſt diſgrace. Theſe Gentlemen are of an excellent temper; nothing can ruffle them, or put them out of countenance; they appear as boldly in company after the expiration of the period as before; they do not fear either the jokes or the ſerious reproaches to which they muſt be expoſed. They are ever ready to begin again; in a word, they are proof againſt the moſt juſtly grounded mortifications. We muſt not aſcribe this wholly to the odd caſt of their minds and affections; the public is more to be blamed than they, becauſe of their too extreme indulgence towards ſuch people. It is ſaid commonly, that God pardons all things, and men nothing; but this maxim is falſe when applied to the Commentators on the Revelations; it is very plain that God has not the ſame indulgence as the public, for the bold interpretations which thoſe pretended Prophets give to the Oracles of the Holy Scriptures at the ſame time that they expoſe them to the contempt of unbelievers. A learned Divine obſerves, that Comenius did not loſe his credit in any manner, tho' he had impoſed upon the people an hundred times, by his idle dreams; and was ſtill conſidered as a great Prophet; ſo true it is, that people love to be impoſed upon in certain things (28). I obſerved before, that Comenius ſtill continued to publiſh the predictions of Dabricius as coming from God, even after they had been contradicted by the event. Here follows an inſtance of this. He was Dabricius's Coadjutor, and was to be one of thoſe, who in preſence of this Prophet, ſhould ſet the Crown of Hungary on the head of Prince Ragotſki at Preſburg (29); after that Dabricius ſhould have gone into Tranſilvania, in order to proclaim this Prince King of Hungary; and to anoint him in preſence of all the people at the end of the Sermon, which he was to have preached on the following text. I HAVE ANOINTED HIM MY KING, UPON MY HOLY HILL. Suſcipe iter ad principem .... ut eum coram toto exercitu quem ad ipſum collegi ungas & proclames Regem terræ hujus. Sed præmittas concionem ſuper verba Pſalmi ſecundi, Ego unxi Regem meum, &c. quam concionem ſtatim meditare, peractaque illa effundas oleum unctionis olei Balſami (quod reperies in aula principis) in conſpectu totius populi ſuper caput principis (30). i. e. "Set out to the Prince, in order to "anoint and proclaim him King of this land, in pre- "ſence of the whole army which I aſſembled for "him. But firſt preach a Sermon on the following "words of Pſalm II, I have anointed my King &c. "which Sermon compoſe immediately, and after hav- "ing preached it, pour the anointed oil of balſam "(this you will find in that Prince's Court) on the head "of the Prince, in preſence of all the people." He lived long enough to be aſſured, that this could never come to paſs.

(28) Interea toties ineptiis ejus decepti eum pro magno Propheta habere pergunt, nec quicquam inde detrimenti authoritas ejus ſentit. Sic mundus vult decipi. Arnoldus, in the Appendix of the Diſcurſus Theologicus, pag. ult.

(29) Scribe Adjuncto (Comenio) illum fore unum de illis qui regio capiti coronam imponent te quoque præſente. Revel. 155. ver. 3, 4. apud Arnoldum, Diſcurſ. Theol. contra Comenium, pag. 37.

(30) Revel. xxx. 4. apud Arnold. ibid.

[K] Some perſons were ſurprized how it was poſſible for him to live ſo long.] It is difficult to conceive how a man of honour can long ſurvive the ſhame of having been the promoter of Prophecies, which the event had confuted in ſuch a manner as ſeemed purpoſely to contradict them. Comenius was alſo expoſed to ſeveral other kinds of mortification which muſt neceſſarily have been as grievous to him as thoſe in queſtion.

In theſe he was reproached with having done great prejudice to his baniſhed brethren (31). Moſt of them had fled from their country with conſiderable ſums of money; but inſtead of being œconomiſts, they ſquandered it away in a ſhort time, becauſe Comenius aſſured that they ſhould return immediately to their native country; that on theſe promiſes they imagined there was no occaſion for them to be ſaving; but that it was better to rid themſelves of whatever might incumber them in their journey. By this means they were

(31) See Arnoldus, Diſcurſ. Theolog. contra Comenium.

Comenius had a cordial and ſpiritual eſteem for one another [L]. I muſt not omit, that he publiſhed a piece againſt the Socinians [M]. The Author of a book intitled JANUA COELORUM RESERATA, i. e. The Gate of Heaven unlock'd, choſe, as we are told, this title, becauſe there is no one to which the ear is more accuſtomed than to that of Janua Linguarum reſerata of Comenius [N]. There will be many particulars in the Articles DRABICIUS were ſoon reduced to beggary, in ſpite of all the fine promiſes with which they had fed themſelves. Comenius was alſo accuſed (32), of having been the cauſe of the plundering and burning of Leſna (33) in Poland, where his brethren had been indulged an aſylum and as it were their Pella; to have been I ſay the cauſe of it, by the Panegyric he made ſo unſeaſonably on Charles Guſtavus King of Sweden, when he invaded Poland. Comenius proclaimed him in a prophetic manner, to be the immediate deſtroyer of Popery; whereby the Proteſtants of Poland became extremely odious to the Roman Catholicks of that Kingdom; and he did not ſeem to be undeceived when the King of Sweden turned his arms ſoon after againſt Denmark. Comenius made him a ſecond Panegyrick (34), wherein he congratulated him no leſs on this new invaſion, than he had done upon the former. It was a great error to imagine, that the abovementioned Prince intended to deſtroy Popery. The Elector of Brandenburg acquainted Richard Cromwell in a letter that the Swedes had made a dreadful havock of the Proteſtants in Poland (35); and no Princes contributed ſo much as thoſe of the Proteſtant Religion, to diſpoſſeſs Charles Guſtavus of his conqueſts. The faith of Comenius was ſhaken at certain times; for tho' it is related (36), that upon his bare word, the Proteſtants of Leſna thought their great deliverance near at hand, and therefore did not take care to retire with their effects to ſome ſecure aſylum; he himſelf tells us (37), that he propoſed to ſecure himſelf from the impending ſtorm; but that not being able to get diſmiſſed from his Church, and being unwilling to bring a reflection upon it, by quitting it without leave, (which he was told would be ſetting an ill example) he and the reſt were ſurprized by the Poliſh Army; on which occaſion he loſt his houſe, his furniture, his Library; and ſeveral works in the compoſing of which he had ſpent above forty years. Only part of the Apocalyptick Treatiſes, and ſome other Pieces (28), eſcaped the flames; he had juſt time to throw them into a hole and cover them with earth, and they were taken from it ten days after the fire (39).

(32) Ibid. and pag. 83.

(33) This City was burnt about the latter end of April 1657.

(34) Arnoldus, Diſcurſ. Theolog. pag. 69.

(35) This Letter contains ſeveral curious particulars. It is dated Dec. 28, 1658; and is inſerted in the Præſtantium & eruditorum Virorum Epiſtolæ, pag. 897. edit. 1684.

(36) Arnoldus, pag. 87.

(37) Equidem ſubducere me mature volui metu ſive talis alicujus tragici exitus, ſive diuturnioris belli ... ſed impetrare à meis demiſſionem non potui; cum ſcandalo autem deſerere gregem (malo prorſus exemplo, ut dictitabant) nolui. Hiſt. Revel. pag. 181.

(38) Thoſe which related to the Panſophia.

(39) Hiſtoria Revelationum, pag. 281.

[L] Madam Bourignon and Comenius had a cordial and ſpiritual eſteem for one another.] "Comenius fell out "with Serrarius, becauſe the latter behaved with ſo "much paſſion and injuſtice towards her. He pre"ſerved an entire friendſhip for her all the remainder "of his life; and being upon his death bed, he de"ſired her to pay him a laſt viſit, ſaying to thoſe "who ſpoke of her: O where is this holy maid! let "me have the ſatisfaction of ſeeing her once more be"fore I die. All the learning and knowledge which I "have acquired, are only the productions of the under"ſtanding and reaſon of man, and the effects of hu"man ſtudy; but ſhe is poſſeſſed of a wiſdom and light "that proceed immediately from God only, thro' the "Holy Ghoſt. After ſhe had viſited him at his requeſt "and was withdrawn; he ſaid frequently, in the "higheſt tranſports of joy, to thoſe who came to ſee "him: I have ſeen an Angel of God; God ſent me "his Angel to day. He died ſome time after in the "grace of God, as Mrs. Bourignon did not doubt; "ſhe often uſing to ſay, that ſhe had never known "a man of learning, who had a more upright heart, "and was poſſeſſed of a greater ſpirit of humility "than Comenius (40).

(40) Vie continuée de Mad. Bourignon, pag. 292.

[M] He publiſhed a piece againſt the Socinians.] A Socinian writ a Book entitled, Irenicum Irenicorum, ſeu reconciliatoris Chriſtianorum hodiernorum norma triplex, ſana omnium hominum ratio, ſcriptura ſacra, & traditiones, and dedicated it to the Pope. Neither the name of the Author, nor the date or place where it was printed are ſet down; but it is known that it was written by a Phyſician born in Dantzick, called Daniel Zwickerus, and that he got it printed at Amſterdam in 1658 (41). Comenius refuted this work by another entitled, De Irenico Irenicorum, hoc eſt conditionibus pacis à Socini ſecta reliquo Chriſtiano orbi oblatis, ad omnes Chriſtianos facta admonitio, printed at Amſterdam, in 1660, and which was alſo refuted ſoon after; for Zwickerus publiſhed in the ſame city, anno 1661, his Irenicomaſtix perpetuo convictus & conſtrictus, ſeu nova confirmatio infallibilitatis Irenici Irenicorum per oſtenſam utilitatem criminoſæ COMENIANAE Refutationis. Soon after Comenius printed an Anſwer, which was followed in a little time by a Work of Zwickerus entitled, Irenicomaſtix poſterior iterato victus & conſtrictus, imo obmuteſcens, ſeu novum & memorabile exemplum infeliciſſimæ pugnæ Dn. Joh. Amos Comenii, contra Irenici Irenicorum Autorem. Comenius took the field once more, and his antagoniſt did the ſame, he publiſhing, Irenicomaſtigis pars ſpecialis, ſeu finalis Confutatio Comenii, Hoornbeekii, & aliorum (42). We are to obſerve, by the way, that Dr. Bull has refuted ſeveral paſſages of the Irenicum Irenicorum, and that he is accuſed for not having read the other works of the ſame Author, for want of which he cenſured Daniel Zwickerus for ſome points which he would not have objected to him, had he peruſed his Irenicomaſtix perpetuus convictus, &c. This is objected to him in a Pſeudonymous Piece, printed at London anno 1697, and entitled, Fides primorum Chriſtianorum ex Barnaba, Herma, & Clemente Romano, monſtrata, Defenſioni Fidei Nicenæ D. Georgii Bulli oppoſita (43).

(41) See the Bibliotheque of the Antitrinitarians, pag. 152.

(42) Extracted from the Bibliotheques of the Antitrinitarians, pag. 152.

(43) The Author aſſumes the name of Lucas Mellierus, V. D. M. Obſerve that Lucas Mellierus is the anagram of Samuel Crellius, the real name of the Author, grandſon of the famous John Crellius.

[N] The Author of a Book entitled, JANUA COELORUM RESERATA choſe, as we are told, this title, becauſe there is none to which the ear is more accuſtomed than to that of Janua Linguarum Reſerata of Comenius.] As this Book is not very much known, it may not be improper to take ſome notice of it here, in order that my Readers may have a general idea of it, without having recourſe to other Books, or even moving from their ſeats.

I ſay therefore that the real or pretended name of the Author of this Book (44), is Carus Larebonius. He attacks in the ſtyle and manner of a Peripatetick Philoſopher, Mr. Jurieu's Syſtem of the Church; and quite overthrows it, ſince he ſhews plainly, that according to the hypotheſis of this Miniſter, perſons of all Religions may be ſaved. This is very grievous to Mr. Jurieu, as it is depriving him of the moſt valuable part of his poſſeſſions, and deſtroying the work which did him moſt honour. For Mr. Nicolle among ſo many works of Mr. Jurieu, thought this only deſerved to be anſwered. He had formed two claſſes of the remainder, and placed in the firſt, thoſe Books wherein he pretended that Mr. Jurieu had not advanced any thing new; and in the ſecond, thoſe where he ſays that Mr. Jurieu has publiſhed ſuch particulars as were new (45); according to him thoſe of the firſt claſs are only various rhapſodies and collections of what had been already related by the Proteſtant Writers; and thoſe of the ſecond contain nothing but loads of ſlander, vented againſt all ſort of perſons; or elſe wild chimæras and opinions, or paſſionate declamations. Now he was of opinion, that the Authors of Collections, do not merit an anſwer, but ought to be left to the judgment of the public, who ſoon bring them to their right wits, by the diſtaſte which they take for Works of this ſort; and that ſilence and contempt are puniſhments beſt proportioned to the vanity and paſſion of thoſe, who write Books of the ſecond claſs. It was his opinion particularly with regard to the accompliſhing of Mr. Jurieu's Propheſies, that it would be as idle for any man to attempt the refutation of them, as of the centuries of Noſtradamus (46): but with reſpect to the ſyſtem of the Church, which the public, ſays he (47), did not look upon as a contemptible work, he was of opinion, after weighing the affair maturely that it would be proper for him to refute it. I only relate theſe things hiſtorically.

(44) Printed at Amſterdam, 1692, in 4to.

(45) Nicolle, Preface de l'Unité de l'Egliſe, pag. 2.

(46) Idem, ibid. pag. 27.

(47) Idem, pag. 1.

We muſt not be ſurprized that Mr. Jurieu, by employing the expreſſions of a man who is highly exaſperated (48), ſhould have ſhewn, that he was ſtrongly affected at the deſtroying of that work, which muſt neceſſarily

(48) See his 2d Apologie.

DRABICIUS and KOTTERUS, which may ſerve as a ſupplement to that we have here given.

necessarily have been his favourite; and those only who are strangers to this kind of paternal tenderneſs can be diſpleaſed at his conſoling himſelf in ſome meaſure, by giving a very diſadvantageous character both of the Book which was writ againſt him (49), and of the perſon to whom he aſcribes it.

Solatia luctus
Exigua ingentis, miſero ſed debita patri (50).
That is,
" A ſlender comfort for ſo deep a grief,
" But, to an unhappy father, due.

(49) He even cenſures the Latin of it; and hints, that ſuch a neglect of ſtyle, is a miracle of God's juſtice (ſo fond he is of miracles;) and does not obſerve that Larebonius ſays, at the beginning and end of his book, that he purpoſely choſe the ſcholaſtic ſtyle. Iniquum eſt, ſays Mr. Amyraut, on the like occaſion, id in aliquo reprehendere, in quo data opera neglexit diligenter elaborare. i. e. " It is unjuſt to cenſure a Writer for not being accurate, when he purpoſely neglected being ſo." Mr. Jurieu was ſo prudent, as to judge of the Latin only by proxy; for he was not ignorant, that his inability on that head was known, even before he wrote againſt Scultetus. See Mr. Simon Rep. à ld Def. des Sent. pag. 191. This proxy is in all probability ſome very poor ſcholar, ſince he looks upon, as dark and perplexing, the arguments of Larebonius, whoſe book is as clear as the Sun.

See a little Book printed at Amſterdam, in 1692, and entitled, New Advices to the little Author of little Books; you will there find (51), a letter full of reflections that are curious enough wherein an apology is made for Mr. Jurieu's anger, and which will prevent our wondering that neither this Miniſter nor his friends have been able to make the leaſt anſwer to the Jaina Coelorum Reſerata. It is being ridiculouſly ſcrupulous to cenſure Larebonius, on pretence that ſeveral of his terms and phraſes are not borrowed from the Claſſicks. His work is of the nature of thoſe whoſe imperfections conſiſt only in bad arguments or falſities; and he cannot be refuſed the privilege which all the Authors of common places of Divinity and public Theſes enjoy, viz. the not regarding whether their Latin is flat or not.

(51) In pag. 58, & ſeq.

(50) Virg. Æneid. lib. 11. ver. 62.

COMMANDINUS FREDERICK) born at Urbino in Italy, and deſcended from a very noble family, was a learned man of the ſixteenth Century. To a vaſt knowledge in the Mathematicks he had added a great ſkill in the Greek tongue, by which he was very well qualified to tranſlate the Greek Mathematicians into Latin. And indeed, he publiſhed and tranſlated ſeveral, to which no Writer, till then, had done that good office. Francis Maria Duke of Urbino, who was very converſant in thoſe Sciences, was a very affectionate Patron to him on that account. Commandinus died in 1575, aged ſixty ſix years. He was buried in the monument of his anceſtors; and Antonio Toroneo delivered his funeral Oration (a). I ſhall give a catalogue of the works which Commandinus has tranſlated and illuſtrated with Notes [A]. He is greatly applauded by Blancanus (b) and other Writers, and deſerves their encomiums very juſtly. It is not the leaſt of his commendations to obſerve, that among the reſt of his diſciples were Bernardinus Baldus and Guy Ubaldus, both excellent Writers, who doubtleſs were indebted to his care for the great progreſs they made. I have one obſervation to make on his Tranſlation of Euclid [B].

(a) Ex Thuano, lib. 61. pag. 139.

(b) Chronolog. Mathem. pag 61.

[A] I ſhall give a catalogue of the Works which Commandinus has tranſlated and illuſtrated with Notes.] Archimedes circuli dimenſio, de lineis ſpiralibus, quadratura paraboles de conoidibus & ſphæroidibus, de arenæ numero; Venice, printed by Paulus Manutius, 1558, folio. Ejuſdem Archimedis de iis quæ vehuntur in aqua, Bologna, 1565 4*to*. Apollonii Pergæi Conicorum libri quatuor una cum Pappi Alexandrini lemmatibus, & commentariis Eutocii Aſcalonitæ, &c. Bologna, 1566, folio (1). Ptolomæi planiſphærium, Venice, 1558 4*to*. Ejuſdem de Analemmate Liber, Romæ 1562, 4*to*. Elementa Euclidis, Peſaro, 1572, folio. Ariſtarchus de magnitudinibus ac diſtantiis Solis & Lunæ, Peſaro, 1575, 4*to* (2). Hero de ſpiritalibus (3), Urbino. 1575, 4*to*. Machometes Bagdedinus de ſuperficierum diviſionibus, Peſaro, 1570, folio. Pappi Alexandrini Collectiones Mathematicæ, Peſaro, 1588, folio, &c. The publication of this laſt Work, would have been ſtill longer after the death of its Author, had not the Duke of Urbino exerted himſelf vigorouſly about it; otherwiſe the law ſuit, which Commandinus's two daughters commenced againſt each other, would have occaſioned a very long delay, as Valerius Spaciolus his ſon-in-law (4) owns. He alſo writ ſome Books of his own compoſing; with a treatiſe De Centro gravitatis ſolidorum, printed in Bologna, 1565, folio; Horologiorum deſcriptio, Rome, 1562 (5), &c.

(1) Ex Ant. Verderio, Supplement. Epitom. Geſner.

(2) See the Bodleian Catalogue.

(3) See Voſſius, de Mathem. pag. 290.

(4) Voſſius, ibid. pag. 59.

(5) The Bodleian Catalogue.

[B] I have one obſervation to make on his Tranſlation of Euclid.] Teiſſier tells us, that Commandinus tranſlated Euclid's Works into Italian, and quotes Voſſius de Mathem. pag. 68 (6): but is certain, that Voſſius does not affirm this to have been an Italian tranſlation; nor do I find any Author who declares it to be ſo. Doubtleſs Mr. Teiſſier's Printer is the cauſe that inſtead of Heronis Alexandrini Spiritalium Liber; we read in page 470 cited by me, Hieronis Alexandrini Spiritualium Liber. In Blancanus (7) we find Neronis inſtead of Heronis. Thus do Printers multiply Authors. Some Compilers, to ſhew that they have improved on their predeceſſors, will perhaps tells us as a rare diſcovery, that there was antiently an able Mathematician called Nero, ſome of whoſe Works are ſtill extant.

(6) Eleg. tirée de Mr. de Thou, tom. 1. pag. 470.

(7) Chronol. Mathemat. pag. 61.

CONCINI (CONCINO) known by the name of MARSHAL D'ANCRE, abuſed in ſo extraordinary a manner the favour of the Queen-mother, Mary of Medicis, that, to check his ambition, it was thought convenient to diſpatch him, without bringing him to a tryal [A]. There would have been too much danger, in doing this in a legal way, which circumſtance alone proves him to have been a wicked man [B]. He was born in Florence, where his father, from the profeſſion of a Scrivener, had roſe to be Secretary of State. He came into France with Mary of Medicis wife of Henry IV, and was at firſt but Gentleman in ordinary to that Princeſs; but he afterwards was appointed her Maſter

[A] It was thought convenient to diſpatch him, without bringing him to a trial.] I am not ignorant that le Grain and ſome other Hiſtorians, relate that the King commanded Mr. de Vitri to ſeize the Marſhal, with the intent to have him tried in his Parliament of Paris (1), but I give more credit to the particular relation of the death of Marſhal d'Ancre (2). It declares, that the King finding that the proſecuting him according to the uſual forms of law would be too dangerous, employed another expedient, viz. the ordering Vitri to get the Marſhal killed.

(1) Le Grain, Decade de Louis XIII, Book x. pag. m. 387.

(2) It is inſerted in, Hiſtoire des Favoris, compiled by Pierre du Puis.

[B] Which circumſtance alone proves him to have been a wicked man.] For a ſubject cannot without guilt, form a deſign to make himſelf formidable to his Sovereign; and if he ſucceeds in ſuch an attempt, he muſt have employed a thouſand unjuſt methods; removed thoſe perſons from their employments who were obnoxious to him, and advanced others on whom he could depend; that is he muſt have turned out all men of worth, in order to make room for thoſe who ſacrifice all things to their advancement. What ſums muſt he have extorted, in order to amaſs as much money as was neceſſary for maintaining ſpies and creatures in all places! Our Marſhal never went without a train of two hundred Gentlemen, beſides his domeſticks whom he uſed to call his ſtipendiary Poltroons (3). We ſhall take notice below (4), of the ſubjection in which he kept the King.

(3) Le Grain, Decade de Louis XIII, Book x. pag. 307.

(4) In the Remark [D].

Maſter of the Horſe, and raiſed himſelf to a prodigious height of power, by the aſcendant which a woman whom he married had over the Queen (a). He purchaſed the Marquiſate of Ancre (b), a little after the death of Henry IV. He was Governor of Amiens, of Peronne, of Roie and Mondidier. He was made firſt Gentleman of the Chamber, and afterwards Marſhal of France (c). He endeavoured to obtain the Government of Picardy; but the Duke of Longueville having this Government and that of Normandy at his option, choſe Picardy, by which means Marſhal d'Ancre was excluded from his pretenſions, and even obliged to reſign the Government of Amiens to that Duke; for this ceſſion was ſtipulated by the Treaty of Loudun, in caſe the Duke de Longueville ſhould make choice of the Government of Picardy. However, Marſhal d'Ancre had wherewithal to conſole himſelf, ſince he, at the ſame time, was appointed Governor of Normandy. He there fortified Quillebeuf, in ſpite of the prohibition of the Parliament; obtained the particular Government of Pont de l'Arche, and tried to get that of Havre de Grace (d). At laſt, it was no longer doubted but that he was endeavouring to bring all things to his devotion, for he removed ſuch Noblemen as were poſſeſſed of the greateſt abilities from his Majeſty's Council, and filled the vacancies with his own creatures. He diſpoſed of the Treaſury, beſtowed all poſts and employments as he pleaſed, made himſelf friends every where, in the armies and in cities; and intimidated, by the example of a ſevere vengeance, thoſe who oppoſed his faction. No other remedy could be thought of to theſe great diſorders, but to get him killed. This Commiſſion being given to Vitri, a Captain of the Life-guard, was executed on the Drawbridge of the Louvre, the 24th of April 1617, by firing ſeveral piſtols at this Marſhal. The next day the populace having dug up his corps in the Church of St. Germain de l'Auxerrois, dragged it through all the ſtreets, and wreaked their vengeance on it in a moſt ſignal manner [C]. The Parliament arraigned the memory of the deceas'd, and declared him guilty of treaſon both divine and human; ſentenced his wife to loſe her head, and declared their ſon ignoble, and incapable of poſſeſſing any employment in the Kingdom (e). Strange things appeared in the courſe of their proſecution, with regard to their judaizing and incantations, which I ſhall mention elſewhere (f). The inſolence of this man is a melancholy example of the fatality which attends on the French Monarchy more than on any other in the world; I mean, that Queens there generally continue as much in the intereſt of the country they came from, as before they left it; and are commonly the inſtrument which heaven employs, to humble and chaſtize the Nation. There have already been two Queens, ſprung from the Houſe of Medicis (g), who, in favour of Spain, had brought the Monarchy to the brink of ruin. This circumſtance in Hiſtory is a ſcandal to the French Name. Should the King have been ſuffered to continue ſo many years the ſlave of a Florentine [D]? Was it not infamous to kneel to this idol, at

(a) Leonora GALLIGAI. See her Article.

(b) It is in Picardy.

(c) Baptiſt le Grain, Decade de Louis le Juſte, lib. 4. ad finem.

(d) Ibid. lib. 9.

(e) Idem, lib. 9.

(f) In the Article GALLIGAI, remarks [D] and [E].

(g) Catherine, mother of Charles IX, and Henry III; and Mary, mother of Lewis XIII.

[C] The populace . . . . wreaked their vengeance on it in a moſt ſignal manner.] The footman of a perſon who had been put to death a little before (5) to pleaſe the Marſhal, began the tumult in the Church of St. Germain de l'Auxerrois. The people cried aloud, that the body of this excommunicated Jew, ought to be dug up and thrown to the ravens; immediately the populace fell to work with ſo much fury, that had any perſon dared to repreſent to them, that they ought to ſhew a greater regard to the holineſs of the place, they would have buried him in the Marſhal's grave. After that the Coffin had been forced open, the corpſe was dragged to the end of the Pont-neuf, and hanged by the feet on one of thoſe gibbets which the Marſhal had cauſed to be erected for all thoſe who ſhould ſpeak ill of him. They cut off his noſe, his ears, and his pudenda. A little after he was cut down, dragged to the Greve and other publick places, and then his limbs were torn aſunder, and his corpſe cut into a thouſand pieces. Every one would have ſome part of him: the ears were bought at a great price, the bowels were caſt into the river; part of the body was burnt before the ſtatue of Henry the IVth on the Pont-neuf; and ſome perſons roaſted at this fire part of his fleſh, and threw it to their dogs (6). The Author of the relation printed with the Hiſtory of Favourites, relates ſome particulars that are ſtill more ſurprizing. The Great Prevoſt* appearing with his Officers, in order to appeaſe, in the beginning, the tumult in the Church of St. Germain de l'Auxerrois, was threatned with being buried alive, if he preſumed to advance a ſtep farther (7). It is added, that a man dreſſed in ſcarlet was ſo exaſperated, that thruſting his hand into the dead body, and drawing it out again all bloody, he ſucked it, and ſwallowed ſome little pieces of fleſh which he had tore away. That another plucked out the Marſhal's heart; broiled it on coals, and eat it publickly with vinegar (8). This Author gives a very minute account of the behaviour of the populace in the ſeveral places where the corpſe was hanged, torne to pieces and burnt: he ſays, that the day after the aſhes were ſold for a quarter of a crown (fifteen pence, French) an ounce (9). It is certain that a herd of mad bulls may as ſoon be brought to hear reaſon, and are leſs to be dreaded than an exaſperated mob.

(5) He was a Gentleman of Normandy, called Hurtevan, who was beheaded at Paris the 21ſt of March 1617. Le Grain, Decade de Louis XIII, Book 9. toward the end.

(6) Idem, lib. 10. pag. 399, 400.

* A kind of High-Sheriff.

(7) Relation, pag. 53.

(8) Idem, pag. 56.

(9) Idem, pag. 57.

[D] Should the King have been ſuffered to continue ſo many years the ſlave of a Florentine?] This is not a calumny contrived, either by the enemies of Marſhal d'Ancre, or by thoſe of Lewis XIII, ſince this Prince himſelf owns the ſlavery to which he was reduced, in the Letters he wrote to the Governors of the Provinces, the day that the Marſhal was killed. "I don't doubt, "ſays he (10), but that in the courſe of affairs which "have been tranſacted, ſince the demiſe of the late "King, my Lord and Father (whom God abſolve) "you have plainly diſcovered, in what manner Marſhal "d'Ancre and his wife, taking advantage of my youth, "and of the influence which they had obtained for "many years over the Queen my Mother; have pro-"jected to uſurp the whole ſupreme authority, as alſo "to diſpoſe, in an abſolute manner, of the affairs of "my Kingdom, and deprive me of the means of "becoming acquainted with them. Which deſign "they have carried ſo far, that hitherto I had only "the bare title of King left me; and it would have "been a capital offence in my officers or ſubjects, to "ſee me in private, or diſcourſe with me on a ſeri-"ous ſubject. Which deſign God, of his great good-"neſs, having made me perceive; and diſcover ma-"niſeſtly the imminent danger, to which my perſon "and kingdom would have been expoſed, by ſuch an "unbounded ambition, had I given the leaſt marks "of my reſentment, and of the great deſire I had to "apply a proper remedy to it; I was forced to diſ-"ſemble; and to conceal, by all my outward actions, "my good intentions, till it ſhould pleaſe God to "give me the means and opportunity of redreſſing

(10) Le Grain, Decade de Louis XIII, pag. 392.

at the very time that thoſe who thus proſtrated themſelves deteſted him in their hearts [E]? None of Malherbe's Verſes are finer than thoſe he wrote on the downfall of this Idol. According to the Poet, this downfall juſtified Providence, which was, in ſome meaſure, impeached as criminal, during the Marſhal's proſperity [F]. In this manner Poets preſume to introduce the greateſt myſteries in a metaphorical way, and under too bold images. It is ſurprizing, that Marſhal d'Etré ſhould have extenuated ſo much the crimes of Marſhal d'Ancre [G]. An Italian Author who publiſhed at Lyons a Hiſtory of Lewis the Juſt anno 1691, was not ſo partial in his favour [H]. Mr. de Beauvais-Nangis (b), who (b) See his Hiſtoire des Favoris François, pag. 100, & ſeq.

" theſe irregularities." The Author of this Relation ſays, that when the King was informed of the Marſhal's death, he cried aloud from the windows of his palace, Thank you, thank you (11); I now am King. He afterwards went to other windows, and cried To arms, to arms, my companions; and afterwards, God be praiſed, I now am King (12). The Lieutenants, Enſigns, and Exempt of the Life-Guards, whom he ſent into the ſtreets of Paris, in order to prevent any tumult, cried aloud in every part of the city, Long live his Majeſty, the King is King (13). The Biſhop of Lucon, who was afterwards Cardinal de Richelieu, had been one of the Marſhal's favourites; and exerciſed at that time the employment of chief Secretary of State. He entered the King's apartment, ſoon after the Marſhal's execution; Sir, ſaid the Monarch to him, we now, God be praiſed, are delivered from your tyranny (14). He did not then know that his deliverance would be ſhort; and that he was ſpeaking to a man who would leave him only the bare title of King. Be this as it will, it is certain, that the Marſhal had uſurped a great aſcendant even over the King's perſon. He deprived him of the liberty of viſiting the fine houſes which are in the neighbourhood of Paris, and permitted the King only to walk in the Tuilleries, but would not allow him to go a hunting, tho' he loved that diverſion (15). The protection of a Queen-Regent inſpires a proud ambitious man with too much boldneſs.

(11) He ſpoke thus to thoſe who were with Vitry.

(12) Relation, pag. 28.

(13) Idem, pag. 29.

(14) Le Grain, pag. 391.

(15) Relation, pag. 4, 5.

[E] Was it not infamous to kneel to this Idol, at the very time that thoſe who thus proſtrated themſelves deteſted him in their hearts?] The Marſhal ſaid one day, " that the French are not the people they ſeem to be; " for tho', continued he, they charge me with the greateſt crimes, I yet am no ſooner arrived in any part of " the Provinces, but the Officers come and make " ſpeeches to me as to the King (16)." So baſe an adulation deſerved not only to be related, but ought to have been told with more indignation than is ſeen in the following paſſage; " I muſt not diſſemble (for Hiſtorians ought to ſpeak truth) that ſeveral Princes " and Lords of the Court, ſeveral Deputies of the " States-General, and many of the chief Magiſtrates " of France, great numbers of retainers or hangers-on " to the Noblemen, and a multitude of Officers and " Citizens, not only tolerated, but were not aſhamed " to advance, to the utmoſt of their power, the grandeur of this Tyrant; in order to ingratiate themſelves in his favour, during which they ſuffered the " love and fidelity which God commands us to bear to " our King and Country to grow cool; and the ancient generoſity, then baniſhed from the French, " was wholly employed to ſupport a foreign Uſurper (17)."

(16) Ibid. pag. 43.

(17) Le Grain, pag. 385.

[F] According to this Poet, the downfal juſtified Providence, which was in ſome meaſure impeached as criminal during the Marſhal's proſperity.] Malherbe introduces the God of the Seine curſing the Marſhal, and foretelling his approaching ruin.

Tes jours ſont à la fin, ta chute ſe prépare,
Regarde moi pour la derniere fois.
C'eſt aſſez que cinq ans ton audace effrontée,
Sur des ailes de cire aux étoiles montée,
Princes & Rois ait oſé défier;
La fortune t'apelle au rang de ſes victimes,
Et le ciel accuſé de ſuporter tes crimes,
Et reſolu de ſe juſtifier.

Thus Engliſh'd,

" Thy life is near its end; prepare, prepare,
" For mighty ruin, lo! thy fall's at hand;
" Once more behold me: — once — then leave the " world.—
" Enough, that five long years, thy frantic pride
" On waxen wings convey'd beyond the Stars,
" Dar'd to contend for ſway with potent Kings,
" Fortune now calls thee to her ſplendid victims;
" And Heaven accus'd of winking at thy crimes,
" Reſolves to clear up its myſterious conduct.

Balzac has made ſome reflections on the Poem in queſtion of Malherbe (18). I perhaps ſhall touch upon this ſubject in the article RUFFINUS (19), on occaſion of the words of Claudian, who ſays, that the good fortune of this man was a trial between God and man, which God gained only by the fall of Ruffinus.

(18) In the Socrate Chretien, pag. m. 239.

(19) Remark [C].

[G] It is ſurprizing that Marſhal d'Etrée ſhould have extenuated ſo much the crimes of Marſhal d'Ancre.] If the reader peruſes the Memoirs of the regency of Mary de Medicis, printed in 1666, he will not find (according to the author of them) that Marſhal d'Ancre was guilty of any heinous crime; and at the end of this piece is a character of the Marſhal, that ſeems a Panegyrick rather than an Apology. I ſhall not here, as is my uſual cuſtom, refer the reader to Moreri, but will give the very words cited by him. " When I re- " flect, ('tis the Author of the Memoirs who ſpeaks) (20) " on the circumſtances of Marſhal d'Ancre's death, I " can aſcribe it to nothing but to his evil deſtiny; he " having been adviſed by a perſon who was of a very " ſweet temper; and as the Marſhal himſelf was naturally generous, and had diſobliged very few, it " muſt have been his evil ſtar, or the ſtate of affairs, " which cauſed ſo many people to riſe up againſt him; " he was a handſome man, ſkilful in riding, and in " all bodily exerciſes that ſuit a Gentleman; he was " fond of diverſions, and eſpecially gaming; his converſation was eaſy and unaffected; his thoughts were " lofty and ambitious, but he uſed to conceal them " carefully; he never having entered, or offered to " enter the Council; and the King has often been heard " to ſay, that he did not know that the Marſhal was " to be killed." I believe it would be imprudent in me, ſhould I prefer the teſtimony of this Author, to that of ſo many Writers who have ſtigmatized Concius Concini. Not but I think it is very poſſible, that a very indiſcreet man, whoſe vices and errors are far from being of a capital nature, may yet, if he has a great number of enemies, become odious to the people, and be conſidered as a monſtrous villain. A malicious and powerful enemy is able to make the common people believe many falſities. I am even of opinion, that a great many particulars, which are related of this ill fated Florentine, are very much exaggerated; and that, to diſcover very exactly and juſtly the truth of theſe matters, a man muſt ſurmount as many obſtacles, as to find out the cauſe of the properties of the load-ſtone; and I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that, on ſeveral occaſions, hiſtorical truths are as difficult to find out as thoſe in Phyſics.

(20) Pag. 244, 245.

[H] An Italian Author . . . was not ſo partial in his favour.] I mean Count Alexander Roncoveri (21). He tells us that Concini, in the beginning of his exaltation, was poſſeſſed of very good qualities, but theſe, adds the Author in queſtion, were afterwards deſtroyed by the bad ones, and never appeared more, nor could do the leaſt ſervice. Aſſeriſcono le memorie di quel tempo, che ne' principii della ſua potenza era huomo di buona legge, di grata compagnia, di confacevole humore, diſintereſſato, mà profondamente ambitioſo, e violente; diffetti, che nel progreſſo confondendoſi con le prime buone qualità in ultimo le ſoffocarono di tal maniere, che quelle non poterono apparire e meno giovargli (22). Had this Author only given the particulars of this Marſhal's eſtate, this would have proved ſufficiently that he was a bad man, and at the ſame time have been a ſatyr upon him. Juvenal ſhall be my witneſs on this occaſion.

(21) He is of Placentia.

(22) Aleſſ. Roncoveri, Iſtoria del Regno di Luigi XIII, lib. 5. pag. 205.

Patricios omnes opibus cum provocet unus,
Quo tondente gravis juveni mihi barba ſonabat,
Cum pars Niliacæ plebis, cum Verna Canopi, who was very well acquainted with the Court of Lewis XIII, does not apologize in any manner for our Concini, but rather confirms the public rumours.

Criſpinus Tyrias humero revocante lacernas
Ventilet æſtivum digitis ſudantibus aurum,
Nec ſufferre queat majoris pondera gemmæ:
Difficile eſt ſatyram non ſcribere . . . . . .
. . . . Sacro nec cedat honori,
Nuper in hanc urbem pedibus qui venerat albis (23).

(23) Juven. Sat. 1. ver. 24 and 110.

That is,

" When all our Lords are by his wealth outvy'd,
" Whoſe razor on my callow beard was try'd;
" When I beheld the ſpawn of conquer'd Nile,
" Criſpinus, both in birth and manners vile,
" Pacing in pomp with cloak of Tyrian dye,
" Chang'd oft a day for needleſs luxury;
" And finding oft occaſion to be fann'd,
" Ambitious to produce his Lady-hand
" Charg'd with light ſummer rings, his fingers ſweat,
" Unable to ſupport a gem of weight.
" Such fulſome objects meeting every where,
" 'Tis hard to write, but harder to forbear.
" The man who, ſhoeleſs, lately trod the ſtreets,
" To ſacred honours, now, refuſes homage."

Oltre un miglione de lire, che valevano i ſuoi ſtabili in Francia, ne havera un' altro di contanti in caſſa, ſecento mila ſcudi ſopra Faideau, quattrocento mila fra Roma, e Fiorenza, e non oſtante il ſacheggio della ſua caſa, mobili, gioie, argenti, e cariche per due miglioni ſenza quella di luogotenente del Re nella Normandia, di primo Gentilhuomo della Camera del Re, e d'Intendente della caſa della Regina (24). i. e. " Beſides a million " of livres, which his eſtates in France amounted to, " he had as much in ſpecie, ſix hundred thouſand " crowns upon Faideau, four hundred thouſand at Rome " and Florence; and, beſides the plunder of his pa- " lace, there were in jewels, money, and employ- " ments to the value of two millions, excluſive of thoſe " of the King's Lieutenant in Normandy, firſt Gen- " tleman of the Bedchamber to his Majeſty, and Stew- " ard of the Queen's Houſhold."

(24) Aleſſ. Rinocoveri, Iſtor. de Luigi-XIII, pag. 199, 200.

CONDREN (CHARLES of) Superior-General of the Fathers of the Oratory in the ſeventeenth Century. See Moreri. I ſhall add but one particular, viz. that all ſuch of his writings as could be found were collected together, and that this collection contains two parts, the laſt of which was reprinted at Bruſſels for Francis Foppens, anno 1659, in 12mo. They conſiſt of Letters of Piety, the peruſal whereof may give great ſatisfaction to contemplative perſons.

CONECTE (THOMAS) a Carmelite, and a native of Brittany, was burnt at Rome as an Heretic in 1434 (a), after having been followed, by the common people, as the greateſt Preacher of the age. Having excited the admiration of his countrymen, he left the Convent of Rennes, and went into Flanders. He there gained ſuch great reputation for his preaching, that words could never expreſs the honours which were paid him in all places through which he paſſed [A], nor the multitudes who flocked to hear his Sermons [B]. He inveighed with great vehemence againſt the vices of the Clergy and the luxury of the women. His ſatyr was levelled chiefly againſt their head-dreſſes, which roſe to ſo enormous a height [C], that the moſt exalted head-dreſſers of this age are but dwarfs to them. Conecte got the better of the mode, and obliged the Ladies to dreſs themſelves in a modeſt manner; but he did not prevail ſo much by the ſtrength of the arguments wherewith he repreſented the duties of the Goſpel, as by the inſults which he

(a) Argentré, Hiſt. de Bretagne, lib. 10. cap. 42. Other Writers, as Spondanus, fix his death at the year 1431.

[A] Words could never expreſs the honours which were paid him in all places thro' which he paſſed.] When it was known in any place, that he was coming to it, the Nobility and people of all ranks went to meet him, and accompanied him bare-headed, holding the bridle of his mule, till he was come to the houſe where he was to lodge, and happy was he who could prevail with him to lodge in his houſe (1).] Paradin gives us a more particular account of this. " Fryar Thomas Conette was " ſo famed for ſanctity, that he was followed by every " body; and ſuch multitudes crouded about him, that " very few could get a ſight of him. He uſed always " to travel on a very ſmall mule; and was followed " by ſeveral Fryars of his Order, and who walked af- " ter him, as tho' they had been his diſciples, as did " many ſecular Prieſts. The Clergy, the Nobility, " and Burghers, uſed to come out of their cities and " towns to meet him; paying him as much reve- " rence and honour, as they would have done to one " of Chriſt's Apoſtles: ſo that in whatever place he " arrived, he was always attended by multitudes of " people, who uſed to go a great way to meet him, as " tho' he had deſcended from heaven. When he was " come into any city, generally the nobleſt and moſt " eminent perſon in it, being on foot, uſed to hold " the bridle of his mule, and conduct him (followed " by numberleſs crowds) to his lodging, which was " commonly prepared for him in the handſomeſt " houſe of the city. And his diſciples uſed alſo to be " lodged one after another in the beſt houſes (in the " ſame manner as the attendants of Princes;) and the " maſters of thoſe houſes thought themſelves very hap- " py, when it was their good fortune to have him, or " one of his diſciples for their gueſt (2).

(1) Argentré, Hiſt. de Bretagne, Book 10. chap. 42.

(2) Paradin, Annales de Bourgogne, Book 3. under the year 1428, pag. m. 700.

[B] Nor the multitudes who flock'd to hear his ſermons.] There were generally fifteen or ſixteen thouſand perſons on theſe occaſions (3); the women ſtanding on one ſide and the men on the other, with a rope laid between them (4). He never preached in churches but in the greateſt ſquares or market-places, where a large ſcaffold covered with the richeſt tapeſtry that could be got, was erected. On the ſcaffold an altar was ſet, which was adorned in the moſt ſumptuous manner poſſible: Here Fryar Thomas uſed to ſay Maſs, before he preached his ſermon (5). All the balconies round the ſquare were ſpread with beautiful carpets. See Bertrand d'Argentré (6).

(3) Paradin ſays, that there were often about twenty thouſand perſons.

(4) Argentré, Hiſt. de Bretagne, Book 10. chap. 42.

(5) Paradin, Annales de Bourgogne, Book 10. chap. 42. ſays, that a Sermon uſed to be preached before maſs was celebrated.

(6) Argentré, Idem.

[C] His ſatyr was levelled chiefly againſt their head-dreſſes, which roſe to ſo enormous a height.] " The " Ladies of the Netherlands uſed to wear, at that time, " a head-dreſs called Hennin, which was of a great " height and very rich . . . . and indeed Meſſire John " Juvenal des Urſins (who lived at that time) declares, " that notwithſtanding the diſcords and tumults in " France (he ſpeaks of Charles VIth's reign) the " maidens and married ladies roſe to prodigious ex- " ceſſes in their attire, and wore horns of a ſurprizing " height and breadth, having on each ſide two ears " of ſo unaccountable a ſize, that it was impoſſible for " them to paſs thro' a door; which I take to have " been the Hennins of Flanders; for ſuch a ſuperfluity in pomp ſpreads among the women every where " in an inſtant (7)." See the following remark, and obſerve, by the way, how often faſhions change (8). The Hennins are again revived under another name, viz. that of top-knots. I have not yet ſeen the Treatiſe, publiſhed at Paris in 1694 on the extravagance of head-dreſſes; however, I don't doubt but the ſame reflection is there made.

(7) Argentré, Hiſt. de Bretagne, Book 10. chap. 42.

(8) See the remark [G] of the article ANDROMACHE.

he exhorted children to employ againſt ſuch women as would not reform in this particular [D]. Hence it was, that as ſoon as he had left the country, the head-dreſſes ſhot to a greater height [E] than before, as though they had intended to make amends for the time that had been loſt (b). With regard to Conecte, he uſed to burn the ſuperfluities in dreſs, aprons, cards, dice, &c (c); and would never be ſeen but in the pulpit. In this he acted prudently; for he very probably would have been leſs ſevere, in common converſation, than ſuited his character, which would have leſſened the high opinion the public entertained of him. After ſtaying a conſiderable time in Flanders, he went into Italy, and made certain new regulations in the Order of the Carmelites of Mantua (d), but not without meeting with ſome oppoſition [F]. From the laſt mention'd City he travell'd to (b) See the Remark [E], in the margin, Citation (11).

(c) See the cloſe of the Remark [E].

(d) Anno 1432.

[D] Conecte got the better of the Mode ... by the inſults which he exhorted children to employ againſt ſuch women as would not reform in this particular.] I will explain this from the old French of Paradin. But a remarkable circumſtance in his Sermons, ſays he (9), was, his manner of exploding the head-dreſſes of the maidens, and married ladies of that age, for perſons of all ranks at that time were very extravagant in their attire. But the head-dreſſes of the women were particularly remarkable; for theſe were about an ell in height, and as ſhart-pointed as a ſteeple; with long pieces of crape, adorned with rich fringes hanging down behind, and waving in the wind like ſo many ſtandards. This Preacher abhorred theſe kind of head-dreſſes ſo much, that moſt of his Sermons were levelled againſt them; on which occaſion he always employed the moſt bitter expreſſions he could think of; and let fly all manner of opprobrious terms againſt the Ladies who wore thoſe head-dreſſes, which he called Hennins. And in order to make them ſtill more odious to the populace, he uſed to excite little children, to whom he gave ſome trifling preſents, in the places where he preached, to hoot and hollow after theſe Hennins. Theſe children were ſo well taught by him, that when they ſaw any Lady coming to Fryar Thomas's Sermon with ſuch a head-dreſs on, they uſed to hollow after her, tho' the congregation was ever ſo numerous, and cry a Hennin, a Hennin, without ceaſing, till ſuch ladies had left the congregation, or taken off their Hennins. And thoſe little children were ſo exaſperated againſt the Hennins, that when Ladies of diſtinction were going to leave the congregation out of ſhame and confuſion, the children would run hooting and hollowing after them. They even carried their reſentments ſo far, that ſome of them flung ſtones at theſe head-dreſſes; whence great miſchief enſued, upon their inſulting ſome Ladies of high quality, who were ſcarce able to get into houſes for ſhelter, becauſe of the annoyance of this rabble of children, thus animated by the Preacher, who indulged them a numberleſs multitude of pardons, (by the power with which he ſaid he was inveſted) for their bellowing after and inſulting the women; and this they continued with ſo much virulence, that the Ladies did not dare to appear any more in public in ſplendid habits, but came to Fryar Thomas's Sermon in diſguiſe, and with head-dreſſes made of linnen, like thoſe of women of mean condition.

(9) Paradin, Annales de Bourgogne, pag. 700.

[E] ... As ſoon as he had left the country, the head-dreſſes ſhot to a greater height.] It is on this occaſion we may ſay very juſtly that they only bowed their heads like bulruſhes, which is the emblem of ſuch a repentance as laſts no longer than the day which had been deſigned for an extraordinary faſt. But Paradin employs another image which I think ſtill better adapted. Here follow his words (10). "Wherever Fryar Thomas "went, the Hennins did not dare ſo much as to peep "out by reaſon of the ſtrong hatred he bore them. "This ſuppreſſed the head-dreſſes in queſtion for ſome "time, and till our Preacher had left the abovementioned countries. But after he was gone, the Ladies "again lifted up their horns, and imitated ſnails, "which when they hear a noiſe gently draw in their "horns; but the noiſe once over, they immediately "ſhoot them out to a greater length than before (11). "Thus did the Ladies, for they never had wore larger, "more pompous, or more magnificent Hennins, than "they did after Fryar Thomas was gone from among "them. This it is, to oppoſe with obſtinacy, ſome "ſtubborn and obſtinate people." Could the reader imagine, that this Author, would ſay but three or four lines after, that the exclamations of Fryar Thomas againſt ſmall ornaments were ſo efficacious, that the Ladies themſelves uſed to bring them to him in a full congregation, and throw them publickly on his ſcaffold, into a great fire which he kindled near his pulpit? Does he not here plainly contradict himſelf? However he might have avoided this contradiction by only ſaying, that all the Ladies did not leave their ornaments for fear of being hooted at, and knock'd on the head; but that ſome of them had a true compunction of heart.

(10) Paradin, Annales de Bourgogne, pag. 701; and obſerve that Monſtrelet, in the 2d volume of his Chroniques, folio m. 38 verſo, & ſeq. relates almoſt the ſame particulars as Paradin.

(11) The women, after Conecte was gone, did not keep long within the bounds he had preſcribed them, but again liſted up their horns to a greater height than before, in order to compenſate for the time paſt. Argentré, Hiſtoire de Bretagne, Book 10. chap. 42.

At the time that this article is printing (12), the News-Papers inform us, that at the Court of France, a ſingle word tranſiently ſpoke by the King, had a ſtronger effect on the enormous altitude of women's head-dreſſes, than all the eloquence of the Preachers. Theſe have exclaimed for twelve or fifteen years againſt this ſuperfluity in the dreſs of women; they have attacked this Coloſſus with all the figures of Rhetorick, inforced by the moſt ſolid arguments of Religion; but inſtead of demoliſhing it, or even beating down ſome portion of it, they have ſeen it riſe higher every month. They ſaw around their pulpits a new kind of amphitheatre, which would have been a regular one, had all the women of the like rank and condition ſat in the ſame row; and had not been at ſuch a diſtance from the Preacher, in proportion as the top-knots exceeded one another in height; but as places are not divided according to this proportion, there was no ſymmetry in the amphitheatre in queſtion. We may therefore more juſtly compare it to a foreſt of lofty trees, wherein ſuch of them as ſhoot up to the greateſt height, are intermixed with others not ſo tall. But however this be, the Preachers did not exclaim againſt an abſent enemy, they ſeeing it near at hand; it advanced within reach of their cannon, faced its thunder, and yet increaſed and multiplied. The double edged ſword of the Preachers made furious havock, and this had no other effect, than what reſults from the labour of a Gardiner who, by lopping a tree, makes it riſe higher, and diffuſe a more extenſive ſhade than before (13); but the bare hint of his Gallic Majeſty wrought ſo ſpeedy and effectual a change, that in a day's time it almoſt levelled theſe proud mountains even with the ground. People had no ſooner heard, (I won't ſay a prohibition or ſome menace) but only that his Majeſty had barely inſinuated his diſlike of this mode, but the whole night was ſpent in this new regulation; and the Ladies appeared the very next day before the Monarch in another dreſs. This regulation makes a ſurprizing progreſs. It flies from the Court to the City in the twinkling of an eye; and as we are told, it would denote a plebeian turn of mind, in any woman who ſhould not follow the new faſhion, we may naturally believe, that there will be but a very few traces left in a few months of the mode which had reigned ſo long. This ſhews, that if Sovereigns knew how great their power is in this reſpect, or would make uſe of it, they could effect more by a ſingle word, than all the Preachers and Confeſſors, with their great profuſion of words (14). Will not a medal be ſtruck on this occaſion? A ſong will certainly be made upon it, and I do not doubt but that ſome Poets will allude one way or other to thoſe Kings of Judah, who did not take away the high places (15); and who by this means did not compleat the reſtoration of Religion to its former purity. On this occaſion will they ſay, the reformation begins by the taking away of the high places. The ingenious Writer, who publiſhes monthly reflections on the News-Papers (16), will doubtleſs give us a very entertaining account of this incident. The exceſs or irregularity was ſo great, that another Thomas Conecte was wanted to reform it.

(12) In the beginning of October 1699.

[F] He made certain new regulations in the Order of Carmelites ... but not without meeting with ſome oppoſition.] Nicholas Kenton an Engliſhman, and Provincial of the Carmelites, wrote a piece againſt this regulation, and dedicated it to John Facius General of the Order (17).

(13) Durit ut ilex tonſa bipennibus
Nigræ feraci frondis in Algido,
Per damna, per cædes, ab ipſo
Ducit opes animumque ferro.
Horat. Od. 4. lib. 4. ver. 57, & ſeq.

(14) Compare this with the remark [M] of the article LEWIS XII.

(15) Veruntamen excelſa non abſtulit, adhuc enim populus immolabat & adolebat in excelſis incenſum, Book 4. Kings, cap. 12. ver. 3. & alibi paſſim.

(16) Since June 1699. His book is intitled, L'Eſprit des Cours de l'Europe.

(17) Argentré, Hiſt. de Bretagne, Book 10. chap. 42.

to Venice, where he acquired eſteem; for the Embaſſadors of the Republic (in the Court of Eugenius IV) whom he followed to Rome, recommended him, in the ſtrongeſt terms, to this Pope, as a very zealous and holy man; however, they verified the maxim Peſſimum inimicorum genus laudantes, although they acted very innocently on that occaſion. The Pope, hearing that this Preacher of Reformation was in Rome, gave orders for his being ſeized and brought to a trial. Conecte was convicted of the moſt dangerous hereſies that could have been taught at that time, for he cenſured the diſſoluteneſs of the Clergy, and that of the Court of Rome. He had declared, that there were many abominations in this Court; that the Church ſtood in need of reformation; that thoſe who perform the ſervice of God have no reaſon to dread the Papal excommunications; that Monks may eat fleſh; and that ſuch of the Clergy as have not the gift of continence ought to be allowed to marry. He ſubmitted to the flames with great patience and reſolution, and did not recant. Several conſiderable perſons among the Roman Catholicks have declared with freedom enough, that he was put to death unjuſtly. Baptiſt Mantuan (e), who was General of the Carmelites, ſpeaks of him as a true martyr (f). The Proteſtants never omit ſpeaking of Conecte, when they give the liſt of thoſe, in different ages, who have wiſhed for a reformation in the Church.

But it muſt be obſerved at the ſame time, that ſome Proteſtants conſider him as an arch-hypocrite [G].

(e) His words, extracted from the Treatiſe de Vita beata, have been cited by Bertrand d'Argentré, Hiſtoire de Bretagne, lib. 10. cap. 42.

(f) Extracted from the Hiſtoire de Bretagne de Bertrand d'Argentré, lib. 10. cap. 42.

[G] Some Proteſtants conſider him as an arch Hypocrite.] John Chaſſanion, a zealous Huguenot, having obſerved, that hypocriſy intrudes and blends itſelf with the pure and lawful ſervice of God, as it alſo does in ſuperſtitious and idolatrous worſhip, even with parade and oſtentation, cites, as an inſtance of this, Fryar Thomas, who, by his boaſtings, impoſed ſo ſtrangely on the World upon pretence of introducing a reformation of manners, that he was conſidered in all places as a holy man (18). He relates, on the credit of Enguerrand de Monſtrelet, the travels of this Preacher &c. "To "give him the better opportunity, ſays he (19), of "acting his farces, ſcaffolds were built for his uſe in "the moſt ſpacious, and moſt commodious ſquares, "which were hung with rich carpets, and otherwiſe "adorned; where, after having firſt ſaid Maſs, he "preached a Sermon, in which he uſed to cenſure the "vices of every one, and eſpecially thoſe of the Cler-"gy, for their keeping Concubines and whores (20). "In all which he acted right. But when he uſed to "ſpirit up little children to halloo after the women, "becauſe of their head-dreſſes, promiſing them cer-"tain days of pardon as tho' he had been a God; "all this reſulted from a mixture of monkery, mad-"neſs, and ſacrilegious impudence." Laſtly he tells us, that Conecte was tried, convicted of hereſy, and burnt; after which he adds; "By this means "God, who employs inſtruments of all kinds, and is "able to ſet every engine at work, was pleaſed thus to "puniſh the hypocriſy of this Friar, who putting on "a ſpecious maſk of piety, was in reality a madman, "a giddy-headed, and ambitious wretch (21)."

(18) Chaſſanion, Hiſtoires mémorables des grans & merveilleux Jugemens de Dieu, chap. 12. pag. m. 119.

(19) Idem, pag. 121.

(20) Paradin, Annales de Bourgog. pag. 700. relates the ſame thing of Conecte: he uſed, ſays he, to make very long Sermons, in which he introduced tedious digreſſions againſt the vices of perſons of all ranks, eſpecially againſt the fornication and impurities of the Clergy, becauſe of their keeping concubines and whores at bed and board, contrary to the vow they made of preſerving their chaſtity.

(21) Chaſſanion, Hiſt. Memorables &c. pag. 124.

☞CONGREVE (WILLIAM), an eminent Engliſh Poet, was the ſon of Mr. Will. Congreve, a younger brother of an antient and good family in Staffordſhire, who was employed in the Stewardſhip of part of the great eſtate of the Earl of Burlington in Ireland, where he reſided many years. His only ſon the Poet was born in that Kingdom in 1672, and educated at the Free-ſchool at Kilkenny, from whence he was ſent to Trinity-College in Dublin, where he had the advantage of being under the tuition of a Gentleman well ſkilled in polite Learning, Dr. St. George Aſh, afterwards Provoſt of that College, and ſucceſſively Biſhop of Clogher and Derry, who had likewiſe the honour of having Dr. Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's, another of his pupils, though not at the ſame time with Mr. Congreve (a). Upon Mr. Congreve's coming to England, he was entered in the Middle-Temple, where he began the ſtudy of the Law, but was diverted from a vigorous proſecution of it by his inclination to polite Literature and Poetry. His firſt performance was a Novel intitled, Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled [A]; and he ſoon after began his Comedy of the Old Batchelor. But having little acquaintance with the traders in that way, he was recommended by his couſins to Mr. Thomas Southerne, who was very uſeful to him in the whole courſe of the Play, and engaged Mr. Dryden in its favour. That great man upon reading it declared, "that he never ſaw ſuch a firſt "Play in his life; but that the Author not being acquainted with the ſtage or the town, "it would be a pity to have it miſcarry for want of a little aſſiſtance. The ſtuff was "rich indeed; it wanted only the faſhionable cut of the town." Mr. Dryden, Mr. Arthur Mainwaring, and Mr. Thomas Southerne read it with great care; and Mr. Dryden put it in the order in which it was played; and Mr. Southerne obtained of Mr. Thomas Davenant, who then governed the Theatre Royal in Drury-Lane, that Mr. Congreve ſhould have the privilege of the houſe half a year before his Comedy was acted; a favour never granted before. It was at laſt acted in 1693 with univerſal applauſe, and uſhered into the world with a commendatory by Mr. Southerne, Mr. Marſh, and Mr. Bevil Higgons, tho' when he wrote it he was but nineteen years of age, and but one and twenty, when it was brought upon the ſtage [B]. The reputation of it gained him a great many conſiderable

(a) For theſe and other particulars of this [Article] we are obliged to the very ingenious Thomas Southerne Eſq; Author of Oroonoko, and the Fatal Marriage, or the Innocent Adultery, and ſeveral] other excellent Plays.

[A] His firſt performance was a Novel, intitled, Incognita: or Love and Duty reconcil'd.] It was publiſhed without his name, and addreſſed to Mrs. Katherine Leveſon, by a Dedication ſigned by the name of Cleophil. He tells us, that it was begun and finiſhed in the idle hours of a fortnight's time; for I can, ſays he, only eſteem it a laborious idleneſs, which is parent to ſo inconſiderable a birth.

[B] When he wrote his Old Batchelor, he was but nineteen years of age, and but one and twenty, when it was brought upon the Stage.] He tells us himſelf (1), that he was very much a boy, when that Comedy was written; "which, ſeveral, ſays he, know was ſome "years before it was acted. When I wrote it, I had "little thoughts of the Stage; but did it to amuſe "my ſelf in a ſlow recovery from a fit of ſickneſs. "Afterwards

(1) Amendments of Mr. Collier's falſe and imperfect Citations. pag. 39, 40.

conſiderable friends, and particularly Mr. Montague, afterwards Lord Halliſax, who procured him to be appointed one of the Commiſſioners of the Hackney-Coaches, and then gave him a place in the Pipe-Office, and afterwards a Patent-place in the Cuſtoms of ſix hundred pounds per annum, and the Poſt of Secretary to Jamaica, which paid him ſeven hundred and nine pounds a year on the Exchange at London. In 1694 his Double Dealer [C] was acted at the Theatre in Drury-Lane, and, together with his former Comedy, was honoured with the preſence of Queen Mary, upon whoſe death December the 28th 1694, our Author wrote a beautiful Paſtoral intitled, The Mourning Muſe of Alexis; a Paſtoral lamenting the Death of Queen Mary. The year following the State-factions grew ſo high, that the company divided, and Mr. Betterton being the moſt injured perſon, Mr. Congreve gave him the Comedy of Love for Love to open the New Theatre, which Mr. Betterton had made out of the Tennis-Court in Portugal-Row in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. His next performance was the Mourning Bride, a Tragedy [D], which was likewiſe acted in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields in 1697, and dedicated to the Princeſs Anne of Denmark, afterwards Queen. In 1698 his four Plays were attacked from the Preſs by Mr. Collier in his View of the Immorality and Profaneneſs of the Engliſh Stage; in an anſwer to which Mr. Congreve wrote Amendments of Mr. Collier's falſe and imperfect Citations &c. from the Old Batchelor, Double Dealer, Love for Love, Mourning Bride. By the Author of thoſe Plays. London 1698 in 8vo. Mr. Collier replied to this piece in his Defence of the Short View of the Profaneneſs and Immorality

" Afterwards through my indiſcretion it was ſeen, " and in ſome little time more it was acted. And I " through the remainder of my indiſcretion ſuffered " myſelf to be drawn into the proſecution of a diffi- " cult and thankleſs ſtudy, and to be involved in a " perpetual war with knaves and fools." The Lord Falkland likewiſe in his Prologue intended for this Comedy has the following lines:

As for our youngſter, I am apt to doubt him,
With all the vigour of his youth about him:
But he, more ſanguine, truſts in one and twenty,
And impudently hopes he ſhall content you.

(2) Num. 9. The Author of the Tatler tells us (2), that in the character, which gives name to this Play, there is excellently repreſented the Reluctance of a battered Debauchee to come into the Trammels of Order and Decency. He neither languiſhes, nor burns, but frets for love. The Gentlemen of more regular behaviour are drawn with much ſpirit and wit; and the Drama introduced by the dialogue of the firſt ſcene with uncommon, yet natural converſation. The part of Fondlewife is a lively image of the unſeaſonable fondneſs of age and impotence. The ſame Writer likewiſe tells us in another place (3), that in this " Comedy there is a neceſſary circumſtance ob- " ſerved by the Author, which moſt other Poets either " overlook or do not underſtand, that is to ſay, the " diſtinction of characters. It is very ordinary with " Writers to indulge a certain modeſty of believing " all men as witty as themſelves, and making all the " perſons of the Play ſpeak the ſentiments of the Au- " thor, without any manner of reſpect to the age, " fortune, or quality of him, that is on the Stage, " Ladies talk like rakes, and footmen make ſimiles. " But this Writer knows men; which makes his " Plays reaſonable entertainments, while the ſcenes of " moſt others are like the tunes between the Acts. " They are perhaps agreeable ſounds, but they have " no ideas affixed to them."

(3) Num. 195.

[C] His Double Dealer.] It is dedicated to the Right Honourable Charles Montague, one of the Lords of the Treaſury; and in the Dedication he obſerves, that he deſigned to have written a true and regular Comedy, but found it an undertaking, which put him in mind of, Sudet multum, fruſtraque laboret auſus idem. " And now, ſays he, to make amends for the vanity " of ſuch a deſign, I do confeſs both the attempt and " the imperfect performance. Yet I muſt take the " boldneſs to ſay, I have not miſcarried in the whole; " for the mechanical part of it is regular. That I " may ſay with as little vanity, as a Builder may ſay " he has built a houſe according to the model laid " down before him; or a Gardiner, that he has ſet " his flowers in a knot of ſuch or ſuch a figure. I de- " ſigned the moral firſt, and to that moral I invented " the fable, and do not know that I have borrowed one " hint of it any where. I made the Plot as ſtrong as " I could, becauſe it was ſingle; and I made it ſingle, " becauſe I would avoid confuſion, and was reſolved " to preſerve the three unities of the Drama." Mr. Dryden wrote a copy of verſes to his dear Friend Mr. Congreve on this Comedy; in which he has the following lines:

In eaſy Dialogue is Fletcher's praiſe;
He mov'd the mind, but had not power to raiſe.
Great Johnſon did by ſtrength of judgment pleaſe,
Yet doubling Fletcher's force, he wants his eaſe.
In diff'ring talents both adorn'd their age;
One for the ſtudy, t'other for the ſtage.
But both to Congreve juſtly ſhall ſubmit,
One match'd in judgment, both o'ermatch'd in wit.
In him all beauties of this age we ſee,
Etherege his courtſhip; Southerne's purity;
The ſatire, wit, and ſtrength of manly Wicherly
All this in blooming youth you have atchiev'd;
Nor are your foil'd contemporaries griev'd;
So much the ſweetneſs of your manners move,
We cannot envy you, becauſe we love *.

* Mr. Congreve's Candour is likewiſe celebrated by Mr. Charles Hopkins in his Poem to him in Dryden's Miſcellanies, Part 5. pag. 50. edit. London 1716.

And a little lower Mr. Dryden writes thus:

Thy firſt attempt (4) an early promiſe made;
That early promiſe has been more than paid:
So bold, yet ſo judiciouſly you dare,
That your leaſt praiſe, is to be regular.
Time, place, and action, may with pains be wrought,
But genius muſt be born, and never can be taught:
This is your portion, this your native ſtore;
Heav'n, that but once was prodigal before,
To Shakeſpear gave as much; ſhe could not give him more.

(4) The Old Batchelor.

[D] His next performance was the Mourning Bride, a Tragedy.] Sir Richard Blackmore has the following paſſage concerning it (5). " This Poem has received, " and in my opinion very juſtly, univerſal applauſe, " being look'd on as the moſt perfect Tragedy, that " has been wrote in this Age. The Fable, as far as " I can judge at firſt ſight, is a very artful and ma- " ſterly contrivance; the characters are well choſen " and well delineated; that of Zara is admirable. " The paſſions are well touched, and ſkilfully wrought " up. The diction proper, clear, beautiful, noble, " and diverſified agreeably to the variety of the ſubject. " Vice, as it ought to be, is puniſhed; and oppreſſed " innocence at laſt rewarded. Nature appears very " happily imitated (excepting one or two doubtful in- " ſtances) thro' the whole piece; in which there are " no immodeſt images or expreſſions, no wild unna- " tural rants; but (ſome exceptions being allowed) all " things are chaſte, juſt, and decent. This Tragedy, " as I ſaid before, has mightily obtained, and that " without the unnatural and fooliſh mixture of farce and " buffoonery; without ſo much as a Song or a Dance " to make it more agreeable. By this it appears, " that as a ſufficient genius can recommend itſelf, and " furniſh out abundant matter of pleaſure and admi- " ration without the paltry helps above named; ſo " likewiſe, that the taſte of the Nation is not ſo far " depraved, but that a regular and chaſte Play will " not only be forgiven but highly applauded."

(5) Preface to Prince Arthur. edit. London, fol. 1697.

Immorality of the Engliſh Stage &c. Being a Reply to Mr. Congreve's Amendments, &c. and to the Vindication of the Author of the Relapſe. London 1699 in 8vo. The laſt of his Plays was the Way of the World [E], acted by Mr. Betterton's Company in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and dedicated to the Earl of Montague. This excellent Comedy met with very indifferent ſucceſs the firſt night of its being exhibited, but afterwards was received in a manner ſuitable to its merit. He reviſed Mr. Dryden's Tranſlation of Virgil's Æneis [F]. He wrote likewiſe a Maſque intitled, The Judgment of Paris; and an Opera, intitled Semele [G], which was never performed, but excellently ſet to Muſic by his friend Mr. John Eccles. In 1710 he publiſhed an edition of his Poetical Works, in three volumes in 8vo, containing, beſides his performances already mentioned, A Collection of Poems upon ſeveral Occaſions; and all his Poetical Works have been reprinted at London in 1730 in three volumes in 12mo. He wrote alſo ſome Letters, particularly one upon Humour in Comedy, publiſhed by Mr. John Dennis in a Collection of Letters written by Mr. Dryden, Congreve, Moyle, &c. and a Dedication of Mr. Dryden's Plays to the Duke of Newcaſtle. In the latter part of his life his health began extremely to decline, and his ſight to fail. He died about five of the clock on Sunday morning, January the 19th $172\frac{8}{9}$, at his houſe in Surrey-ſtreet in the Strand, in the fifty ſeventh year of his age, and on the Sunday following, January the 26th, his corps lay in ſtate in the Jeruſalem-Chamber; from whence the ſame evening it was carried with great decency and ſolemnity into King Henry VIIth's chapel in Weſtminſter-Abbey, and interred near the late Earl of Godolphin, and a monument was erected to him there by Henrietta, late Ducheſs of Marlborough [H]. We ſhall give the character of him and his Writings in the Note [I].

CONON

[E] The laſt of his Plays was The Way of the World.] In the Dedication of it to Ralph E. of Montague he obſerves, that the ſucceſs of it on the Stage was almoſt beyond his expectation; for but little of it was prepared for that general taſte, which ſeems now to be predominant in the palates of our Audience. Thoſe characters, which are meant to be ridiculed in moſt of our Comedies, are of fools ſo groſs, that in my humble opinion they ſhould rather diſturb than divert the well-natured and reflecting part of the Audience. They are rather objects of charity than contempt; and inſtead of moving our mirth, they ought very often to excite our compaſſion. This reflection moved me to deſign ſome characters, which ſhould appear ridiculous, not ſo much thro' a natural folly, (which is incorrigible, and therefore not proper for the Stage) as thro' an affected wit; a wit, which at the ſame time that it is affected, is alſo falſe. As there is ſome difficulty in the formation of a character of this nature, ſo there is ſome hazard, which attends the progreſs of its ſucceſs upon the Stage. For many come to a Play ſo over-charged with criticiſm, that they very often let fly their cenſure, when thro' their raſhneſs they have miſtaken their aim. This I had occaſion lately to obſerve; for this Play had been acted two or three days, before ſome of theſe haſty Judges could find the leiſure to diſtinguiſh betwixt the character of a Witwoud and a Truewit. Sir Richard Steele wrote an Epiſtle to him upon the occaſion of this Comedy (6).

(6) It is printed by Mr. Charles Gildon in a New Miſcellany of Original Poems on ſeveral Occaſions. Written by the E. of D. Sir Charles Sidley, &c. and ſeveral other eminent Hands. Never before printed. London 1701 in 8vo.

[F] He reviſed Mr. Dryden's Tranſlation of Virgil's Æneis.] Mr. Dryden mentions this in the following paſſage of his dedication of that Tranſlation to John Lord Marquis of Normanby (7): Mr. Congreve has done me the favour to review the Æneis, and compare my verſion with the original. I ſhall never be aſhamed to own, that this excellent young man has ſhewed me many faults, which I have endeavoured to correct.

(7) The Works of Virgil. Tranſlated into Engliſh Verſe by Mr. Dryden, vol. 2. pag. 435. edit. London 1730, in 12mo.

[G] In 1710 he publiſhed Semele, an Opera.] In the Argument introductory to it he obſerves, that it was not thought requiſite to have any regard either to rhyme or equality of meaſure in the lines of that part of the dialogue, which was deſigned for the Recitative-Style in Muſic. "For as that Style in Muſic is not "confined to the ſtrict obſervation of Time and Meaſure, which is required in the compoſition of Airs "and Sonata's, ſo neither is it neceſſary that the ſame "exactneſs in numbers, rhymes, or meaſure, ſhould "be obſerved in words deſigned to be ſet in that manner, which muſt ever be obſerved in the formation "of Odes and Sonnets. For what they call Recitative "in Muſic, is only a more raiſeable ſpeaking; it is a "kind of proſe in Muſic: its beauty conſiſts in coming near nature, and in improving the natural accents of words by more pathetic or emphatical "tunes."

[H] A monument was erected to him there by Henrietta Ducheſs of Marlborough.] The Epitaph inſcribed upon it is as follows: Mr. William Congreve. Dyed January the 19*th* 1728, aged 56, and was buried near this place. To whoſe moſt valuable memory this monument is ſett up by Henrietta Ducheſs of Marlborough, as a mark how dearly ſhe remembers the happineſs and honour ſhe enjoyed in the ſincere friendſhipp of ſo worthy and honeſt a man, whoſe virtue, candour and witt gained him the love and eſteem of the preſent age, and whoſe writings will be the admiration of the future.

[I] We ſhall give the character of him and his writings in the Note.] Sir Richard Steele (8) obſerves, that his great diſcernment in diſtinguiſhing the characters of mankind, which is manifeſted in his Comedies, rendered his good opinion a juſt foundation for the eſteem of other men: That he acquired a juſt ſucceſs in the various parts of Poetry; that gentle, free, and eaſy faculty, which alſo in Songs and ſhort Poems, he poſſeſſed above all others, diſtinguiſhed itſelf wherever he appeared. "I cannot but "inſtance, ſays Sir Richard, your inimitable Doris, "which excels for politeneſs, fine raillery, and courtly "ſatire, any thing we can meet with in any language. "I cannot leave my favourite Doris, without taking "notice how much that ſhort performance diſcovers a "true knowledge of life. Doris in the character of a Li"bertine-Woman of condition, and the Satire is work'd "up accordingly. For people of quality are ſeldom touch"ed with any repreſentation of their vices, but in a light "which makes them ridiculous." Sir Richard then remarks that as much as our Author is to be eſteemed for his excellent writings (by which he is an honour to our Nation) he chooſes rather, as one that has paſſed many happy hours with him, to celebrate that eaſy condeſcenſion of mind and command of a pleaſant imagination, which gave him the uncommon praiſe of a man of wit, always to pleaſe, and never to offend. No one, after a joyful evening, could reflect upon an expreſſion of Mr. Congreve's, that dwelt upon him with pain. "In a man capable of exerting himſelf any "way, this, whatſoever the vain and ill-natur'd may "think of the matter, is an excellence above the "brighteſt ſallies of imagination." The ſame Writer likewiſe in his Epiſtle Dedicatory of the ſecond Edition of Mr. Addiſon's Drummer to Mr. Congreve (9) writes thus: You will pleaſe to pardon me, that I have thus laid a nice affair before a perſon, who has the acknowledged ſuperiority to all others, not only in the moſt excellent talents, but poſſeſſing them with an equanimity, candour, and benevolence, which render thoſe advantages a pleaſure as great to the reſt of the world, as they can be to the owner of them. And ſince fame conſiſts in the opinion of wiſe and good men, you muſt not blame me for taking the readieſt way to baffle an attempt upon my reputation,

(8) In his Dedication of his Poetical Miſcellanies &c. to Mr. Congreve. The 2d edition was printed at London 1727 in 12mo.

(9) Printed at London 1722, in 4to.

CONON, a Mathematician and Aſtronomer, was of Samos (a). He flouriſhed about the 130th Olympiad. He died before his friend Archimedes, who had a great value for him, and uſed to communicate his Problems to Conon, and ſend him Problems [A]. He engaged in ſome diſputes with Nicoteles the Mathematician, who wrote againſt him, and treated him with a little too much contempt (b). Apollonius Pergæus confeſſes this, and he declares, that Conon had not been ſucceſsful in his Demonſtrations (c). He invented a kind of Volute which differed from that of Dinoſtratus, but as Archimedes exhibited the properties of it more clearly, he, by that means, paſſed for the inventor of it; it having been called the Volute of Archimedes, and not that of Conon (d). With regard to the Aſtronomical knowledge of Conon, I refer you to Catullus [B], who gives an account of it in the beginning of his Poem on the hair of Berenice, ſiſter and wife of Ptolomy Euergetes. I muſt obſerve, that this Conon was ſo great a flatterer, as to aſſert that this Queen's hair had been transformed to a Conſtellation. We find, in Photius (e), the extracts of a work which contained fifty relations concerning the fabulous ages. The Author's name was CONON, and he had dedicated the book in queſtion to King Archelaus Philopator, whence Voſſius (f) ſuppoſed, that he might fix his life to the beginning of the eighth Century of Rome; he imagining that Strabo, Dion, and other Hiſtorians furniſh proofs from which it may be inferred, that this King Archelaus was one of the Princes who followed Mark Anthony in oppoſition to Octavius. Were this true, this Conon muſt be diſtinguiſhed from him, who, according to Joſephus, had mentioned the Jews (g). And indeed, it would have been very ridiculous in Joſephus, had he gloried in the teſtimony of ſo modern an Hiſtorian. The moſt probable aſſertions that can be made are, I, that the CONON, Author of a book relating to the City of Heraclea, cited by Apollonius the Scholiaſt (b), is the ſame with CONON who wrote a work concerning Italy, which Servius has cited (i). II, that the Conon of Photius, or the Conon of Joſephus, are the ſame with him in queſtion.

(a) Apollonius Pergæus, in Epiſtola ad Attalum præfixa lib. 4. Conicor.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Ex Voſſio de Scient. Mathem. cap. 54. num. 5. pag. 327, 328.

(e) Chap. 186.

(f) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. 1. cap. ult. pag. m. 162.

(g) Joſeph. contra Apionem, lib. 1. pag. 1051.

(b) Apol. Schol. in lib. 1.

(i) Servius in Æneid. lib. 7. ver. 738.

CONON

reputation, by an addreſs to one, whom every wiſe and good man looks upon with the greateſt affection and veneration. Major Richardſon Pack tells us (10), that in all his "Plays there is a great deal of lively and uncommon humour, and ſuch as yet, for the moſt part, is a picture of true life. Beſides, he hath raiſed the vein of ridicule, and made the Stage, which had been too much proſtituted to the mob, edifying to perſons of the firſt condition. And as his Fable is diverting, ſo it is wrought according to the ſtricteſt rules." Mr. Pope (11) ſtiles him [one of the moſt valuable men, as well as fineſt Writers of his age and country. Mr. de Voltaire obſerves (12), that he raiſed the glory of Comedy to a greater height than any Engliſh Writer before or ſince his time. He wrote only a few Plays, but they are excellent in their kind. The Laws of the Drama are ſtrictly obſerved in them. They abound with characters, all which are ſhadowed with the utmoſt delicacy; and we don't meet with ſo much as one low or coarſe jeſt. The language is every where that of men of honour, but their actions are thoſe of knaves; a proof that he was perfectly well acquainted with human nature, and frequented what we call polite company. He was infirm, and come to the verge of life, when I knew him (13). Mr. Congreve had one defect, which was his entertaining too mean an idea of his firſt profeſſion, (that of a Writer,) tho' it was to this he owed his fame and fortune. He ſpoke of his works as of trifles, that were beneath him; and hinted to me in our firſt converſation, that I ſhould viſit him upon no other foot than that of a Gentleman, who led a life of plainneſs and ſimplicity. I anſwered, that had he been ſo unfortunate as to be a mere Gentleman, I ſhould never have come to ſee him; and I was very much diſguſted at ſo unſeaſonable a piece of vanity. H.

(10) Eſſay on Study in his Miſcellanies, pag. 100.

(11) Poſtſcript to his Tranſlation of the Iliad of Homer, dated March 25, 1720.

(12) Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation, Lett. 30. pag. 188, 189. edit. London 1733, in 8vo.

(13) Mr. Voltaire came to England about the year 1726; for in the Preface to his Eſſay on the Civil Wars of France &c. printed at London 1727 in 12°, he tells us, that he had been but eighteen months in England.

[A] He died before his friend Archimedes who had a great value for him; and uſed to communicate his Problems to Conon.] This appears from Archimedes's writings. Debemus Cononе vivente ipſa emittere in vulgus: hunc enim accepimus talia potiſſimum poſſe deprehendere, & ipſis accommodatam proferre demonſtrationem (1). i. e. "We ought to publiſh theſe things in the life-time of Conon; for he, I am informed, is beſt capable of comprehending, and of giving a proper demonſtration of them." Theſe words are extracted from a Letter of Archimedes, inſerted at the beginning of one of his Books, and the following are found in another Letter. Antea quidem mihi mandaſti ſcirem eorum problematum demonſtrationem quæ prius ipſe propoſueram Cononi (2). i. e. "You ſome time ſince deſired me to write a demonſtration of thoſe Problems, which I firſt propoſed to Conon." He ſays in another place: Quot in Geometria theoremata viſa primum impoſſibilia, tempore perfectionem capiunt? Conon quidem non ſufficiens tempus ſortitus in eorum diſquiſitione, vitam cum morte commutavit, & ea dubia reliquit; quamquam omnia invenerat, ut & alia multa quibus plurimum Geometriam adauxit. Scimus quippe in illo fuiſſe non vulgarem Mathematicarum artium peritiam, laboriſque ſupra modum tolerantiam (3). i. e. "What a number of geometrical Theorems, which at firſt were thought impoſſible, have by time been carried to perfection? Conon indeed, not being allowed by the fate years ſufficient for inveſtigating them, was ſnatched from the world, and ſo left them unravelled, although they had been invented by him, and many more by which he has greatly improved Geometry; for we knew him to be exceedingly well ſkilled in the Mathematicks, and prodigiouſly laborious in his ſtudies." Here follows another paſſage. Cum audiſſem defunctum eſſe Cononem qui nobis reliquus erat in amicitia, tibique admodum fuerat familiaris, puta in Geometria maxime verſatus; virum quidem mortuum amare planxi, ut amiciſſimum & hominem in Mathematicis plane mirabilem. Atque tunc repente ſtatui mittere ad te, ſicuti antea ad Cononem ſolebam, geometricum theorema, quod nemo quidem prius eſt contemplatus &c (4). i. e. "When I heard of the death of Conon, who was my very good friend, and very intimate with you, and greatly ſkilled in Geometry; I bewailed exceedingly the loſs of ſo kind a friend, and ſo admirable a Mathematician: and immediately reſolved to ſend to you, as I uſed to do to Conon, a geometrical theorem, which till then had not been conſidered by any one."

(1) Archimed. Epiſt. ad Doſitheum, præfixa libro 1. de Sphæra & Cylindro.

(2) Idem, Archimed. Epiſt. præfixa lib. 2.

(3) Idem, Epiſt. præfixa Libro de Spiralibus.

(4) Idem in Libr. de Quadrat. Parabolæ.

[B] With regard to the aſtronomical knowledge of Conon I refer you to Catulus.] His Poem begins as follows:

Omnia qui magni diſpexit lumina mundi,
Qui ſtellarum ortus comperit, atque obitus:
Flammeus ut rapidi ſolis nitor obſcuretur,
Ut cedant certis ſidera temporibus,
Ut Triviam furtim ſub Latmia ſaxa relegans
Dulcis amor gyro devocet aërio:
Idem me ille Conon cœleſti lumine vidit
E Bereniceo vertice cæſariem
Fulgentem clarè (5).

"Thus Engliſh'd,
"Conon, whoſe eagle-eye the Stars ſurvey'd,
"Found when they riſe, or when they ſet to mortals.
"Who knew why Sol's effulgence is eclips'd,
"Why Stars at certain periods diſappear,
"How gentle love could draw fair Cynthia down
"To Latmos, there to kiſs her dear Endymion.
"Conon, who ſaw me, ſhining, in the Orb,
"Whence Berenice ſheds æthereal luſtre."

(5) Catullus, Epigr. 67. pag. m. 134.

CONON, General of the Athenians during the war of Peloponneſus, had made himſelf ſo illuſtrious by his brave actions, that they gave him the command over all the Iſlands [A]. He commanded the Naval Army the laſt year of the war; but he was not preſent at the battle which proved ſo fatal to the Athenians [B]. His abſence contributed very much to the deciſive advantage which thoſe of Lacedæmon obtained (a) under the conduct of Lyſander at the Goat's river (b). Conon, being informed after that misfortune of the taking of his native City, retired to Pharnabazus Governor of Ionia and Lydia [C], and inſinuated himſelf into his favour, that he might be able to hurt the Lacedæmonians. Theſe latter broke with Artaxerxes King of Perſia, and carried the war into his country under the conduct of Ageſilaüs. They made great progreſſes, and would in all likelihood have ſubdued all the provinces on this ſide Taurus, if Conon, by whoſe counſel the Perſian army was conducted (c), had not traverſed their deſigns [D]. He eaſily perceived that Tiſſaphernes betrayed the King of Perſia: this was too viſible; and yet the King, who had ſome obligation to Tiſſaphernes, was ſo prepoſſeſſed in his favour that he would not believe him guilty. This obliged Conon to take a journey to the Perſian Court; where he made that General's treaſon ſo apparent, that he convinced the King of it. He received a commiſſion to fit out ſhips of war againſt the Lacedæmonians; and by that means he had a fleet under his command, which gained (d) a ſignal victory over them (e). His principal care was to make the beſt uſe of the opportunity in (a) In the 4th year of the 93d Olympiad.

(b) Apud Ægos flumen. Corn. Nepos, in Conone, cap. 1.

(c) Hunc (Ageſilaum) adverſus Pharnabazus habitus eſt imperator; re quidem vera exercitui præfuit Conon, ejuſque omnia arbitrio geſta ſunt. Corn. Nepos, in Conone, cap. 2.

(d) The 2d year of the 96th Olympiad, according to Diodorus Siculus.

(e) Hos Conon apud Cnidum adortus magno prælio fugat. Corn. Nepos, in Conone, cap. 4.

[A] They gave him the command over all the Iſlands.] It is thought Cornelius Nepos has here committed a ſmall Anachroniſm (1); for the other Hiſtorians ſcarce begin to ſpeak of Conon, but by ſaying that he was put in the place of Alcibiades: now from that time to the end of the war, they do not ſay he had the poſt in queſtion, and it was not a poſt which the Athenians were in a condition to create: however, he who might be inveſted with it could not have made conqueſts, as Conon did: In qua poteſtate Pharas cepit coloniam Lacedæmoniorum (2). i. e. "Which command "while Conon held, he took Pharæ a Colony of the "Lacedæmonians." It was very much at that time if they could ſtand on the defenſive (3). It is thought therefore that the Hiſtorian anticipates and confounds the times, and that Conon had not this authority over all the Iſles, till he received it from the King of Perſia. If that Author had committed this error, he would have very ill diſcharged the duty of an Hiſtorian. He would be in ſome ſort excuſable, if he had taken one time for another with regard to a dignity which the Commonwealth of Athens had conferred: but ſuppoſing the cenſure juſt, he has done much worſe; he has been miſtaken both as to the time, and as to the perſons who conferred the command; he has attributed that to the Athenians which was done only by Artaxerxes; and he has notwithſtanding ſpoken ſeparately of what Artaxerxes did (4). It will be anſwered, perhaps, that he does not ſpecify from whom Conon received that Commiſſion, and therefore charity obliges us to ſuppoſe that he intends to ſpeak of the command which Artaxerxes beſtowed on Conon: but nothing can be more abſurd, or more repugnant to the Laws of Hiſtory, than to inſert in that paſſage, in the manner it appears there, the employment with which the King of Perſia honoured this illuſtrious Athenian. Let us allow therefore that Cornelius Nepos has confounded himſelf. Xenophon expreſly obſerves that Pharnabazus and Conon ravaged the territory of Pharæ (5). This was ſome time after the defeat of the Lacedæmonians at Cnidus.

(1) See Kirchmaier's Commentary on Cornelius Nepos, in Conon. pag. m. 433, 434.

(2) C. Nepos, in Conone, cap. 1.

(3) See Juſtin, lib. 5. cap. 6.

(4) Hinc magnis muneribus donatus (Conon) ad mare eſt miſſus, ut Cypriis & Phœnicibus cæteriſque maritimis civitatibus naves longas imperaret. i. e. "Hence was "Conon ſent, "laden with "rich preſents, "down to the "ſea, to order "the Cyprians, "Phœnicians, "and other maritime Cities, "to furniſh "ſhips of war." C. Nepos, in Conone, cap. 4.

(5) Xenoph. lib. 4. de Rebus geſtis Græcorum, pag. m. 314.

(6) Xenoph. lib. 2. pag. 268. See alſo Plutarch, in Lyſandro.

(7) See Kirchmaier, in C. Nep. Conon. pag. 434.

[B] He was not preſent at the battle which proved ſo fatal to the Athenians.] Here is a freſh fault of the Hiſtorian. There are no readers but would imagine, from his words, that the Athenian Fleet was attacked while Conon was gone to take a journey, or while he was carried to ſome town for the ſake of his health; but this was by no means the caſe: the abſence of Conon conſiſted in his eſcaping in time with nine veſſels, having well foreſeen that the enemy would gain a complete victory (6). It is true, it was not out of fear, but becauſe he ſaw that by reaſon of the ill diſcipline of the troops, they were in ſuch a condition that they could not poſſibly make reſiſtance. The Commentators who endeavour to juſtify Cornelius Nepos make wretched work of it (7).

[C] He retired to Pharnabazus Governor of Ionia and Lydia.] We have here another fault of the Hiſtorian: he does all that is neceſſary to perſuade his readers that Conon, ſeeking not a place of ſafety, but a place where he might do ſervice to his country, went directly to the Court of Pharnabazus. Non quæſivit ubi ipſe tuto viveret, ſed unde præſidio poſſet eſſe civibus ſuis (8). All this is deceitful: neither the fact nor the reaſon of it is true; for that General eſcaped directly to the Iſle of Cyprus, to King Evagoras a good friend of the Athenians; he eſcaped thither, I ſay, as well for his own ſecurity, as in order to concert meaſures with that Prince for the re-eſtabliſhing the affairs of his country. Ὡς Εὐαγόραν ἦλθε νομίσας κ) τῷ σώματι βεβαιοτάτην εἶναι τὴν παρ' ἐκείνου καταφυγὴν κ) τῇ πόλει τάχιστα ἂν αὐτὸν γενέσθαι βοηθόν: Ad Evagoram ſe contuliſſe quod putabat ſe apud eum & ſaluti ſuæ rectiſſimè conſulturum, & Reipublicæ erigendæ adjutorem quamprimum habiturum (9). All the Hiſtorians ſpeak of this retreat of Conon (10); and there are ſome Authors who ſay he was yet in Cyprus when Ageſilaüs ravaged Aſia. Iſocrates aſſures us that Conon for ſome time thought of nothing but his own private affairs in the Iſle of Cyprus. Χρόνον μέν τινα περὶ τὴν τῶν ἰδίων ἐπιμέλειαν διέτριβεν (11). He was yet in Cyprus, according to Juſtin (12), when it was diſcovered that Tiſſaphernes, betraying the King of Perſia, had ſuffered the Lacedæmonians to commit hoſtilities in Aſia. If Cornelius Nepos has been guilty of a fault when he did not ſpeak of this retreat of Conon, he has been guilty of another when he took upon him to ſpeak of it." He ſays in the Life of Chabrias, that it is the ordinary defect of Republics not to bear a diſtinguiſhed merit: Eſt hoc commune vitium in magnis liberiſque civitatibus, ut invidia gloriæ comes ſit, & libenter de his detrahant quos eminere videant altius. i. e. "This is the common fault "in great and free Cities, that envy is the concomi-"tant of glory, and men willingly detract from thoſe "whom they perceive to be more highly eminent." It is for this reaſon, ſays he, that ſeveral great men have voluntarily abſented themſelves from Athens, and that Conon lived a long time in the Iſle of Cyprus. This example is good for nothing; for Conon retired into that Iſland after ſo lamentable a defeat, that he was either afraid (13) or aſham'd (14) to return to Athens. Add to this, that that City fell ſoon after under the Lacedæmonian yoke.

(8) C. Nep. cap. 2.

(9) Iſocrat. in Evagora, pag. m. 292.

(10) Juſtin. lib. 5. cap. 6. Xenophon, lib. 2. Diodorus, lib. 13. Plutarchus, in Lyſandro, pag. 438. in Artaxerxe, pag. 1021.

(11) Iſocrat. Orat. ad Philipp. pag. m. 137.

(12) Juſtin. lib. 6. cap. 1.

(13) Crudelitatem civium metuens ad regem Cyprium concedit. Juſtin. lib. 5. cap. 6.

[D] The Lacedæmonians would have ſubdued the Provinces on this ſide Taurus, if Conon . . . . had not traverſed their deſigns.] A political fetch, which his Hiſtorian ſays nothing of, proved a hundred times more uſeful to him than all his military ſkill: the fetch was this. He perſuaded the King of Perſia to ſend round ſums of money to the Orators of Greece, to the end they might excite a war againſt the Lacedæmonians. Thoſe Orators, being gained by this means, ſtirred up the people, each of them in his own city, to ſuch a degree that a formidable league was formed againſt the Lacedæmonians (15); and then Ageſilaus was recalled home, and obliged to quit all his projected conqueſts to think only of defending the territories of Lacedæmon. There is nothing of greater uſe to thoſe who would kindle a war, or cauſe one to continue, than to have the Orators tongues at their devotion. For which reaſon it is obſerved they take great care to gain thoſe men's affection.

(14) Ἀτυχήσας ἐν τῇ ναυμαχίᾳ . . . εἰκὸς δὲ μὴ, αἰσχυνθῆναι κατηγορῶν. Cum navali prælio . . . male pugnatum eſſet redire domum erubuit. Iſocrat. Orat. ad Philip. pag. 138.

(15) Polyænus, lib. 1. Stratagem. ſub fin. See alſo Plutarch, in Artaxerxe, pag. 1021; and Xenophon, Hiſt. Græc. lib. 3. pag. 294. edit. 1581.

in favour of his native country [E]: he ſailed to Athens with part of the victorious fleet, he diſtributed among the inhabitants the money which he had received from Pharnabazus, and he gave orders for repairing the Piræus and the City walls. Had he done no more than this, he would not have been to blame; but he forgot himſelf ſo far as to contrive the taking of Ionia and Æolis from the Perſians, and the bringing them again under the Athenian power. This plot could not be carried on ſo ſecretly but the Perſians perceived it. Whereupon Teribazus, the Governor of Sardis, ſent Conon word that he had ſome affairs of great importance to communicate to him, on account of which he deſigned to ſend him to the King. Conon repaired to Sardis, and was there made priſoner. Some ſay he was carried to Artaxerxes, and that he ended his life in that country; but others aſſert that he eſcaped out of priſon, and doubt whether Teribazus was not conſenting to it (f). Moreri ought not, therefore, to have affirmed that Teribazus, being envious of his glory, put him to death; for Xenophon acknowledges, I, that Teribazus did not arreſt him till after the crimes, of which the Lacedæmonians accuſed him, were fully proved; II, that he afterwards ſent to know of the King his maſter what he ſhould do with him (g). Conon left a ſon named TIMOTHEUS, who was a great Captain, and experienced the uſual ingratitude of his country (b). This Timotheus was the ſcholar of Iſocrates [F]. He brought himſelf genteelly off when he was reproached with the lewd life of his mother [G]. He left a ſon named CONON, who was condemned to rebuild part of the City walls [H]. No great exactneſs is to be found either in Juſtin or in Cornelius Nepos, with regard to our Conon, whether we compare them with one another [I], or whether we

(f) Extracted from Cornelius Nepos, in the Life of Conon.

(g) Xenoph. de Geſtis Græcorum, lib. 4. pag. m. 315.

(b) See his Life in Cornelius Nepos.

[E] His principal care was to make the beſt uſe of the opportunity in favour of his native country.] Juſtin and Cornelius Nepos have employed too ſtrong expreſſions, when they ſpeak of the condition from which Conon delivered the city of Athens. Juſtin ſuppoſes that when the Lacedæmonians loſt the famous battle of Cnidus, they held the city of Athens under the yoke of ſervitude; that they had a garriſon there; in a word, that it was one of their conquered countries. Victi Lacedæmonii fugam capeſſunt, præſidia hoſtium Athenis deducuntur, populo reſtituta dignitate conditio ſervilis eripitur (16). This is not only carrying matters too far, but alſo advancing a great falſhood; for ſix or ſeven years before Conon had defeated the Lacedæmonian fleet at Cnidus, the Athenians had recovered their liberty; the government of the thirty Tyrants had been aboliſhed, a general amneſty had been publiſhed, the popular ſtate had been reſtored, &c (17). It was Thraſybulus who produced theſe great changes the third year of the 94th Olympiad (18): but the battle of Cnidus was fought the ſecond year of the 96th Olympiad. Beſides, is it not certain that the year before this battle of Cnidus, the Lacedæmonians had been beaten near Haliartus by the army of the Allies? Were not the Athenians one of the people who had entered into a confederacy againſt the Lacedæmonians? Could they have done this if they had had a Lacedæmonian garriſon in their city? Cornelius Nepos has not committed the Anachroniſm of Juſtin; he very well knew that the Thebans and Athenians had declared war againſt thoſe of Lacedæmon before the battle of Cnidus. Poſteaquam domum à ſuis civibus revocatus eſt (Ageſilaus) quod Bœotii & Athenienſes Lacedæmoniis bellum indixerant, Conon nihilo ſecius apud præfectos regis verſabatur. i. e. "After "that Ageſilaus was recalled home by his citizens, be"cauſe the Bœotians and Athenians had declared war "againſt the Lacedæmonians, Conon nevertheleſs con"tinued with the King's Governors." The ſame Hiſtorian, after theſe words, relates how Conon took a journey to the Court of Perſia, and obtained a commiſſion to cauſe ſhips of war to be equipped, to put to ſea the year following. It was with this fleet that Conon beat the Lacedæmonians at Cnidus. Juſtin has confounded every thing: he has falſly imagined that the Thebans, the Athenians, and their Allies, did not declare war againſt Lacedæmon till after the battle of Cnidus (19). It is no wonder that the terms of Cornelius Nepos are leſs falſe than thoſe of Juſtin; becauſe the Anachroniſm of the latter is not to be found in the former. We may, notwithſtanding, affirm that Cornelius Nepos has expreſſed himſelf ill (20); for it cannot be ſaid, properly ſpeaking, that a people which makes war on another, and wins battles againſt another, is under the ſervitude of that other. The Athenians were in this ſituation before the battle of Cnidus. In the ſtyle of an Orator one may ſpeak as Cornelius Nepos does; for an Orator would make no difficulty to ſay that Guſtavus gave liberty to all Europe, which was in ſlavery to the Houſe of Auſtria; but this language would be very impertinent in an Hiſtorian.

(16) Juſtin. lib. 6. cap. 3.

(17) Xenophon, lib. 2. ſub fin.

(18) According to Calviſius.

(19) Juſtin. lib. 6. cap. 4.

(20) Hos Conon apud Cnidum adortus magno prælio fugat, multas naves capit, complures deprimit: qua victoria non ſolum Athenæ ſed etiam cuncta Græcia, quæ ſub Lacedæmoniorum fuerat IMPERIO, liberata eſt. i. e. "Theſe Conon "attacked near "Cnidus, and "defeated them "in a great en"gagement, "taking and "ſinking many "ſhips; by "which victory "not Athens "alone, but all "Greece like"wiſe, which "had been ſub"ject to the "power of the "Lacedæmoni"ans, was ſet at "liberty. Corn. Nepos, in Cononе.

[F] TIMOTHEUS, his ſon, was the Scholar of Iſocrates (21).] Cicero teſtifies that Timotheus equalled his father in military virtues, and ſurpaſſed him in learning. Quod idem fecit Timotheus Cononis filius, qui cum belli laude non inferior fuiſſet quàm pater, ad eam laudem doctrinæ & ingenii gloriam adjecit (22).

(21) Plutarch. in Vita Iſocrat.

(22) Cicero, de Offic. lib. 1. cap. 32.

[G] . . . . and brought himſelf genteelly off, when he was reproached with the lewd life of his mother.] This woman was of Thrace, and had followed the trade of a Courtezan; but after ſhe had left it off, no one ſhewed a more prudent and exemplary conduct than ſhe; and this is the property of that ſort of women when they become ſincere converts: it is at leaſt the opinion of the Author whom I copy. Τιμοθεος δ' ὁ στρατηγήσας Ἀθηναίων ἐπιφανῶς, ἑταίρας ἦν υἱὸς, Θρᾴττης τὸ γένος, σώφρονος δ' ἄλλως τοὺς τρόπους, μεταβαλλόντων δὲ αἱ τοιαῦται εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν, τῶν ἐπὶ τούτῳ σεμνυνομένων ἐστὶ βελτίων. Timothei, qui cum magna gloria Athenienſium dux exercituum fuit, mater erat Thracia genere, meretrix, ſed gravibus & laudatis moribus. Nam ejus conditionis fœminæ cùm ad temperantiam & continentiam ſeſe applicuerint, aliis qui ob eas virtutes gloriantur, probiores ſunt (23). Timotheus being rallied for having ſuch a mother, anſwered that he was greatly obliged to her, ſince ſhe was the cauſe that he was the ſon of an illuſtrious father (24). And indeed, if this woman had not been one of a looſe behaviour, ſhe had never lain with Conon; and conſequently Timotheus had never been. He owed his exiſtence therefore to his mother's lewdneſs; which exiſtence was glorious, conſidering the figure Conon made in the world. This makes me recollect what is told of the mother of three illuſtrious baſtards. She repented not of her faults, ſince they had produced three men of great merit. Conſult the Remark [B] of the article ERASMUS.

(23) Athen. lib. 13. cap. 5. pag. m. 577.

(24) Idem, ibid.

[H] CONON, his grandſon, was condemned to rebuild part of the city walls.] Cornelius Nepos moralizes upon this by a very pretty antitheſis: Hujus (Timothei) poſt mortem quum populum judicii ſui pœniteret, mulctæ novem partes detraxit, & decem talenta Cononem filium ejus ad muri quamdam partem reficiendam juſſit dare; in quo fortunæ varietas eſt animadverſa, nam quos avus Conon muros ex hoſtium præda patriæ reſtituerat, eoſdem nepos cum ſumma ignominia familiæ ex ſua re familiari reficere coactus eſt (25). i. e. "After "the death of Timotheus, when the people re"pented of the ſentence they had paſſed, they remit"ted nine parts of the fine, and ordered Conon his ſon "to pay ten talents to repair a certain part of the "wall; wherein the viciſſitude of fortune is obſerva"ble: for the ſame walls which Conon the grandfa"ther had rebuilt for his country out of the ſpoil of "its enemies, was the grandſon, with the utmoſt igno"miny to the family, compelled to repair out of his "private fortune."

(25) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Timothei, cap. 4.

[I] No great exactneſs is to be found either in Juſtin, or in Cornelius Nepos, ... whether we compare them with one another . . . .] Here is the narrative of we compare the Life of Conon with that of Ageſilaüs, both written by Cornelius Nepos.

Juſtin (26). The Lacedæmonians, after they had ſubdued the Commonwealth of Athens, became more ambitious than before (27), and thought of no leſs than the conqueſt of all Aſia. To perform this they muſt neceſſarily vanquiſh the Perſians, as well thoſe who were commanded by Tiſſaphernes, as thoſe who were commanded by Pharnabazus. The enterprize appeared too great to Hercyllides the Lacedæmonian General: for which reaſon he corrupted Tiſſaphernes, and made a private treaty with him, by which he engaged not to attack him, provided that certain ſums were paid him. Pharnabazus complained of this conduct: he repreſented that Tiſſaphernes inſtead of repelling the enemies, bought a Truce of them, which afforded them an opportunity of attacking the other provinces of the Empire more vigorouſly; that the command of the Fleets ought therefore to be taken from him, and conferred on Conon, who lived in exile in the Iſland of Cyprus. The King of Perſia found the Remonſtrances of Pharnabazus juſt, and ordered the Naval Army to be put under the command of Conon. Hereupon, the Lacedæmonians demanded ſuccours of the King of Egypt, and obtained ſeveral ſhips, and reſolved to ſend their King Ageſilaüs into Aſia with a great army. Here therefore are Conon and Ageſilaüs oppoſed to one another in Aſia: the match was well made; they were equal in all things; and it thence came to paſs that neither of them vanquiſhed the other. Non facile dixerim quod aliud par ducum tam bene comparatum fuerit, quippe ætas, virtus, conſilium, ſapientia utrique prope una, gloria, quoque rerum geſtarum eadem: quibus cum paria omnia fortuna dederit, invictum tamen ab altero utrumque ſervavit (28). i. e. "It would be hard to "ſay that any other two Generals were ſo well matched; for their age, their valour, their conduct, and "their prudence, were nearly the ſame, the glory of "their paſt actions was alſo equal: whom when fortune had thus alike favoured in all reſpects, ſhe notwithſtanding ſuffered neither of them to be conquered by the other." But as Conon's ſoldiers mutinied for want of pay, and the letters which he wrote to the King on that head produced no effect, he took a journey to the Court of Perſia, and remonſtrated the ill uſe which the Miniſters made of the public revenues ſo ſtrongly, that the King named a perſon whoſe care it ſhould be to furniſh Conon with what money was neceſſary. Immediately Conon was ſent to the Fleet, and without loſing time he went and landed in the enemies country, ravaged it, took ſome Towns, and ſpread ſuch a conſternation there, that thoſe of Lacedæmon reſolved to recall Ageſilaüs. However, they fitted out a great fleet, and thought themſelves in a condition to hazard a battle; but they were defeated by Conon. This victory reſtored the Athenians to liberty, and encouraged the Thebans to declare war againſt the Lacedæmonians: they beat them, and then entred ſword in hand into the territory of Lacedæmon. The Lacedæmonians recalled Ageſilaus to oppoſe this torrent (29). Ageſilaus came back, and obtained a victory. Conon, being informed that Ageſilaus had left Aſia, made a new deſcent on the enemies lands, pillaged them, and afterwards returned to Athens.

(26) Juſtin. lib. 6. cap. 2, & ſeq.

(27) More ingenii humani quo plura habent eo ampliora cupientes. i. e. "According to "the natural "diſpoſition of "mankind, "whereby the "more they "poſſeſs, the "more they co-"vet." Idem, ibid. cap. 1.

(28) Juſtin. lib. 6. cap. 2. His TAMEN ſeems to me to be the term of a very bad Logician; for it is ſo far from being ſtrange that two Captains equal IN EVERY THING did not vanquiſh one the other, that it would have been ſurprizing if it had happened otherwiſe. This is the reaſon why I have not ſaid according to the Text of Juſtin, Notwithſtanding it came to paſs that neither of them vanquiſhed the other: but have put thence in the room of notwithſtanding.

(29) See the laſt Remark, towards the end.

See the Narrative of Cornelius Nepos in the Text of this Article, and compare it with that of Juſtin, and you will find that either the one or the other of theſe two Hiſtorians has committed great overſights. I. According to Juſtin, no employment was given to Conon till the King of Perſia was convinced of the treaſon of Tiſſaphernes by the means of Pharnabazus: the firſt employment which was given him was the command of the Fleet; he had continued in the Iſle of Cyprus till Pharnabazus procured it for him (30). But according to Cornelius Nepos, he had not retired into the Iſle of Cyprus, but went directly to Pharnabazus: he had been the ſoul of the army commanded by that General, and had been oppoſed to King Ageſilaüs; he had, by his good counſels, hindred Ageſilaüs from making farther conqueſts; nor had he remained uſeleſs after that Prince's retreat: he had been ſent to the Court by Pharnabazus to accuſe Tiſſaphernes: he had undeceived Artaxerxes with regard to that traitor; and it was ſubſequent to all this that he obtained the command of the fleets. Can two Narratives be more different? II. According to Juſtin, the Lacedæmonians, being informed that Conon was to command the naval forces of Perſia, made great armaments by ſea and land: they gave the command of their Fleet to Piſander, and ſent Ageſilaüs into Aſia with very fine troops to oppoſe Conon; ſo that thoſe two great men were then matched againſt one another. Ageſilaüs and Conon maintained their honour; neither of them vanquiſhed his antagoniſt. But Conon, being ill obeyed by his ſoldiers becauſe they were not paid, was obliged to go to the Court of Perſia to repreſent the neceſſary remedy to the King: he received money, and was ſent back to the Fleet. Cornelius Nepos relates things very differently: he will have it that Conon did not command the naval army till after Ageſilaüs had quitted Aſia to go and ſuccour Lacedæmon; and that Conon went to the Court of Perſia to accuſe Tiſſaphernes, and not becauſe the ſoldiers had mutinied. III. According to Juſtin, the Perſian army was commanded by Conon only; but, according to Cornelius Nepos, it was Pharnabazus who commanded it: it is true, the real command was in Conon, becauſe his counſels were followed. It is impoſſible not to ſee faults in the Relation of Juſtin; for after that Author has told us that Conon was the King of Perſia's Admiral (31), he makes him appear at the head of a Land-army, without acquainting us why or how the Court ordered ſuch a metamorphoſis, and even without taking notice that they diſpoſed of him in a different manner. It will not be denied that Ageſilaüs made war by land (32); it is therefore moſt certain that Conon, who was oppoſed to him, according to Juſtin, muſt have commanded by Land. The Hiſtorian, not content with this fault, has committed a ſecond; he not only ſhews us a chimerical Admiral, who, without having performed the leaſt thing at ſea, appears at the head of an army far within land; but he ſays alſo that this General having gone to complain that his troops were not paid, was ſent back to the Fleet. Who would not believe, when he reads this, that Conon had already appeared on board the King of Perſia's Fleet? Yet it is certain that he appears in Juſtin only among the land-forces. Theſe are inaccuracies which are not to be juſtified by ſaying, that this Author only wrote an Abridgment of a larger Hiſtory; for a good Abridger never ſuppreſſes ſuch circumſtances as are wanting here. So much for the Criticiſms which might be made on Juſtin, conſidering him as the only Writer who has ſpoken of theſe things: but I doubt not but if he were compared with the other Hiſtorians, he might eaſily be convicted of ſome falſhoods. I wiſh they who have commented him would have taken notice of the faults of his narration, and his hiſtorical confuſions. Almoſt all of them have rather choſen Grammatical Remarks.

I would not always prefer Cornelius Nepos to Juſtin; for though, having only written the Life of a ſingle perſon, he ought to have ſpoken more exactly of him than thoſe who met with him in their way, while they were writing a General Hiſtory, it is true nevertheleſs that in certain particulars I ſhould rather truſt to the General Hiſtory left us by Xenophon, than to him. Xenophon is in divers reſpects more and leſs conformable to Cornelius Nepos than to Juſtin. He neither introduces Conon in the wars by land againſt Ageſilaüs, nor makes him concerned in the diſgrace of Tiſſaphernes; which is at once to refute both Cornelius Nepos and Juſtin. He does not make Conon appear on the Stage, till after the puniſhment of Tiſſaphernes, and to command the Van-guard of Artaxerxes's naval army at the battle of Cnidus (33). Here is nothing to countenance Cornelius Nepos; but Juſtin finds ſomething to favour him. Xenophon acknowledges that Conon made two deſcents on the lands of the Lacedæmonians, but both poſterior to the battle of Cnidus, and as Lieutenant or Collegue of Pharnabazus (34). This refutes Juſtin, who does not ſpeak of Pharnabazus even as a cypher, and who ſuppoſes that the firſt deſcent was made before the battle of Cnidus. When the news of that battle was brought

(30) His vocibus regem à Tiſſapherne alienatum hortatur (Pharnabazus) ut in locum ejus navalis belli ducem eligat Conona Athenienſem, qui amiſſa bello patria Cypri exulabat. Juſt. lib. 6. cap. 1.

(31) Juſſus eſt (Pharnabazus) Conona claſſi præficere. Idem, ibid.

(32) Xenophon, lib. 3. pag. 294. obſerves that the Lacedæmonians ſent the commiſſion to command the naval forces into Aſia to Ageſilaus; but that he gave that poſt to his brother-in-law.

(33) Xenophon, de Rebus Geſtis Græc. lib. 4. pag. 303.

(34) Idem, pag. 313, 314.

Nepos [K]. Servius the Grammarian is miſtaken in ſuppoſing that our Conon was meant in thoſe words of Virgil (i), In medio duo ſigna, Conon. Beroaldus (k), cenſuring this error, has obſerved that, according to the Grammarian Probus, Virgil intended to ſpeak of Conon of Samos, who is the ſubject of the preceding Article.

(i) Eclog. 3. ver. 40.

(k) Beroald. Animadv. in Servium.

brought to Ageſilaüs, he was already in Bœotia, according to Xenophon (35). On this foot, Juſtin is miſtaken, when he ſays that the exploits of Conon obliged the Lacedæmonians to recall Ageſilaüs. He is alſo miſtaken when he relates that Conon, having learned that Ageſilaus was returned from Aſia to Greece, quitted the coaſts of Aſia, and returned thence towards Lacedæmon, to make a ſecond deſcent there (36); for as this ſecond deſcent was made after the battle of Cnidus, and that battle was poſterior to Ageſilaüs's return into Europe, I leave you to judge whether the news of that return of Ageſilaüs was the occaſion of Conon's taking the reſolution to make this ſecond deſcent. People may praiſe the ancient Hiſtorians as much as they pleaſe, but they ſhall never perſuade me that they equal ſome of our moderns with regard to the diſtinct obſervation of the times wherein each thing happened (37).

(35) Idem, pag. 303.

(36) Conon quoque audito reditu Ageſilai, & ipſe ex Aſia ad depopulandos Lacedæmoniorum agros revertitur. Juſtin. lib. 6. cap. 5.

(37) See Mr. Perrault, Parallele des Anciens & des Modernes, tom. 1. pag. 275, of the Dutch Edition.

[K] . . . . or whether we compare the Life of Conon with that of Ageſilaüs, both written by Cornelius Nepos.] We ſee Conon in the former ſo highly eſteemed by Pharnabazus, that every thing is done by his advice. It is he who, properly ſpeaking, commands the army (38); and Pharnabazus is Generaliſſimo only in name. It is Conon who ſtops the progreſs of Ageſilaüs: without him all Aſia on this ſide Taurus would have fallen under the Lacedæmonian yoke. Look in the Life of Ageſilaüs whether Conon ſignalized himſelf againſt him, and you will not find Conon's name there ſo much as once. You ſee Ageſilaüs always triumphant; he always over-reaches his enemies; if he does not think fit to fight, it is not poſſible to force him to it; if he does fight, he always conquers, though he be inferior in number (39); if he does not penetrate into the heart of the Empire, Conon is not the cauſe of it, it is becauſe he is recalled home where his preſence is neceſſary. In caſe Cornelius Nepos had a mind to conſult Conon's honour, he has done well not to introduce him in the Life of Ageſilaus, where there is nothing but ſhame to be gotten by all who reſiſted that Prince during his Aſiatic expedition. But in conſulting the honour of another, the Hiſtorian has proſtituted his own: he has not conſidered the character with which he had inveſted Conon in the Life of that General; ſo that one might ſtrangely perplex Cornelius Nepos by the following Dilemma: What you have ſaid of the exploits of Conon againſt Ageſilaüs is either true or falſe: if it be falſe, you deſerve to be toſſed in a blanket; if it be true, you deſerve it no leſs: for you have not only ſuppreſſed it in the Life of Ageſilaus, but you there ſpeak of Ageſilaus's exploits in ſuch a manner, that all your Readers clearly ſee the Perſians did nothing of conſequence, and got nothing but ſhame. Here is another attack. In the Life of Conon, the Lacedæmonians break the alliance they had made with the Perſians; they carry the war into Aſia under the conduct of Ageſilaüs, and they are encouraged to this chiefly by Tiſſaphernes, who betrays his maſter, and makes a private Treaty with them. That General's treaſon is a clear and certain fact, though the King is not willing to believe it (40). But in the Life of Ageſilaüs, it is Artaxerxes who begins to make preparations againſt the Greeks; and he is prevented with ſuch diligence, that Ageſilaüs arrives in Aſia with his troops before the Perſian Governors know he is ſet out (41). Tiſſaphernes is ſurprized and diſconcerted no leſs than the others: he demands a truce, and feigns to deſire it only to conclude a peace; but at the bottom he only ſeeks to gain time, in order to levy forces: he obtains a truce for three months, and thinks of nothing but war; and in all that follows he makes not one ſtep which looks like a colluſion. Indeed he is not fortunate enough to penetrate the deſigns of his enemy, or to defend the Provinces which the King of Perſia had intruſted him with; but he does all that he is able, if the Hiſtorian may be believed. I have ſeen no Commentators who reproach him with this groſs contradiction. To conclude, in the Life of Conon, it is Pharnabazus who commands the Perſians againſt Ageſilaüs; but in the Life of the latter, the name of this Pharnabazus is not even once to be ſeen: ſo that the ſame Author in one place attributes the whole care of making reſiſtance to Conon and Pharnabazus, and in another he attributes it wholly to Tiſſaphernes. It may be ſaid, that it would have diminiſhed the glory of Ageſilaüs, if he had owned the treaſon of Tiſſaphernes. But if this reaſon be good, let us deprive him of the title of Hiſtorian; for he deſerves no other than that of a Panegyriſt, who imitates the falſe Rhetoric of a Sophiſt. If theſe two Lives were ſtrictly examined, one would be apt to conclude them to have been the Work of two Writers, who endeavoured to refute each other; and yet they are the production of the ſame pen.

(39) Pepulit ergo quotieſcumque congreſſus eſt multo majores adverſariorum copias. Idem, in Ageſilao, cap. 3, fin.

(40) Defecerat à Rege Tiſſaphernes, neque id tam Artaxerxi quàm cæteris erat apertum. Idem, in Conone, cap. 3.

(41) Tanta celeritate uſus eſt, ut prius in Aſiam cum copiis pervenerit quam regii Satrapæ eum ſcirent profectum. Idem, in Ageſilao, cap. 2.

Cornelius Nepos criticized.

The Life of Conon written by Cornelius Nepos differs from the relation of Juſtin in ſeveral particulars; as has been ſhewn above. Give me leave farther to obſerve a variation which is found between Juſtin and the Life of Ageſilaüs written by Cornelius Nepos. According to Juſtin, fortune carried herſelf ſo evenly between Ageſilaüs and Conon, that they were equal in every thing, ſo that the one did not vanquiſh the other (42). Cornelius Nepos tells us quite the contrary, though he affects to ſuppreſs the name of Conon. He is not ſatisfied with relating events which prove in a very ſenſible manner that Ageſilaüs beat the Perſians, without the leaſt appearance of their ever gaining any advantage, he ſays expreſly that all the world would agree that Ageſilaüs was the conqueror (43). He adds that that Prince at the head of a victorious army was in full hopes of ſubduing all Perſia (44). I forgot to take notice that, according to Juſtin, the Lacedæmonians recalled Ageſilaüs when they ſaw themſelves blocked up by the enemy after the battle of Haliartus, where Lyſander was ſlain. They were in pain for their City, ſays he, for which reaſon they recalled Ageſilaüs, who was performing great things in Aſia (45). Had he ſaid no more than this, he could not well have been cenſured; but he had ſaid, ſome pages before, that the recalling of Ageſilaüs was reſolved on before the battle of Cnidus, and that the loſs of that battle gave ſuch encouragement to the Athenians and Thebans, that they declared war againſt the Lacedæmonians, and won a battle in which Lyſander was killed. This is overturning the order of events; for the battle of Haliartus was fought a year before that of Cnidus: ſo that we ſee Juſtin has fallen into the Sophiſm à non cauſa pro cauſa, which is yet more frequent among the Hiſtorians than among the Peripatetics, as I have elſewhere (46) obſerved.

(42) I have quoted and criticized Juſtin's words above, Citation (28).

(43) Sic in Aſia verſatus eſt ut omnium opinione victor duceretur. Cornelius Nepos, in Ageſilao, cap. 3, fin.

(44) Quum victori præeſſet exercitui, maximamque haberet fiduciam regni Perſarum potiundi. Idem, ibid. cap. 4.

(45) Quod metuentes Lacedæmonii regem ſuum Ageſilaum ex Aſia, qui ibi magnas res gerebat, ad defenſionem patriæ arceſſunt. Juſtin, lib. 6. cap. 4.

(46) Above, at the end of the the laſt Remark of the Article CAUSSIN.

CONRAD (HERIMANNUS). There is extant under that name a Latin Oration, in which the United Provinces are very much abuſed [A]: It was printed at Molſheim about the year 1618. The Author aſſerts that he bore arms ſince the battle of Pavia. Berneggerus thinks that piece was written by a Jeſuit (a).

(a) Matth. Berneggerus, in Tuba Pacis, pag. 271.

[A] There is under that name an . . . . . Oration, in which the United Provinces are very much abuſed.] The Author charges the States with Atheiſm, and aſſerts, that they do not mind Religion, but only ſo far, as they think it may ſerve to enlarge their Dominions. Ordines Belgii potentiſſimos Atheiſmi præſidenter arceſcit, nec Religionem curæ habere dicit, niſi quatenus ad ampliendum Imperium utilis eſſe videtur (1).

(1) Bernegg. in Tuba Pacis, pag. 271.

CONRARUS (GREGORY) Protonotary to the Pope, was one of the learned men who lived in the fifteenth Century. There is a Letter, which Poggius wrote to him, in which he anſwers the objections which Conrarus had propoſed to him concerning his book de de Nobilitate. Amongſt Candidus Decembrius's manuſcript Letters there is one of our Conrarus to the learned Cecilia de Gonzaga, in which he congratulates her, becauſe ſhe had deſpiſed the pleaſures of this world, in order to devote her herſelf entirely to God: he entreats her not to read any more the Poets, for which Victorinus her Tutor had given her a taſte, and which he had taught her to underſtand; but he adviſes her to read the Treatiſes, which the holy Fathers wrote upon Virginity and Continency. He directs her to ſeveral Works of the Fathers, and particularly to a Treatiſe of St. Baſil, which Ambroſe of Camaldoli had tranſlated into Latin, and to Salvian's Book de Providentia Dei, which he (Conrarus) had met with in Germany, and had carried with him into Italy, when he returned from the Council of Baſil (a). He mentions Ambroſe of Camaldoli as a very eminent man, who died before he was grown very old (b) [A].

(a) Cujus libros de providentia Dei è Concilio Baſileenſi rediens, de Germanorum ergaſtulis in Italiam deportavi.

(b) Ex Muſæo Italico Mabillonii, tom. 1. pag. 198.

[A] He mentions Ambroſe of Camaldoli as a . . man who died before he was grown very old.] Here follow his own words. Multa quidem utilia ex Doctoribus Eccleaſticis egregie tranſtulit, & plura tranſtuliſſet, niſi eum a laboribus humanis IMMATURA mors ſuſtuliſſet. i. e. "He "(Ambroſe) has excellently tranſlated a great many things "from the Eccleſiaſtical Writers; and would have "tranſlated more, had not an untimely death ſnatched "him from his worldly labours." This may ſerve to confute thoſe who make Ambroſe live till the year 1490. Add this to the arguments with which I confute them in his Article (1).

(1) CAMALDOLI Remark [E].

CONSTANCE, a City in Germany ſituated between two Lakes, formed by the Rhine, was for ſome time under a Republican Government; and the Citizens, the better to maintain their liberty, of which the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria would deprive them, made an alliance with the Cities of Zurick, Lindau and Uberlingen: they renounced Popery in the year 1523; but the City having been proſcribed by the Emperor in the year 1548, it was ſo cloſely preſſed by Charles the Fifth, that the Citizens were obliged to ſubmit to him, upon which moſt of the Proteſtants, and particularly Ambroſe Blaurer their chief Miniſter, retired to other places. Since that time the City of Conſtance belongs to the Houſe of Auſtria (a); Moreri, who ſaid in two places that it is an Imperial City, is very much miſtaken. The City of Conſtance entered into the Confederacy of Smalcald in 1531 (b); and this was, no doubt, one of the reaſons which determined Charles the Fifth to ſubdue it, after he had vanquiſhed the Confederates. The Swedes under the command of Marſhal Horn beſieged Conſtance in the year 1633, but did not ſucceed in their deſign. The beſieged drew up a Journal, in which they related a great many miracles, and remarkable ſigns of the divine protection, which appeared in their behalf during the ſiege (c) [A]. A Proteſtant Author wrote a ſhort Cenſure upon this [B].

(a) Taken from Matthew Dreſſerus, Iſag. Hiſt. Part 5. pag. 196, & ſeq.

(b) Munſter, in Coſmog. pag. m. 397.

(c) Spanheim, Merc. Suiſſe, pag. 372.

COORNHERT,

[A] The Swedes . . . beſieged Conſtance in . . 1633. . The beſieged drew up a Journal, in which they related a great many miracles, . . . which appeared in their behalf during the ſiege.] "The moſt remarkable are, I. "The advantages they gained over the enemy in the "weakeſt part of their city, beyond what they could "expect. II. The incredible courage and ſtoutneſs "both of their Citizens and Soldiers, beſides the good "underſtanding there was between them. III. The "frequent ſupplies of proviſions, which were very ſea"ſonably thrown into the city, and the wonderful "concurrence of favourable winds, to conduct theſe "ſupplies, tho' the air in that climate be generally "ſubject to contrary winds, and their lake to frequent "tempeſts in that month. IV. The little damage "done by the granades and red-hot bullets, notwith"ſtanding the prodigious number of them, which had "been thrown into the city, and which alone were "ſufficient to burn it to aſhes, and reduce all the in"habitants to the utmoſt poverty. V. The height of "the Rhine, which is uſed to fall as ſoon as the hot "days of the ſummer are over, and yet continued to "ſwell to ſuch a degree as to furniſh all the mills in "the city with water ſo abundantly, that there was "enough to ſupply the neceſſities of the inhabitants as "long as the ſiege laſted': this was confirmed by the "teſtimony of their Millers, who declared, that this "great quantity of water run off, as ſoon as the ene"my was retired, and the foreign Troops had been "diſmiſſed. VI. The moſt contemplative added, "that the fourth day of the ſiege they obſerved at "noon-day the bleſſed Virgin flying over the Church "of the Auguſtin Friars with an extraordinary ſplen"dor. The Swediſh Centries are alſo alledged in the "ſame Journal, as witneſſes to ſuch apparitions, and "it is there pretended, that they ſaw a face more "than angelical, ſliding along the wall, near the loop"holes, from the Tower of Rewenegg, to the Gate "of Creutzlingen (1)."

(1) Spanheim, Mercure Suiſſe, pag. 372, &c.

[B] A Proteſtant Author wrote a ſhort cenſure upon this.] Frederic Spanheim, who was a Miniſter at Geneva when he wrote his Mercure Suiſſe, from which I have extracted the foregoing remark, adds what follows. "The Swedes did not find any ſuch thing, nei"ther in their own accounts, nor in thoſe of their ſol"diers. They alſo obſerved, that the Author of the "Journal often wanted memory, and did not remem"ber in the cloſe of his account what he had owned "in the beginning, namely, the fear the beſieged "were in, the ruins of the city, the number of the "ſick in their hoſpitals, their bills of mortality; all "which ſufficiently ſhewed, that the granades were "not entirely ineffectual. The Swedes alſo relate a"mongſt the moſt dangerous circumſtances of the "ſiege, that they obſerved a great number of troops "entering the city over the lake, which being very "broad, and they wanting boats, they could not op"poſe the paſſage of thoſe troops but from a great "diſtance. And indeed the beſieged themſelves rec"kon in their Muſter-Rolls 5500 men, who entered "their city during the ſiege, beſides Count Wolffegg's "Regiment, which was there before the arrival of the "Swedes. The city of Uberlingen furniſhed the inhabi"tants of Conſtance with 200 men; Lindaw with 400; "Bregentz with 200; Colonel de Merſy with 1200; "the Regiment of Embs with 500; that of Altringen "with as many; Colonel Comargo with 1000; "Serjeant-Major de Reinach with 100; his Lieutenant "with 500. So that the Swedes were of opinion, "that ſo many and ſuch powerful ſupplies, together "with the neceſſary proviſions, were ſufficient not "only to make the City, which was well fortified, "hold out againſt five or ſix thouſand men, which "were ſo bold as to beſiege them amongſt a great ma"ny inconveniencies, and in a foreign country, but "alſo to make them quit the field, if thoſe auxiliary "troops had been as jealous of their reputation, as "they were careful to preſerve their lives (2)."

(2) Spanheim, Mercure Suiſſe, pag. 374, &c.

You ſee, that this Miniſter explodes as ſo many forgeries, part of the miracles, of which the inhabitants of that beſieged city boaſted. The reſt of thoſe miracles are of ſuch a nature, that there is no country in the COORNHERT, a Dutch Author in the ſixteenth Century. See KOORNHERT.

the world, but where it may be obſerved, that the like circumſtances of winds, rain, the ſwelling of rivers, &c. have either favoured warlike undertakings, or made them miſcarry. Now, as it is not at all probable, that God would alter the general laws of nature, but when the ſalvation of his children requires it, we ought not to take for miracles ſuch events, as happen equally amongſt the unbelievers, and amongſt the faithful: And yet men of all perſuaſions are very much inclined to think themſelves favoured with miraculous bleſſings; and if Frederic Spanheim had given an account of a ſiege happily held out by a Proteſtant City, he would perhaps have made obſervations not much different from thoſe he refuted (3). There are ſome Miniſters, who think all thoſe events miraculous, in which their party is concerned. Monſieur Jurieu, for inſtance, finds miracles every where (4), and of late, in what happened to the inhabitants of the Cevennes (5). But people, who underſtand the art of war, and who are acquainted with the ſituation of the country, and knew how the neighbouring cities were diſpoſed, and all the circumſtances of the inſurrection of the inhabitants of the Cevennes, find nothing in all this, but what is very natural. I will not examine whether a man, who thinks that a certain concurrence of ſecond cauſes had ruined the deſigns of the enemy, ought to make people believe, that there is ſomething miraculous in this, and whether he can juſtify himſelf by ſaying, that this is a proper method to raiſe men's hopes and confidence, and to fill them with a greater gratitude for the divine protection. But I dare to affirm, that if he hopes by this means to perſuade the Rulers of Nations to enter into a war, he is very much miſtaken. Let Monſr. Jurieu repeat as often as he pleaſes, that the preſervation of the Camiſards is a continued ſeries of miracles, the Princes will not be much moved by all this, if other political reaſons, which they know much better, than he does, and with which they do not want to be acquainted by him, do not determine them to relieve the Cevennois. They will underſtand an affair thoroughly, before they undertake it: but future miracles are objects of faith, and conſequently dark.

(3) Compare this with what has been ſaid in the Continuation des Penſées diverſes, pag. 312.

(4) See the ſame Continuation, pag. 313.

(5) See the Piece he publiſhed in 1705, intitled, Avis aux Puiſſances de l'Europe, &c.

CORBINELLI (JAMES), born at Florence of an antient and illuſtrious family [A], retired into France under the reign of Catharine de Medicis. This Queen, to whom he had the honour of being related, placed him with her ſon the Duke of Anjou, as a man well ſkilled in polite Literature, and capable of giving good advice (a). He read every day to the Duke, Tacitus, Polybius, and often Machiavel's Diſcourſes, and his Prince, if we may believe Davila (b). Corbinelli did not flatter his maſter like a weak and ſelf-intereſted Courtier, but told him the truth boldly, and made his court without baſeneſs. He was looked upon as a man of the ſame character with the antient Romans [B], upright, and uncapable of doing the leaſt unworthy action. Chancellor de l'Hoſpital had a very great eſteem for him [C]. He was the friend and open Patron of all men of Letters, ſo far, that though he was not rich, yet he ſpent part of his eſtate in the printing of their works [D]. But his talents were not confined to the Muſes only; he was proper both for Study, and for the Council Table; he was even a man of courage and reſolution,

[A] He was of an . . . illuſtrious Family.] Here follows a paſſage from the Preface, which is prefixed to the Sentences (Maximes) of Livy, collected by Mr. Corbinelli. "He is originally deſcended from one of "the moſt ancient and nobleſt families of Florence; "and when the Commonwealth ſubſiſted, his anceſtors "filled the higheſt poſts amongſt the Lords, who go-"verned the State."

See Claude Malingre Sieur de St. Lazare in a Dedication to the Noble and illuſtrious Meſſire Peter de Corbinelli, Counſellor and Lord Steward to the King (1). He was one of James Corbinelli's ſons.

(1) That of the Book intitled, Hiſtoires Tragique de notre tems, printed at Roan, in 1641.

[B] He was look'd upon as a man of the ſame character with the ancient Romans.] The following words of Juſtus Lipſius are quoted in the Preface, which I have mentioned. Gentem veſtram amavi ſemper, & ex ea illos maxime qui vetere illa Italia digni, qualem te eſſe, mi Corbinelli, video (2). i. e. "I have always "loved your family, and eſpecially thoſe perſons of it, "who deſerve to be ranked amongſt the great men of "ancient Italy, as I find you do, my dear Corbinelli." The paſſage is curtailed, we muſt tranſcribe the whole of it; by which it will appear that Peter Victorius had a great eſteem for our Corbinelli. Qualem te eſſe, mi Corbinelli, non ſolum ex igniculis literarum tuarum, quos ſparſos colligo, video; ſed etiam ex teſtimonio viri magni Victorii, qui de indole tua ad virtutem magna prædicat, nec vana. i. e. "As I find you do my dear Corbi-"nelli, not only by your excellent Letters, of which "I make a collection, but alſo by the character, which "that great man Victorius gives you, who loudly "proclaims your virtuous diſpoſition, and not with-"out reaſon. This Letter of Lipſius acquaints us, that Corbinelli had a brother, who came to an unfortunate end. Fratris tui μεγαλοψυχια hiſtoriam & triſte exitium legi. Quid miremur? hodie illæ viæ, & nil niſi σχολιον videmus à pleriſque his Dynaſtis (3). i. e. "I have read the ſtory and ſad fate of your magna-"nimous brother. Why ſhould we wonder at it? "This is now-a-days the way, and we ſee, that no-"thing but injuſtice is done by theſe great Lords." It is very probable, that he periſhed at Florence in ſome republican attempt.

(2) Lipſ. Epiſt. 5. Cent. 2. Miſcellan. It is dated from Leyden in 1586.

(3) Idem, ibid.

[C] Chancellor de l'Hopital had a very great eſteem for him.] "We ſee in the Chancellor's Epiſtle to him in Latin Verſe, not only, that of all his friends, Corbinelli's converſation was moſt agreeable to him, but alſo, that he was almoſt the only Courtier, whom the "Court had not corrupted, and who could prefer po-"lite learning before his own intereſt and advance-"ment." Theſe are the words of the Author of the Preface; and here follow ſome of the Chancellor's Verſes, which offer the ſame ſenſe.

Corbinelle, libens te plus fruar omnibus uno,
Præſentiſque animum ſermone oblectet amici.
Tu ſervare modum noſti prope ſolus in aula,
Et præferre bonas inhoneſtis quæſtibus artes (4).

(4) Hoſpital. Epiſt. 6.

[D] He ſpent part of his eſtate in the printing of ſeveral works.] "Dante's Book concerning the Italian "Tongue was publiſhed by his care (a), beſides a great "many other Books, which would for ever have been "buried in oblivion, had he not cauſed them to be "printed (5)."

(5) Preface des Maximes de Tite Live.

* (a) He not only publiſhed this Book of Dante from the only manuſcript extant, which he had, but alſo adorned it with Italian Annotations, which are printed after the Text, in the Paris Edition of 1577, 8vo. It is ſuppoſed as a matter of fact in one of Marſhal de Baſſompierre's obſervations upon ſome of the Hiſtorian du Pleix's lives, quoted in the Remark [H], that Corbinelli had been baniſhed from Florence for high-treaſon, which is inconſiſtent with the words of J. A. de Baïf in his Epiſtle in verſe to King Henry III, where ſpeaking of the ſame Corbinelli, the Poet ſays

Sans aucun ſien m'effait exilé de Florence.

That he was baniſhed from Florence; tho' he was not guilty of any crime. Let us obſerve, that this Epiſtle fills up the fourth leaf of the Book we have mentioned, the whole title of which is, Dantis Aligerii præcellentiſſ. Poetæ de vulgari Eloquentia Libri duo. Nunc primum ad vetuſti & unici ſcripti Codicis exemplar editi. Ex Libris Corbinelli: Ejuſdemque annotationibus illuſtrati. Ad Henricum Franciæ Poloniæque Regem Chriſtianiſſimum. Paris. Jo. Borbon. 1577. CRIT. REM.]

resolution, as much as of cunning and intrigue [E]. His son Raphael Corbinelli, Secretary to Mary de Medicis, Queen of France, was the father of Monsieur Corbinelli, who is at present one of the greatest and best wits of France (c) [F]. See his Elogy in a Preface, from which I have extracted not only the materials, but even the very expressions of this article; it is very remarkable, that men did not know of what Religion James Corbinelli was [G]. This may make us suspect, that he had no other but that of an honest man. Marshal de Bassompiere has very much abused him [H].

(c) Extracted from an Advertisement to the Reader, prefixed to a Book intitled, Les anciens Historians reduits en Maximes, printed in 1694. This Preface is ascrib'd to Father Bouhours.

[E] He was a man of courage and resolution, as much as of cunning and intrigue.] "Peter Matthieu relates "in his History of Henry IV, that the King came near "Paris, on account of a design formed by his faithful subjects there, who had given him their word, "that they would open one of the gates of the city "to him. The Historian adds, that Henry was acquainted by them with all that passed; and the "most secret intelligence was conveyed to him by Corbinelli, a stout man, who was extremely zealous for "the King's cause, which he defired should get the "better of the rebels. Corbinelli, says the same Writer, wrote down whatever he heard, and carried the "paper openly in his hand, as tho' it had contained "only indifferent things relating to tryals and lawsuits. His bold and stout countenance imposed upon the guards, who watched at the gates, and as "he shewed that he trusted every body, no body mistrusted him (6)." Another Historian speaks after this manner. The King had a great many faithful servants in the city, who acquainted him very punctually with all that past, and held themselves in readiness, to facilitate his entry into the city. Amongst them was James Corbinelli, who employed the utmost care and artifice. He always carried his advice to the King in his hands, as common papers relating to some law-suit that by this boldness he might give no suspicion. When he pressed his Majesty to execute his designs, he used to write to him only these three words, come, come, come, written only upon such a small bit of paper, as was sufficient to contain them, and put it into a quill sealed up, which the messenger carried in his mouth. . . This Corbinelli was an Italian, of a most ancient and noble family of Florence. He had taken sanctuary in France, because he had been concerned in Pandolfo Puccio's conspiracy, as Thuanus observes in his History (7).

(6) Ibid.

(7) Dupleix, Hist. de Henri IV, pag. 22. under the year 1589.

[F] Mr. Corbinelli . . is at present one of the greatest and best Wits of France.] It is not said in the Preface, that he published in several volumes a Collection of the most beautiful passages, which are to be met with in the wits of this age (8). I observe it therefore in this place: and for the rest, I refer the reader to the Preface, in which Mr. Corbinelli's character is drawn in a very ingenious manner, and which is very much to his honour. The pains he took in digesting the maxims of the ancient Historians into order, will very much raise their reputation, and also serve to instruct the public. The author of the Preface does very well observe, "that the skilful readers will be de"lighted to see, that an infinite number of thoughts "and maxims, with which the moderns adorn their "writings, have been stolen from the ancients, and "that this alone may make us sensible of the merit "of those great men, and will perhaps undeceive those "prepossessed persons, who have not for the ancients "all the respect and admiration they deserve." If the ancients be compared with the moderns with regard to their respective thoughts and maxims considered in themselves, and separated from the body of their works, I don't doubt, but we shall be easily convinced, that the former have the advantage over the latter: for I do not believe, that there is any lofty or ingenious thought expressed in this age, but what may be met with in the Books of the ancients. The most sublime notions either in Metaphysicks or Ethicks, which we admire in the moderns, are to be found in the writings of the ancient Philosophers. So that our Age cannot pretend to any superiority over antiquity, except a whole work be compared with a whole work. For it must be confessed, that a work, which with regard to the beauties of it does not yield to other works considered also with regard to their beauties, is yet inferior to them, if there be in the former more defects and greater faults than in the latter. Can it be questioned, that tho' Des Cartes had borrowed every part of his Philosophical System from the ancients, yet he deserves more to be admired than they, since he knew how to connect together so many loose parts, and to make a regular System of the incoherent subjects?

(8) It is intitled, Extrait de tous les beaux Endroits des Ouvrages des plus celébres Auteurs de ce tems, printed at Amsterdam in 1681.

A Reflexion upon the parallel between the Ancients and the Moderns.

Observe that M. Corbinelli had a literary correspondence with Monsr. de Bussi-Rabutin. This is plain from the Volumes of Letters written by the latter, amongst which they have inserted several Fragments of Mr. Corbinelli's Letters to him. His name is there marked only by a C.

[G] Men did not know of what Religion James Corbinelli was.] Thuanus tells us this; let us transcribe the whole passage: It was not known of what Religion Corbinelli was; it was a political Religion, after the manner of the Florentines, but he was a man of good morals (9). This assertion is of great weight for two reasons; 1. because Thuanus was a grave and honest man; 2. because he was intimately acquainted with Corbinelli. Let us see what he had already said of him. I have known Corbinelli particularly; he was a very great Wit. He was also very proper for business, in which he was wonderfully skilled. He married an English woman, by whom he had some daughters, who are still at Court in the service of some Ladies. One of them lives with the Countess of Fiesque. Corbinelli was not rich: but he lived with great oeconomy, and was always extremely neat and genteel in his dress. He was a great friend to the Abbé d'Elbene (10).

(9) See Thuana, pag. m. 35.

(10) Ibid. pag. 30.

[H] Marshal de Bassompiere has very much abused him.] It was with regard to the passage in Dupleix, which I have quoted above: The Marshal's censure upon it is as follows (11). There is nothing more silly and impertinent than this whole chapter. Had he no other good Frenchmen to name, that he instances in this man banished from Florence for treason? A wonderful invention it was, to carry his advices in his hands! They must have been very important, since that, which is related by way of eminence, is his come, come, come. The King would have been very prudent indeed, had he undertook any thing upon such an exhortation. What occasion was there to fill the History of France with an account of this Corbinelli's pedigree? He must have been a very honest man really, since he was concerned in a conspiracy to kill his Prince, with Pandolfo Puccio the ringleader of it, who was hanged for his crime on a hook, at the very windows of the Palace. Observe, that this conspiracy, how wicked soever it may have been, does not refute what others relate of Corbinelli's good morals. Conspiracies against the State are the greatest crimes men can commit, and yet some persons suffer themselves to be drawn into conspiracies by such motives as they think are morally good: so true is it, that man's conscience is liable to the most lamentable errors! Brutus, and several of those, whom he prevailed upon to murther Cæsar, were men of the most eminent probity and virtue.

(11) Remarques sur les Vies de Henry IV & de Louis XIII de Dupleix, pag. 11.

CORCEONE (ROBERT DE) Cardinal with the title of St. Stephen on Mount Celius, was an Englishman. There is an article of him in Moreri's Dictionary (a), but the following particulars are not mentioned there. Having been sent into France by Pope Innocent III for the affairs of the Crusado which was intended both against the Albigenses and the Saracens, he held a Council at Paris in the year 1212, in which he caused very good regulations to be made for the reformation of manners. He forbad the Secular Clergy

(a) Under the name of Curson.

Clergy to bind themſelves by oath not to lend books, or houſes, or other things, and not to be bail. He alſo forbad the Regular Clergy to bind themſelves by oath, not to lend books, provided however they took the neceſſary precautions to have them returned to them, or to be otherwiſe indemnified. He alſo commanded them not to lie two together [A]; he gave the ſame command to the Nuns, in order to prevent, ſaid he, the danger of incontinency. He held other Councils; he eſtabliſhed preachers for the Cruſado, and he perſecuted the Heretics very much. But he ſhewed himſelf ſo paſſionate againſt the Clergy, and was ſo ready to give the croſs to all ſorts of perſons, that heavy complaints were made againſt him at the Court of Rome. He made himſelf ſo odious by invading the rights of the Gallican Church, that they appealed from his proceedings, whilſt the Council, which he had ſummoned at Beziers, was ſitting. The Deputies from the French Clergy carried on the appeal very vigorouſly, and confounded this Cardinal to ſuch a degree, in a general Aſſembly, which was held at Rome, that the Pope deſired them not to inſiſt ſo much upon the grievances of which they complained (b). Corceone conducted a great number of Croiſes in 1214, to Simon of Montfort, who was making war againſt the Albigenſes (c). He died in Paleſtine, whither he had followed the Cruſado, as may be ſeen in Moreri. Amongſt the books which he wrote, there is one upon this queſtion, Whether Origen be in Heaven?

(b) Taken from Spondan. Annal. Eccleſiaſt. ad ann. 1212, n. 8.

(c) Spondan. ad ann. 1214, num. 2.

[A] He commanded the Regular Clergy not to lie two together.] Here follows a paſſage from Peter de St. Romuald's Abridgment of the Chronological Treaſure (1). "In the year 1212 there was a Council held at Paris "by Cardinal de Corceone, of which Spondanus has "related the Decrees, amongſt which is the following, "Interdicimus Regularibus & Monialibus ne bini vel "binæ in lecto jaceant, propter metum incontinentiæ. "That is, We forbid the Monks and Nuns to lie two together in a bed, for fear of incontinency. In 1643 "there was publiſhed a little Book, writen by a devout Prieſt, and approved by four Doctors, which "was intitled, Avis Chreſtien touchant une matiere de "grande importance (A Chriſtian Advice concerning a "very important Subject) in which the Author earneſtly wiſhes that this Decree were exactly obſerved, "becauſe of the inconveniencies, which he deſcribes "as modeſtly as he can." Let it be done as modeſtly as you pleaſe; yet this Book is proper only to raiſe our indignation againſt the Law of Celibacy, ſince it is liable to ſuch dreadful conſequences.

(1) Saint Romuald, Abrégé Chronologique & Hiſtorique, tom. 3. pag. m. 127, 128.

CORDIER (MATHURIN) in Latin Corderius, lived in the ſixteenth Century, and was one of the beſt Teachers that could be wiſhed; for he underſtood the Latin Tongue perfectly well, was a man of virtue, and performed his functions with the utmoſt diligence, being as careful to teach his ſcholars true wiſdom, as to make them learn good Latin. He ſpent his long life in teaching children at Paris, Nevers, Bordeaux, Geneva, Neufchaſtel, Lauzane, and laſtly again at Geneva (a), where he died September the 8th (b), 1564, at the age of eighty five, having inſtructed the ſcholars of the ſixth form three or four days before his death. He ſtudied Divinity for ſome time at Paris in the College of Navarre, about the year 1528, after he had taught a form in the ſame College; but he left off that ſtudy, in order to apply himſelf to his former functions of a Grammarian (c). He had taught at Nevers in the years 1534, 1535, and 1536 (d). Calvin, who had been his ſcholar at Paris in the College de la Marche (e), dedicated his Commentary on the 1ſt Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians to him (f). It is not exactly known of what Province Mathurin Cordier was; ſome ſay he was born in Normandy; others pretend he was born in the Earldom of Perche (g). He publiſhed ſeveral books, which ſerved very much to improve the ſcholars [A].

(a) Beze, Vie de Calvin, en Preface du Commentaire de Calvin ſur Joſué, pag. m. 4.

(b) In the Latin editions of Calvin's Life, they have put VI Nonas Septembris, but it ſhould be Idus inſtead of Nonas.

(c) Laun. Hiſt. Colleg. Navarr. pag. 700.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Beze, Vie de Calvin, pag. 4. In one of the foregoing editions he had ſaid, that it was in the College of St. Barbe.

(f) Beze, Vie de Calvin, pag. 51.

(g) La Croix du Maine, pag. 318.

CORPICIUS

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral Books, which ſerved very much to improve the Scholars.] Du Verdier Vau-Privas gives the titles only of the following. Epiſtres Chreſtiennes. "Chriſtian Epiſtles", printed at Lions, by Loys Tachet, in 1557, 16to. Sentences extraictes de la Saincte Eſcriture pour l'inſtruction des Enfans. i. e. "Sentences extracted from the Holy Scripture for the "inſtruction of children;" printed in Latin and French by Thybault Payen, in 1551. Cantiques ſpirituels en nombre 26: i. e. "26 Spiritual Songs;" printed in 1560 by John Cariot, at Lions, 16to (1). Le Miroir de la jeuneſſe, pour la former à bonnes mœurs, & civilité de la vie (2); i. e. "A Mirrour for the Youth, "to inform them in the practice of virtue and politeneſs;" printed at Paris, by John Bonfons, 16to. L'Interpretation & conſtruction en François des Diſtiques Latins, qu'on attribue à Caton; i. e. "A French Tranſlation and Conſtruction of the Latin Diſtichs, which "are aſcribed to Cato;" printed at Lyons in 8vo by Thibault Payen, above an hundred times, and ſince by others, becauſe it is a Book, which children uſe to read at ſchool (3). Du Verdier adds, that Mathurin Cordier's Colloquia or Dialogues have been tranſlated into French by Gabriel Chapuis. There are but few Books, that have been ſo uſeful as this, to teach children to talk Latin. A correct ſtyle and ſound morality reigns thro' the whole; it has been printed a thouſand times. La Croix du Maine obſerves (4), that this Author wrote in French Verſe ſeveral Remonſtrances and Exhortations to the King, and to the Eſtates of the Kingdom, printed in the year 1561 at G. that is to ſay, at Geneva. Geſner, who publiſhed his Bibliotheca in 1545, ſays, that Cordier was then teaching in the Latin Schools at Neufchaſtel: he ſets down the titles of ſome Books for the uſe of the Schools publiſhed by this Writer (5): I ſhall mention but one of them, which is, De corrupti Sermonis apud Gallos emendatione, & Latinè loquendi ratione, ſive de Latini ſermonis varietate & modis loquendi Lib. 1. adduntur autem etiam ipſæ phraſes corruptæ, & Gallicæ interpretationes locutionum, ut in poſterum vitentur; earumque loco puræ ac elegantes eloquendi formulæ doceantur: quæ quidem non temere, ſed ſecundum locos communes aliquot digeſtæ ſunt. Plurimum ſane prodeſt hoc opus, ad ſermonem & variandum & locupletandum. In Latinis formulis ſola contentum eſt linguæ proprietate: neque verborum ſucum, neque longas & obſcuras Periphraſes affectat, cum potiſſimum in puerorum gratiam conſcriptum ſit, propter quos etiam paſſim permulta piè & Chriſtianè vivendi hortamenta interjiciuntur (6). Geſner tells us, that this book was printed at Paris by Robert Stephens in 1536, in 4to, and at Baſil, by Weſthemer in 1537, 4to. Geſner's Epitomizers ought to have known in 1583 the following particulars. Mathurin Cordier corrected and improved this work very much in the fourth Edition, which Robert Stephens printed of it. He had been told, that the examples of bad phraſes, which he had collected only with a deſign, that the children ſhould avoid them, were very prejudicial

(1) Geſner's Epitomizer mentions, pag. 596. an edition of 1557, 16to, apud Joann. Gerardum.

(2) La Croix du Maine, pag. 318. obſerves, that ſince this book had been printed at Poitiers in 1559, it has been reprinted at Paris by John Ruelle and others in 1560, with this title Civilité puerile.

(3) Du Verdier, Bibl. Françoiſe. pag. 861.

(4) Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 318.

(5) De Quantitate Syllabarum, de Latino declinatu partium Orationis, &c.

(6) Geſner, Biblioth. folio 507 verſo.

CORICIUS (JOHN) lived very agreeably at Rome under the Popes Julius II, Leo X, and Clement VII. He gained the love of the men of Letters by the particular kindneſs he had for them, and they extolled him ſo much, that they raiſed him a very great reputation. He made them meet often in his garden (a), and he gave all the Poets, whom Leo X's liberality had invited to Rome, a very good opportunity to ſhew their wit (b); for he eſtabliſhed poetical games [A], which were celebrated every year on St. Ann's day (c), the ſubjects of the Poems were the Elogium of that Saint, the Virgin Mary, and of Jeſus Chriſt (d). He fell into the hands of the ſoldiers, who took the City of Rome in 1527, and it coſt him a very great ſum of money to get his liberty (e). He had hid part of his money under the yard-door of his houſe; no body knew it, but the maſon, who had ſtopt the hole. This maſon begged him to lend him twenty five piſtoles, which he wanted to get out of the ſoldier's hands; but as he could not get them from him, he diſcovered the whole ſecret to a Spaniſh Captain, who thereupon went to Coricius's houſe, ſent him out of the way under divers pretences, and ſeized all the money, that was hid. Coricius complained of it to the General Officers, but to no purpoſe: finding himſelf thus reduced to a very great want, he endeavoured to go out of the City, and did at laſt, though with great difficulty. He was maintained for ſome time at Verona, through the generoſity of Calyſtus Amadeus (f), and as he was getting himſelf ready to return to Treves his native country (g), he fell ſick, and died overwhelmed with grief and ſorrow (b).

(a) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, lib. 2. de Literatorum Infelicit. pag. m. 87.

(b) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 103. pag. m. 241.

(c) Pier. Valerian. de Literat. Infelic. pag. 87.

(d) Jovius, Elog. cap. 103.

(e) Pier. Valer. de Literat. Infelic. pag. 87.

(f) Caliſti Amadei ejus Urbis Propræſulis liberalitate ſuſtinetur, Idem, ibid. pag. 88.

(g) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 103.

(b) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, de Literat. Infelicit. pag. 87.

prejudicial to them; becauſe as our natural inclination prompts us to evil, the children took much more notice of thoſe barbarous phraſes, which gave them an opportunity to laugh and banter, than they did of the exact and good expreſſions. *In libelli noſtri lectione unum eſſe hoc malum permulti affirmabant, quod pueri (ut natura in deteriorem partem fere proni ſumus) ridendi & jocandi ſtudio & libentius & ſæpius in legendo corrupto ſermone & barbaris locutionibus, quam Latinis edi*ſ*cendis, ſeſe oblectarent. Ex quo fieri dicebant, ut nonnulli formandæ juventutis magiſtri diſcipulos omnino prohiberent ab ejus libri lectione: videlicet ne ſermonis vitiis, quæ nondum audierant ſemel in tenera ætate imbuti, ea vix unquam poſtea deponerent* (7). He had then been often adviſed to ſuppreſs that part of his Book, and he yielded at laſt to thoſe exhortations. The title of his Book was altered thus in the fourth edition (8). Commentarius puerorum de quotidiano Sermone, qui prius Liber de corrupti ſermonis emendatione dicebatur.

(7) Matur. Corderius, Præf. in Comment. Puerorum, de quotidiano ſermone.

(8) I do not know the date of it; the author put none to his Preface. I make uſe of the Paris edition Ex Officina Roberti Stephani, 1580, 8vo, which was printed ſixteen years after Cordier's death. Mr. D. Launoi, Hiſt. Colleg. Navar. pag. 701, places the 4th edition under the year 1550. apud Robertum Stephanum.

[A] The Men of Letters extolled him much.... He eſtabliſhed Poetical Games.] Let us quote Paulus Jovius: Franciſcus Arſillus ſcripſit ... lepidum item libellum de Poetis urbanis mihi tanquam veteri ſodali dedicatum (1), quum Leone ingeniis liberaliter arridente, multi undique Poetæ illuſtres, nequaquam ad inanes ſpes in urbem confluxiſſent, & pulcherrimo quodam certamine a ſingulis in una tantum ſtatuæ materia ſcriberetur, qua Carminum farragine Coritius homo Trevir, humani juris libellis propoſitus, uti perhumanus poetarum hoſpes, ac admirator inclaruit; ea ſcilicet ſtatua inſigni marmorea, Aureliano in Templo dedicata, invitatiſque vatibus, ut tria numina Chriſti Dei, & Matris, ac Aviæ uno in ſigno celebrarent (2). Longolius has mentioned theſe Aſſemblies; and ſpoke alſo of the entertainments given on St. Ann's day: he even ſaid, that the Poets once quarrelled there, but he does not enter into particulars, becauſe he wrote to a man, who was well acquainted with the whole affair. De eodem Corytio illud mihi velim diligenter perſcribas, ecquid ſacrum Annæ diem anniverſario illo ſtudioſorum hominum conventu epuliſque celebrarit: an vero propter anni ſuperioris diſſidium, cœnas facere omnino deſierit; an ſodalitatem potius illam, (ſcis quam dico) non vocarit: reliquis cœnam dederit. Neque vero quam eos lautè ſplendideque acceperit, quæro: novi hominis magnificentiam, ſed quid dictum, quamve frequens convivium ex hominum genere fuerit, qui ſe academicos & eſſe & numerari exiſtimant. Subvereor interdum, ut cum illis in gratiam redierit. Contra cum mihi in mentem venit, iſtis & cœnas & hortos Epicuri mirum in modum probari, hunc autem menſas non ſumptuoſe minus quam libenter inſtruere, jam nihil inimicitiarum reliquum eſſe ſuſpicor. Tu me velim de tota dici illius ratione certiorem facias (3). i. e. "I wiſh you would "let me know, whether Coricius has celebrated St. "Ann's Day, by the annual aſſembly and entertain"ment of learned men, or whether he left off thoſe "entertainments, on account of the laſt year's diſ"putes; or rather, whether he only paſſed over that "fraternity (you know what I mean) and invited the "reſt. I do not aſk how nobly he entertained them; "I know his magnificence; but what diſcourſes they "held, and how many there were of thoſe men, who "think that they are Academicians, and that they "are reckoned to be ſo. I am a little afraid, he is "not yet reconciled with them. Yet when I conſider, "how much they like Epicurean treats and gardens, "and how generous and magnificent he is in his enter"tainments, I am apt to think, that there remains "not the leaſt enmity between them. I deſire you "would give me an account of all that paſſ that "day."

(1) See the remark [A] of the article ACCURSIUS (Mariangelus.)

(2) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 103. The ſubſtance of this paſſage has been given in the Text.

(3) Longolius, Epiſt. lib. 2. folio m. 183.

CORNELIA Pompey's wife; ſee the laſt remark of the article MUCIA.

CORNELIUS (ANTHONY) a Licentiate of the Law, and Author of a book, which I mention in the article of WECHEL (a), was a native of Billi [A] upon the borders of Auvergne, and lived under the reign of Francis I. Father Garaſſe has committed a great many blunders concerning that book [B], which was printed off

(a) In the Remark [B].

[A] He was a native of Billi.] I prove it by the following Epigram, which is at the end of the Querela Infantium (1), (the Infants complaint) Gulielmi Nurii Judicis Billienſis ad Antonium Cornelium Billienſem utriuſque Juris Licentiatum Doctiſſ. Hexaſtichon.

Olim in te puero quiddam haud vulgare videbar
Perſpicere, Antoni, talia ſigna dabas.
At neque deſtituis ſpem tu jam grandior iſtam,
Imo infinitis vincis ubique modis.
Id tibi teſtantur facile liber ille, puellos
Intinctos ubi litem inſtituiſſe facis.

That is,

"An Epigram of ſix Verſes on Anthony Cornelius of "Billi, Licentiate of the Law both Canon and Ci"vil, written by William Nurius * Judge of Billi.

"I thought, I obſerved formerly ſomething uncom"mon in you, when you was young, Anthony, by the "great tokens of wit you then gave. Nor have you "diſappointed my expectations, now you are grown "up; nay, you are gone much beyond them: as ap"pears evidently by that Book, in which you make "thoſe infants, who died without Baptiſm, plead their "cauſe."

(1) See the Title of our Cornelius's Book more exactly in the Remark [B] of the Article WECHEL.

* His French name was perhaps Nouri or Le Nouri.

[B] He is the Author of a Book.... Father Garaſſe has committed a great many blunders concerning that Book.] I prove this unqueſtionably in the remark [B] of the article WECHEL; but ſince the ſecond Edition of this Dictionary, I have received an account of the Querela infantium, at the end of which are the following words. "Let off in January 1531 (b): The Author was ſtill very young at that time [C].

(b) It is the year 1532, if the year be ſuppoſed to begin with January.

" Let me beg leave to draw ſome inferences from the " foregoing account. I. The Name of Antonius Cor- " nelius is not a fictitious name, as F. Garaſſe aſſerts " in his Somme Theologique, p. 19, and 298: this may " be inferred from his Dedication: is it probable that a " man in diſguiſe ſhould have dared to dedicate his " work to Anthony du Bourg (2) Lieutenant-Civil in " the diſtrict of the Prevoſt of Paris †, and afterwards " Chancellor, and even to call him his Mecænas, and " to relate ſome particular circumſtances, which hap- " pened between that Magiſtrate and him? II. It " ſeems that the epigram, which we have tranſcribed " above (3) ſhould fully perſuade us, that Cornelius " was his true name; would a man, who does not " conceal of what country he is, and to whom the Judge " of his native place directs ſome verſes, diſguiſe him- " ſelf under a fictitious name? The leaſt attention to " all theſe circumſtances will remove all manner of " ſuſpicion. III. By what has been ſaid above ‡ " concerning his Book, it appears that it is not ſuch " an infamous and abominable Book, as Father Ga- " raſſe would make us believe. IV. And conſequently " this Jeſuit is in the wrong to ſay that the printing of " this wicked Book drew God's wrath upon the " Printer (4)."

(2) Obſerve, that Monſ. Du Bourg was of Auvergne, as well as our Cornelius.

† The Provoſt of Paris is the chief Magiſtrate, who has ſeveral Lieutenants under him, both for civil and criminal affairs.

(3) In the remark [A].

‡ See the Article WECHEL Remark [B].

(4) From a Manuſcript communicated by Monſ. Lancelot.

I have obſerved in another place (5) that there are two copies of this work of our Cornelius in the Archbiſhop of Rheims's Library; and that Monſ. Bourdelot (6) did me the favour to ſend me his copy; ſince that time Monſr. Lancelot let me know, that there is alſo a copy of it in the Mazarine Library, and that it has been ſeen, as he has been told, in the King's Library, and in other places. Another perſon wrote to me, that the copy in the Mazarine Library, Number 2634, is bound in paſte-boards covered with red paper, with another Book intitled, Diſcorſo Cattolico & Apologia Hiſtorica cavata dal Vecchio e nuovo Teſtamento, &c. ordinata de diverſe Hiſtorie, compoſta dal eccellente Dottor Camillo Borrello ſopra un Giudicio fatto intorno à quella ſentenza di Pilato che li anni paſſati fu trovarta nel l'Aquila Citta d'Abruzzo. Opera veramente utile, nella quale ſi deſcrivono diverſi concetti notabili ſi di Teologia, come anco d'Hiſtorie e d'Annali, ove con molte Autorità e Sentenze de Scrittori approbati ſi ſcuopre ſe detta Sentenza è vera, o no. Drizzata alla Santità di N. S. Siſto V, Sommo Pontefice, con la Tavola delle materie principali, & coſe piu notabili, ch' in eſſa ſi contengono. In Napoli, appreſſo Horatio Salviati, 1588. This piece is directed to Paulus Jovius (7): The Author takes a great deal of pains, to prove, that this ſentence of Pilate, which was found at Aquila in the Province of Abruzzo, is ſpurious.

(5) In the Remark [B] of the article WECHEL.

(6) He is firſt Phyſician to the Ducheſs of Burgundy.

(7) It contains 144 pages.

[C] The Author was ſtill very young at that time.] We may infer this from the following words in his Advice to the Reader. Quod ſi quid deprehenderis nota dignum, pro tua facilitate in meliorem interpretare partem, ÆTATIQUE meæ adſcribe atque condona. i. e. " If you find any thing in it that deſerves to be cen- " ſured, be ſo kind as to put the beſt conſtruction up- " on it, and aſcribe it to my age, and forgive it me."

CORONEL ALPHONSUS) a great Lord of Spain, who miſtruſting Don Pedro the Cruel King of Caſtile, formed a party in Andaluſia that he might be in a condition to maintain himſelf againſt his King. He raiſed troops, fortified ſome places, and ſent John della Cerda, his ſon-in-law, into Mauritania, to aſk for aſſiſtance. He depended chiefly upon the City of Aguilar, of which he was Governor. Don Pedro having taken ſome other places from him, made preparations to beſiege Aguilar, when more preſſing affairs obliged him to march into Aſturia, where one of his brothers had revolted. But as ſoon as he had reſtored the tranquillity of that Province, and ſuppreſſed the commotions in other places, he returned into Andaluſia, and beſieged Aguilar. Coronel defended himſelf very vigorouſly during four months; but at laſt the city was carried by ſtorm in February 1353. Coronel was hearing maſs, when they came and told him, that the enemies were in the city. Notwithſtanding this he continued to hear maſs till the divine ſervice was quite performed, and then he ſhut himſelf up in a tower. He was taken and treated like a rebel; that is, he was condemned to death for high-treaſon (a). Mary, one of his daughters, was ſo careful to preſerve her chaſtity, that ſhe choſe rather to kill her ſelf, than to expoſe that virtue to the leaſt danger [A]. The Author ſhe employed is

(a) Taken from Mariana, in chapter the 17th of the 16th book of his Hiſtory of Spain.

[A] One of his daughters . . . choſe rather to kill herſelf, than to expoſe her chaſtity to the leaſt danger.] John de la Cerda her huſband having in vain ſought for aſſiſtance amongſt the Moors of Granada and amongſt thoſe of Africa, returned into Portugal and led a ſad melancholy life in his baniſhment. Mary Coronel his ſpouſe could not bear his abſence, and that ſhe might not yield to the temptations of nature, ſhe killed herſelf. I cannot well expreſs in Engliſh what device ſhe made uſe of; I ſhall therefore tranſcribe Mariana's Latin words. Ejus Uxor Maria Coronellia, cum Mariti abſentiam non ferret, ne pravis cupiditatibus cederet, vitam poſuit, ardentem forte libidinem igne extinguens, adacto per muliebria titione. Dignam meliore ſæculo fæminam, inſigne ſtudium caſtitatis (1). This Author does not contradict himſelf, tho' he maintains on the one hand, that this Lady was extremely careful of her chaſtity, and ſuppoſes on the other hand, that ſhe was probably tormented with ſenſual inclinations. For the moſt fervent love of chaſtity does not neceſſarily remove the natural diſpoſitions towards incontinence. This Lady being firmly determined not to do the leaſt thing againſt her duty, and having a very great love for chaſtity, ſtruggled againſt the intices ments of nature, but ſhe could neither prevent them, nor ſuppreſs them for ever. This kind of a military life ſeemed both too troubleſome and too dangerous to her; and this made her deſperate. She went beyond the Counſels of the Goſpel. The Scripture tells us indeed (2); " If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, " and caſt it from thee: for it is profitable for thee " that one of thy members ſhould periſh, and not that " thy whole body ſhould be caſt into hell. And if " thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and caſt it " from thee: for it is profitable for thee, that one of thy " members ſhould periſh, and not that thy whole body " ſhould be caſt into hell." But we do not find there, that it is lawful for a perſon to kill himſelf, in order to prevent a temptation. She might have practiſed literally this evangelical precept or counſel, without killing herſelf. Origen, Ambroſe Morals, and ſome others practiſed it literally, and yet it was not mortal to them (a). You have read in the Dialogues of a Jeſuit (3), what a woman of Athens did, that ſhe might not be tempted to reveal the ſecret of her friends. After ſhe had been put to the rack, and had ſuffered the moſt cruel pains with an incredible conſtancy, without declaring the leaſt thing, ſhe cut her tongue with her teeth, and ſpit it in the Tyrant's face, who would force from her, what ſhe was reſolved not to declare. You have alſo read there the following reflection of the Author. This woman was in the right to fear leſt her tongue ſhould play her ſome bad trick, and therefore ſhe did wiſely to get rid of it (4). But you would not be reaſonable, if you ſhould apply this reflection to Mary Coronel's action. There would be more regularity in a compariſon between Porcia, Brutus's wife, and John de la Cerda's wife, tho' there would alſo be ſome diſparaty in the parallel. Porcia, Cato of Utica's daughter and Brutus's wife, killed herſelf by ſwallowing glowing coals (5); but it was only out of pride, becauſe ſhe would not ſurvive her huſband, and would ſhew herſelf a true follower of the Stoic Sect, which her father and her huſband had been ſo fond of.

(1) Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. 16. cap. 17. pag. 80. edit. Mogunt. 4to. The ſenſe is, " That ſhe ex- " tinguiſhed one " fire by an- " other, thruſt- " ing a Brand " into her.

(2) Matt. v. 29, 30.

(3) Entretiens, d'Ariſte & d'Eugene, 3 Entretien, pag. m. 197.

(4) Ibid. pag. 198.

(5) Val. Maximus, lib. 4. cap. 6. num 5.

is ſo ſtrange, that I think my ſelf obliged to relate it. See the Remark [A].

* (a) One can eaſily conceive, how men can perform that operation upon themſelves, but it is not ſo eaſy to underſtand how women can do it. Monſr. Venette, in the laſt chapter of his book intitled, Le Tableau de l'amour conjugal &c. (The Deſcription of conjugal Love &c.) ſays, " It cannot be queſtioned, but a woman may be rendered uncapable to conceive, by cutting off the &c. But it is difficult to know, how the ancients performed that operation: and that I may ſay what my opinion is, I think that it cannot be done without danger." It will perhaps be explained in the following book, which I have not ſeen. Eunuchi nati, facti, & myſtici, ex ſacra & humana literatura illuſtrati. Zacharias Paſqualigas puerorum emaſculator ob muſicam quo loco habendus. Reſponſa ad quæſitum per epiſtolam J. Heriberti. Divione, 1655. in 4*to.* i. e. " The Eunuchs born, made, and myſtical, illuſtrated by ſacred and prophane Literature. What muſt be thought of Zachariah Paſqualigas, who caſtrates boys to make fine Singers of them? An Anſwer to a queſtion propoſed in a Letter of J. Heribert. At Dijon, 1655, 4to." This Book is aſcribed to Father Theophilus Raynaud. CRIT. REM.]

COSTA (MARGARET) was born at Rome, and lived in the ſeventeenth Century. She had wit and a genius for Poetry, and prepared for the King of France an entertainment on horſeback after the manner of a Carrouſel and Balet. The ſubject of the piece was a conteſt between Apollo and Mars (a). You will find a deſcription of it in a book of F. Menêtrier (b). " But as it was thought too difficult to put that deſign in execution, they preferred Orpheus before it, which was acted in the year 1647 [A]. However " Signora Coſta's Entertainment was printed with her other Poems, which ſhe dedicated " to Cardinal Mazarin (c)".

(a) Menêtrier, Repreſentat. en Muſique, pag. 232.

(b) Ibid. pag. 233, &c.

(c) Ibid. pag. 235.

[A] She prepared an entertainment on horſe-back. . . . They preferred Orpheus before it.] " Cardinal Mazarin, who propoſed to introduce into France the " diverſions of Italy, cauſed ſome Players to come " from that country in 1647, who acted at the Royal " Palace Orpheus and Euridice an entertainment in " Muſic and in Italian Verſe; it was acted with " wonderful changes of the Scenes, and with a Ma" chinery, all which had never been ſeen before (1)." You will find a deſcription and an abſtract of that Opera in F. Menêtrier (2). The ſucceſs of this entertainment, the novelty of which ſurprized all the ſpectators by the wonderful changes of the extraordinary ſcenes, by the beauty of the airs, as well as by the variety of the dreſſes, and the different concerts of Muſic, determined the Court to give another entertainment of the ſame nature at his Majeſty's nuptials: they acted Ercole amante, which being written in Italian, was tranſlated into French Verſe for the ſatisfaction of thoſe, who did not underſtand Italian (3). It will perhaps be ſaid, that all this is nothing to the purpoſe, ſince it does not concern Signora Margarita Coſta. I own it; but as a great number of readers are very glad to find ſomething, that may give them a notion of the firſt eſſays of Opera's, when I have mentioned them occaſionally, I thought, that this remark ought not be ſuppreſſed.

(1) Menêtrier, Repreſentat. en Muſique, pag. 395.

(2) Ibid. pag. 205.

(3) Idem, pag. 205.

☞COTES (ROGER), an excellent Mathematician, and Plumian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy and Experimental Philoſophy at Cambridge in the 18th Century, was ſon of Roger Cotes, Rector of Burbage in Leiceſterſhire, which Rectory was remarkable for being held many years by Anthony Earl of Kent, grandfather to the preſent Duke of Kent (a), to whom by his mother, a daughter of Major Farmer of that county, he was nearly related (b). He was born at Burbage July 10, 1682, and received his firſt education at Leiceſter-School, where at the age of eleven or twelve years he diſcovered a ſtrong inclination to Mathematics, in which his uncle, Mr. John Smith (c), a Clergyman in Lincolnſhire, very much encouraged him, and was ſo highly pleaſed with his genius, that he prevailed with his father to ſend him to his houſe to aſſiſt him in thoſe ſtudies. From thence he was ſent to St. Paul's School in London, where he was educated under Dr. Thomas Gale, and Mr. John Poſtlethwayte, ſucceſſively maſters of that ſchool, and found ſo much time from School-hours, as to keep up a conſtant correſpondence with his uncle not only in Mathematics, but likewiſe in Metaphyſics, Philoſophy, and Divinity. April the 6th 1699 at ſeventeen years of age he was admitted a Penſioner of Trinity-College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, of which he was choſen Fellow at Michaelmas 1705. He was Tutor likewiſe at the College to Anthony Earl of Harold, and Henry de Grey, ſons to the Duke of Kent. In January 170$\frac{5}{6}$ he was appointed Profeſſor of Aſtronomy and Experimental Philoſophy in the Profeſſorſhip founded by Thomas Plume D. D. Archdeacon of Rocheſter, being choſen the firſt in that chair for his great merit and learning (d). In 1706 he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, and entered into holy Orders about the year 1713 (e). He was highly eſteemed for his knowledge in the moſt abſtruſe parts of Mathematics by the greateſt men of the age. In the year 1713, at the deſire of Dr. Richard Bentley, he publiſhed at Cambridge in 4to a ſecond edition of Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica, with all the improvements which the Author had made thereto; to which he prefixed an excellent preface, giving an ample account of the Philoſophy introduced by that great man. He had prepared ſeveral uſeful books for the public, one of which, intitled, Harmonia Menſurarum, ſive Analyſis & Syntheſis per Rationum & Angulorum menſuras promotæ. Accedunt alia opuſcula Mathematica per Rogerum Cotes [A], was publiſhed at Cambridge in 4to, 1722 by his learned ſucceſſor

(a) Life of Dr. John Colet Dean of St. Paul's. By Samuel Knight, D. D. pag. 429, 430. edit. London 1724, in 8vo.

(b) From Memoirs communicated to us by Robert Smith, L. L. D. Plumian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in the Univerſity of Cambridge.

(c) Father of Dr. Robert Smith abovementioned.

(d) From Dr. Smith's Memoirs, and Dr. Knight, pag. 430.

(e) From Dr. Smith's Memoirs.

[A] His Harmonia Menſurarum &c.] The whole title is as follows: Harmonia Menſurarum, ſive Analyſis & Symtheſis per Rationum & Angulorum Menſuras promotæ. Accedunt alia Opuſcula Mathematica: per Rogerum Coteſium. Edidit & auxit Robertus Smith Collegii S. Trinitatis apud Cantabrigienſes Socius; Aſtronomiæ & Experimentalis Philoſophiæ poſt Coteſium Profeſſor. The Dedication of this work to Richard Mead M. D. and F. R. S. by Dr. Robert Smith is dated from Trinity College Cambridge April the ſucceſſor Robert Smith, now LL. D. He wrote likewiſe a Deſcription of the Great Meteor, which was on the 6th of March 171⅝, in a Letter to Robert Dannye, D. D. Rector of Spofforth in Yorkſhire, publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions. Num. 365. And for the ſake of preſerving as much as poſſible the hiſtory of every part of that learning wherein Mr.

the 16th 1722. The Harmonia Menſurarum is divided into three parts. The firſt is called Logometria, and was firſt publiſhed by the Author himſelf in the Philoſophical Tranſactions of the year 1714, num. 338. In this part (1), the Author's chief deſign is to ſhew how that ſort of Problems, which are uſually reduced to the Quadrature of the Hyperbola and Ellipſis, may be reduced to the meaſures of Ratio's and Angles; and afterwards to be ſolved more readily by the Canons of Logarithms, and Sines, and Tangents. He defines the meaſures of Ratio's to be quantities of any kind, whoſe magnitudes are analogous to the magnitudes of the Ratio's to be meaſured. In this ſenſe any Canon of Logarithms is a Syſtem of numeral meaſures of the Ratio's of the abſolute numbers to an unit. The parts of the Aſymptote of the Logiſtic Line, intercepted between its Ordinates, are a Syſtem of Lines or Meaſures of the Ratio's of thoſe Ordinates. The Areas of an Hyperbola, intercepted between its Ordinates to the Aſymptote, are a Syſtem of Plane Meaſures of the Ratio's of thoſe Ordinates. And ſince there may be infinite Syſtems of Meaſures according as various kinds of Quantities are made uſe of, ſuch as Numbers, Time, Velocity, and the like; or according as the Meaſures of any one Syſtem may be all increaſed or diminiſhed in any given Proportion; in ſuch variety much confuſion may poſſibly ariſe as to the kind and abſolute Magnitudes of particular Meaſures, which happen to fall under conſideration. Our Author very happily removes the difficulty, by ſhewing that the nature of the ſubject points out the Meaſure of a certain immutable Ratio for a Modulus in all Syſtems, whereby to determine the Kind and abſolute Magnitudes of all other Meaſures in each Syſtem. The firſt Propoſition (2) is to find the Meaſure of any propoſed Ratio. This he conſiders in a way ſo ſimple and general, as naturally leads to the Notion and Definition of a Modulus; namely, that it is an invariable Quantity in each Syſtem, which bears the ſame Proportion to the Increment of the Meaſure of any propoſed Ratio, as the increaſing Term of the Ratio bears to its own Increment. He then ſhews, that the Meaſure of any given Ratio is as the Modulus of the Syſtem from whence it is taken; and that the Modulus in every Syſtem is always equal to the Meaſure of a certain determinate and immutable Ratio, which he therefore calls the Ratio Modularis. He ſhews that this Ratio is expreſſed by theſe Numbers 2, 7182818 &c. to 1, or by 1 to 0, 3678794 &c. So that in Briggs's Canon of the Logarithm of this Ratio is the Modulus of that Syſtem: in the Logiſtic Line the given Subtangent is the Modulus of that Syſtem; in the Hyperbola the given Parallelogram, contained by an Ordinate to the Aſymptote and the Abſciſs from the Center, is the Modulus of that Syſtem: and in other Syſtems the Modulus is generally ſome remarkable Quantity. In the ſecond Propoſition (3) he gives a conciſe uncommon method for calculating Briggs's Canon of Logarithms, together with Rules for finding intermediate Logarithms and Numbers, even beyond the limits of the Canon. In the third Propoſition (4) he conſtructs any Syſtem of Meaſures by a Canon of Logarithms, not only when the Meaſure of ſome one Ratio is given, but alſo without that Datum, by ſeeking the Modulus of the Syſtem by the Rule abovementioned. In the fourth (5) fifth (6) and ſixth (7) Propoſitions he ſquares the Hyperbola, deſcribes the Logiſtic Line and Æquiangular Spiral by a Canon of Logarithms, and ſhews ſome curious uſes of theſe Propoſitions in their Scholia. Take an eaſy Example of the Logometrical Method in the common Problem for finding the Denſity of the Atmoſphere. Suppoſing Gravity uniform, every one knows, that if Altitudes are taken in any Arithmetical Proportion, the Denſities of the Air in thoſe Altitudes will be in a Geometrical Progreſſion; that is, the Altitudes are the Meaſures of the Ratio's of the Denſities below and in thoſe Altitudes, and ſo the difference of any two Altitudes is the Meaſure of the Ratio of the Denſities in thoſe Altitudes. Now to determine the abſolute and real Magnitude of thoſe Meaſures, Mr. Cotes ſhews a priori, that the Modulus of the Syſtem is the Altitude of the Atmoſphere, when reduced every where to the ſame Denſity as below. The Modulus therefore is given (as bearing the ſame Proportion to the Altitude of the Mercury in the Barometer, as the ſpecific Gravity of Mercury does to the ſpecific Gravity of the Air,) and conſequently the whole Syſtem is given. For ſince in all Syſtems the Meaſures of the ſame Ratio's are analogous among themſelves; the Logarithm of the Ratio of the Air's Denſity in any two Altitudes will be to the Modulus of the Canon, (that is to the Logarithm of the Ratio Modularis defined above,) as the Difference of theſe Altitudes is to the aforeſaid given Altitude of the homogeneous Atmoſphere. He concludes his Logometria with a General Scholium (8), containing great variety of elegant conſtructions both Logometrical and Trigonometrical; ſuch as give the length of Curves either Geometrical or Mechanical; their Area's and Centers of Gravity; the Solids generated from them, and the Surfaces of theſe Solids; together with ſeveral curious Problems in Natural Philoſophy, concerning the Attraction of Bodies, the Denſity and Reſiſtance of Fluids, and the Trajectories of Planets. Several of theſe Problems have two Caſes; one conſtructed by the meaſure of a Ratio, and the other by the meaſure of an Angle. The great affinity and beautiful harmony of the Meaſures in thoſe caſes gave occaſion to the title of the Book. The Meaſures of Angles are defined (juſt as the Meaſures of Ratio's) to be Quantities of any kind, whoſe magnitudes are analogous to the magnitude of the Angles. Such may be the Arcs or Sectors of any Circle, or any other Quantities of Time, Velocity, or Reſiſtance, analogous to the Magnitudes of the Angles. Every Syſtem of theſe Meaſures has likewiſe its Modulus homogeneous to the Meaſures in that Syſtem, and may be computed by the Trigonometrical Canon of Sines and Tangents, juſt as the Meaſures of Ratio's by the Canon of Logarithms; for the given Modulus in each Syſtem bears the ſame proportion to the Meaſure of any given Angle, as the Radius of a Circle bears to an Arc, which ſubtends that Angle, or the ſame as this conſtant Number of Degrees 57, 2957795130 bears to the Number of Degrees in the ſaid Angle. Upon the whole Mr. Cotes thus expreſſes himſelf (9): Geometris integrum erit, ex adductis hactenus exemplis de Methodo noſtra judicare; quam quidem, ſi proba fuerit, ulterius excolere pergent, & excolendo latius promovebunt. Patet utique Campus ampliſſimus, in quo vires ſuas experiri poterunt, præſertim ſi Logometriæ Trigonometriam inſuper adjungant, quibus miram quandam affinitatem in ſe invicem euntem intercedere notabam. Hiſce quidem Principiis haud facile crediderim generaliora dari poſſe; cum tota Matheſis vix quicquam in univerſo ſuo ambitu complectatur, præter angulorum & rationum Theoriam. Neque ſane commodiora ſperabit, qui animadvertit effectionis facilitatem per ampliſſimas illas, omnibuſque ſuis numeris abſolutas, tum Logarithmorum tum Sinuum & Tangentium Tabulas, quas anteceſſorum noſtrorum laudatiſſimæ ſolertiæ debemus acceptas. Ut vero tanti beneficii uberior nobis exſurgat fructus, id nunc exponendum reſtat, quibus artibus ad iſtiuſmodi concluſiones rectiſſima perveniatur. In hunc finem Theoremata quædam, tum Logometrica, tum Trigonometrica adjeciſſem, quæ parata ad uſum aſſervo; ni conſultius viſum eſſet, quum abſque nimiis ambagibus ea tradi non poſſent, intacta potius præterire, atque aliis denuo inveſtiganda relinquere. Why our Author takes his principles to be ſo general, will farther appear by an inſtance or two. In the Problem already mentioned he meaſures the Ratio of the Air's Denſities in any Altitudes, by the Altitudes themſelves, and makes uſe of the Altitude of an uniform Atmoſphere for the Modulus. So likewiſe when he conſiders the Velocities acquired, and the Spaces deſcribed in given times, by a Body projected upwards and downwards in a reſiſting Medium with any given Velocity; he ſhews, that the Times of Deſcent, added to the given time,

(1) See the Account of the Harmonia Menſurarum &c. in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, num. 372. vol. 32. pag. 139, & ſeqq. for the years 1722 and 1723.

(2) Pag. 4-9.

(3) Pag. 10-11.

(4) Pag. 11.

(5) Pag. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

(6 Pag. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19.

(7 Pag. 19, & ſeqq.

(8) Pag. 22, & ſeqq.

(9) Pag. 35, 36.

(10) P

Mr. Cotes excelled, we ſhall give extracts of ſome original Letters of his to the learned and ingenious William Jones, Eſq; F. R. S. in the note [B]. He lived but a little while to time, are the Meaſure of Ratio's, to a given Modulus of Time, whoſe terms are the Sum and Difference of the ultimate Velocity and the preſent Velocities, that are acquired: that the Times of Aſcent, taken from a given Time, are the Meaſures of Angles, to a given Modulus of Time, whoſe Radius is to their Tangents in the Ratio of the ultimate Velocity to the preſent Velocities; and laſtly, that the Spaces deſcribed in Deſcent or Aſcent are the Meaſures of Ratio's to a given Modulus of Space, whoſe terms are the abſolute accelerating and retarding Forces ariſing from Gravity and Reſiſtance taken together at the beginning and end of thoſe Spaces. This general account may be ſufficient to illuſtrate what we are going to ſay; that ſince the Magnitudes of Ratio's (as well as Forms) may be expounded by Quantities of any kind, the Mathematician is at liberty upon all occaſions to chooſe thoſe which are fitteſt for his purpoſe; and ſuch are they without doubt, that are put into his hand by the Conditions of the Problem. He may indeed repreſent thoſe Quantities by an Hyperbola, or any other Logometrical Syſtem, were not his purpoſe anſwered with greater ſimplicity by the very Syſtem itſelf, which occurs in each particular Problem. And the ſame may be ſaid for the Syſtems of Angular Meaſures, inſtead of recurring upon all occaſions to Elliptical or Circular Area's. As to the convenience of calculating from Mr. Cotes's Conſtructions, he ſhews that the Meaſures of any Ratio's or Angles are always computed in the ſame uniform way; by taking from the Tables the Logarithm of the Ratio, or the Number of Degrees in the Angle, and then by finding a fourth Proportional to three given Quantities; for that will be the Meaſure required. The ſimpleſt Hyperbolic Area may indeed be ſquared by the ſame operation taught in the Author's fourth Propoſition; but the ſimpleſt Elliptic Area requires ſomewhat more. Thoſe that are more complex in both kinds (which generally happens) require an additional trouble to reduce them to the ſimpleſt; to ſquare them by infinite Series is ſtill more operoſe, and does not anſwer the end of Geometry. Upon the whole therefore it may deſerve to be conſidered, for what purpoſes ſhould Problems be always conſtructed by Conic Area's, unleſs it be to pleaſe or aſſiſt the imagination? The deſign of Theoretical Geometry differs from Problematical; the former conſiſts in the diſcovery and contemplation of the Properties and Relations of Figures for the ſake of naked truth; but the deſign of the laſt is to do ſomething propoſed, and is beſt executed by the leaſt Apparatus of the former. The ſecond part of our Author's Harmonia Menſurarum contains Theoremata tum Logometrica, tum Trigonometrica, quæ datarum Fluxionum Fluentes exhibent per Menſuras. Adjiciuntur Theoremata de Continuatione Formarum & Fluentium ad infinitum. The third part contains Problematum Analyſis & Conſtructio per Formas præcedentes. Theſe two parts were publiſhed after Mr. Cotes's death by Dr. Smith, who has ſubjoined to them, Theoremata tum Logometrica tum Trigonometrica datarum Fluxionum Fluentes exhibentia, per methodum menſurarum ulterius extenſam. Operis materiam à Rogero Coteſio accepit, Opus ipſum compoſuit Robertus Smith. The firſt Treatiſe in the Miſcellaneous Works is intitled, Æſtimatio Errorum in mixtâ Matheſi, per Variationes Partium Trianguli Plani & Sphærici. It conſiſts of 28 Theorems, to determine the Proportions among the leaſt contemporary Variations of the Sides and Angles of Plane and Spherical Triangles, while any two of them remain invariable. An example will ſhew their great uſe in Aſtronomy. The time of the day or night is frequently to be determined by the Altitude of the Star. Let it then be propoſed to find the error, that may ariſe in the time, from any given error in taking the Altitude. By applying the 22d Theorem (10) to the Triangle formed by the Complements of the Star's Altitude and Declination, and by the Complement of the Poles Elevation, Mr. Cotes ſhews, that the Variation of the Angle at the Pole, and conſequently the Error in Time, will be as the Error in the Altitude directly, as the Sine of the Complement of the Pole's Elevation inverſely, and as the Sine of the Star's Azimuth from the Meridian inverſely. Conſequently, if the Error in the Altitude be given, under a given Elevation of the Pole, the Error in time will be reciprocally as the Sine of the Azimuth contained by the Meridian and the Vertical, which the Star is in. This Error therefore will be the ſame, whatever be the Altitude of the Star in the ſame Vertical; and will be leaſt when the Vertical is at right Angles to the Meridies; but will be abſolutely the leaſt in the ſame circumſtance, if the obſerver be under the Æquator. In which caſe, if the Error in the Altitude be one minute, the error of the Time will be four ſeconds. If the Obſerver recedes from the Æquator towards either Pole, the Error will be encreaſed in the Proportions of the Radius to the Sine Complement of the Latitude. So that in the Latitude of 45 Degrees it will be 5 $\frac{2}{3}$ Seconds, and in the Latitudes of 50 and 55 it will be 6 $\frac{2}{3}$ and 6 $\frac{12}{13}$ Seconds reſpectively. If the Star be in any other vertical Oblique to the Meridian, the Error will ſtill be increaſed in the Proportion of the Radius to the Sine of that oblique Angle. Laſtly, if the Error in the Altitude be either greater or leſs than one Minute, the Error in Time will be greater or leſs in the ſame Proportion. Much after the ſame manner may the Limits of Errors be computed in other caſes, which ariſe from the Inaccuracy of Obſervations, and from hence the moſt convenient opportunities for obſerving are alſo determined. The ſecond Treatiſe is De Methodo Differentiali Newtoniana. The Author having written it, before he had ſeen Sir Iſaac Newton's Treatiſe upon that ſubject, has treated of it after a manner ſomewhat different. The third Treatiſe is intitled, Canonotechnia, ſive Conſtructio Tabularum per Differentias. It conſiſts of ten Propoſitions, moſt admirably contrived for the expeditious Computation of intermediate Terms in any given Species. The laſt Propoſition, which contains a general ſolution of the whole deſign, is this (11): Datis Seriei cujuſcunque Terminis aliquot æquidiſtantibus, quorum intervalla ſecanda ſunt in æquales quotlibetcunque partes, propoſitum ſit invenire terminos interſerendos. The Book concludes with three ſmall Tracts, De Deſcenſu Gravium; De Motu Pendulorum in Cycloide; De Motu Projectilium; compoſed in a very natural and eaſy manner. The Editor has ſubjoined ſome Notes upon the Harmonia Menſurarum, and tells us (12), that Mr. Cotes was very young, when he wrote the three laſt mentioned Tracts; and that he left behind him ſome other Tracts, particularly Compendium Arithmetices, Reſolutio Æquationum, Problema Dioptricum univerſale, and de Naturâ Curvarum; all which pieces Dr. Smith informs us he deſigns to publiſh. Mr. Cotes likewiſe drew up an elegant courſe of Lectures upon Experimental Philoſophy; and intended to have made a great many improvements in Practical Aſtronomy, having made Flamſtead's and Caſſini's Tables more commodious for the computing of the Motions of the Sun and his Satellites, and began to draw up new ones for the Newtonian Theory of the Moon.

(10) Pag. 17.

(11) Pag. 64.

(12) In his Preface to the Harmonia Menſurarum.

[B] We ſhall give Extracts of ſome original Letters of his to the learned and ingenious William Jones Eſq; F. R. S. in the Note.]

" Sir, Febr. 15th 1711.

" I yeſterday received your moſt valuable and acceptable gift (13), together with your very kind Letter. I return you my hearty thanks for 'em both. Not having heard any thing of your Book till I ſaw it, I received it with the additional pleaſure of a ſurprize. You have highly obliged the mathematical part of the world by collecting into one volume thoſe curious and uſeful Treatiſes, which were before too much diſperſed, but eſpecially by the publication of the Analyſis per Æquationes Infinitas, and the Methodus Differentialis. I could heartily wiſh that nothing of Sir Iſaac's might be loſt. I hope you will endeavour (as you find an opportunity) to perſuade him to publiſh other papers; for I believe he has yet many excellent things in reſerve. About a year and a half ago (when I was laſt in town) I acquainted Mr. Ralphſon, that you had ſome papers of Sir Iſaac's in your hands, which were long ago communicated to Mr. Collins. I thought to carry on those discoveries which he had designed for the public, dying June the 5th 1716 in the prime of his age, to the great regret of all lovers of the Mathematical Sciences.

(13) Analyſis per Quantitatum Series, Fluxiones, ac Differentias, cum enumeratione Linearum tertii ordinis, publiſhed by Mr. Jones at London 1711, in 4to.

" thought they might have been pertinent to his design of writing an History of the Method of Fluxions. I afterwards understood that you gave him a sight of those papers, and that he thought 'em not to be for his purpose, which I do now very much wonder at, if his intention was to do justice to Sir Isaac. If that was not his intention, I think your Preface has already sufficiently defeated all his attempts. We are now at a stand as to Sir Isaac's Principia; he designs to make some few experiments before we proceed any further: The first Book, and the first Sections of the second are printed off. The inclosed paper (14) is what I wrote about three years ago, and read to my auditors in our Schools in 1709. I have sent it to you, as it relates to the Methodus Differentialis, but more especially as a small acknowledgment of my gratitude for having received that and the other excellent Treatises from your hands, and as a token of my hearty friendship and sincere good-will to you. I am, &c."

(14) De Newtoniana Methodo Interpolandi, published since by Dr. Smith among the Additions to the Harmonia Mensurarum.

Cambridge Trinity-College.

Cambridge Sept. 30th 1711.

" Sir,

" I return you my thanks for your Letter, and the information you gave me concerning the State of Mathematicks at present in London. I shall be glad to see Mr. De Moivre's Treatise of Chance, when it comes out. His things are always very neat and curious. We have nothing of Sir Isaac Newton's, that I know of in manuscript at Cambridge besides the first draught of his Principia, as he read it in his Lectures; his Algebra-Lectures, which are printed; and his Optick-Lectures, the substance of which is for the most part contain'd in his printed Book, but with further improvements. I thank you for your kind offer of recommending my paper to the public; but I am of opinion, that it is not of so great use as to deserve to be printed after Sir Isaac's Methodus Differentialis. The reading of that excellent Treatise gave me occasion to consider the subject again. As my design related chiefly to the Construction of Tables; so I found and examined a great Variety of Methods; which might be employed for that purpose. But at last I pitched upon one, which I judged to be by much the simplest and most convenient of any of those, which offered themselves to my thoughts. The account of this Method may make a second part to be annexed to the paper I formerly sent you, if you and your mathematical friends shall think it of any use to be published. I have not as yet drawn it up in writing; otherwise it might have accompanied this Letter. The best description I can give you of it in few words is this (15): that in some respects it resembles Sir Isaac's Method in Propos. III. of his Method. Differ. but is in the main more nearly related to the Method of Mr. Briggs described in cap. 13. of his Arithmetica Logarithmica, Edit. London. Dr. Gregory Lib. V. Propo. XXV. of his Astronomy refers his reader to a Book of Gabriel Mouton de Observationibus Diametrorum Solis & Lunæ apparentium. Though I do not much rely upon the Doctor's recommendation, yet I should be glad to see the Book, or to have some short account of his way. If you could assist me in this respect, I should be much obliged to you for the favour. I have formerly sent to my Bookseller at London for it, but he could not procure it. I am very desirous to have the edition of the Principia finished; but I never think the time lost when we stay for Sir Isaac's further Corrections and Improvements of so very valuable a book, especially when this seems to be the last time he will concern himself with it. I am sensible his other business allows him but little time for these things; and therefore I don't hasten him so much as I might otherwise do: I am very well satisfied to wait till he has leisure. I am, &c."

(13) This Paper is likewise published by Dr. Smith in the same place.

Cambridge Nov. 11th 1711.

" Dear Sir,

" I have received Mouton's Book. I thank you for the favour you did me in sending it. I have look'd over what relates to his way of interpolation, but I can find no cause from thence to make any alteration. I beg your pardon that I have not yet sent you my second paper, I had finished it before I received your last Letter with the Book, but since that time I have not had leisure to transcribe it. I design to send with it a paper concerning Logarithms (16), which together with the others may serve to fill up a whole Transaction, if you shall think them of any use to be published after you have read them. The controversy concerning Sir Isaac's Philosophy is a piece of news, that I had not heard of. I think that Philosophy needs no defence, especially when it is attacked by Cartesians. One Mr. Green, a Fellow of Clare-Hall in our University, seems to have nearly the same design with those German and French Objectors, whom you mention. His Book (17) is now in our press, and is almost finished. I am told he will add an Appendix, in which he undertakes also to square the Circle. Ex pede Herculem. I need not recommend his performance any further to you. I am, &c."

(16) This is printed in the Philosophical Transactions, numb. 338. an. 1714.

(17) This book was published at Cambridge 1711 in 8vo under the following title: The Principles of Natural Philosophy, in which is shewn the Insufficiency of the present Systems to give us any just Account of that Science, and the Necessity therein of some new Principles in order to furnish us with a true and real knowledge of Nature. By Robert Green, M. A. There is subjoined to this book a Latin Treatise, intitled, Geometria Solidorum sive materiæ, seu de variâ Compositione &c.

" Cambridge May 5th 1716.

" Dear Sir,

" I take it very kindly of Dr. Taylor, that he has been pleased to give so favourable a representation of my Tables: and your Letter encourages me to give you some account of the principal part of that work, with which I did not acquaint the Doctor by reason of his short stay with me. I must therefore tell you, that Geometers have not yet promoted the inverse method of Fluxions by Conick Areas or by Measures of Ratios and Angles so far as it is capable of being promoted by those methods. There is an infinite field still reserved, which it has been my fortune to find an entrance into. Not to keep you any longer in suspense, I have found out a general and beautiful method by Measures of Angles and Ratio's for the Fluent of any Quantity, which can come under this form $\frac{dzz\,\overset{\theta}{\overline{\lambda}}\overline{\theta+\nu-1}}{\overline{c+fz^{\nu}}}$, in which d, e, f are any constant Quantities, z the variable, ν any Index, θ any whole Number affirmative or negative, $\frac{\theta}{\lambda}$ any Fraction whatever. The Fluents of this form, which have hitherto been considered are $\frac{dzz\,\overline{\theta\nu-1}}{c+fz^{\nu}}$, $\frac{dzz\,\overline{\theta\nu+\frac{1}{2}\nu-1}}{c+fz^{\nu}}$ These you remember are Sir Isaac's two first, and from these all his others are easily deduced. And as his irrational forms of the Quadratick Kind are derived from the rational, so from my general rational Form I deduce irrational ones of all kinds. Thus for instance, if $\frac{\theta}{\lambda}$ represent any affirmative or negative Fraction, the Fluent of any Quantity of this form $dzz\,\overline{\theta\nu-1}\times\overline{c+fz^{\nu}}\Big|^{\theta}_{\lambda}$ or of this kind $dzz\,\frac{\overline{\theta\nu-1}\,\overline{c+fz^{\nu}}\Big|^{\theta}_{\lambda}}{g+hz^{\nu}}$ and so of some others, depends upon the Measures of Ratio's and Angles. Mr. Leibnitz in the Leipsick Acts of 1702, pag. 218 and 219 has very rashly undertaken to demonstrate that the Fluent of $\frac{x}{x^4+a^4}$ cannot be expressed by Measures of Ratio's and Angles; and he swaggers upon the occasion (according to his usual vanity) as having by this Demonstration determined a Question of the greatest moment. Then he goes on thus: As the Fluent of $\frac{x}{x+a}$ depends up" on

ces. He lies interred in Trinity-College Chapel in Cambridge, with an epitaph written by Dr. Richard Bentley [C], Maſter of the ſaid College, who highly valued him.

" on the Meaſure of a Ratio, and the Fluent $\frac{x}{xx+aa}$ " of upon the Meaſure of an Angle; ſo he " has more than once expreſſed his wiſhes, " that the Progreſſion may be continued, and if " it be determined to what Problem the Fluents " of $\frac{x}{x^4+a^4}$, $\frac{x}{x^3+a^3}$ &c. may be referred; his " deſire is anſwered in my general Solution, which " contains an infinite number of ſuch Progreſſions. I " can go yet further, and ſhew him how to find by Mea- " ſures of Ratio's and Angles without any Exception " or Limitation the Fluent of this general Quantity " $\frac{\theta_n}{dzz+\frac{\dot{\partial}}{\lambda}\eta-1}$ or even this $\frac{\theta_n}{dzz+\frac{\dot{\partial}}{\lambda}\eta-1}$ / $e+fz^n+gz^{2n}$ / $e+fz^n+gz^{2n}+hz^{3n}$, " where θ, as before, repreſents any Integer, and the " Denominator λ of the Fraction $\frac{\dot{\partial}}{\lambda}$ repreſents any " Number in the ſeries 2. 4. 8. 16. 32 &c. any whole " Number being denoted by its Numerator $\dot{\partial}$. In " truth I am inclined to believe, that Liebnitz's grand " queſtion ought to be determined the contrary way, " and that it will be found at laſt, that the Fluent of " any rational Fluxion whatever does depend upon " Meaſures of Ratios and Angles, excepting thoſe " which may be had of infinite terms, even without " introducing Meaſures.

[C] With an Epitaph written by Dr. Richard Bentley.] It is as follows: H. S. E. Rogerus Roberti Filius Cotes, Collegii hujus S. Trinitatis Socius, Aſtronomiæ & Experimentalis Philoſophiæ Profeſſor Plumianus; qui immaturâ morte præreptus pauca quidem ingenii ſui pignora reliquit, ſed egregia, ſed admiranda, ex inacceſſis matheſeos penetralibus felici ſolertiâ tum primum eruta. Poſt magnum illum Newtonum Societatis hujus ſpes altera & decus gemellum. Cui ad ſummam doctrinæ laudem omnes morum virtutumque dotes in cumulum acceſſerunt, eo magis ſpectabiles amabileſque, quod in formoſo corpore gratiores venirent. Natus Burbagii in Agro Leiceſtrienſi Jul. x. 1682. obiit Jun. v. 1716.

T.

(a) Part 2. pag. 174, &c. of the Dutch edition.

(c) Mercure Galant, for March 1682, pag. 143.

COTIN (CHARLES) a native of Paris, and a Member of the French Academy, whom Monſieur Boileau has very much abuſed in his Satyrs. See a Vindication of him, and ſeveral circumſtances of his Life in Monſieur Perrault's Paralleles (a). See alſo the Letters collected by Richelet (b). He died in January 1682 (c).

(b) The Life of ſeveral French Authors are prefixed to them. That of Cotin is in pag. 56 of the Dutch edition 1699.

(a) Teiſſier, Catalogus Catalogor. &c. pag. 52.
(b) Multa, vel potius multos collegit. Scipio Gentil. in Apolog. Apulcii, p. 428.

COTTA (CATELLIANUS) wrote Scholiums ad Mediolanenſium Statuta, upon the Laws of the Milaneſe, and a ſmall Treatiſe concerning the Civilians, which he begins with Mutius Scevola, and finiſhes with Andrew Alciat (a). He wrote alſo a book intitled Memorabilia, which were printed at Venice in the year 1572, 8vo, and which is nothing but a compilation from other Authors (b). He owns it in the beginning of his books, which acquits him of the crime of Plagiariſm.

COTTERUS (CHRISTOPHER) one of the three Prophets, whoſe Revelations Comenius publiſhed. See KOTTERUS.

(a) Harpocration, in voce Κότυς.

COTYS King of Thracia, contemporary with Philip, Alexander's father, reigned twenty four years. He at firſt gave himſelf up to luxury and a voluptuous life; and being grown prouder by proſperity, he became ſo cruel, that he cut his own wife in two, beginning by her ſecret parts (a). Athenæus does not relate this fact thus, according to Delechamp's Tranſlation [A]. But that Tranſlation is erroneous, as the learned Mauſſac has very well obſerved [B]. Cotys dies a violent death; one Python killed him, and retired

[A] He cut his own wife in two . . . Athenæus does not relate this fact thus, according to Dalechamp's Tranſlation.] After he had ſaid, that Cotys, the moſt voluptuous Prince that ever reigned in Thracia (1), did not begin to be unfortunate, till after he had offended againſt Minerva, he adds the following particulars. Cotys pretended one day to marry that Goddeſs; the wedding-dinner was given; the nuptial chamber was prepared; the Bride only was wanting; Cotys, being very drunk, waited for her with the utmoſt impatience; and when he did not ſee her come, he fell into a violent paſſion. He ſent one of his guards to ſee whether ſhe was not yet arrived in the room prepared for her. The ſoldier returned, and ſaid he had not ſeen any body; which exaſperated the furious Prince to ſuch a degree, that he killed the meſſenger on the ſpot; he ſent another, who brought the ſame anſwer, and met with the ſame fate. He ſent a third, who thinking to avoid the misfortune of the two former, would not ſay he had met with no body; but boldly aſſerted, that Minerva had been a long while waiting for the King. But his impoſture had no better ſucceſs, than the former's ſincerity. For Cotys being taken with a ſudden fit of jealouſy, as tho' this third meſſenger had taken hold of the opportunity, which the bride's impatience might have offered him, fell upon him, and tore him in pieces, beginning with his ſecret parts. Ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς ὅτός ποτε καὶ ζηλοτυπήσας, τὴν αὐτοῦ γυναῖκα ταῖς αὐτοῦ χέρσιν ἀνέτεμε τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἀπὸ τῶν αἰδοίων ἀρξάμενος. Tum Rex zelotypia percitus, ne quid in uxorem ſuam auſus ille fuiſſet, manibus ſuis militem conſcidit, ac diſcerpſit, a pudendis exorſus (2). This is Athenæus's account if you will follow his Tranſlator; but you muſt not follow him (3). He did not obſerve that the words Ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς ὅτός ποτε are the beginning of a new ſtory, and ſignify, Rex iſte aliquando (it happened once that this King &c.)

(1) Ὃς ἁπάντων τῶν βασιλέων τῶν ἐν τῇ Θράκῃ γεγενημένων μάλιστα περὶς ἡδυπαθείας καὶ τρυφὰς ὥρμησε. Athen. lib. 12. cap. 8. pag. 531.

(2) Idem, ibid. pag. 532. Ex Theopompo.

(3) I had done it, and correct now this error in this third edition, having been adviſed by Mr. Weyſſiére la Croſe.

[B] The learned Mauſſac has very well obſerved it.] He obſerves that Theopompus, in Athenæus, aſſerts the ſame thing as Harpocration does, namely, that Cotys tore his own wife in pieces, and he cenſures Dalechamp for tranſlating Athenæus as tho' the Meſſenger, and not the Queen herſelf had been thus cruelly treated. Eruditiſſimus Dalecampius longiſſimè erravit a veritate hiſtoriæ, cum Græca verba Theopompi . . . . ita vertit . . . . (4). Imo e contrario mulierem propriam diſcerpſit: ut optime habet Harpocration, quod deſignat evidentiſſime illa verba τὴν ἄνθρωπον: falſiſſimum autem eſt eum conſcidiſſe tertium militem. Fraudi fuit ſine dubio eruditiſſimo illo interprete vox ἄνθρωπον, cui non animadvertit conjunctum eſſe articulum τὴν, & hoc in loco mulierem ſignificare. Hæc velim dicta in favorem juniorum (5). i. e. " The moſt learned Dalechamp has " been very much miſtaken in his tranſlation of Theo- " pompus's Greek words. For on the contrary Cotys " tore his own wife in pieces; as it is very well ex- " preſſed by Harpocration, and evidently appears by " theſe words τὴν ἄνθρωπον; but it is abſolutely falſe, " that he tore the third ſoldier in pieces. This moſt " learned Tranſlator has been miſled by the word ἄν- " θρωπον, becauſe he did not obſerve, that there was " an article of the feminine gender prefixed to it, ſo " that it ſignifies in this place a woman. Let this be " obſerved for the ſake of young ſcholars."

(4) See the Greek words of Theopompus, and Dalechamp's Tranſlation above, quotation (2).

(5) Philippus Jacobus Mauſſacus, Not. ad Harpocration, pag. 221. editionis Lugd. Bat. 1683.

retired to Athens, where his action was nobly rewarded (b) [C]. He was assisted by his brother in the murther of this King, and it was in order to revenge their father, that they resolved upon this attempt. Aristotle, who acquaints me with this [D], observes, that one Adamas revolted against Cotys, to be revenged of an injury which he had received from him in his youth. This injury was, that he had been castrated. Cersobleptes Cotys's son succeeded his father in the Kingdom. He had a sister who was married to Iphicrates [E]. I believe this is the Cotys whom Plutarch mentions in his Apophthegms [F]. He speaks in another place of a COTYS King of Paphlagonia, who made an alliance with Agesilaus, and by that means married a beautiful girl (c). Livy mentions one COTYS King of the Odryses, who fought faithfully against the Romans for Perseus King of Macedonia (d). Tacitus speaks of some Princes named COTYS, of whom Moreri does not give us a very true account [G].

(b) Demosthen. adverss. Aristocratem, pag. 452, A.

(c) In Vita Agesilai, pag 601.

(d) Livius, lib. 42.

In

[C] One Python killed him, and retired to Athens, where his action was nobly rewarded.] When he committed the fact he was assisted by his brother Heraclides (6). He would not have found every where a sanctuary after this murther (7). But he thought that Athens would be a very good asylum for him, because that City had been a long time at war with Cotys. He retired therefore thither, and desired to be admitted a Citizen of Athens (8). He not only obtained that privilege (9), but they also gave him a golden crown, and loaded him with so many praises in the Orations delivered before the people, that he had room to think they raised the people's jealousy, by extolling too much the glory of the murther he had committed: so that he bethought himself of a device, to remove the envy, which began to be conceived against him (10). He came before the people, and declared, that he did not pretend to any share in the glory of that action; that he only lent his arm to some Deity, to whom therefore the whole merit of it ought to be ascribed. Diocles, in Diogenes Laertius (11), says only, that the Philosopher Pyrrho was honoured with the Freedom of Athens, as a reward for the murther of Cotys. The war had very much changed the heart of the Athenians, for they had formerly admitted Cotys a Citizen of their City, and given him a golden crown (12). It is asserted that he also gave them the Freedom of Thrace, in order to shew that he did not think himself beneath them. Capax generosi spiritus illud quoque dictum Regis Cotys; ut enim ab Athenienſibus civitatem sibi datam cognovit; Et ego, inquit, illis meæ gentis jus dabo. Æquavit Athenis Thraciam, ne vicissitudine talis beneficii imparem se judicando humilius de origine sua sentire existimaretur (13).

(6) Demosthenes, adverss. Aristocratem, pag. m. 445, C. See the following Remark.

(7) Demosth. ibid. pag. 446, C.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ibid. pag. 445, C.

(10) Plutarchus, de sui laude, pag. 542, E, & de gerenda Republica, pag. 816 E.

(11) Lib. 9. num. 65.

(12) Demosthen. adverss. Aristocratem, pag. 445, B.

(13) Valer. Maximus, lib. 3. cap. 7. circa finem.

[D] . . Python and his brother resolved upon this attempt in order to revenge their father. Aristotle . . . . acquaints me with this.] It is in the tenth chapter of the fifth book of his Politicks, but we must correct something in it. Πάρων δὲ καὶ Ἡρακλείδης οἱ Αἴνιοι Κότυν διέφθειραν, τῷ πατρὶ τιμωρῆσαι. i. e. "Paro and "Heraclides of Ænos * killed Cotys, on purpose to "revenge their father." Thus it is in my edition of Aristotle (14), which is that of Geneva printed in 1605. But it should be Πύθων instead of Πάρων, and it must be translated Python and Heraclides &c. Let us not forget to observe, that Plutarch tells us, these two murtherers of Cotys had been Plato's disciples (15). See also Philostratus, Chapter the first, Book the fifth of Apollonius's Life, where he tells us, they were of the Academick Sect.

* A Town in Thracia.

(14) Pag. 305, D.

(15) Plut. adv. Colotem. pag. 1126.

[E] His son . . . . had a sister, who was married to Iphicrates.] Menestheus, who was born of this marriage, said one day, that he had more value for his mother, than for his father, because his mother had done all that lay in her power to make him an Athenian, whereas his father did all that he could, to make him a Thracian. Menesthea filium reliquit (Iphicrates), ex Thressa natum, Coti Regis filia. Is cum interrogaretur, utrum pluris matrem, patremve faceret; matrem, inquit. Id cum multis mirum videretur: at ille merito, inquit, facio: Nam pater, quantum in se fuit, Thracem me genuit; contra mater Athenienſem (16). Such was the pride of the Athenians; they preferred the title of Citizen of Athens before the quality of a King's son-in-law, or grand-son, and they openly rewarded the murtherers of a Crowned-Head. Demosthenes tells us, that Iphicrates, tho' loaded with honours in his own country, did yet engage in a naval battle against the Athenians in behalf of his father-in-law. He adds, that Cotys was so ungrateful for this service, that he would not shew the least civility for the Athenians, in order to obtain Iphicrates's pardon. On the contrary, he endeavoured to make him exasperate his fellow-citizens more and more, for he would employ him to attack other places belonging to them: and because he could not persuade him to it, he deprived him of the command of his troops, and reduced him to the sad necessity of seeking for a sanctuary in some corner of the earth: for when Iphicrates was out of favour at the Court of Cotys, he durst not retire to Athens; because he had but lately borne arms against his native country (17). I forgot to observe, that Anaxandrides the Poet, in Athenæus (18), rallies the entertainment, which Cotys gave the day his daughter was married with Iphicrates.

(16) Corn. Nepos, in Iphicrate, sub fin.

(17) Ex Demosth. adv. Aristocrat. pag. 447.

[F] I believe this is the Cotys, whom Plutarch mentions in his Apophthegms.] Plutarch's Cotys was a very passionate man, who punished his servants cruelly, when they committed the least fault. Some person had sent him a present of very fine earthen vessels, curiously adorned with several figures painted upon them: he rewarded the person, who gave him those vessels, but he caused them all to be broken in pieces (19), because he foresaw, that his servants could not avoid breaking such brittle ware, and that in such a case he could not forbear punishing them too severely (20). This agrees pretty well with our Cotys's character. Moreri applies it to another Cotys, who followed Pompey's party, says he: but the passages he quotes, do not contain any such thing, and I don't doubt, but he is mistaken. You will find his other blunders in the following remark. Observe, that I do not deny, there was a Cotys, King of Thrace, who sent his son (21) to Pompey at the head of 500 horse.

(18) Lib. 4. cap. 3. pag. 131.

(19) Plutarch, in Apoph. pag. 174.

(20) Compare this with what Augustus did at Vedius Pollio's house, apud Senecam de Ira, lib. 3. cap. 4. pag. m. 581. and Plutarch's Advice, Lib. de Ira cohibenda, pag. 461, E. to passionate people, not to keep precious ware.

[G] Tacitus speaks of some Princes named Cotys, of whom Moreri does not give us a very true account.] I. He says, that in Nero's time, Cotys King of Thracia shared his Kingdom with his uncle Rhescuporis. He should have said, that Augustus, after the death of Rhœmetalces (22), King of Thrace, divided the Kingdom between the son and the brother of the deceased Prince. Rhescuporis, who was the brother, had for his share the countries, that were the least cultivated and lay the nearest to the enemy. Cotys, who was the son, had the countries, which were nearest to Greece. Tacitus acquaints us with this in the LXIV Chapter of the IId Book of his Annals. II. So that Moreri was very much in the wrong to quote Tacitus L. 11 & 12 Annal. & L. 11. Hist. We meet indeed in Book the 11th with a COTYS, King of the lesser Armenia, whom Moreri mentions. But the 12th Book of the Annals does not speak of this Cotys, nor is there any Cotys at all mentioned in the second Book of the History; so that Moreri's quotations are very erroneous; for, besides the observation I have just now made we may ask him, why he did not quote any authority concerning the COTYS, who, as he says, shared his Kingdom with Rhescuporis? The COTYS, mentioned in the XIIth Book of the Annals, was brother of Mithridates King of Bosphorus. The Cotys of the XIth Book was probably the son of that Cotys whom his uncle treated so cruelly; (I shall speak of him below.) What would incline me to think so is, that when the Emperor Caligula gave the lesser Armenia and part of Arabia to Cotys, he gave this same Cotys's estates to Rhœmetalces (23). This Rhœmetalces was, without doubt, the same, who after the condemnation of Rhescuporis Cotys's murtherer, obtained from Tiberius part of Thrace, the rest being given to Cotys's sons (24). III. Moreri's third blunder consists in a consi-

(21) Named Sadales. See Cæsar, de Bello Civ. lib. 3. cap. 4. See also Lucan. lib. 5. ver. 34.

(22) It is, I think, the same whom Dion mentions, lib. 54. pag. m. 624. under the year 743. and lib. 55. pag. 651. under the year 759. He was, if I am not mistaken, the brother of one Rhascíporis, son of Cotys, killed in the year 743, according to Dion, pag. 624.

(23) Dio, lib. 59. ad ann. 791. pag. m. 745.

(24) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 67.

I inform thoſe who have not the third edition of this Dictionary (in French) that they muſt omiſſion. He had before him an account abounding with moral inſtructions, of which Tacitus afforded him the materials: why then did he not make uſe of them? Let us not imitate his careleſsneſs. The two Princes, between whom Auguſtus divided Thrace, were of a very different character; Cotys was an honeſt man, polite, mild, and agreeable. Rheſcuporis was of a ſavage, cruel and ambitious temper, who could not bear a companion. Ipſorumque Regum ingenia, illi mite & amœnum, huic atrox, avidum, & ſocietatis impatiens erat (25). By this obſervation Tacitus prepares his readers to ſee without aſtoniſhment the Cataſtrophe, which he was going to deſcribe. None but very dull readers, but muſt expect, after ſuch an obſervation, to ſee Cotys deprived of his Dominions. It would be next to a miracle, if the portion of an honeſt man did not become the prey of a wicked fellow. During the Life of Auguſtus, Rheſcuporis, who dreaded his power, affected to live in friendſhip with his neighbour, and went on but ſlowly in his uſurpations; but as ſoon as he heard that Prince was dead, he invaded openly and violently his nephew's territories. Tiberius having been acquainted with it, let the two Princes know that he would have them put an end to their diſpute in a friendly manner. This was ſufficient to engage Cotys to diſarm; and as he thought others as honeſt as himſelf, he conſented to an interview, which Rheſcuporis propoſed to him, and the better to ſhew his candour, he accepted of the invitation which Rheſcuporis made him, to come to an entertainment which he would give him, with a pretence to confirm their new alliance. But after the entertainment he was bound in chains, and it was in vain that he inſiſted upon the laws of honeſty and hoſpitality. Rheſcuporis ficta modeſtia, poſtulat eundem in locum coiretur, poſſe de controverſiis colloquio tranſigi. Nec diu dubitatum de tempore, loco, dein conditionibus, cum alter facilitate, alter fraude cuncta inter ſe comederent acciperentque. Rheſcuporis, ſanciendo, ut dictitabat, fœderi, convivium adjicit; tractaque in multam noctem lætitia, per epulas ac vinolentiam incautum Cotyn, & poſtquam dolum intellexerat ſacra Regni, ejuſdem familiæ Deos, & hoſpitales menſas obteſtantem, catenis onerat (26). Rheſcuporis having made himſelf maſter of all Thrace, wrote to the Emperor, that he had been obliged to do it, in order to prevent a treaſon which Cotys was contriving againſt him (27). This is a treachery by which the moſt unjuſt offenders uſe to cover their blackeſt attempts. Tiberius anſwered him, that if he was guiltleſs, he ought not to have the leaſt miſtruſt, and ſhould ſet Cotys free, and come to Rome, there to have his cauſe tried. He choſe rather to be guilty of a complete crime, than of a crime committed but by halves, which is a much more ſubtle policy, than men imagine. He cauſed Cotys to be put to death, and gave out that he had killed himſelf. Rheſcuporis inter metum & iram cunctatus maluit patrati quam incepti facinoris reus eſſe; occidi Cotyn jubet, mortemque ſponte ſumptam ementitur (28). But the Divine Juſtice did not ſuffer him to enjoy long ſuch a wicked uſurpation: he was not cunning enough to eſcape the ſnares, which the Emperor laid for him (29); he was obliged to go to Rome, where the Senate doing juſtice to Cotys's widow, who had accuſed Rheſcuporis, deprived him of his Kingdom, and even of his liberty. He was conducted to Alexandria, and whether it was that he endeavoured to make his eſcape, or that they ſuppoſed him guilty of ſome new crime, they killed him. His ſon Rhœmetalces, who had not been concerned in his wickedneſs, had no ſhare in his puniſhment: Thrace was divided between him and the ſons of Cotys; and becauſe they were yet under age, they were put under the guardianſhip of Trebellienus Rufus, who was made Regent of the Kingdom. IV. Moreri's fourth blunder is, that he diſtinguiſhes Cotys, Rheſcuporis's nephew, from the Cotys, whom Ovid mentions: For we ought not to doubt, but the Cotys, to whom this Poet wrote an Elegy, is the ſame whom Tacitus commends, and to whom Auguſtus gave part of Thrace. Ovid beſtows great praiſes upon him, and begs his protection. He tells him in one paſſage, that the place of his baniſhment is in the neighbourhood of that King's Dominions (30), and in another paſſage he ſays, that he lives in that Prince's Forteſſes (31). This is ſomewhat obſcure. This ſame Epiſtle of Ovid acquaints us, that Cotys had ſtudied, and had even made ſome good verſes.

Adde quod ingenuas didiciſſe fideliter artes
Emollit mores, nec ſinit eſſe feros:
Nec Regum quiſquam magis eſt inſtructus in illis,
Mitibus aut ſtudiis tempora plura dedit.
Carmina teſtantur; quæ ſi tua nomina demas,
Threicium juvenem compoſuiſſe negem.

That is,

" Add to this, that the ſtudy of the liberal Arts im-
" proves the morals, and does not ſuffer us to be un-
" polite. There is no Prince in the world better ſkil-
" led in theſe than you are, nor has any King ſpent
" more time in thoſe agreeable exerciſes; witneſs your
" verſes, which, if your name was not prefixed to " them, I would never believe they were written by a
" young Thracian."

Cotys's family was ſo ancient, that it deſcended from Eumolpus (32). Now Eumolpus was the perſon, who taught the Athenians the myſteries of their Religion (33). V. Laſtly we may explode what Moreri ſays, namely, that Cotys was a certain King of the Getes, into whoſe territories Ovid was baniſhed. It is certain, that Cotys's Kingdom was Thrace, and not the country of the Getes. Cotys held perhaps a garriſon at Tomos, the place of Ovid's baniſhment; but that is not being King of the Getes. So that Lipſius ſeems to have been miſtaken, when he ſaid, in hujus regno vates ille exulavit, quod ſcire volo juventutem (34). i. e. " This Poet (Ovid) was an exile in his (Cotys's) King" dom, which the youth ought to take notice
" of." Would ever a man, who lives in a Prince's dominions, petition him, that he would make him live ſecure in the neighbourhood of his Kingdom? And yet this is the concluſion of Ovid's requeſt (35).

Some are of opinion (36), that the King, to whom Ovid wrote, was the ſon of Cotiſo, King of the Getes, of whom Suetonius ſays, M. Antonius ſcribit, primum eum (Auguſtum) Antonio, filio ſuo, deſpondiſſe Juliam; dein Cotiſoni, Getarum Regi, quo tempore ſibi quoque invicem filium Regis in matrimonium petiiſſet (37). Theſe words acquaint us with two facts, which are not to be met with in any other Writer. I. That Auguſtus deſigned to marry his daughter Julia with Cotiſo King of the Getes. II. That he himſelf deſigned to marry the daughter of this Cotiſo. For, with a great Critick's leave (38), this is the ſenſe of Suetonius's words; which ſenſe is not to be refuted by Auguſtus's conſtant affection for his ſpouſe Livia: for it muſt be obſerved, that it is Mark Anthony who ſpeaks here, and that he did not much mind what he ſaid, when he intended to render Auguſtus odious. The moſt groundleſs reports, the leaſt ſuſpicions, were ſufficient for him, to make them the ſubject of his Manifeſto's. But I come back now, in order to confute thoſe, who aſſert, that Ovid wrote to this Cotiſo's ſon. I object Tacitus to them, who expreſly aſſert (39), Cotys King of a part of Thrace, in Tiberius's time had obtained that part of the Kingdom from Auguſtus, after the death of Rhœmetalces. Whence it follows that the Cotys, who reigned in Thrace during Ovid's baniſhment, was the ſon of this Rhœmetalces. Monſieur de Tillemont (40), who thought he was only his nephew was miſtaken: the cauſe of his error was probably this. He had ſeen, that about the year 738 ſince the building of Rome Rhœmetalces governed in Thrace, as guardian to his nephews the ſons of Cotys (41), and that in 759 Rhœmetalces and his brother Rheſcuporis drove the enemy out of the country (42): He thought therefore that the Cotys, to whom Auguſtus gave part of Thrace after the death Rhœmetalces was one of thoſe pupils, ſons of Cotys, to whom Rhœmetalces was guardian in the year 738. He would not have thought ſo, had he obſerved that Tacitus's account is ſtrongly ſupported by the praiſes, which Ovid beſtows on the courage of Cotys's father (43). Theſe praiſes ſuit very well with Rhœmetalces, who appears now and then in Hiſtory from the year 738, to the year 759 (44), and one muſt make a great many groundleſs ſuppoſitions, to make theſe praiſes belong to a Cotys, who died before the year 738, leaving his children under age, which gives us reaſons to believe, that he did not reign long.

(25) Idem, ibid. cap. 64. ad ann. 772.

(26) Idem, ibid. cap. 65.

(27) Thracia omni potitus, ſcripſit ad Tiberium, ſtructas ſibi inſidias, præventum inſidiatorem. Ibid.

(28) Ibid. cap. 66.

(29) Vell. Paterculus, lib. 2. chap. 129. reckons this amongſt the beſt managed intrigues of Tiberius.

(30) Fama loquax veſtras, ſi jam pervenit ad aures,
Me tibi finitimi parte jacere Soli.
Ovid. Epiſt. 9. lib. 2. de Ponto, ver. 2.

(31) Tu quoque, fac profit intra tua Caſtra jacenti. Ibid. ver. 37.

(32) Ibid. ver. 23 and 19.

(33) Plutarch, de Exilio, pag. 607, E.

(34) Lipſ. in Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 64.

(35) Hac (natali humo) quoniam, careo, tua nunc vicinia præſtet,
Inviſo poſſim tutus ut eſſe loco.

(36) See the Ovidius Variorum, 8vo, tom. 3. pag. 661.

(37) Sueton. in Auguſt. cap. 63.

(38) Caſaubon. in hæc verba Suetonii.

(39) Annal. lib. 2. cap. 64.

(40) Hiſtoire des Empereurs, tom. 1. pag. m. 21.

(41) Dio. lib. 54. pag. 612.

(42) Idem, lib. 55. pag. 651, 652.

(43) Non tibi Caſſandreus pater eſt....
Sed quàm Marte ferox, & vinci neſcius armis
Tam nunquam facta pace cruoris amans. Ovid. Epiſt. 9. lib. 2. de Ponto, ver. 43.

(44) See Dio. lib. 54. pag. 612, 624. and 55. pag. 651.

must correct ſomething in the remarks [A] and [B] of this article. I have found that the learned Mauſſac's obſervation is well grounded (e).

(e) I am obliged for this to Monſ. Veyſſiere la Croſe.

COUSIN (GILBERT) in Latin Cognatus, born at Nozeret in Franche-Comté (a) in the year 1505, was a learned man, as he ſhewed by a great number of books, a catalogue of which may be ſeen in the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca. He had been Eraſmus's ſervant [A], and found in him a maſter, who did juſtice to his great qualities. Eraſmus had a great eſteem for him, and taught him ſeveral things [B]. He procured him a Canonry at Nozeret, and offered him his own houſe upon very advantageous terms, when he found him weary of his living, becauſe of the law-ſuits to which it expoſed him. See the Letters XLVI, LI, and LV of the XXVIIth Book of Eraſmus. Couſin was ſtill living in the year 1563 [C]. He was not guilty of Plagiariſm with regard to the paſſage which Thomaſius cites (b), for his Notes upon Lucian were printed before Peter Pithou's Adverſaria had been publiſhed.

(a) Epit. Bibliotb. Geſneri.

[A] He had been Eraſmus's ſervant.] Here follows what Eraſmus wrote to Lewis de Vers, Abbot of Mount St. Mary, who was one of Couſin's relations. Gilbertus Cognatus mihi jam pluſquam triennium fidelem & commodum præſtitit famulum, quem ego tamen ob mores liberales non tam pro famulo habui, quam pro convictore, & in ſtudiorum laboribus ſocio. Proinde & tuæ reverendæ amplitudini gratulor talem cognatum, & illi multo magis tam amicum & benignum patronum. i. e. "Gilbert Couſin has ſerved me above three years "faithfully and well; and as he has a generous mind, "I treat him rather as a companion, and a partner "of my ſtudies, than as a ſervant. I congratulate "your Reverence for having ſuch a relation, and him "much more, for having ſuch a friend and kind pa-"tron as you are." I have extracted this from the XLVIth Letter of Eraſmus's XXVIIth book; this Letter is dated December the 11th 1533.

[B] Eraſmus . . . taught him ſeveral things.] Eraſmus reckons this amongſt the advantages which Couſin met with in his ſervice; he even pretends, that he preſerved him from the contagious danger of the new opinions. Spero autem fore, ut illum temporis apud me peracti non pœniteat, nam præter eruditionis fructum, quod ex mea conſuetudine cepit haud pœnitendum. . . . poterat alibi nonnihil attrahere contagii a Sectarum amatoribus; apud me vero, etiam ſi quid attraxiſſet, purgari potuit (1). I do not know what Couſin's opinions were during Eraſmus's life; however I do not doubt, but he was afterwards either a Proteſtant, or a favourer of the Proteſtants (a).

(1) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 46. lib. 27.

(a). The reading of his Adagia does ſtrongly incline us to believe it. See amongſt others, the chapter intitled, Magis fantaſticus quam Papæ Mula. i. e. "More fantaſtical than the Pope's Mule." CRIT. REM.

[C] He was ſtill living in the year 1563.] This appears from the advertiſement to the reader, which Marc Hopperus prefixed to the edition of Lucian publiſhed at Baſil in the year 1563. He beſtows there a great many praiſes upon Gilbert Couſin, whoſe Notes upon Lucian were inſerted in that edition.

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 120. 2d edit. London 1721. and Sir Thomas Pope-Blount's Remarks upon Poetry with Characters and Cenſures of the moſt conſiderable Poets, whether Antient or Modern, extracted out of the beſt and choiceſt Criticks, pag. 48. of the Characters and Cenſures: edit. London 1694, in 4to.

☞COWLEY (ABRAHAM), one of the greateſt Engliſh Poets of the ſeventeenth Century, was born in Fleetſtreet near the end of Chancery-Lane in London in the year 1618. His father, who was a Grocer, dying before the ſon was born, his mother by her endeavours and friends procured him to be admitted a King's Scholar in Weſtminſter (a). The occaſion of his firſt inclination to Poetry, was his caſual lighting on Spenſer's Fairy Queen, when he was but juſt able to read [A]; and this inclination was ſo far improved in him, that at thirteen years of age he began to write ſeveral Poems, a collection of which was publiſhed in 1633, when he was but fifteen years old [B]. While he was at School he had this defect in his memory, that his Teachers could never bring it to retain the

[A] The occaſion of his firſt inclination to Poetry was his caſual lighting upon Spenſer's Fairy Queen, when he was but juſt able to read.] He informs us of this circumſtance in his Eſſay upon himſelf, where he writes as follows; I believe I can tell the particular little chance, that filled my head firſt with ſuch chimes of verſe, as have never ſince left ringing there. For I remember when I began to read, and take ſome pleaſure in it, there was wont to lie in my mother's parlour (I know not by what accident, for ſhe herſelf never in her life read any book but of devotion) but there was wont to lie Spenſer's Works. This I happened to fall upon, and was infinitely delighted with the ſtories of the Knights, and Giants, and Monſters, and brave Houſes, which I found every where there (though my underſtanding had little to do with all this,) and by degrees with the tinkling of the rhyme and dance of numbers, ſo that I think I had read him all over before I was twelve years old, and was thus made Poet as immediately as a child is made an eunuch.

[B] At thirteen years of age he began to write ſeveral Poems, a collection of which was publiſhed in 1633, when we was but fifteen years of age.] Dr. Sprat in his Life of him (1) is miſtaken in aſſerting that this Collection was publiſhed in the thirteenth year of his age, ſince Mr. Cowley was born in 1618, and this Collection was printed at London 1633 in 4to, under the title of Poetical Bloſſoms, and contained Antonius and Melida, and the Tragical Hiſtory of Pyramus and Thiſbe; the former dedicated to Dr. John Williams Biſhop of Lincoln, and the latter to Mr. Lambert Osbaldeſton, Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool. Before both is his picture with his age ſet over it, viz. 13, but falſe, as Mr. Wood obſerves (2). There are alſo verſes made by his ſchool-fellows in commendation of them; and at the end are two Elegies, one on Dudley Lord Carleton, and another on his kinſman Richard Clerk of Lincoln's-Inn Gent. and A Dream of Elyſium. Dr. Sprat (3) tells us, that there are many things in theſe Poems, that might well become the vigour and force of a manly wit. Mr. Cowley in his Eſſay upon himſelf gives us ſome ſtanza's of an Ode, printed in this Collection, and written when he was but thirteen years old. "The beginning of it, ſays "he, is boyiſh, but of this part, which I here ſet down "(if a very little were corrected) I ſhould hardly now "be much aſhamed."

(1) Prefixed to his Works.

(2) Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 120.

(3) Ubi ſupra.

IX.

This only grant me, that my means may lie
Too low for envy, for contempt too high.
Some honour I would have,
Not from great deeds, but good alone.
The unknown are better than ill known.
Rumour can ope' the grave:
Acquaintance I would have, but when't depends
Not on the number, but the choice of friends.

X.

Books ſhould, not buſineſs, entertain the light,
And ſleep, as undiſturb'd as death, the night.
My houſe a cottage more
Than palace, and ſhould fitting be
For all my uſe, no luxury.
My garden painted o'er
With Nature's hands, not art's, and pleaſures yield, Horace might envy in his Sabine field.

